The signe of the foresaid crosse was not onelie seene of the Picts and Scots being there with them in aid, to both their great comforts and gladnesse, but also of the Englishmen to their no lesse discouragement, as they that vnderstood saint Andrew to be patrone and protector of the Scotish and Pictish nations. For it did put such a feare into their hearts, that when they came to the point of ioining, their stomachs so failed them, that with small resistance they were easilie vanquished (as is said) and put to flight. For this so manifest a miracle, after the battell was once ended, and the victorie obteined, Hungus repaired with his people following him, vnto the church of that blessed man saint Regulus, now called saint Andrewes, where they made their offerings with humble deuotion vnto the reliches of the apostle, rendering thanks vnto him for their victorie with deuout praier after the accustomed maner. They vowed there also at the verie same time (as the fame goeth) that from thenceforth as well they as their posteritie in time of war should weare a crosse of saint Andrew for their badge and cognisance. Which ordinance continuallie after remained with the Picts, and after their destruction and extermination with the Scots euen vnto our time. The bodie of Athelstane was buried in the nert church vnto the place where the field was fought, howbeit, some haue left in writing that his head was cut off from the bodie, and brought to Inchgarue, where being set vpon a stake, it was shewed to the people in reproch of his iniurious enterprise.

Hungus the Pictish king to shew himselfe yet more mindfull of the due honoring of the holie apostle, by whose aid he acknowledged himselfe to haue got the victorie aforesaid, not onelie augmented his church with new bildings & needfull reparations, but increased the number of priests for the celebrating of diuine seruice; he also gaue manie rich and costlie ornaments vnto the same, as chalices, cruets, basons, & such like. Moreouer, he caused to be made the images of Christ and his 12 apostles of fine gold and siluer, which he bestowed there; with a case also of beaten gold, therein to inclose the relickes of saint Andrew. And besides this, he ordeined that the spiritualtie should haue the tenths of all increase of goods: as of corne, cattels, herbage, and such like through his realme: and further that spirituall persons should not be compelled to answere before anie temporall iudge. But these beneficiall priuiledges the Pictish clergie did not long inioy. For Feredeth that was the fourth, which reigned amongest the Picts after Hungus, toke from them all such gifts as this Hungus had giuen them, and further ordeined to the derogation of their priuileges, that they should answere for secular crimes afore secular magistrats; and that liuing vpon their former reuenues, souldiers & men of war should inioy the other which Hungus, had so frelie bestowed vpon them.

The nobles of the land mainteined Feredeth in his doings, reckoning all that spirituall persons had to be but cast away, which was the cause (as some thought) that their kingdome came into such ruine, as shortlie after followed. There be some chronicles that write how these things, which are mentioned of Hungus, and Athelstane, chanced not altogither about about this ſeaſon, but Hector Boetius followeth Veremond in moſt of his accounts, as the author whom he taketh to be moſt certeine, as well for the account of the time as in the courſe of the whole hiſtorie. And for that we meane not to preſume wholie to derogat the ſame Boetius his credit, we haue not much diſſented from him, but rather followed him in moſt places, leauing ſuch doubts as may be worthilie put forth of that which he writeth, vnto the conſideration of the diligent reader, ſith it is not our purpoſe to impugne, but rather to report what we find written by others, except now and then by the way to admoniſh the reader of ſome vnlikelihods (as the ſame doth ſéeme to vs and others) and happilie not without iuſt occaſion.

But now to our purpoſe. As well Hungus king of Picts, as Achaius king of Scots, after the ouerthrow and death of Athelſtane, liued with their people in good quiet and reſt: for the Engliſhmen attempted nothing againſt the Scots and Picts afterwards, during the time of their reignes. At length Achaius, after he had reigned 32 yeares, departed this life, in the yeare of our Lord 819, which was about the firſt yeare of Hungus his dominion ouer the Picts. His bodie was buried in Colmekill, according to the maner of kings amongeſt his predeceſſors. In the dais of this Achaius (beſide Clement and others, of whome before ye haue heard) liued biſhop Gerualdus a notable preacher in Murrey land, alſo biſhop Glacian with Modan and Medan two brethren, all doctors and men of ſingular knowledge, in reſpect whereof they were had in great credit and eſtimation with the people.

Betwixt this Conuall and Hungus the Piciſh king, there was wonderfull loue and amitie ſhewed, both of them ſtudieng by all means how to maintéine the ancient league and alliance betwixt their people, whereupon inſued great wealth and quietneſſe vnto both their kingdoms. Finallie Hungus waſted with a continuall conſumption deceaſſed, deliuering vp his kingdome into the hands of his ſonne Dorſtolorgus, and that in the preſence of king Conuall, who likewiſe liued not long after him, for in the firſt yeare of his reigne he likewiſe departed out of this world, by force of naturall ſickneſſe.

DOngall the ſonne of king Soluathius was receiued to ſucceed by the common conſent of the ſtates of all the realme, a man of ſingular wiſdome and great knowledge. But for that he was ſomewhat ſeuere in puniſhing the miſordered behauiours of the nobilitie, & miſgouerned youth of his realme, diuers of the nobles conſpired againſt him, forcing one Alpine the ſonne of Achaius to make claime to the crowne; who perceiuing there was no remedie, but either to follow their minds, or elſe to be murthered amongeſt them, conſented to go with them into Argile, where they purpoſed to crowne him king ſitting vpon the chaire of marble, according to the manner. Howbeit, at his comming into that countrie, he found means to conuey himſelfe from amongeſt them, leaſt through his means the quiet ſtate of his countrie ſhould be brought into trouble: and forthwith being eſcaped out of their hands with a few other that were priuie to his intention, he maketh all the haſt he could, till he came to the preſence of Dongall, who receiued him in moſt ioifull wiſe, promiſing that if it ſhould be thought neceſſarie by the ſtates of the realme, he would gladlie reſigne vnto him his whole crowne and dignitie, deſirous of nothing more than to ſée the aduancement of the houſe of Achaius. Such (ſaith he) were the merits of that famous prince towards the preſeruation of the Scotiſh common wealth, that it were too much wickednеſſe to go about to defraud his iſſue of the inheritance of the realme.

Alpine conſtrained by the nobles, taketh vpon him to be crowned king.

Alpine vnwilling to receiue the crowne fled.

Alpine his excuſe vnto Dongall.

Alpine was ioifullie receiued of Dongall.

Alpine giuing the king moſt hartie thanks, beſought him to continue in the adminiſtration, drawing God and the world to witneſſe, that he minded nothing leſſe than to be about to claime the gouernement of the kingdome ſo long as he liued. For as touching his offenſe, in that he had gathered an armie, and led the ſame into Argile, it was not his fault, but the conſpirators which had forced him thereto, being determined to haue ſlaine him, if he had not conſented vnto their deſires. Within three yeares after, there came meſſengers from the rebels to excuſe themſelues alſo, & to put all the fault in Alpine: but king Dongall giuing ſmall credit to their forged words, gathereth his power, and maketh ſuch ſpéed towards the place where he vnderſtood the ſaid rebels were aſſembled togither, that he was vpon them yer they had anie knowledge of his ſetting forwards. So that before they could make anie ſhift to eſcape out of danger, which they went about to do, they were apprehended, and immediatlie condemned and put to death. Which execution put other preſumptuous perſons in feare, ſo that the ſtate of the realme remained afterward a great deale more in quiet.

Dongall maketh an armie againſt the rebels.

Whileſt things paſſed thus in Scotland, Eganus the ſecond ſonne of Hungus the Piciſh king, found means to murder his brother Dorſtolorgus, to the end he might reigne in his place: and through ſupport of ſome of the nobilitie he atteined to his purpoſe. And for that he would aſſure himſelfe the more firmelie in the eſtate, he frankelie beſtowed his fathers treaſure amongeſt his lords and chiefeſt peers of his realme, and toke to wife Brenna the king of Mercia his daughter, whom his brother the forenamed Dorſtolorgus had maried, that thereby he might aſſwage the ſaid king of Mercia his diſpleaſure, which otherwiſe he ſhould happilie haue conceiued for the death of his other ſonne in law the ſame Dorſtolorgus. His feare was great on eth ſide, and therefore had ſmall affiance in anie perſon, doubting leſt one or other ſhould ſéeke to reuenge his brothers death. He durſt neuer go anie waies forth abroad without a gard of men of warre about him, whome he had wone & made his faſt friends by his paſſing great largeſſe and bountifull liberalitie. At length yet, his wife to reuenge hir former huſbands death, found means to ſtrangle him as he lay one night faſt aſléepe, hauing dronke a little too much in the euening before, and in this ſort he came to his end, after he had reigned much what about the ſpace of two yeares.

Thus both Eganus & Dorſtolorgus being made away, without leauing anie iſſue behind them, forſomuch as now there remained none of the poſteritie of Hungus to ſucceed in gouernement of the Piciſh kingdome, Alpine nephue to the ſaid Hungus, by his ſiſter Ferguſiana, with the aduiſe of king Dongall, made claime thereunto, and thervpon ſent his meſſengers vnto the lords and péeres of the Piciſh dominion, to require them on his behalfe, that he might be receiued to the gouernement of the kingdome due vnto him by lawfull inheritance, as they well vnderſtood: and that if they throughlie conſidered of the thing, they might perceiue it was the proviſion of almightie God, that for want of lawfull ſucceſſion lineallie deſcended from Hungus, now to ſucceed in the eſtate of the Piciſh kingdome, by this meanes both the nations Scots and Picts ſhould be ioined in one, to the abolithing of all ſuch mortall warres, as by diſcord and contention might ariſe betwixt thoſe two people, in like ſort as before time there had done, to the great perill and danger of both their vtter ruines.

The Picts chooſe Feredeth to be king.

The Picttiſh nobilitie, hauing knowledge that theſe meſſengers with ſuch kind of meſſage ſhould ſhortlie come from Alpine, with generall conſent and whole agreement, chooſe one Feredeth to be their king, a man of great authoritie amongſt them, ſuppoſing this to be a meane to defeat Alpines title, and that thereby he ſhould ſéeme to be excluded from any further claime. Within few daies after, came vnto Camelon the Scotiſh ambaſſadors, where Feredeth with his nobles at that preſent were aſſembled: they being admitted therefore to declare their meſſage, when they began to enter into their matter of the right which Alpine had to the kingdome of the Picts, the people would not ſuffer them to proceed anie further therein, but began to make ſuch an vprore, that to appeaſe the noiſe, Feredeth himſelfe toke vpon him to make anſwer vnto the ambaſſadors: and thervpon commanding ſilence, declared vnto them that the Picts neither might nor ought to admit any ſtranger to reigne ouer them: for there was an ancient law among them, of moſt high authoritie, that in caſe of neceſſitie they might tranſpoſe the crowne from houſe to houſe: and further, that by the ſame law there was an ordenance decreed, that if anie man were once made and created king, he might not be depoſed during his naturall life. And therfore though it were ſo, that Alpine were the nephue of Hungus by his ſiſter Ferguſiana: yet bicauſe he was a ſtranger borne, and conſidering withall, that the people by their full authoritie had tranſlated the regall adminiſtration vnto an other houſe, of the which one was alredie proclamed and inueſted king, there was no reaſon now, why Alpine ſhould make anie further claime or demand vnto the kingdome.

The ambaſſadors come into the court.

King Feredeth his anſwer vnto the Scotiſh ambaſſadors.

Vpon the meſſengers returne home with this anſwer, Dongall ſhewed himſelfe to be in no ſmall chaſe, that the Picts ſhould thus go about by ſuch ſubtill arguments and contriued inuentions to defraud Alpine of his right. And therevpon the ſecond time he ſent his ambaſſadors vnto them, requiring them either to doo him reaſon without anie further ſurmiſed cauillations; either elſe within three moneths ſpace after to looke for open warres at the Scotiſhmens hands. Theſe ambaſſadors paſſing forth on their iourneie, at their approching vnto Camelon, certeine ſergeants at armes met them, and did forbid them to enter the citie: alſo they further commanded them in name of Feredeth their king to auoid out of the confines of his dominions within foure daies ſpace, vpon paine of death.

Dongall his diſpleaſure with the Picts anſwer.

Ambaſſadors ſent againe.

Ambaſſadors are not receiued.

The ambaſſadors being terrefied with ſuch maner of inhibitions, they went no further: but yet according as they had in commiſſion, they pronounced the warre in the name of Alpine and Dongall, requiring thoſe that thus came to méet them, to giue ſignification therof vnto their maiſter Feredeth, and to the whole Pictiſh nation; and ſo returned home the ſame way they came. Then did the Scotiſh lords repaire vnto Dongall, who at the ſame time laie in Carrike caſtell, and there taking counſell for the maintenance of theſe warres, not one was found amongeſt them which offered not to ſpend both life, lands, & goods in Alpines iuſt quarell. By this means was great preparation made on both ſides for the warre, the Scots minding to ſet Alpine in his right, and the Picts determining not to receiue any prince of a ſtrange nation to reigne ouer them. But whileſt Dongall goeth about to prouide all things readie for his enterprize, he chanced to be drowned in the riuer of Speie, as he was about to paſſe the ſame in a boate. This miſhap chanced him in the firſt yéere of his reigne, and after the birth of our Sauiour 830. His bodie was buried in Colmekill, with all funerall obſequies. 930.

Alpine.

Alpine crowned king of Scotland.

After Dongall was Alpine receiued to the crowne and gouernement of the realme, by the generall voices of all the people, whoſe chiefeſt ſtudie was vpon his firſt entring into the eſtate, to follow his ſute touching his title to the Pictiſh kingdome: and herevpon with all diligence preparing a mightie hoſt and all other things (which were thought requiſite for the furthering of his enterprize) he paſſed forth towards Angus, not ſtaieng till he came to the caſtell of Forfair, which he beſieged; but the third day after his comming thither, Feredeth the Pictiſh king with a great armie of his ſubiects aranged in good order of battell, came and preſented himſelfe in ſight of the Scots, whervpon immediatlie nére vnto the towne of Reſkennoth they met, and ioining there in battell, fought right fiercelie. At the firſt encounter the right wing of the Scotiſh armie was nére hand ouerthrowne; but Fenedocht lieutenant of Athole came ſpédilie to the ſuccors with 400 of his countriemen, and reſtored the battell on the Scotiſh ſide: whereby inſued a right ſore bickering with great ſlaughter, and no ſigne of ſhrinking on either part, by meanes whereof it ſéemed doubtfull for a long ſpace vnto whether ſide the victorie would incline.

At length Feredeth perceiuing the middle ward of his battell a litle to ſhrinke, ſpédilie preaſſed forth to ſuccor the ſame with a choſen companie of ſuch as he had appointed to attend him: but entring thus with great violence amongſt the thickeſt preaſe of his enimies, he was cloſed in on each ſide, and excluded ſo from the reſidue of his owne people, that hée could neither returne the ſame way he entered, neither yet by anie other, ſo that he with thoſe that were with him, perceiuing their liues to be in preſent danger, did caſt themſelues into a ring, determining yet to reuenge their owne deaths, whervpon rather wearied with continuall fight, than vanquiſhed, or with any feare oppreſſed, they were ſlaine all the whole number of them, togither with Feredeth their king. Yet herewith did not the other Picts giue ouer the battell, ſo long as anie daie light was on the ſkie. So that the night in the end parted them in ſunder, both the armies withdrawing to their camps with ſmall ioy or triumph, by reaſon of the great ſlaughter which had béene made on both ſides.

Feredeth is ſlaine.

The night parted the armies.

The capteins of the Picts weieng with themſelues the loſſe of their king, and great multitude of their men, thought it not beſt to abide any longer in the field: wherefore leauing their wounded people behind them, with all their baggage in the campe, they fled incontinentlie the ſame night, ſome into one place, & ſome into another, where they thought beſt for their owne wealth and ſafetie. The Scots had fled immediatlie likewiſe, but that word was brought them as they were about to depart, how the Picts were gone alreadie, and had left their campe void of men of warre to defend the ſame. Whervpon the Scots taried till it was day, not farre from the place of the battell. In the morning there were certeine horſſemen appointed to ride abroad, and to view the field, thereby to vnderſtand whether the Picts ment anie deceit by their departure, as by laieng of ſome ambuſhments, or otherwiſe: but vpon the returne of thoſe horſſemen, when it was once knowne how there was no ſuch matter, but that they were fled in déed, the Scots reioiſing thereat, fell to and gathered the ſpoile of the field, diuiding the ſame amongſt themſelues according to their accuſtomed order.

The Picts fled by night.

Alpine

Alpine himſelfe commanded the bodie of his enimie Feredeth to be laid in chriſtian buriall not farre from Forfair. After this cauſing the muſters of his people to be taken, he found that he had loſt the third part of his armie in that mortall and cruell battell, and thereupon brake vp his campe for that time, licencing thoſe that were left aliue to returne vnto their homes. This battell being fought in the firſt yeare of the reignes of the two foreſaid kings, weakned the forces of both nations, ſo farre forth that the Scots doubting to bring the realme into danger of vtter ruine (if they ſhould commit their whole puiſſance eftſoones to the hazard of another foughten field) determined to purſue the warre by making of incurſions and inrodes onelie vpon their enimies, ſo to vex the Picts, and to bring them vnto reaſon, if it were poſſible. And ſo much verely the Scotiſhmen did by ſuch their continuall rodes & incurſions which they made into Angus, that the countrie was left void and deſolate of all the inhabitants.

Feredeth is buried.

The Scots determine to warre onlie with incurſions.

Neither did Brudus the ſonne of Feredeth, (whome the Picts had choſen to ſucceed after his father in the kingdome) find anie ſpeedie redreſſe to withſtand thoſe dailie inuaſions thus made by the Scots vpon his countries and ſubiects. For he was but a ſlouthfull perſon, and verie negligent in his office, whereupon he was had in deriſion of his owne people, who in the end ſlue him amongſt themſelues before he had reigned fullie the terme of one whole yeare. Then ſucceeded Keneth, the ſecond ſonne of Feredeth, with no better hap or end than his brother. For gathering togither an armie of his ſubiects, and comming with them into Angus, he came no ſooner within ſight of his enimies, but that caſting off his armor, he fled incontinentlie, leauing his people in the field; and for that his haſte, was ſlaine by a plowman that met him by chance, and knew him not, but yet perceiuing how he had fled from his companie, and therefore deſerued not to haue anie other fauour. His people ſeeing themſelues deſtitute of their head capteine and gouernor, retired from their enimies, keeping themſelues in order of battell without anie further attempt.

After this infortunate end of Keneth, the Picts choſe to their king one Brudus, a man of a ſtout and manlike ſtomach, who immediatlie vpon his entring into the eſtate, comming into Angus (which region the Scots had made waſte) catched there certeine Scotiſh robbers, and forthwith hanged them vp vpon gibets. After this, he ſent forth his ambaſſadors vnto king Alpine for reformation of all iniuries and wrongs betwixt the two nations, and to haue the ancient league renewed betwixt them. Alpine and the Scotiſh lords, hauing quicklie aduiſed what to anſwer, declared vnto the Pictiſh ambaſſadors plainelie, that they would not heare anie treatie for peace, till the Picts had deliuered the kingdome vnto the right heire. Brudus vnderſtanding by this anſwer, that the Scots would ſtill follow the warres againſt the Picts; to be the better able to withſtand their malice, he purpoſed to procure the friendſhip of the Engliſhmen, to haue their aid againſt the Scots. He ſent therefore his ambaſſadors with a great ſumme of monie vnto Edwine king of Northumberland, requiring him of his fauour, and to haue ſome number of his people for his wages to ſerue him againſt the Scots.

Manie of the Picts reioiſed greatlie, that they ſhould haue aid thus of the Engliſhmen, hoping thereby to haue aſſured victorie of their aduerſaries. Other miſtruſted not a little the Engliſhmens offers, by reaſon of the old enimitie betwixt the Picts and them. In this meane ſeaſon the Scots take and ſeize vpon all the countrie of Angus, euen from the mounteine of Granzebene vnto the riuer of Taie, whereof Brudus being certified, ſendeth a poſt with all ſpeed vnto king Edwine king of Northumberland, requiring him to ſend to his aid a power of Engliſhmen, to helpe to reſiſt the Scots, which at that preſent inuaded his countrie. To which demand Edwine made this anſwer, that he was not onelie troubled with ciuill war made againſt him by other Engliſhmen, but alſo had beene requeſted by Lewes ſurnamed Pius, as then French king, in no wiſe to indamage the Scots his confederats, ſo that for that yeare preſent he might not conuenientlie ſend to him anie ſuccours, but if he would defer the warres till the nert yeare, he ſhould haue the beſt helpe that he were able to ſhew him.

Brudus perceiuing himſelfe thus mocked and deluded by the Engliſhmen, commanded by ſolemne ſummons, that all ſuch of his ſubiects, as were able to beare armor, ſhould aſſemble in nether Caliden within eight daies after, with conuenable proviſion of vittels, there to know his pleaſure. His commandement was obeied: ſo that a mightie armie of men at the day and place appointed came togither, which being muſtered, they ſtreitwaies remoue vnto Calidon caſtell, now called Dunkeld, where they paſſe the riuer of Taie, and ſo enter into Angus, not without ſome difficultie: but being once gotten ouer, they march forthwith towards the place where they vnderſtood their enimies did lie. Brudus the night before the day in the which he thought they ſhould haue battell, by the aduiſe of certeine expert warriours, which he had with him, appointed all the horſes that were in the campe, ſeruing for burden, to be beſtowed amongſt the women, lackies, and coiſtrels, part of them being clad in armor, and part in white linnen, with long poles in their hands like to ſpeares and iauelins. Amongſt them alſo he ordeined an hundred horſſemen to be placed, whome he made priuie as then to his intention, by whoſe leading that feat which ſhould be wrought in this behalfe, was to be atchiued. Theſe he cauſed to lie couertlie within a wood neere vnto the place where the battell ſhould be fought, giuing them in commandement not to ſhew themſelues till the battell were begun.

Brudus being deceiued of the Engliſhmen, called his owne ſubiects to the warre, aſſembling them at the foot of Calidon wood.

A wonderfull policie vſed by Brudus.

King Alpine all this while held himſelfe in a caſtell which ſtood vpon an hill, a little from Dundee, being now decaied, ſo that little thereof remaineth to be ſeene at this day. Vpon the north ſide of the hill, there lieth a great large plaine, compaſſed on ech ſide with mounteins, as then full of woods & launds, but now for the moſt part bare and without anie trees or buſhes. In this plaine were the Scots incamped. Alpine beholding forth of the caſtell, how the Picts approched to giue battell, got him into the campe, & erhorting his people to ſhew themſelues valiant, placed them in araie. The Picts no leſſe deſirous to fight than their gouernors would haue wiſhed them, began the battell before they had commandement, with ſuch violence, that the right wing of the Scots was ſore diſordered. But Alpine perceiuing that, came ſpedilie to their ſuccours, greatlie reprouing them for their faintneſſe of courage. To be ſhort, he did ſo much to imbolden them, that by his means the fight was renewed in moſt cruell wiſe: inſomuch that thoſe which before were put backe, began to winne ground againe, and to beate downe their enimies verie fiercelie.

Thus few were ſlaine in the battell, but a great number died in the chaſe, & were beaten downe on ech ſide as they were ouertaken by the Picts. Alpine himſelfe was taken, and hauing his hands bound behind him, was led to the next towne, and there beheaded. The place beareth the name of him vnto this day, being called Paſalpine. His head alſo was ſet vpon a pole, and borne vnto Camelon, and there ſet vp vpon one of the higheſt turrets of the wall. The Scots that eſcaped from this ſorowfull ouerthrow, got them with all ſpéd into Argile, where they inueſted Kenneth the ſonne of Alpine king of their realme. This was in the yére of our Lord 834, and the fourth yére after Alpine entred firſt into the eſtate.

The Picts hauing atchiued this great and ioifull victorie, aſſembled at Camelon by commandement of their king, where cauſing a ſolemne proceſſion to be made, in rendering thanks to almightie God for their good ſucceſſe in their paſſed iournie: they take a generall oth vpon the goſpell booke, that from thenceforth they would not ceaſſe to make the Scots war, till they had vtterlie deſtroied the race of them: and herewith ordeined a law, that if anie man made mention of anie peace or league to be had with the Scots, he ſhould loſe his head for it. There were indeed ſome ancient perſonages amongſt them, that ſpake againſt this inſolent outrage of the people, alledging that in time of proſperous ſucceſſe men ought to vſe a modeſtie: but certeine youthfull perſons offended with ſuch graue aduiſe, thruſt the authors thereof out of the church, within the which they were as then aſſembled. The Scots being certified héereof, were nothing hérewith diſcouraged, but rather put in good hope of better ſucceſſe, ſith their enimies abuſed themſelues thus in time of felicitie.

The Picts giue thanks vnto God for their victorie. They make a vow to continue the warre.

The good counſell of graue men is deſpiſed.

The Scots are animated.

The nert ſummer after, the Picts aſſembled their power togither, and ſetting forward towards the Scots, thorough a light occaſion they fell at variance amongſt themſelues, and fought with ſuch hatred togither, that the king was not able to appeaſe the fraie, till night parted them in ſunder. Then calling the lords afore him, he aſſaied alwaies to haue agréed the parties, but when he ſaw it would not be, in the morning he gaue them licence to depart euerie man to his owne home, breaking off his iournie for that time. Bzudus liued not paſt thre moneths after, for thorough griefe that things went not forward as he wiſhed, he fell into a gréeuous diſeaſe, and finallie thereof died. After whoſe deceaſſe, the Picts choſe his brother named Druſken, to ſucced in gouernment of the kingdome, who aplied his whole indeuour vpon his firſt entring into the eſtate, to appeaſe the ciuill diſcord amongſt his ſubiects.

The Picts fall at variance within themſelues.

Bzudus died.

Druſken K. ouer the Picts

But whileſt he was thus buſilie occupied about the ſame, there were certeine Scots, which ſore diſdained to vnderſtand that the head of their late king ſhould remaine vnburied, in ſuch reprochfull ſort amongſt their enimies. Wherevpon hauing perfect knowledge of the Pictiſh tong, they feined themſelues to be merchantmen of that countrie, & comming vnto Camelon, watched their time, till they found meanes in the night ſeaſon to ſteale to the wals, and ſecretlie taking awaie the head, eſcaped with the ſame home into their owne countrie.

The head of king Alpine is ſtolne, and ſolemnlie buried with the bodie.

This act of theirs was not a little commended: and ſo now the head of king Alpine being recouered, was cloſed in a ledden coffin, and Kenneth himſelfe, hauing in his companie a great number of his nobles, went with it ouer into Colmekill, where he buried it in the abbeie, amongſt the ſepultures of his elders, togither with the reſidue of the bodie in verie ſolemne wiſe, as apperteined. And further, thoſe perſons that had put their liues in aduenture to fetch the ſame head from the wals of Camelon, were by Kenneth rewarded with rich gifts and lands in perpetuitie, to remaine to them and to their heires for euer. After this, Kenneth deuiſing for the ſuertie of his ſubiects, furniſhed all the holds and caſtels on the frontiers of his enimies with men and munition, according as he thought expedient: and moreouer tooke order, that all the youth of the realme ſhould be in a readineſſe vpon an houres warning, to go forth againſt the Picts, if they attempted anie new inuaſions.

Kenneth fortified the realme.

But the Scotiſh lords had no great luſt to take anie enterpriſe in hand eftſoones againſt the Picts, remembring how infortunatelie they had ſped the laſt time: ſo that for the ſpace of thre yéres there was no great exploit atchiued, ſaue certeine roads and incurſions, which both the nations continuallie vſed to make one vpon an other, as time and occaſion ſerued. At length king Kenneth being verie deſirous to be reuenged of the Picts, for the death of his father king Alpine, and other iniuries by them done and attempted againſt the Scotiſh nation, in the fourth yére of his reigne, he aſſembled the peeres and chiefeſt nobles of his realme, truſting to perſuade them to aid him in all ſuch enterpriſes as he ment to take in hand againſt the Picts, whome he purpoſed to purſue with open warres, till he had them at his pleaſure. But calling his lords and peeres thus aſſembled on a day before him, and going earneſtlie about to moue them to the warres, he could ſtir them no more to his purpoſe, than if he had beene in hand to haue counſelled them vnto that which in no wiſe had apperteined vnto their duties: which their lacke of ſtomach, Kenneth perceiuing, he began to deuiſe a prettie ſhift, whereby to induce them to his accord.

Kenneth called his nobles to reuenge his fathers death.

A prettie ſhift deuiſed by the king to perſuade the nobilitie.

Firſt therefore, breaking vp the aſſemblie for the ſame day, he commanded that they ſhould come togither againe on the nert morow, to conſult further for the ſtate of the realme, as they ſhould ſée cauſe. The ſame euening alſo he had them all to ſupper, which being prolonged till farre in the night, it was late before they went to bed, ſo that being ouerwatched, when they were once gotten to reſt, they were ſone brought into a ſound ſléepe. Now had the king appointed for euerie one of their chambers one man apparelled in garments prétilie deuiſed and made of fiſh ſkins vnſkaled, bearing in one of their hands a ſtaffe of ſuch rotten wood as ſhineth in the night, and in their other hand a great ore horne, to the end that vttering their words thorough the ſame, the ſound of their voices ſhould ſéeme farre differing from the vſuall ſpéech of man.

Thus appointed in the dead of the night, they enter the chambers to ech of them aſſigned, where (as is ſaid) the lords laie faſt aſléepe, who being at the firſt as it were halfe awakened, were wonderfullie amazed at the ſtrangeneſſe of the ſight (doubting whether it were but a dreame, or ſome true and vnfeined viſion.) Hérewith alſo were heard certeine ſeuerall voices, far greater than thoſe of men, declaring that they were meſſengers ſent from almightie God vnto the Scotiſh nobilitie, to command them to obeie their king, for his requeſt was iuſt: the Pictiſh kingdome due vnto him by rightfull heritage, & ought to be recouered from that people, which for their great offenſes and ſins towards almightie God, ſhould ſhortlie come to vtter deſtruction: ſuch was the determinate pleaſure of his diuine maieſtie,

Of ſuch ſights there were manie in thoſe dates: and oftentimes no doubt eſtéemed to be heauenlie viſions in déed.

teitie, against the which night neither counsell nor puissance of man be able to resist.

When the counterfeited messengers had thus made an end of their words, they sillie hid their staues vnder their innermost garments, and therewith quicklie conueied their vppermost vestures made of fish skales (as I haue said) into their bosoms, in such slight and nimble wise, that it seemed these visions had suddenlie vanished awaie. Those lords that had seene these sights, laie still for that night, greatlie musing on the matter. In the morning being got vp, and assembled in the councell chamber, they declared to ech other what they had seene and heard in the night passed. And for that all their visions which they had seene by ech others report, were in euerie behalfe like, and nothing differing one from an other, they beleeued verelie it was some celestiall oracle & message sent from God. Therefore presentlie they go vnto the king, declaring vnto him how they had beene admonished from aboue, to continue the warres with all their forces against the Picts.

The lords declare their vision vnto the king.

The king told them he had seene the like vision, but they ought to keepe it close, least by glorieng too much in the fauour shewed by almightie God toward them, they might happilie displease his diuine maiestie, which otherwise they might perceiue was readie in their aid. Then finallie might the vision be published, when thorough his fauourable assistance, the warres were brought to a luckie end. This aduise of the king was well liked of them all, and commandement giuen, that all maner of prouision should be prepared with all speed for an armie to be set forth into Pictland. The lords going busilie about to prouide themselues of all things necessarie, mustered their men in all parts, so that there was leuied a greater host than had beene seene in those parties of long time before. When the whole power was come together, Kenneth marched forth with the same, entring by great violence into the Pictish borders about Sterling.

The answer of king Kenneth.

Kenneth entred into Sterlingshire.

Drusken the king of Picts aduertised hereof, and hauing his armie in a readinesse both of Picts and such Englishmen as he had reteined, to serue him for his wages, fetcheth a compasse about, and passing by the Scotish armie in the night, incampeth betwixt them and home, insomuch that the day did no sooner appeare, but the one part destrous to be in hand with the other, without token of trumpet, or commandement of capteine, they rushed togither most fiercelie. The hastie speed of the Picts to ioine, put them to no small disaduantage; but the departure of the Englishmen, withdrawing themselues aside to the next mounteine, most of all discouraged them: for the Scots therwith giuing a shout, declared themselues to be highlie recomforted with that sight. Drusken in all hast sent vnto those Englishmen a messenger, willing them with large promises of reward to returne to his aid: but the Englishmen answered, that their vse was not to fight without order and commandement of their generall, and that the Picts like vnskilfull men had cast awaie themselues to be slaine by the enimies hand, where it apperteined vnto warlike knowledge to auoid the battell, when no hope of victorie appeared.

Drusken hastilie inuaded his enimies.

The Englishmen fled.

Drusken sendeth to the Englishmen.

The middle ward of the Picts seeing themselues left naked on the one side, and assailed on the backs; whereas the Englishmen should haue kept their ground and defended them, they began to shrinke: which the Scots perceiuing, stroke on the more fiercelie, till at length the Picts not able to withstand their force, fell to running awaie. They made their course towards the water of Forth, which was not farre from the place of the battell, where being ouertaken, they were beaten downe & slaine in great numbers: for Kenneth gaue commandement that they should spare none of the Picts nation, neither gentleman nor other, that fell into their hands. The Englishmen whilest the Scots and Picts were thus occupied in the fight and chase, withdrew homeward with all speed; and by reason of the mounteins which they had to passe, that take awaie the sight of them from the Scots, they escaped into their countrie without anie pursute. Drusken himselfe so soone as he perceiued how the field went against him, got him to his horsse, which he had appointed to be readie for him at hand vpon all occasions, and so escaped out of danger with a few other in his companie.

The Picts are vanquished.

The Englishmen escape.

Drusken escaped by flight

The Scots returning from the chase, remained in the place of the battell all night, keeping strong watch about their campe, for doubt least the Englishmen had beene lodged in some secret place nere by to haue set vpon them at vnwares, if they might haue seene anie aduantage; but in the morning when it was knowne how they were quite gone their waies, and returned into their countrie (as before ye haue heard) then was the spoile of the field and Pictish campe gathered and bestowed amongst the souldiers, after the ancient custome of that nation. And then were they all licenced to depart euerie man to his home, with thanks for their seruice and paines in this iournie so manfullie imploied. Within few daies after, the Pictish king Drusken sent his ambassadors vnto king Kenneth to sue for peace. Kenneth was contented to heare him, and promised to grant a peace, so they would surrender into his hands the gouernement of their kingdome due vnto him by right of inheritance. But this condition being vtterlie refused of the Picts, was the cause that the warre was eftsoones renewed with more cruelties than before.

The Picts sue for peace.

The yeere next insuing this battell, Kenneth got Mernes, Angus, and Fife into his hands, furnishing all the castels and holds with men, munition, and victuels. But whilest he went about to subdue the countries about Sterling, word was brought him that such as he left thus in garison in those countries, were betraied by the inhabitants, and slaine euerie mothers sonne. Kenneth wonderfullie kindled in wrath for the newes, left off his treatie, which then he had in hand with the people of Menteth and Sterlingshire for their submission, and returned in great hast towards Fife, where being arriued, he put all to the fire and sword, not leauing one aliue of the Pictish nation within all those quarters. The like cruelties was shewed through the whole countries of Mernes and Angus, for an example to other to beware how they falsified their faiths once giuen by waie of allegiance.

Kenneth getteth Mernes, Angus, and Fife.

Fife is put to the fire and sword.

Mernes and Angus is cruellie punished.

In the meane time that Kenneth with his Scots raged in such wise through those countries, Drusken assembling all the power of his countries, came forth into the field to meet the Scots, meaning either to put them backe out of the confines of his dominion, either else to die with honor in the attempt thereof. Thus passing through the countrie, at length he came vnto Scone, where afterwards stood a famous abbie of chanons of saint Augustines order, and here he found Kenneth with his armie alreadie incamped. The nert day, when both parties were redie to haue giuen battell, Drusken wishing rather to aske peace whilest his power was yet in safetie, than after he were once vanquished (if such were his misaduenture) to intreat for the same in vaine, sent an herald at armes vnto Kenneth, willing that he might talke with him before he ioined, for that he had to say certeine things, which being followed, might turne to the great benefit and commoditie of both the Scotish and Pictish nations.

Drusken commeth to rescue his people.

Kenneth

Kenneth for that he would not seeme to refuse anie indifferent offers, was contented to come to a communication, and so thereupon both the kings in presence of both their armies arranged in the field readie to fight, came togither in a place appointed, either of them being accompanied with a like number of their nobles, as by the heralds it was accorded. Here Dzuiken with manie reasons going about to persuade peace, shewed how necessarie the same was betwixt the two nations: and againe, how doubtfull fortune was to them that trusted too much in hir vnstedfast fauour: at length he grew to this end, that if Kenneth could be contented to grant a peace, the Picts should release all such right, title and interest as they had in the countries of Mernes, Angus, and Fife, vnto him and his successors the Scotish kings for euer, so that he should make no further claime vnto anie other of those countries which the Picts as yet possessed.

The persuasion of peace by Dzuiken.

Mernes, Angus, and Fife is required of the Picts to release.

Kenneth his answere.

Herevnto Kenneth answered, that he well vnderstood how vnstable fortunes lawes were, but sithens the Picts fought in an vniust quarell, as to defraud the posteritie of their lawfull king Hungus, who latelie reigned amongest them, of the rightfull inheritance of their kingdome, they themselues had iust cause to doubt fortunes chance, where the Scots hauing put vpon lawfull armour, and seeking to atteine that by warre which by other means they could not atteine at the hands of the vniust possessors, they had lesse cause to mistrust hir fauour, & therefore if the Picts were desirous of peace, they ought to cause a surrender to be made of their kingdome into his hands, accordinglie as they well knew it was reason they should. And what commoditie might thereof insue to both nations, being by such means once ioined and vnited into one intire kingdome, he doubted not but they vnderstood it sufficientlie inough. And as for other conditions of peace than this, he told them plainelie there would be none accepted. Thus did the kings depart in sunder, without anie agreement concluded: and being returned to their armies, they make readie to trie the matter by dint of sword.

Kenneth exhorted his people that day to shew themselues men, sith the same should iudge whether the Scots should rule and gouerne the Picts, or the Picts the Scots. With these and manie other effectuall words when he had incouraged his folks to the battell, he diuided them into three wards, as two wings and a mane battell. In euerie of them he set first archers and arcubalisters; and next vnto them pikes and speares, then bilmen and other with such short weapons: last of all, an other multitude with all kind of weapons, as was thought most expedient. The fore ward was committed to the leading of one Bar, a man right skilfull in all warlike knowledge, the second one Dongall gouerned, and the third was led by Donald the kings brother. The king himselfe with a troope of horsemen followed them to succour in all places where he saw need.

The order of the battell.

Then commanded he his trumpets to sound to the battell, which the Scots began with such a chéerefull shout, that the Picts euen vpon the first onset were so amazed, that if Dzuiken had not with comfortable words relieued their fainting stomachs, the most part of them had fled without anie stroke stricken. But being incouraged through the presence of their king, shewing himselfe with chéerefull countenance amongst them, and therewith exhorting them to stand by him at that present, there was fought a right sore and cruell battell betwéene them. The women that were amongest the Picts, of whom there was no small number, speciallie in the right wing, made such a wofull noise, when they beheld the men one kill an other, that they were a more cumbrance to the Picts, than aid, when it came to the point of seruice: by reason whereof that wing was shortlie beaten downe, and put to flight. Which when Kenneth beheld, he set in with his horsemen on the backs of the Picts, now left bare by the running thus away of those in the foresaid wing: and so entring in amongest them, disordred their araie in such wise, that by no means they were able to aid themselues, or come into anie order againe: so that in the end they were faine to throw downe their weapons, and take them to their féete, thereby to escape the danger. Such heaps of slaine men, armour, & weapons laie here & there strewed in the place of the battell, that the Scots were forced in following the chase to breake their araie, so to passe the more spédilie: by means whereof, falling amongest whole bands of the Picts, manie of them were slaine.

Kenneth with the horsemen disordered the Picts araie.

The right wing of the Picts is put to flight.

This mischiefe Kenneth perceiuing, commandeth to sound the retreat, and so gathering his people about their standards, he apointed certeine companies in warlike order to pursue in chase of the enimies, whilest he himselfe with the residue abode still in the place (where the field was fought) all that day and the next night following. The Scotish capteins that were sent to follow the chase, earnestlie executing their kings commandement, made great slaughter of Picts in all places where they might ouertake them. Dzuiken the Pictish king himselfe being pursued to the riuer of Taie, for that he could not passe the same, was there slaine with the whole retinue which he had about him. It is said, that the Scotishmen incountred with the Picts that day at seuen sundrie times, and in seuen sundrie places, and still the victorie abode with the Scots. The day after the battell, such as had followed the chase returned to the campe; where they presented vnto Kenneth their king, the armour and other spoile of Dzuiken the Pictish K. which they brought with them, besides great abundance of other pillage and riches, which they had gotten of the enimies that were slaine. Dzuikens armour and other things belonging to his owne bodie, was offered vp to saint Colme, in the church dedicated to his name within the Ile of Colmekill, there to remaine as a monument of this victorie to such as should come after.

Kenneth causeth the retreat to be sounded.

The king of the Picts slaine.

After this the whole preie and spoile was gathered and diuided amongest the souldiers. Kenneth was counselled to haue discharged his armie, and to haue departed home; but he purposing now to make an end of the whole warres, sith he was in such a forwardnesse, called togither the multitude, and in this wise began to vtter vnto them his mind and purpose. ¶ It is the dutie of a good capteine, when he hath the victorie in his hands, & as yet the warres not ended, if he mind the preseruation of himselfe and his countrie, and to vse the victorie as he ought, not to cease from pursuing the enimies once vanquished, till he haue either made them his friends, or else vtterlie destroied & rid them out of the way; for if anie man shall thinke it best to suffer the enimie to remaine in quiet, after he be once weakened and brought to a low ebbe, till time peraduenture he shall haue recouered his forces againe, he shall procure to himselfe (as I gesse) more danger than happilie he is well ware of. And that we may speake somewhat of this danger now present, the state of the Pictish kingdome (as ye know) is sore infeebled, their power being diminished by force of warre, is brought to that point, that it resteth in our hands vterlie to destroie and exterminat the whole nation. Which act ought to be abhorred, if it were possible for vs by anie meanes to draw them (our honor saued) vnto

An oration of king Kenneth vnto our friendship. But the Picts are of such a stubborne nature, and so desirous of reuenge, that so long as there remaineth anie one of them aliue, they will beare in their hearts a desire to reuenge all such losses as they haue in anie wise susteined by this warre. Wherevpon I do verelie believe, that there is none of the Pictish nation from henceforth, will beare anie faithfull friendship towards the Scots. Therefore sith we can not make the Picts, thus latelie scourged by vs, our friends, I thinke it best (except we will neglect our owne safeties) vtterlie to destroie the whole nation, by putting to the sword not onelie both men and women, but also all their youth and yong children: least they being descended of that linage, hereafter in time to come, arme themselues to the reuenge of their parents deaths, and that not without perill of the vtter losse of our countrie and kingdome.

The commõs allow the kings saieng.

This sentence of the king though it seemed to cruell to many, yet whether for that they saw the same to stand with the kings pleasure, or that they thought it most expedient for the suertie of the Scotish common-wealth, it was allowed and ratified by them all. Such crueltie here vpon was forthwith shewed throughout all the Pictish regions, that there was not one liuing creature of humane shape left aliue, sauing such as saued themselues within the walles of Camelon, or in certeine other holds and fortresses, and also about two thousand of those that fled into England: for all the residue were most vnmercifullie murthered and slaine, without respect either of age, sex, profession, or estate. Thus Kenneth hauing dispatched the inhabitants, seized the countrie into his owne hands, making partition of the same as he saw cause, and diuiding it amongst his nobles, according to the merits of euerie of them dulie weied and considered, he added new names vnto euerie quarter and region (either after the name of the gouernor, or else of some promontorie, riuer, or other notable water or place, according as was the ancient custome of the nation) that the memorie of the Pictish names might end togither with the inhabitants.

Pictland parted vnto diuers men.

New names are giuen vnto euerie region.

The countrie anciently called Horestia, was giuen vnto two brethren, Angusian, and Mernan, by reason whereof the one part of the same countrie was called Angus, and the other the Mernes. The linage of those two noble men remaine vnto this day. The region which till then was named Otholinia, was turned afterwards to the name of Fife, after the name of one Fife Duke: whose valiancie was throughlie tried in these last warres with the Picts. There remaine vnto this day tokens and old ruines of a castell situate betwixt the riuer of Leuin and saint Kenneths church, which (as yet appeareth) was fensed about with seuen rampires, and as manie ditches, wherein the posteritie of this worthie man after his decease had their habitation by the space of manie hundred yéres. Louthian reteined still the former name, so honorable was the remembrance of that famous prince king Loth amongst all men. The strongest castell of the whole countrie, Kenneth bestowed vpon that valiant capteine named Bar, whose counsell and forward seruice stood the Scots in no small stead in those warres, in which the Picts were thus subdued. That fortresse euer sithence (after his name) hath béene called Dunbar, that is to say, the castell of Bar.

The familie of Dunbar.

There descended of him a noble house or familie, bearing the name of this castell, continuing in great fame and honor, euen vnto our time, of the which the earles of March had their beginning, and continued long in that dignitie from one to another, with sundry branches of right famous memorie. The names of diuerse dales were also changed, but yet some kept their old names still. Ordolucia shortlie after began to take the name of Annandale, of the riuer of Annan that runneth through the same. And so likewise Twedale toke name of the water of Twéd. And Cludesdale of the riuer of Clude. In like maner manie other countries, townes, and castels had their names changed at the same time, after they came into the possession of the Scotishmen, vpon sundrie considerations, for a witnesse of their victorious acts atchiued against the Picts. Furthermore, into the citie of Camelon were withdrawne the most part of all the noble mens wiues of the Picts, with their children, vpon trust to be in safetie in the same, as well by reason of strength of the place, as also of the strong garison which was appointed to defend it.

Kenneth therefore hauing taken his pleasure abroad in the countrie, came thither with a mightie armie to besiege the citie. And first sending vnto them within, to know if they would yéeld, he was answered, how sith it plainelie appeared, that the Scots could be satisfied with nothing but with the slaughter of all such as fell into their hands, aswell of women and children, with impotent aged, as of others, they were minded neuer to surrender their hold with life. Wherevpon the siege continued by the space of manie daies. Whilest the Scots in the meane time got togither a great number of fagots, and other such brush and stuffe to fill the ditches withall, which were verie déepe and broad, at length when they within began to want victels, they required a truce for three daies, in the which meane time they might take aduise for the surrender of the citie. Kenneth mistrusting no deceit, granted their request, and thereupon commanded his people to cease from all maner of annoiance of the enimies, for that terme.

Kenneth sendeth vnto Camelon, cõmanding them for to yeeld.

They of Camelon require truce for three daies.

But in the meane time the Picts prepared themselues of all things necessarie to make an issue vpon the Scots. There was also an old gate forlet and stopped vp with earth and stones vpon the one side of the citie, so that of a long time before there had béene no way forth by the same. Wherefore in the darke of the night the Picts ridding away the earth and ramell wherewith it was closed vp, about the third watch they passe forth at that gate in good order of battell, setting first vpon such Scots as kept the standing watch, who were in doubt of nothing lesse than of anie issue to be made on that side, by means whereof they were easilie oppressed, and likewise the other that kept the inner watch, insomuch that the slaughter went on almost euen to the kings tent with great noise and clamor, as is commonlie séene in such sudden tumults, especiallie chancing in the night season.

The Picts issue vpon the Scots with great fortune.

When the day began once to appeare, the Picts withdrawing towards the citie by the same waie they came, were pursued by the Scots, and no small number of them slaine at the entring. The citie also had béene taken at the same time, but that the Picts out of the turrets and loupes of the walles, discharged a wonderfull number of quarels, darts, arrowes, stones, and other things vpon the Scots, as they approched néere to the gate, where their fellowes (that made the issue) hasted to enter againe into the towne. There were slaine of the Scots at this bickering aboue six hundred, wherewith Kenneth was so kindled with wrath, that detesting the falshood of the Picts, he vowed by open oth that hée would not depart from the siege, till he had put the citie and them within to fire and sword, without sparing of anie, either one or other.

their walles ſo ſtoutlie, that he could not atchiue his purpoſe. Wherevpon the ſiege continued for the ſpace of foure moneths togither. So that ſuch ſcarſitie of all kinds of vittels ſtill aroſe amongſt them, that the wretched citizens abſteined from nothing that might in anie wiſe be eaten, though it were neuer ſo much to be abhorred. And yet although they were brought into ſuch miſerable ſtate, that there was no hope longer to defend themſelues, if anie man notwithſtanding all ſuch extremitie, were heard make mention of ſurrendering, he was forthwith ſlaine by his fellowes, as an enimie to his nation and a friend vnto the Scots. It was thought that Kenneths oth made them ſo obſtinate in their wilfull contumacie, becauſe they ſaw nothing but death, which way ſoeuer they inclined.

A prettie craft vſed by Kenneth.

At length when the citie was thus reduced into all extreme miſerie, and the ditches filled with faggots and other ſuch ſtuffe, Kenneth one night appointed ſir hundred of his choiſeſt ſouldiers to lie in ambuſh within a wood, ioining neere to one ſide of the citie, ſo that in the morning when he ſhould giue the aſſault on the contrarie ſide, they might ſuddenlie come forth and ſcale the walles on that other. Theſe ſouldiers, according to that which they had in commandement, ſhortly after the breake of day, hearing that Kenneth had begun the aſſault on his part, quicklie came forth of the wood, and hauing their ladders readie, came to the walles, reared them vp, and ſwiftlie getting into the citie, opened one of the gates where one part of the armie entered; the citizens ſtanding in no doubt at all of anie attempt on that ſide: ſo as being gotten togither to defend the walles on that part where Kenneth gaue the approch, and now hearing how the enimies were got into the citie, and comming on their backs, they were wonderfullie amazed, but yet ſo long as they were able to make anie reſiſtance, they did what lay in their vttermoſt power to beat backe the Scots, and to driue them out of the citie againe.

The Scots enter the citie.

The ſlaughter therfore was great which the Scots made of the Picts in euerie paſſage & corner of the ſtreets, inſomuch that the Scotiſh lords and other captains, in reuenge of the late receiued loſſe of their men, through the falſe practiſed policie of the Picts, commanded in a great furie to ſet fire on the houſes, and to kill and ſlea all ſuch of the Pictiſh nation as came in their way. Thus the murther proceeded vpon all eſtates, aſwell religious as other, and likewiſe vpon women and children, without anie difference. A number of ladies and gentlewomen, getting them into the preſence of king Kenneth, beſought him in moſt lamentable wiſe, to haue pitie vpon their wofull eſtate, and to ſaue their liues from the hands of his moſt cruell ſouldiers. But ſuch was the rage kindled in the Scotiſhmens hearts, that there was no more fauor ſhewed toward them than toward the other, and ſo immediatlie were they alſo ſlaine without all compaſſion. So farre forth was the murther executed on all hands, that there was not one left aliue of the Pictiſh nation, neither man, woman, nor child to bewaile that miſerable deſtruction of their countrie and kinſfolkes. Then were the walles throwne downe & made euen with the plaine ground. The houſes and buildings aſwell priuate as publike, with churches and chappels, were ſet on fire, and that which might not be conſumed with the rage of fire was ruinated and deſtroied with hand, ſo that there remained of all that famous citie, nothing but the aſhes, with heapes of the broken and burned ſtones, and likewiſe of the pauement and foundation of ſome part of the walles.

The Picts are miſerablie ſlaine, without regard of perſon.

Ladies and gentlewomen deſire the king to be pardoned of their liues.

All the Pictiſh nation deſtroied.

The citie of Camelon is throwne downe.

At the ſame time the caſtell of Maidens, now called commonlie Edenbourgh caſtell, was ſtill kept with a mightie garriſon of Picts, but they hearing of the miſerable deſtruction of Camelon, and doubting to fall into the like miſchance, left the caſtell void, and fled to Northumberland. Thus ended the kingdome of the Picts in Albion, in the yeere after they firſt began to reigne therein 1173, and in the yeere after the birth of our Sauior 839, from the firſt comming of Fergus 1166, and after the creation of the world 4806, if the Scotiſh chronicles be true. ¶ But where as the truth concerning the time of the firſt comming into this Ile, aſwell of the Scots as Picts reſteth doubtfull, and that aſwell by authoritie of approued writers, as by reaſonable coniectures, we haue in the hiſtorie of England more largelie written thereof; we referre thoſe that be deſirous to ſee further of that matter, vnto the ſame, following here in this hiſtorie of Scotland the report moſt an end, as we find it in Hector Boetius, and other the Scotiſh writers, not taking vpon vs ſo frankelie to ſet downe our owne opinion in this Scotiſh, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie, through want of ſuch helpes in the one, as we haue got in the other.

Prodigious tokens ſeene in the aire.

There were ſeene the ſame yeere two comets or blaſing ſtarres of dreadfull aſpect to the beholders, the one went before the ſunne riſing in harueſt ſeaſon, and the other followed the going downe thereof in the ſpring of the yeere. There was oftentimes alſo ſeene in the aire a viſion of fierie armies, running togither with burning ſtaues, and the one being vanquiſhed, they ſuddenlie both of them vaniſhed away. Alſo at Camelon, as the biſhop was at ſeruice holding his croſier ſtaffe in his hand, it was kindled ſo with fire, that by no meane it could be quenched, till it was burnt euen to aſhes. About none date, the aire being faire and cleare, as well in the countries of the Scots as of the Picts, there was heard ſuch a noiſe and clattering of weapons and armor, with braieng of horſes, as though two armies ſhould haue beene togither in fight, whereby manie of either nation which heard it, were put in great feare. Theſe vncouth wonders were interpreted by diuinors diuerſlie: ſome of them affirming the ſame to betoken ioy and happie proſperitie, and other alledging, how they ſignified rather miſhap and vtter calamitie.

The interpretation of the ſaid tokens.

But to returne to our purpoſe. King Kenneth hauing thus deſtroied the Pictiſh kingdome, togither almoſt with the whole nation, cauſed the marble ſtone (which Simon Breke ſometime brought out of Spaine into Ireland, and the firſt Fergus out of Ireland into Albion, as before is recited) to be brought now forth of Argile (where till that time it had beene diligentlie kept) into Gourie, which region before appertained to the Picts, there to remaine from thenceforth as a ſacred token for th'eſtabliſhment of the Scotiſh kingdome in that countrie: he placed it at Scone vpon a raiſed plot of ground there, becauſe that the laſt battell which he had with the Picts was fought neare vnto the ſame place, the victorie (as before is ſpecified) chancing to the Scots. Vpon this ſtone (as before is rehearſed) the Scotiſh kings were vſed to ſit, when they receiued the inueſture of the kingdome. ¶ Some writers haue recorded that by commandement of Kenneth, at the ſame time when this ſtone was thus by him remoued, thoſe Latine verſes were grauen vpon it, whereof mention is made before, where we ſpake of the aforeſaid Fergus the firſt his comming ouer forth of Ireland into Albion there to reigne.

The marble ſtone is remoued from Argile into Gourie, in the place called Scone.

Now in the meane time, when thoſe few of the Picts, which by flight had eſcaped the Scotiſhmens hands, and were gotten into England, could by no meanes perſuade the Engliſhmen, being troubled with inteſtine warre, to aid them in recouerie of their countrie, ſome of them paſſed the ſeas ouer into to Norway, and some into Denmarke, and diuerse other of them remained still in England, where they got their liuing either by some manuall occupation, either else by seruice in the warres. The Scots from thence forthlinged in quiet, during the life time of K. Kenneth, who deserued eternall fame, by the inlarging of the bounds of his kingdome, so mightilie and in such wise, that where he found the frontiers, he made the same well neere the middest of his kingdome. Other things he did also touching the politike gouernement of his subiects in time of peace, no lesse worthie of praise than his noble and famous conquests: but specially he ordeined certeine lawes for the wealth of his people, whereby his iudges and other officers should proceed in the administration of iustice, of the which I haue thought requisite to rehearse part as yet being vsed, that aswell the author, as the time of their first establishment, made the better appeare, vnto such as shall peruse this historie.

The tables of the law to be kept.

The Chapters of those lawes which yet remaine to be obserued, are these.

Oxen or kine hurting ech other.

If oxen or kine chance by running together to kill one another, the truth being not known which it was that did the hurt, that which is found without hornes shall be iudged the occasion of the skath, and he that is owner of the same, shall haue the dead beast, and satisfie him for the losse to whome it belonged.

A sow.

If a sow eate hir pigs, let hir be stoned to death, and buried, so that no man eate of hir flesh.

Swine.

A swine that is found eating of corne that groweth in the field, or wrooting vpon the tilled grounds, let it be lawfull for anie man to kill the same without danger.

Beasts damage faisant.

Other kinds of beasts, wherein other men haue anie propertie, if they breake into thy pastures, or eate vp thy corne, impound them, till time the owner haue satisfied thee for the quantitie of the damage.

Articles concerning religion.

¶ These were ciuill ordinances belonging to the good gouernement of the people, other there were, which apperteine to religion;

gion: as theſe.

Thou ſhalt deuoutlie reuerence the altars, temples, images, oratories, chapels, prieſtes, and all men of religion.

Keeping of holie daies. Thou ſhalt obſerue with due reuerence feſtiuall and ſolemne holie daies, faſting daies, vigils, and all maner of ceremonies inſtituted by the godlie ordinance of man, in the honor of our S. Chriſt & his ſaints.

Prieſts. To hurt a prieſt, let it be accounted an offenſe worthie of death.

Ground to be left vntilled. That ground wherin anie that is ſlaine lieth buried, leaue it vntilled for ſeuen yeeres ſpace.

Graues. Repute euerie graue holie, and adorne it with the ſigne of the croſſe, ſo as thou ſhalt be well aduiſed that in no wiſe with thy feet thou tread vpon it.

Buriall. Burie the dead according to the quantitie of his ſubſtance.

Buriall of noble men. The bodie of a noble man & of him that hath well deſerued of the common-wealth, ſhall be buried in ſolemne and pompous wiſe, but yet in mourning ſort & dolorous manner.

Let there be two knights or eſquires to attend his bodie to the graue. The one being mounted vpon a white horſſe ſhall beare the coate-armor of the dead, and the other in mourning apparell with his face couered ſhall ride vpon a blacke horſſe; who after the corps is brought to church, turning his horſſe from the altar, ſhall crie out how his maiſter is dead: and therewith the people making an outcry againſt him, he ſhall ſtreictwaies depart and get him with all ſpeed to the place frō whence he came; the other going ſtreight to the altar, ſhall there offer vp vnto the prieſt his coate-armor with his horſſe, as a token to ſignifie thereby that his maiſter doth inioy euerlaſting life, in the land of permanent light and ioies eternall.

¶ But this cuſtome of buriall, as that which was ſuppoſed not apperteining to the order of the chriſtian religion, the age that followed did vtterlie aboliſh, appointing to the prieſts in ſteed of the horſſe and armor, fiue pounds ſterling in monie for the offering. With theſe and diuers other ordinances, which time and other ſtatuts by other kings deuiſed haue abrogated, Kenneth gouerned his people in great felicitie during his life time.

S. Reule his church, now called Saint Andrewes. The biſhops ſee, which before had beene at Abirnethie, he tranſlated vnto the church of that holie man S. Reule. Euer ſince which time the towne hath been called S. Andrewes, and thoſe which gouerned the ſame church a long time after, were called the great biſhops of Scotland: for the realme was not diuided into dioceſes till the daies of Malcolme the 3, who by diuine inſpiration (as is ſaid) ordeined the ſee of Murthlake, now called Abirden: but ſuch as were reputed of vertuous behauiour and knowledge meet for the office, vſed the authoritie & rome of biſhops, in what place ſoeuer they were reſident. Yet ſuch was the continuance of thoſe which gouerned the church of S. Andrewes, that there haue beene aboue the number of fortie biſhops reſident there, ſince the firſt inſtitution of that ſee: manie of them for the opinion conceiued of their holineſſe, being numbred according to the manner in times paſt in the regiſter of ſaints. But now to returne vnto Kenneth, who hauing (as is ſaid) inlarged the bounds of his kingdome, ſo as the ſame ſtretched forth vnto the confines of Northumberland on the one ſide, and to the Iles of Orknie on the other, the ſea compaſſing the reſidue, at the length after he had reigned about twentie yeeres in great renowme and glorie, he departed out of this life, through too much abundance of rheumatike matter, at Fortiuiot, in the yeere of our Lord 856. His bodie was conueied into the Ile of Colmekill, and there honorablie buried amongſt his anceſtors.

The bounds of the Scotiſh kingdome.

King Kenneth departed out of this life. 855. H.B.

Donald.

Donald the fourth of that name ſucceedeth his brother Kenneth. The king is of diſſolute demeanor.

After his deceaſſe ſucceeded in gouernment of the realme his brother Donald, farre differing in qualities from his noble brother the foreſaid Kenneth; but yet before he came to the rule of the realme, he diſcloſed not his vicious nature, for doubt of offending the king his brother. Neuertheleſſe he had continued ſcarſe two yeeres in the eſtate, but that he had ſubuerted all good orders in his realme, by his naughtie examples of diſſolute liuing: for his mind was ſet on nothing but on wanton pleaſure; as in the vnlawfull vſe of concubines, riotous banketting, keeping of hawkes, hounds, & horſſes for pleaſure, and not for the vſe of warres, whereof he had no regard at all: for ſuch charges as he ſhould haue beene at for maintenance of men of warre to keepe the frontiers of his realme, were imploied on a ſort of raſcals, that ſerued him in the furtherance of his wanton delights and voluptuous deſires, as huntſmen, falconers, cookes, bawdes, ruffians, and ſuch like loſſels.

The king is admoniſhed of his nobles. Wherevpon diuers of the nobles remembring what apperteined to their duties, ſpared not but freelie admoniſhed the king what danger would inſue of his miſordered behauior, if he reformed not his maners, nor reſtreined the licentious doings of his ſeruants and familie. But when they perceiued that their words were not regarded, but for the ſame they themſelues ran into diſpleaſure; they ſorrowed not a little, to ſee ſo ſmall hope of amendment of ſuch enormities, as euerie where reigned through the region: for all youthfull perſons giuen to ſenſuall luſt followed the ſame without anie feare or care of correction, ſo that there was no meaſure of offending and haunting of euill rule in all parties, inſomuch that ſhortlie, through want of all good gouernance, wrong was placed in ſteed of right, and contempt of Gods honor imbraced euerie where in place of vertue and godlineſſe.

The exiled Picts require aid of the Engliſhmen. In this meane while, the reſidue of the Picts remaining amongſt the Engliſhmen, ceaſſed not to ſolicit the gouernors of the countrie to aid them towards the recouerie of their dominion out of the Scotiſhmens hands, promiſing to be ſubiects vnto the Engliſh nation, if by their helpe they might be reſtored to their ancient ſeates. At length Oſbert and Ella kings of Northumberland were perſuaded through inſtant ſute to take that enterpriſe in hand, the rather vpon truſt of good ſucceſſe, for that they vnderſtood what lacke of politike gouernement then remained amongeſt the Scots, by reaſon of the kings naughtie demeanor and moſt inordinat trade of life. But firſt there was a league concluded with new articles of agreement betwixt the Engliſhmen and Britains, as yet inhabiting alongſt the coaſts of Cumberland, by meanes of which league both Britains and Engliſhmen ioined their powers together, and in moſt ſpeedie and forcible wiſe paſſed the water of Tweed, firſt pitching their campe in the countrie of Mers. From whence immediatlie king Oſbert (being appointed as generall in that iournie)

Oſbert and Ella kings of Northumberland.

The Engliſhmen and Britains ioined their powers with the Picts.

An herald is ſent vnto Donald.

ſent an herald vnto Donald the Scotiſh king, commanding him either to ſurrender vp vnto the Picts all ſuch regions as the Scots had taken from them, either elſe to looke to haue the Engliſhmen and Britains no leſſe their enimies than the Picts, whoſe cauſe they had taken vpon them to mainteine and defend.

Donald being at the firſt ſore troubled with theſe newes, yet at length (by the aduiſe of his nobles) he tooke a good hart vnto him, and in defenſe of his realme cauſed muſters to be taken throughout all his dominions, and forthwith came into the field to incounter his enimies, whome he found at Jedworth readie to giue battell: where after ſore fight, in the end Olbert with his people was chaſed to the next mounteins. Donald hauing thus obteined the victorie in this conflict, ſuppoſed all had béene his owne, and therevpon remoued ouer Tweed with all poſſible haſt, marching forth till he came to the mouth of that riuer, where there late at anchor certeine Engliſh veſſels, laden with proviſion of vittels and all other things neceſſarie for the furniture of an armie. Donald ſetting vpon theſe ſhips, with ſmall reſiſtance tooke them, ſpoiled them of all ſuch things as were found aboord, and after ſet fire on them. The ſpoile was diuided amongeſt the ſouldiers and men of warre, which ſerued them to ſmall vſe or commoditie: for all the youth of the armie, through example of their prince, was ſo corrupted in vicious cuſtomes, that the campe was repleniſhed with horſes, bawds, ſtewes, and dicing tables, in ſuch wiſe, that all ſuch prouiſion as ſhould haue ſerued for ſore and ſtaple of vittels, was ſpent in riotous banketing without anie order or meaſure: & oftentimes (as it chanceth where politike gouernement lacketh) there happened amongeſt them in the armie, diſcord and variance with ſundrie murders and ſlaughters.

Olbert is put to flight at Jedworth, or Jedburgh.

Olbert his prouiſion by water is taken by the Scotiſhmen.

Great diſorder in the Scotiſh campe.

When the enimies were aduertiſed how far out of order all things ſtood in the Scotiſh campe for want of good and diſcreet chieftains, Olbright with all ſpéd got a mightie hoſt togither againe, and before his approch was looked for of the Scots, he commeth vpon them one morning in the breake of the day, and aſſaileth them in their lodgings, wherein he found them ſo vnprouided of all helps to make reſiſtance, that it was a wonder to ſée the diſorder that apeared amongeſt them: ſome of them running vpon their enimies naked without all diſcretion, other breaking forth of the campe to ſaue themſelues by flight, not ſparing hill nor dale where they ſaw anie way to eſcape the enimies hands, though it were with preſent danger of breaking their necks downe the ſloeling banks and craggie rocks, being forced thereto by the fierce purſute of the Engliſhmen and Britains, who moſt eagerlie preaſed vpon them in all places, to reuenge the late receiued ouerthrow and ſlaughter of their friends and kinſfolks. There died of the Scots in this mortall bickering aboue twentie thouſand perſons. King Donald being faſt aſléepe at the firſt aſſault of the enimies, as he that had drunke ouer night more than inough, was taken before he could make anie ſhift for himſelfe, with the reſidue of the nobilitie, that ſcaped with life.

The Scotiſh campe ſuddenlie inuaded.

10000 Scotiſhmen ſlaine. King Donald is taken with the nobilitie.

The campe is rifled.

The whole realme of Scotland diſcomfited.

The Scotiſh campe, the next day after this ouerthrow, was rifled, the ſpoile being diuided amongeſt the Engliſhmen and Britains. But when the fame of this infortunat battell was noiſed once through the realme of Scotland, how the king was taken priſoner, his campe woone, the armie diſcomfited, and almoſt all the ſouldiers and men of warre ſlaine, thoſe few of the nobles which were left aliue remaining priſoners in the enimies hands, there was ſuch dole and lamentation made ouer all, as though the realme had alreadie béene loſt without recouerie. Some there were that blamed fortune, ſome curſſed the wicked trade of life in the king, other bewailing the great calamitie of this miſchance put the fault in diuers other things, as in ſuch caſes commonlie it falleth out: for in ſundrie heads are euer ſundrie opinions. Manie ran vp and downe the ſtréets and high waies, to inquire the certeintie of all things, and whether there were anie hope at all left to reſiſt the enimies, alſo which way the enimies held, whereabout they went, and what they purpoſed to doo.

The Engliſh men inuade Louthian, the Britains Galloway.

Anon after, when it was certeinlie knowen that the Engliſhmen were entred by Louthian, and the Britains by Galloway, there was ſuch feare mixed with ſorrow (for loſſe of their friends and kinſfolks) ſtricken into the peoples hearts, and namelie into the womens, that a greater hath not béene heard of in anie region. So that all prouiſion to defend their countrie was quite neglected, ſo amazed were the Scots with the ſudden change of fortunes fauor. The Engliſhmen herevpon tooke all the countrie euen to the water of Forth, and likewiſe the Britains ſeized into their hands all that which lieth from the bounds of Cumberland vnto Sterling bridge, finding no reſiſtance in their way at all. Herevnto aſwell the Engliſhmen as Britains vſed the victorie verie cruellie, ſparing neither one nor other of the Scotiſh bloud, that by anie means fell into their hands, but prieſts and all paſſed one way, that is, by the edge of the ſword.

The Britains as yet kept poſſeſſion of Cumberland, and thoſe other countries lieing by the coaſt of thoſe weſt ſeas.

The victorie vſed cruelte.

King Olbert purpoſed to haue paſſed the water of Forth, that waie to haue entered into Fife, & ſo ouer Taie into Angus: but hearing that the Scots had gathered a power to impeach his paſſage, he ſtaied certeine daies. At length vnderſtanding that the enimies were nothing of that puiſſance or number, as at the firſt they were reported to be; he determined to ſet ouer in certeine boats ten thouſand of his men; but through a ſudden tempeſt of wind and weather, that roſe in that inſtant, there were fiue thouſand of them drowned, the reſidue being conſtreined to land againe on the ſame ſide from the which they looſed, hauing loſt through violence of the weather all their tackle and whole furniture of their veſſels. Olbert being alſo admoniſhed with this miſfortune, thought good to attempt no more the furious rage of the water, but determined by land to go vnto Sterling, where he vnderſtood he ſhould find the Britains, with whome he might ioine his power, and paſſe ouer the bridge there, and ſo inuade other of the Scotiſh regions which lay thereabout.

A great manie Engliſhmen drowned.

Ambaſſadors ſue for peace.

But at his comming thither, certeine Scotiſh ambaſſadours came vnto him to ſue for peace, which they humblie required at his hands in name of the whole realme, beſeeching him to conſider well the ſtate of the caſe as it ſtood, and not to truſt too much on brittle fortune, the which ſheweth hir ſelfe neuer ſtable; but commonlie vſeth to call backe againe hir grant of proſperous ſucceſſe, where the receiuer hath not skill to vſe it moderatlie, and the vanquiſhed ſéemeth to haue béene ſufficientlie corrected. As for the Scots, though it might appeare that their force was greatlie abated, & that reſiſtance ſhould little auaile them: yet were they minded to die in defenſe of their liberties, rather than to ſubmit themſelues vnto anie conditions of vile ſeruitude. The words of theſe ambaſſadors being throughlie weied (though ſome tooke them in great diſdaine) yet in the end it was ſuppoſed that after victorie thus had againſt the enimies, honorable conditions of peace ought to be preferred before doubtfull warre.

Fortune is brittle.

Wherevpon anſwere was made to the ambaſſadors, that both the Engliſh and Britiſh people with Peace granted with conditions.

their kings were contented to haue peace with the Scots (though it laie in their hands now to deſtroy the whole nation) if ſo be the Scots would agrée to reſigne aſwell to the Engliſhmen as Britains all ſuch lands and countries as they had now gotten into their poſſeſſions, without anie claime or title to be made to the ſame from thenceforth, either by them or anie of their poſteritie, ſo that the water of Forth on the eaſt halfe, ſhould diuide the Scotiſh dominions from the confines of the Engliſhmen & Britains, and be called from that time euer after, the Scotiſh ſea. On the weſt the water of Clide ſhould diuide the Scotiſh lands from the Britains; the caſtell of Alcluith, ſtanding at the mouth of the ſame riuer, to remaine in the hands of the Britains, from thenceforth to beare the name of Dunbreton, that is to ſay, the caſtell of the Britains. And furthermore, that if anie of the Scots ſhould attempt to paſſe the ſaid bounds into anie of the Britiſh or Engliſh borders, he ſhould die for that offenſe. And if by force of tempeſt it chanced anie of them to be driuen to land on the ſouth ſhore, within anie of thoſe parties, they ſhould take nothing away with them but water or vittels, and depart within three daies, except ſome reaſonable cauſe of ſtaie conſtreined them to the contrarie. Moreouer, they ſhould not fortifie anie townes or caſtels on the frontiers néere to the Engliſh or Britiſh confines. And further, they ſhould couenant to pay vnto the Engliſhmen and Britains, within the ſpace of twentie yeares, the ſumme of one thouſand pounds of ſiluer. For performance of which articles of agréement, the Scots ſhould deliuer three ſcore hoſtages, being the ſonnes and heirs aparant of the chiefeſt noble men of all their realme and countrie. And if it ſo were that they miſliked and refuſed anie of theſe articles, he commanded that there ſhould no other ambaſſadour come to him for anie other treatie of accord.

Articles of peace propouned.

The Forth called the Scotiſh ſea.

Dunbreton. It was called before Caer Alcluith, that is, the citie vpon Cluid, as H. Lhoid holdeth.

Hoſtages are required.

The ambaſſadors returning home, and declaring how they had ſped, manie of the Scots thought the articles nothing reaſonable for frée people to accept; other iudged that either they muſt come to ſome agreement with the Engliſhmen and Britains, or els put the land in extreme perill. Thus had the people béene diuided into two contrarie opinions and factions, had not one Calene a noble man, borne of high parentage, and gouernour of Angus, with ſober reaſons and ſtrong arguments appeaſed this contention, perſuading them to haue reſpect to the time. And ſith the force of the realme was ſo infeebled, abated, and brought vnder foot through aduerſe fortune: better it was to yéeld vnto neceſſitie in ſauing part at that preſent, in hope after, when occaſion ſerued to recouer the reſidue, than through obſtinat wilfulneſſe to loſe the whole. For conſidering the preſent danger, it could be reputed no diſhonor to receiue conditions of peace at the enimies hands, ſith there wanted not the like example of the Romans, who gladlie accepted ſuch articles of peace, as that noble prince king Gald appointed them: and yet it is not to be iudged, that there wanted men of great knowledge and wiſdome amongeſt them, and ſuch as regarded their honor, ſo far forth as reaſon in anie wiſe did reach.

The Scots miſlike the articles of peace.

Calene his graue counſell taketh place.

The multitude moued with theſe words of Calene, whoſe graue authoritie (by reaſon of his age and wiſedome) was of no ſmall reputation amongſt them, hauing loſt nine of his owne ſonnes in the laſt battell, they finallie determined to follow his opinion in receiuing the ſame conditions of agreement which Oſbert had preſcribed: and thereupon ſent againe their ambaſſadours with the hoſtages appointed for the eſtabliſhing of the peace, in maner as is before rehearſed. Which being throughlie accompliſhed in ſuch ſolemne wiſe, as in thoſe daies and in the like caſes was accuſtomed, Oſbert ſet Donald with his nobles at libertie, ſending them home together with the ambaſſadours, being earneſtlie required ſo to do, both by the Engliſh lords, and alſo by the Britains.

The multitude conſented vnto Calene his ſaiengs.

The Scots receiue the peace.

King Donald with the noblemen are ſent home againe.

The agréement being thus made, the lands were diuided betwixt the Engliſhmen and the Britains, in ſuch ſort as the Britains had for their part all that which lieth from Sterling vnto the weſt ſea, betwixt the riuers of Forth and Clide, vnto Cumberland: and the Engliſhmen poſſeſſed the other parcels, lieng from Sterling vnto the eaſt ſea, betwixt the Scotiſh ſea and Northumberland: ſo that by this means, Clide water, Forth, and the Scotiſh ſea (where Forth runneth into the maine ſea) diuided the Scots from the Engliſhmen and Britains. And thus was the towne of Sterling a common march vnto thoſe three people; the ſame towne with the caſtell remaining vnto Oſbert, as it was couenanted amongeſt other articles of this peace. Here (as the Scotiſh writers haue) he ordeined his mint, and his coiners of monie to inhabit, whereupon came vp the name of Sterling monie: but therein they are deceiued, for (as in the hiſtorie of England ſhall appéere) that name came not in vſe till manie yéeres after. Oſbert alſo in this place cauſed a ſtone bridge to be made ouer the water of Forth, in ſtead of the wodden bridge which the Picts had made there, and was now pulled downe, and in the midſt of this new ſtone bridge he ſet vp a croſſe, whereon were ingrauen theſe verſes, to be read of the paſſers by:

Lands diuided betwixt the Britains and Engliſhmen.

A bridge of ſtone made at Sterling.

Anglos à Scotis ſeparat crux iſta remotis,
Arma hîc ſtant Bruti, ſtant Scoti hac ſub cruce tuti.

I am free march as paſſengers maie ken,
To Scots, to Britains, and to Engliſhmen.

Belenden the Scot.

The Picts which had béene with the Engliſhmen in this iournie, euer hoping to be reſtored to their lands and former poſſeſſions by Oſbert, when they ſaw how he reteined the ſame in his owne hands, appointing his ſubiects to inhabit therein, they doubted that which afterwards came to paſſe in déed, leaſt the Engliſhmen of friends would now become enimies, ſéeking the deſtruction of the whole Pictiſh generation, thereby to aſſure themſelues in the poſſeſſion of thoſe lands and liuings, whereunto the Picts (as they thought) would euer make ſome claime and title, whileſt anie of them remained aliue.

The Picts hope is deceiued.

Upon this miſtruſt therefore did thoſe Picts, which were amongeſt the Engliſhmen, make the beſt ſhift they could for themſelues, ſo that manie of them got ſhips, and ſailed into Norwaie and Denmarke, vnto their countriemen there: the other that could not make ſhift to get away, were ſlaine anon after by the Engliſhmen, ſo that one of them was not to be found aliue within anie of the Engliſh dominions. And ſuch was the end of the Picts that fled vnto the Engliſhmen for ſuccour. In this meane time the Scotiſh king Donald being reſtored againe to his countrie, was receiued with more ioy and honor than he had deſerued, in hope yet by this ſcourge of aduerſe fortune, that he would haue reformed his former abuſes. Neuertheleſſe, he had not béene at home anie long time, but that he fell to his old vicious trade of life againe, remouing from his companie ſuch honorable perſonages as wiſhed the ſuertie of his eſtate, with the aduancement of the common welth, to the reliefe and eaſe of his poore miſerable ſubiects. At length the nobles of the realme, perceiuing the danger that their countrie ſtood in, by reaſon of Donalds inſolent miſorder, vndiſcréet rule and gouernement, they found means to apprehend and commit him vnto ſafe kéeping. But the monſtrous creature, within a few daies after he was thus put in ward in great desperation sine himselfe, in the first yeare after he had begun his infortunat reigne, and in the yeare of our Sauiour 860.

The same yeare that the realme of Scotland was brought vnto such miserable state by the puissant force of the Englishmen and Britains, as aboue is rehearsed, there were sundrie wonders heard of in the countrie; as in Louthian a child of one moneth old and a halfe, admonished the mother to flie out of that countrie: for it would come to passe, that the enimies should come and take that region out of the Scotishmens hands. Beasts also, as they were pasturing abroad in the fields there, roaring after a strange sort, suddenlie died. Fishes likewise, in shape resembling the figure of man, were found dead in the sands of the Scotish sea. In Galloway there fell such abundance of adders and snakes out of the skie, that the aire being corrupted with the sauour of them lieng on the ground, both men and beasts died of certeine diseases, which they toke through infection thereof.

A yong babe giueth warning vnto his mother.

Beasts roring died.

Adders and snakes fell downe out of the skie.

Such as were accounted to be skilfull in diuination, assumed that these things did signifie an infortunat reigne, with an euill end vnto king Donald, as afterwards it happened, who hauing made away himselfe in prison (as before is expressed) Constantine the sonne of king Kenneth was crowned king at Scone, in the chaire of marble there, according to the maner as then vsed. After his first entring into the estate, he would gladlie haue gone in hand with the wars against the Englishmen, to haue recouered out of their possessions, those countries which they had latelie taken from the Scots in his predecessors time: but his councell aduised him otherwise, declaring that the state of the commonwealth was so decaied by the misgouernance of his said predecessor, that till the same were reformed, and such intestine discord, as through licentious libertie reigned amongest his subiects might be appeased and quieted, there was no hope to atchiue anie worthie enterprise abrode against forreigne enimies.

The interpretation of the prodigious things.

King Constantine crowned.

He fain would recouer his predecessors losses.

He was aduised otherwise by his councell.

Herevpon by their aduertisements and good aduise, he deuised a reformation of all such misorders as were growen vp in all parts of his realme: and first for the spiritualtie, he ordeined that priests should attend their cures, and not to intermeddle with anie secular businesse, but to be free from going forth to the warres: neither should they keepe horsses, hawks, or hounds. And if anie of them were found negligent in doing his dutie apperteining to his vocation, he should for the first fault forfeit a peece of monie, but for the second he should lose his benefice. For the youth of his realme he toke order (to bridle them the better from wanton delights and sensuall lusts) that none of them should haue past one meale a day, and that of no fine or deintie delicats, and to absteine from all such drinke as might distemper their braine, so that if anie yong person, either man or woman were knowen to be drunken, they should die for it.

Misorders are redressed.

Priests shuld onelie attend their vocation.

A penaltie for not doing their duelies.

Youth should eate but one meale a day.

Drunkennes punished with death.

He commanded further, that all the youth of his realme, should exercise running, wrestling, shooting, throwing of the dart and bowle: so to auoid slouthfulnesse, that their bodies might with such exercises be made the more able to indure paines and trauell: and for the same purpose he toke order, that they should lie vpon the bare boords, with one mantell onelie throwen vnder them, so that they should take nothing neither by day nor night, that might nourish them in anie wanton delights or effeminat pleasures. It was also ordeined, that all such as kept victualling houses for banketting cheere, should be banished the realme, with those that kept brothell houses. Thus were the Scots by obseruing of these ordinances, made within short time of glutton and excessiue feeders, sober and temperat men: of delicat and easefull persons, hard, tough, and able to abide anie trauell or labor, were the same neuer so painfull: and hereof the state of the commonwealth began to grow to good perfection, so that Constantines administration was liked of the most part of all his subiects.

Youth to be trained vp in hardnesse.

The first that went about to disquiet the prosperous reigne of that worthie prince, was one Euan, a man of an ancient house, borne in the westerne Iles. ¶ Such haue beene the vnquiet nature of the Scotishmen, euen from the beginning, neuer to liue contented anie long time either with peace or warre: for being once wearied with the charges of the warres, they streightwaies wish for peace; and hauing in time of peace heaped togither some wealth, then can they not sutfer the gouernement of their superiors, but either are readie to fall out with some forreigne enimie, or else to raise some commotion amongest themselues. This Euan therfore being the kings lieutenant of his castell of Dunstafage in Louchquhaber, practised a conspiracie against the king, with a number of other light persons being gentlemen borne, misliking the administration of things, onelie for that they saw how their inordinat libertie to oppresse inferiour persons, and to vse such wild and insolent misdemeanour, as they had done afore time, was now restreined by lawfull iustice and execution of due punishment for the same.

Euan disquieted the king and realme.

The vnquiet nature of Scotishmen.

Euan lieutenant of Dunstafage conspireth against the king.

But as these conspirators went about to haue moued the people of Louchquhaber, Murrey land, Rosse, and Cathnesse, to haue ioined with them in their traitorous interprise; some of them in whom Euan put most trust, secretlie aduertised the king of all the whole matter, who gathering a competent number of men togither, made such speedie hast towards Dunstafage, where the chiefe capteine of the rebels as then lay, that he came before the same yer anie inkling were knowen to them within of his approch. By meane whereof comming vpon them so at vnwares, he had the castell sone at his pleasure; and immediatlie herevpon caused Euan to be trussed vp on a high paire of gallowes, for a spectacle to all his complices. And furthermore, least the other conspirators might prouide them of some other chiefteine, he apprehended diuerse of the nobilitie that were accused to be of Euans confederacie, the which he put in streict prison, there to be safelie kept, till the peeres of the realme had determined with good deliberation, what should become of them. This businesse being in this wise appeased, when all men looked for quietnesse, there suddenlie followed a greater and more pernicious trouble: for such is the course of the world, that when men least thinke of mischiefe, they fall oftentimes into most danger.

The king is aduertised of Euan his treason.

The king cõmeth to Dunstafage with an armie.

Euan is executed.

One trouble followeth another.

Cadane king of Denmarke, pretending a title to all such lands as somtimes belonged to the Picts, for that the residue of that nation which had escaped the hands of the Scots and Englishmen, had resigned vnto him all their right & interest of the same lands, he determined in that quarrell (and in reuenge of the iniuries which the Picts alledged they had sustained) to make warres both vpon Scots and Englishmen. He caused therefore an huge number of ships to be prepared, and a mightie armie of men to be put in a readinesse, to passe in the same ouer into Albion, vnder the leading of his two brethren, the one named Hungar, and the other Hubba. These two chieftens hauing their ships and men with all prouision apperteining once readie, toke the sea, and sailed forth forth till they came to the coaſts of Scotland, where they toke land within the countrie of Fiſe, before anie tidings were heard of their comming thither.

The Danes vſe great cruelſtie.

The Danes being ſet on land, ſpared no kind of cruelſtie that might be ſhewed againſt the inhabitants, and namelie for that they had not as yet receiued the faith of Chriſt, they raged without all meaſure againſt prieſts, and religious perſons, ouerthrowing and burning vp churches and chapels, whereſoeuer they found anie in their way. Whereupon the Engliſhmen that inhabited in Louthian, and the Scots that dwelled in Fiſe, left their houſes & poſſeſſions, fleeing into other parties, where they thought they might beſt eſcape the hands of their new come aduerſaries. A great companie alſo of ſuch vertuous and godlie perſons, as about the ſame time laboured buſilie in ſetting forth the word of life vnto the people in thoſe parties, fled with one Adrian as then biſhop of the Scotiſhmen, into the Iland called Maie, which lieth in maner in the midway of the paſſage ouer the Forth betwirt Fiſe and Louthian, where as then there was a famous monaſterie of monks. But neither the reuerence of the place, neither the innocencie of thoſe harmleſs creatures could reſtraine the Danes from polluting their wicked hands in murthering that deuout companie, as they were then eſteemed.

The inhabitants fled the countrie.

They that fled into May Iland were ſlaine.

This is that reuerend band of martyrs, which the Scotiſh people haue had in ſuch reuerence in the foreſaid Iland of Maie; a few names of ſome of that multitude as yet remaining in memorie amongſt writers, as the foreſaid biſhop Adrian, Glodian, Gaius, or (as others write) Monanus archdeacon of ſaint Andrews, and biſhop Stolbrand: the names of the reſidue are forgotten. ¶ Some there be that affirme how this companie were Hungarians, the which fleeing out of their countrie, from the perſecution which was their exerciſed by men of miſbeliefe againſt the chriſtians, they arriued here in Scotland, and applied themſelues to the inſtructing of the Scotiſhmen in the way of ſaluation. Other write that they were Scots and Engliſhmen thus aſſembled there togither. But of whence ſoeuer they were, certeine it is that by cuſtome they were become Scots, and inſtructed the Scots (as before is ſaid) in the way of ſaluation. After this cruell ſlaughter thus by the Danes committed, they continued in their wood rage, as they paſſed through Fife and the other countries nere bordering vpon the ſame, till all the inhabitants were auoided out of their houſes, either by flight or ſlaughter.

The vncertentie of writers in this matter of theſe martyrs.

Conſtantine the Scotiſh king being kindled in the meane time with paſſing great diſpleaſure, for theſe ſo notable iniuries receiued at the hands of the Danes, thought good with all ſpeed to go againſt them, and to attempt the chance of battell before they had waſted anie further within his dominions, ſo greatlie to the diminiſhing of his roiall power and eſtimation amongſt his ſubiects. Hereupon leuieng his people, and aſſembling a mightie hoſt togither, he paſſed forth with the ſame towards his enimies, the which were lodged in two ſeuerall camps, the one being diſtant from the other about a quarter of a mile, ſeuered in ſunder with the courſe of a little riuer called Leuin, the which (vpon the approch of the Scots vnto that part of the campe that laie on the further ſide nert vnto them) chanced to be raiſed on ſuch hight, thorough abundance of raine, that in two daies after vnneth it might bee paſſed ouer at the fords.

Conſtantine aſſembled a mightie army.

After this ſore and tempeſtuous weather, the aire cleared vp and waxed verie faire and calme, giuing occaſion to the Scots to worke their feat againſt one part of their enimies, whileſt the other could not come ouer vnto their aid and ſuccour. In this campe which lay on that ſide the riuer nert vnto the Scots, Hubba was lodged, who did what he could to haue ſtaied his men from iſſuing forth of the campe, to giue battell when the Scots drew nere to the ſame, and aſſaied all waies by prouoking the Danes with ſkirmiſhes to come forth and fight with them in plaine field. But notwithſtanding all that he could doo, forth they ruſhed in ſuch wiſe by plumps, and with ſo great noiſe and clamour, that the captains were conſtreined of neceſſitie to ſet them in order of battell, ſith they would néeds giue the onſet vpon their preſent enimies.

The Scots & Danes ioine their battels.

The Danes did weare aloft vpon their armor certeine linen garments, wrought with red ſilke, ſhewing faire and white both at hand and a far off. Their weapons were of ſuch ſort as ſerued for the puſh rather than for downe-right blowes, the points being of ſuch a handſome ſtrong faſhion, that no armor might lightlie hold forth againſt them. Theſe kind of weapons, togither with the maſter of their huge bodies, was dreadfull at the firſt for the Scotiſhmen to behold, as they marched towards them in araie of battell. But anon comming nere togither readie to ioine, the Scots manfullie taking to them new courages, ſet vpon the Danes with great violence, who likewiſe began the battell verie ſtoutlie, ſo that the ſame continued right fierce and cruell a good ſpace. At length the Danes being aſſailed on each ſide, both afront before, and on their backs behind, oppreſſed as it were with multitudes, did throw downe their weapons and fled amaine. Manie of them making towards their campe were ouertaken and ſlaine, diuerſe of them falling into the ditches were oppreſſed with throng, aſwell of their owne companie, as of their enimies, as they paſſed ouer them in following the chaſe, and ſtriuing to enter the campe vpon ſuch as ſtood to defend them from entering. Other there were that leaping into the water in hope to get ouer, were drowned in the whirling waues of the ſtreame; though ſome, through helpe of their fellowes (which ſtood on the other ſide readie to haue paſſed the water, if they might ſo haue done without manifeſt danger of drowning) eſcaped and got ouer, amongſt whome Hubba was one, to the great reioiſing of his brother Hungar, to ſee him thus deliuered twiſe from perill of death, as firſt from amongeſt his enimies, and ſecondlie out of the roring ſtreame of that deepe and ſwift raging riuer.

The Danes apparell.

Hubba was ſaued from drowning.

The Scots tooke no warning by the ouerthrow of their enimies, but ſtreightwaies fell to ſpoile the dead bodies, and to gather vp the riches that lay ſcattered abroad in the fields. Manie of them alſo ſtripped themſelues out of their armor, and ſome put on the apparell of their aduerſaries, ſo that they were verie vnlike themſelues. Thus while the victors were buſie in ſpoiling the ſlaine, the vanquiſhed Danes that eſcaped the ſlaughter, gathered themſelues togither, and returned to the campe, where they found the Scots in ſuch diſorder, that they were eaſilie put to the worſe, and ſlaine in great numbers, ſo that the victorie fell to the Danes againe, who ſlue all the Scots that they found in the campe, and ſpoiled them of their armor and apparell, wherewith they apparelled themſelues, and ſo returned to the ſhips.

The Scots tooke of this victorie immoderate ioy.

The Scots for ioy readie to fall out.

Conſtantine proceeded againſt his enimies.

Thus the Scots were ſpoiled of their victorie, and the Danes of their ſpoile, ſo that the Scots had nothing left them but their bare liues, and the Danes had nothing but their armor and apparell. Yet ſo farre proceeded their inſolent outrage, that they began to contend amongſt themſelues for the priſoners and ſpoiles, which they counted now their owne, as though alreadie they had the ſame wholie in their poſſeſſion: and further reaſoned, not without altercation, whether the Daniſh captens after they had them once in their hands, ſhould be put to death, or els be kept aliue to be ſhewed to the people in triumph or no. Great adoo and manie vaine words were ſpent hereabout, in ſuch earneſt ſort, that they were at point to haue fallen out amongſt themſelues: but there was no mention at all made touching the ordering of their battels, and other the neceſſarie proceedings againſt their enimies. At length, when the riuer was fallen and come to his old courſe againe, ſo that it might eaſilie be paſſed, Conſtantine in order of battell got ouer with his people, to the other ſide where the Danes were lodged, who hauing more mind to ſet themſelues in ſuch order, whereby they might gaine the victorie, than to deuiſe for the diuiding of the ſpoile, perceiuing occaſion now offered to giue the onſet, forthwith araied their people in this ſort.

The order & placing of the Danes armie.

Hubba had the right wing

Huerne had the left wing.

Hubba with ſir thouſand Danes, was placed in the right wing. The left was led by one Huerne an Engliſhman borne, who was fled out of his countrie, for that he could not beare ſuch iniuries as Oſbert offered him in forcing his wife, to the great reproch and diſhonor of his houſe and name. He had with him in this left wing certeine bands of Engliſhmen, with thoſe Picts that had eſcaped ouer into Denmarke (as before is mentioned.) Hungar with all the reſidue of the armie, kept the battell or middle ward, exhorting his men to ſhew their force & manhood that day, ſith the ſame ſhould either put them in poſſeſſion of the whole land of Albion, with all the ſubſtance and riches conteined therein, either elſe bring them perpetuall ſeruitude with ignominie amongſt their moſt cruell and fierce aduerſaries. He therefore himſelfe openlie in preſence of them all, vowed with ſolemne oth, either to returne with victorie to his campe, either elſe to die in the place, willing them all to make the like couenant. Whereupon the vniuerſall multitude allowed him ſo much for this his motion, that there was not one amongſt the whole number, which agreed not to ſweare the like oth. Conſtantine keeping in manner the like order, placed in the right wing his brother Ethus, in the left Duncane the lieutenant or thane of Athole, appointing to either of them ten thouſand men a peece.

Hungar kept the battell.

Hungar made a vow.

The ſouldiers did make the like vow.

King Conſtantine placed his men in like manner.

All the reſidue were ſet in the battell where he himſelfe ſtood. And firſt he gaue them all hartie thanks in that they had ſo valiantlie atchiued the victorie in the laſt battell, requiring them now not to blemiſh their former glorie with anie faintneſſe of courage, recreant cowardiſe, or diſhonorable flight: and further he willed them in no wiſe to be afeard of their enimies, in reſpect more for their hugeneſſe of bodie, than for anie of their valiant ſtoutneſſe of heart: for if they aſſailed them with one whole and entire conſent, according to their wonted forwardneſſe & manlike prowes, they ſhould quicklie put them to flight, and obteine a ioifull victorie. Herewith he alſo warned them not to run raſhlie vpon the enimies, but to ſuffer them firſt to giue the charge: for by that meanes he thought the Danes would with their earneſt violence diſorder themſelues, and ſo ſhould it be more eaſie for the Scots to breake in amongſt them.

In incouragement giuen to his ſouldiers.

But this deuiſe did not a little abate the Scotiſh mens courages. For the Scots vſe is, when they ſhall enter into battell, to make a great ſhout and noiſe, and therewith to run vpon their enimies, by which meanes (as they ſuppoſe) they both put the enimie in feare, and incourage themſelues to the battell. The Danes at the ſound of the trumpet marched forth towards the Scots, where they ſtood thus in order of battell: but when they perceiued that the Scots came not forward, they alſo ſtaied in the midway to refreſh themſelues, leaſt at the ioining they ſhould be out of breath. Anon after, paſſing forward an eaſie pace, they ſhot quarrels, and threw darts at their enimies verie freſhlie, and the Scots let flie at them againe with arrowes and darts as thicke as it had beene a ſtorme of haile.

The Danes approch towards the Scots.

The Danes ſhot quarels and threw darts.

The Scots ſhot arrowes and darts as thicke as haile.

After this they ruſhed togither with great violence on both ſides; but within a while, the Danes had put both the wings of their enimies to flight, and after compaſſing the maine battell round about, they conſtreine the ſame in the end with great bloudſhed and ſlaughter to giue backe and flee out of the field. Ten thouſand Scots died that day in this infortunate battell with Conſtantine himſelfe, who being firſt taken was had into a caue by the ſea ſide amongſt the rocks, and there cruellie murthered by the enimies. The place was called certeine yeres after, the blacke den: but now they name it the diuels den, in memorie of that heinous murther there committed. The Scotiſh nation alſo had beene vtterlie as then deſtroied, had not Ethus the brother of Conſtantine, perceiuing how the field was loſt, eſcaped awaie with two companies of his beſt men of warre, ſo reſeruing himſelfe to the time of more luckie fortune.

Ethus.

THe people likewiſe doubting for want of a gouernor to be the ſoner ouercome by their enimies, did lead the ſaid Ethus to Scone, where they crowned him king, in the yeere after the birth of our Sauiour 874, and the 13 after Conſtantine began to rule the eſtate of the realme. The ſame yeere were manie wonders and vnketh ſights ſeene within the Scotiſh dominions. In the mouth of the Forth, otherwiſe called the Scotiſh ſea, there appeared fiſhes in great numbers, like vnto men in ſhape, ſwimming vp and downe in the ſtreame with halfe their bodies aboue the water, and hauing a blacke ſkin, which couered there heads and necks, from their ſhoulders vpwards like an hood. Theſe are called Balinates, and vſe to go in great companies togither, as though they were ſkulles of herrings, ſignifieng (when they are ſeene) ſome great miſfortune vnto the countrie, as the common people haue long had an opinion. Alſo the loches, riuers, and all maner of other waters were frozen from the beginning of November, till the latter end of Aprill; and when the froſt brake, and the ſnowe melted, there was ſuch a flood flowing ouer all the plaines euen to the roots of the mounteins, as the like had not bene ſeene. Furthermore, when the ſame ſhrunke and went away, in the mud and ſlime there was ſuch a ſort of frogs left, that when they were dead, and began to putrifie, the aire was ſo infected, that manie deadlie diſeaſes inſued, whereof great numbers of the inhabitants did periſh. Moreouer, there was a mightie ſtarre or comet ſeene with firie rates iſſuing forth of the ſame, which both night and day followed the mone during the moneth of Aprill, to the great horror of all that beheld it.

But to proceed. The Danes (as is ſaid) hauing vanquiſhed the Scots, and waſted the countrie of Fife, paſſed ouer into Louthian, where robbing and ſpoiling all before them, they purſued the inhabitants into Northumberland, whither they fled for refuge. There the Danes being aided with certeine Engliſhmen in fauour of Huerne, ſlue in battell both Oſbert and Ella, kings of that countrie. The crueltie of the Danes was ſuch after they had atchiued the victorie, that few eſcaped with life, but ſuch as ſaued themſelues by flight. But chiefflie there rage appeared moſt againſt prieſts, and ſuch as profeſſed themſelues men of religion. For the Danes being Ethniks, perſecuted moſt egerlie thoſe that in anie wiſe profeſſed Chriſt. The like outragious murthering of the chriſtians was practiſed throughout the countrie, and at length came vnto that bleſſed king ſaint Edmund, reigning as then ouer the people of the Eaſtangles, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie more plainlie maie appeare. Howbeit other of the Engliſh kings mainteined the warres with theſe Danes certeine yeres after this, with variable fortune; the moſt part of thoſe people which inhabited on that coaſt toward the Germane ſeas, either being ſlaine or brought into miſerable bondage and thraldome. But Alured, which ſucceeded his brother king Edelfred, not in the kingdome of Northfolke and Suffolke (as Hector Boetius affirmeth) but in the kingdome of the Weſtſaxons, redreſſed a great part of this miſerie, into the which the countrie was thus thus brought by the Danes, by ſubduing them in ſundrie conflicts, and ſleaing their two capteins the foreſaid Hungar and Hubba, as in the ſame Engliſh hiſtorie is further expreſſed.

But now to returne vnto Ethus, I find that he was of ſuch ſwiftneſſe of foot, that he would match and make waie in running with harts and hounds, and therevpon was ſurnamed Lightfoot: but of what nimble lightneſſe of bodie ſoeuer he was, truth it is that he was of diſpoſition in mind vnfit to haue the order of anie publike regiment. For whereas he might haue recouered Fife and Louthian with other regions, whileſt the Engliſhmen and Danes were togither by the eares, he paſſed ouer that occaſion, delighting more in following the pleaſures of the bodie & ſenſuall luſts, than to beſtow his time in feates of chiualrie and other warlike exerciſes. The nobles of the realme perceiuing him thus to abuſe the worthie gifts of his perſon, miſtruſting leaſt his inſolent doings ſhould indamage the publike ſtate of the common-wealth, they toke counſell togither how they might apprehend him, and to ſend him ſome whither out of the waie where to be ſafelie kept, and then to place ſome other in the gouernement of the realme, that might rule the ſame with more diſcretion & better aduiſe. And leaſt their reſolution ſhould be diſcloſed before it toke effect, they ſlacked no time, but went ſpéedilie about their buſineſſe. And comming to the king, whome they found a hunting in Calidon wood, they ſuddenlie areſted him, and therwith committed him to ſafe kéeping: & thoſe whome they knew to be fauourers of his euill rule and miſgouernance, they put them alſo faſt in irons, till they had anſwered vnto ſuch articles as ſhould be laid to their charge. This done, they proceéded to the election of a new king; and in the end by the perſuaſion of one Dongall gouernor or thane of Argile, they choſe Gregorie the ſonne of that Dongall, which reigned before Alpine, who was not paſt two moneths old when his father died.

Gregorie is choſen king.

Gregorie.

THis Gregorie being knowne to be a man worthie of the rome, though he himſelfe onlie was againſt it, at length by perſuaſion receiued the inueſture of the kingdome at Scone, with all due ſolemnitie. Ethus hearing thereof, through anguiſh of mind died within three daies after, in the ſecond yeare of his reigne, and 876, after the birth of our Sauiour. There be that write how he was ſtrangled in priſon by Dongall his procurement, leaſt by aduenture he might haue béene reſtored vnto libertie, and withall haue made claime to the crowne againe. Gregorie being thus eſtabliſhed in the eſtate, conſidering that the ſuertie of all realmes reſted in the hands of the diuine maieſtie, to begin his gouernment with ſome luckie enterpriſe, cauſed a conuocation to be holden at Forfair, for the aduancement of Chriſts religion: where amongſt other things, it was ordeined, that prieſts from thenceforth (to the end they might more freelie attend to their vocation) ſhould be exempt from paieng of tribute and all maner of exactions. Alſo that they ſhould not be conſtreined to go vnto the warres, neither to come before anie tempporall iudges, but onlie before their ordinaries and biſhops, by whome they ſhould be iudged in all cauſes. The ſame ordinaries and biſhops ſhould alſo haue authoritie to order all men, both publike and priuate, aſwell for the kéeping of faith giuen, as to conſtreine them to confirme the ſame, and to puniſh ſuch as ſhould be found in the contrarie; likewiſe in cauſes of controuerſie touching matrimonie, tithes, teſtaments, legacies, and ſuch like: moreouer the correcting of thoſe that blaſpheme either God or his ſaints.

875. Io. Ma.

A conuocation of the clergie.

Prieſts are free of all tribute.

They ſhould not be called to ſerue in the warres.

Authoritie giuen vnto biſhops to order kings.

Heretikes and necromancers, with other the like offendors againſt the lawes and articles of the chriſtian religion, was aſſigned vnto the biſhops and their ſubſtituts, ſo that all thoſe which were found diſobedient vnto them, and refuſed to be at their commendement, they ſhould haue authoritie to excommunicate them out of the church, and from companie kéeping with anie of the cõgregation, ſo as they that were thus excommunicated, ſhould be depriued of all abilitie to inioy anie inheritance or right to lands or poſſeſſions whatſoeuer they were. Neither ſhould they be accepted as a witneſſe in anie maner of cauſe, neither beare anie office or rule in the common-wealth. This Gregorie alſo (as is ſaid) was the firſt author of that ordinance, by the which the Scotiſh kings at their coronation vſe of ancient cuſtome to vow by ſolemne oth, that during their liues, they ſhall mainteine and defend the church with his miniſters, in all ancient liberties and priuileges, and not to ſuffer anie man to hurt or infringe the ſame.

When the Scotiſh kings firſt began to promiſe by oth to mainteine the libertie of the church.

There was ſuerlie in this Gregorie a certeine naturall inclination to vertue, with ſuch aduiſednеſſe in all his words, that he vttered few or none but that the ſame ſéemed to be ſpoken with verie great conſideration. He was neuer maried, but continued in chaſtitie all his life time. Of meate & drinke he was verie ſpare, delighting in all kind of ſobrietie, more watchfull than giuen to ſléepe. But his fame increaſed moſt for his mainteining of iuſtice and ciuill adminiſtration concerning the ſtate of the common-wealth, not omitting the practiſe of warre, where neceſſitie required. The firſt expedition which he toke in hand, he made into Fife, to recouer that countrie to the crowne of Scotland. At whoſe entrance into the ſame, the Picts, whome the Danes had left in thoſe parties at their departure thence, being ſtriken with feare to fall into the hands of the Scots their ancient enimies, fled forthwith into Louthian, leauing Fife in manner void, and without anie that would offer to defend it againſt the Scots.

Gregorie is choſen king.

He made an expedition into Fife.

The Picts fled into Louthian.

Wherevpon Gregorie ſo finding it deſolate of inhabitants, ſent for people out of other parts of his realme, appointing them dwellings in that countrie as he thought moſt expedient. This done he paſſed into Louthian, where taking the fortreſſes and places of defenſe, ſome by force, and ſome by ſurrender, he eaſilie reduced that countrie into his ſubiection, ſo that within a few daies, hauing there all at his pleaſure, he came vnto Berwike, where there were a great number of Danes ioined togither with the Picts, as men not minding to flee anie further, but to fight with the Scots euen there, if they ſhould come forward vpon them. But when they ſaw what number the Scots were of, and herewith doubting the Engliſhmen to come on their backs if the matter went not well with them; they thought it beſt that ſuch Danes as were of anie great reputation of nobilitie, ſhould withdraw into Berwike before the enimies were at hand, and the reſidue to paſſe ouer Tweed into Northumberland, there to ioine with other Danes that in thoſe parties were latelie arriued.

The king ſet inhabitants in Fife.

He ſubdued Louthian.

The Danes and Picts ioine themſelues togither.

They fled into Northumberland.

But the Engliſhmen within Berwike, abhorring nothing more than to be vnder ſubiection of the Danes, in the euening after the receiuing of the Daniſh nobles into their towne, deliuered it togither with their gheſts vnto the Scotiſhmen, who ſuffering the Engliſhmen at their pleaſure either to go their waies with all their goods, or to remaine ſtill in their houſes, ſlue the Danes, without ſparing either man, woman, or child. Then leauing a ſtrong garriſon of Scotiſhmen within Berwike, Gregorie marched forth with the reſidue of his people into Northumberland, to vnite that countrie to other of his his dominions that bordered vpon the same.

In those parties at that selfe time there were two armies lodged in the fields, the one of Danes not far from Yorke, vnder the leading of one Herdunt, who had latelie taken and sacked that citie, and the other of Englishmen that late 20 miles off from the said Danes. Herdunt hearing of the slaughter which the Scots had made of his countriemen at Berwike, threatned sore that he would not leaue a man aliue of the Scotish race within anie part of the confines of Albion. With how manie of the companie, following their captaines example, likewise made. Shortlie after, hearing of their enimies approch, the whole host (by commandement of Herdunt) issued forth of their campe to giue battell.

Herdunt threatned the Scots.

The Danes prepare to the battell.

Here the Scotish king standing with his people in order of battell, had thought to haue vsed some comfortable speech vnto them, thereby to incourage them to fight: but such hast was made by the Scots to preasse vpon their enimies, that he saw it more needfull to take heed to the ordering of them in perfect arate, than to stand about to exhort them, whome he saw readie inough of their owne accord to fight. Therefore he said no more vnto them, as he went amongst the ranks, but onelie willed them to remember how cruellie Constantine their king was sometime murthered, after he had yelded himselfe prisoner to these enimies, with whome they should now ioine.

King Gregorie his saieng to the souldiers.

The Scots hereupon running to the battell with no lesse stoutnesse of mind than violent force, gaue their enimes scarse space to charge their weapons, but bare them downe with long speares and iauelins, and withall the bilmen following them made great slaughter on ech side, so that there needed neither exhortation of capteins, nor diligence of wisers to keepe them in arate. For the wrathfull stomachs of the souldiers onelie wrought the feat in such sort, that the Danes were quicklie put to flight and chased. Those that could not escape to the campe, got them vnto the next mounteins, who chanced vpon better lucke than those that escaped to the campe, for the egernesse of the Scots was such in chasing the enimes, that neither ditch nor rampire could staie them from entring the campe vpon the Danes where they made greater slaughter than they had done in the field.

Herdunt assembled his men togither.

The next daie Herdunt goeth about to assemble his men togither againe, being dispersed here and there: but when he vnderstood how he had lost the more halfe of his whole host, he cursed that vnhappie day, and determined to retire vnto Rasin, who as then was capteine generall of all the Danes that were in England. But Herdunt by reason of his wounded men, whome he was faine to carie with him, could not make forward with anie great speed, so that he was scarse fortie miles got forth on his waie, when word came to him, that Rasin fighting with the Englishmen vnwarilie, at a place called Helcades, chanced to be slaine with a great multitude of his people: and therevnto his head was caried abroad vp and downe the countrie from towne to towne to be seene. By such mishaps the prosperitie of the Danes so much flourishing of late, began now manifestlie to decaie.

Herdunt went toward Rasin, chiefe generall of the Danes in England.

Herdunt although he was not a little discouraged therewith, yet he chose forth a plot of ground most meet for his purpose, where he determined to abide in campe, till he might vnderstand what the Danes in other places were minded to do. But Gregorie king of Scots, hauing thus expelled the Danes forth of Northumberland, brought that countrie vnder his subiection: neuertheless he permitted the inhabitants to inioy all their possessions still, onelie receiuing of them in name of souereignitie a yerelie tribute. So that within a few daies after, he brake vp his armie, and went himselfe into Berwike, where he remained all the winter season in consultation with his nobles about the publike affaires of the realme.

Herdunt remained in campe.

King Gregorie suffered the inhabitants of Northumberland to inioy their lands.

King Gregorie wintered at Berwike.

In the beginning of the next summer, he prepared againe for warre, and raising an armie, he purposed to make a iournie against the Britains, who held (as before ye haue heard) a great part of Scotland. But he was not driuen to vse anie force in this warre: for the Britains being vexed afore this time with warre by the Danes, had compounded with them for an huge summe of monie to haue truce for twentie yeres space: but the Danes without regard to their promise, shortlie after (with a greater power than at the first) entered into the British borders, renewing the warre so fiercelie, that albeit their force was sore enfeebled, by reason of the two last ouerthrowes; yet the Britains doubting the worst, feared to incounter with them, and therefore after consultation had, they thought it best to assaie if they might happilie allure the Scots, of their enimies to become their friends. Hereupon sending vnto the Scotish king an herald, they require to ioine with them in armes against the Danes, common enimies to both their countries, promising that if they would so do, they would willinglie render into his hands all such possessions which they held at anie time belonging vnto the Scotish kingdome.

The Britains send to king Gregorie.

Gregorie weieng with himselfe how necessarie this friendship should be, not onelie to the publike weale of all the whole land of Albion, but also of the good suertie and aduancement of Christes religion, whereof the Danes were greuous aduersaries (for this he thought, that if Scots, Englishmen, and Britains did ioine in one, and knit themselues together in aiding each other, there was no nation in the world that they needed to feare) he consented vnto the request of the Britains, and so accepting their offer, he had all those regions which perteined sometime to the Scots, and were now in possession of the Britains, surrendered into his hands, and so by this means were the Scotish confines inlarged and extended vnto their owne ancient limits and former bounds.

King Gregorie his consideration.

A peace concluded, and lands surrendered to the Scots.

This dissention and variance being ceassed after this maner, it greatlie reioised the minds of all the inhabitants of this Iland: but contrariwise, the Danes looked for nothing more than present destruction to insue vpon them, if this amitie should continue anie while amongest their enimies. Wherefore they practised sundrie means to breake th'amitie thus remaining betwixt their aduersaries, Scots, Englishmen, and Britains. Wherein they needed not greatlie to trauell, for within a short time after the conclusion of the same league, the prosperous successe of the Englishmen (which for a season had followed them vnder the conduct and gouernement of their king Alured against the Danes) occasioned the Britains also (hauing now no further feare of the Danish puissance) to repent themselues of the league, which they had latelie made with the Scots, so that Constantine, whome a little before they had receiued to be their king after the decease of his father, raised a power, and with the same entered into Annandale, to recouer that countrie out of the Scotishmens hands. But hearing in the end that Gregorie was comming with a great armie to succour his subiects, whome the said Britains on each side had sore afflicted, they began to draw backe towards Cumberland with their bootie, thinking there to be in safetie, vntill a time more conuenient.

The Britains repent them of the league made with the Scots.

But king Gregorie coasting the countrie, met with with them at Lochmaben, and there gaue them battell, wherein when Conſtantine perceiued how his people began to ſhrinke backe, as one hauing more regard to his honor than to the ſuertie of his life, he ruſhed forth into the formoſt preaſe, there to ſuccour and relieue his ſtandards: but being compaſſed about amongeſt a great companie of his enimies, his chance was there to be ſlaine with a number of the chiefeſt lords of all the Britiſh nation. The other multitude ſeeing the day go thus againſt them, fled to ſaue their liues, leauing the victorie ſo vnto the Scots.

Conſtantine is ſlaine.

This ouerthrow did put the Britains in danger to haue bin vtterlie ouerrun, what by the Scots on the one ſide, and Danes on the other: for as for forren aid to be loked for of the Engliſh, they had plaine anſwer they ſhould haue none, ſith they had ſo vniuſtlie broken the league concluded with their confederats the Scots, to the great hinderance of the proſperous proceedings of all the inhabitants of this Ile, againſt their common enimies the Danes. Yet the better to eſtabliſh the eſtate of their countrie, and in hope of ſome recouerie of their former damages; they crowned to their king one Herbert or (as ſome copies haue) one Hebert the brother of the laſt Conſtantine, and herewith ſent ambaſſadours vnto Gregorie king of the Scotiſhmen to excuſe themſelues, in that they had ſo wrongfullie attempted the warres againſt him and his people, laieng all the fault in Conſtantine, who againſt the wils and contrarie to the minds of his ſubiects, did take vpon him that diſhonorable and moſt infortunat enterprize.

Herbert king of Britaine ſent ambaſſadors to Gregorie.

King Gregorie his anſwere.

Gregorie hauing heard the meſſage of theſe ambaſſadours, for anſwere declared vnto them, that he vnderſtood well inough, that the Britains now ſued for peace vpon no reuerend conſideration they had vnto their oths of couenant; but onelie for that they ſaw how if they ſhould purſue the warre ſtill, they were ſure that in the end they ſhould be like to haue the foile: and therefore he was fullie thus reſolued, not to conclude anie peace or truce with ſuch diſloiall people, till they had reſigned ouer into his hands the whole poſſeſſion of the countries of Cumberland and Weſtmerland, with aſſurance neuer to pretend anie claime or title vnto thoſe dominions from thenceforth: and herewith for performance of couenants, to render into his hands not onelie the keies of all the townes, caſtels and fortreſſes in the ſame countries, and to auoid quite their waies into Wales to other their countriemen there, but alſo to deliuer ſixtie noble mens ſonnes and heires apparant as pledges to remaine with the Scots.

Gregorie required a reſignation of Cumberland and weſtmerland.

The ambaſſadours returning home with this meſſage, and reporting it accordinglie vnto their king, when all men had ſaid their aduiſe, in the end they condeſcended to conclude a peace with the rehearſed conditions preſcribed by the Scotiſh king, ſith they ſaw no better meane to preſerue their nation from preſent deſtruction. And thus deliuering the appointed number of pledges, they left the countries of Cumberland and Weſtmerland void, ſurrendering into the Scotiſhmens hands the poſſeſſions of all the townes, caſtels and fortreſſes, and therewith departed into Northwales, where they placed themſelues in the countrie betwixt Conway and the riuer of Dee, out of the which they expelled the Engliſhmen (that were then in poſſeſſion thereof) and therewith they erected a kingdome there, which they named Stradcluid, mainteining warres againſt the Engliſhmen manie yeares after.

Peace was concluded.

Humf. Lhoid. 870.

King Gregorie hauing thus inlarged his kingdome, aſſembled his nobles at Carleill, where he reſolued (with their aduiſe) to follow ſuch good fortune as by Gods prouidence ſhould chance vnto them. Whereupon it was agreed, that they ſhould go firſt vnto Yorke to conquere that citie, whileſt the Engliſhmen in Kent were occupied with the Danes that were come thither; ſo as neither the one nation nor the other could attend to make anie attempt to hinder the Scotiſhmens enterprize. But in the meane time came ambaſſadours vnto Gregorie from king Alured, to congratulat his proſperous ſucceſſe againſt his enimies the Danes and others. Theſe ambaſſadours alſo willed to haue the ancient league betwixt Engliſhmen and Scots renewed, by which means both their powers might ioine togither againſt their common enimies, when they ſhould attempt anie wrongfull inuaſion.

The policie of the Scots to haue taken Yorke.

King Alured ſent ambaſſadours vnto king Gregorie.

This requeſt was granted, ſo that ſhortlie thereupon peace was eſtabliſhed betwixt thoſe princes and their people, with confirmation of the old league, whereto were added theſe articles; That the Scots ſhould inioy poſſeſſion of Northumberland without anie claime to be made to the ſame by the Engliſhmen; If the Danes chanced to inuade either of their dominions, the warre ſhould be accounted as common to them both; Neither ſhould the Scots grant paſſage to anie enimie of the Engliſhmen through Scotland, neither the Engliſhmen ſuffer the Scotiſhmens enimies to paſſe through England; If anie Engliſhmen did rob or ſteale anie thing out of Scotland, that ſhould not breake the league; but the offendors with the receiuers ſhould be deliuered to the Scotiſh magiſtrats, to be puniſhed according to the qualitie of the offenſe; and the like ſhould be obſerued by the Scots towards the Engliſhmen.

Peace confirmed.

New conditions of peace.

No paſſage to be granted vnto the enimie.

Puniſhment of robbers.

Thus things being quieted with the Engliſhmen, as Gregorie was about to lay armour aſide, word came to him of new troubles forth of Galloway, by reaſon of an inuaſion made by the Iriſhmen into that countrie. For the Iriſhmen hauing knowledge that the inhabitants of Galloway had ſpoiled two ſhips of Dubline arriuing on their coaſt, ſent ouer a great power of men, the which landing in Galloway, made great ſlaughter of the people on each ſide. King Gregorie being aduertiſed hereof, ſtreitwaies made towards them, but they hauing knowledge of his comming drew to their ſhips with a great prey of goods and cattels, and returned therewith immediatlie backe into their owne countrie.

Galloway inuaded by the Iriſh men.

Herevpon Gregorie without delaie got togither his ſhips and followed the enimie with all his armie, and landing in Ireland, put the nobles of that realme in great feare, who as then were in contention togither which of them ſhould haue the gouernement, by reaſon their king was latelie dead, and had left a ſonne behind him being but a child in yeres, to ſucceed him in his throne. Some therefore of the wiſer ſort, and ſuch as tendered the wealth of their countrie, went earneſtlie about to agree the parties, but when they ſaw that it would not be, they did ſo much preuaile, that a truce was taken betwixt them for a while, leaſt fighting ſtill amongſt themſelues, they ſhould put their countrie in danger to be ouerrun of the Scots: againſt whome when they had agreed vpon the foreſaid truce, either of the factions raiſed a power, one Bren being generall of the one, and Cornelius of the other; for theſe two princes were heads of the parties, betwixt whom the controuerſie for the gouernement of the realme reſted, and thereupon by conſent of the reſidue had the leading of all them that were of their faction.

A truce was taken betwixt the two parties.

The two Iriſhmen gather their powers.

Theſe two capteins with their armies incamped themſelues vpon the banke of the riuer Bane, vnder the mounteine called Fute: their camps being ſeuered by a ſmall diſtance the one from the other, in ſuch a ſtrong place, that it was not poſſible for the

Two armies one neere the other.

the enimies to approch them without manifeſt danger to caſt away themſelues. Their chiefe purpoſe was to prolong the time here in this place, till they had famiſhed the Scotiſh armie, and then to deale with them at their pleaſure. But the induſtrious proviſion of Gregorie paſſed the politike deuiſe of the Iriſhmen: for he had commanded that euerie one of thoſe Scotiſhmen, which paſſed the ſeas with him, ſhould purueie himſelfe of vittels, according to the cuſtome of the countrie, for fiftie daies ſpace, as of bread, cheeſe, butter, lard, and powdered beefe: as for drinke, they knew they ſhould not need to care, ſith they were ſure to find water inough in euerie place where they chanced to come: for as yet filthie & ſeruile gluttonie had not ſoftned nor inured with wanton delicacie the warlike natures of the Scotiſh people.

In the end Gregorie, hauing for certeine daies reſted himſelfe and his men, and deuiſing in the meane time which way he might beſt indamage the enimies; at length concluded to ſend in the night ſeaſon two thouſand of his ſouldiors vp to the ridge of the forenamed mounteine called Fute, through the thicke buſhes and woods, wherewith the ſame was couered, to the end that getting to the top of that hill, right ouer where the Iriſh camps laie, they might in the morning (at what time Gregorie with the reſt of the armie went about to aſſaile his enimies) tumble downe ſtones from the browes of the hill vpon them, thereby either to deſtroy great numbers of them, either elſe to conſtreine them to come forth of their ſtrength into the plaine fields, and ſo to fight with them in a place indifferent.

Kenneth Cullan the thane of Carrike, tooke vpon him to haue the conduct of them that ſhould go about this interpriſe, who conueieng his band ouer the water of Bane, and ſo vp on the backeſide of the mounteine, in the morning when their felowes fell in hand to aſſaile the Iriſh campe, where Bren lodged, they tumbled ſuch plentie of mightie ſtones downe vpon the Iriſhmen, that aboue a thouſand of them being ſlaine, all the reſidue were forced to forſake their ground, & to flee in maner without anie ſtroke ſtriken. The Scots that were ſent to purſue them, tooke a great number of them priſoners, and ſlue but a few, hauing before hand ſuch commandement from their prince.

Whileſt this miſchiefe fell vpon Bren and his people, Cornelius with his folkes curſſing that infortunate daie, left their lodgings, and marched their waies in good order of battell, till they were farre inough out of danger. The bodie of Bren alſo was found amongſt other in the rifling of the campe, with the head bruiſed in peeces, and the braines paſhed out with ſome ſtone throwne downe by the Scotiſhmen from the hill ſide: which Gregorie at the requeſt of ſome of the priſoners, cauſed to be buried in chriſtian ſepulchre. He cauſed alſo women and children to be ſent awaie harmeleſſe, onelie reteining the men of able age priſoners. Furthermore he commanded that they ſhould vſe neither fire nor ſword, but againſt ſuch onelie as with weapon in hand made anie reſiſtance: and commanded them alſo that they ſhould prouide themſelues of vittels to ſerue them, whileſt they ſhould lie abroad & remaine there in that countrie.

Herevpon manie of the Iriſh people thus taſting the mercifull clemencie of the Scotiſh king, yeelded themſelues vnto him with ſundrie fortreſſes, ſo that Gregorie finding ſufficient prouiſion of vittels to ſerue his hoſt for a long ſeaſon, he went vnto the ſtrong citie of Doungarg, or Doungard, which he enuironed about with a ſtrong ſiege, & continuing the ſame certeine daies, at length they within wearied with continuall trauell and lacke of vittels, opened the gate, and ſuffered him to enter. He would not permit his men to meddle with anie of the ſpoile, but appointed the townelmen to redeeme the ſame (their armour excepted) of his ſouldiors for a peece of monie.

The towne was yeelded.

A gentle ranſome.

Afterward, tarieng in this citie by the ſpace of three daies, he departed and came afore another citie called Pontus, which he receiued by ſurrender, and therfore preſerued the citizens from all hurt & annoiance. From thence he purpoſed to haue gone vnto Dublin, about 14 miles diſtant from Pontus, but as he marched thitherwards, he was aduertiſed that Cornelius was comming towards him with ſuch an huge armie, as the like had not beene ſeene within the memorie of man in that Ile. Wherevpon Gregorie changing his purpoſe of going to Dublin, vpon report of theſe newes, he got him vp into the next mounteine.

Pontus was ſurrendred alſo.

Cornelius came with an huge armie.

The next day came the Iriſhmen ranged in three battels. In the firſt there was a great multitude of Kernes with darts and bowes: in the ſecond were a great number of mightie tall men, armed in cotes of male, with bucklers and great long ſwords, which they caried vpon their right ſhoulders. In the third battell, wherein ſtood their generall Cornelius, with all the chiefeſt nobles of the countrie, were an infinite companie of all ſorts of ſouldiors, choſen forth of all the whole numbers. The Scots (according to their cuſtome) diuided themſelues into two wings, and a middle ward, in euerie of the which were three ſorts of ſouldiors: as firſt archers, and thoſe with long ſpeares, then bilmen, and laſt of all ſuch as bare long ſwords and leaden malles.

The Iriſhmen came in three battels. Kernes. Theſe might we name Gallowglaſſes, if they had been furniſhed with axes.

The Scots came in two wings.

Thus the battels being ordered on both parts, forward they make one towards another to begin the fight. The Scots (after their ſhot and throwing of darts was ſpent, and that they came to ioine) kept off their enimies with long ſpeares or iauelins, in ſuch ſort, that they were not able to come neere them: which diſaduantage Cornelius perceiuing, commanded on high, that they ſhould with their ſwords cut thoſe iauelins in ſunder. And as he lifted vp the viſor of his helmet, the better to exhort his people to the execution hereof, he was ſo wounded in the face with a ſpeare, that he was faine to withdraw apart out of the field. The Iriſhmen ſuppoſing he had fled, incontinentlie to ſaue themſelues, threw off their armor and fell to running awaie. Thus did the victorie incline to the Scotiſh ſtandards.

Two battels ioine.

Cornelius was ſore wounded.

The Iriſh ran away.

There died but a few (to ſpeake of) in the battell, howbeit in the chaſe there was a wonderfull number ſlaine: for the Scots purſued them euen vnto Dublin gates, which citie the next daie Gregorie beſet on each ſide with a mightie ſiege. There was got into this citie at the ſame time a wonderfull multitude of people, what of ſuch as were receiued into it fleeing from the battell, as alſo of other which were there aſſembled before, in hope of aſſured victorie and ſafegard of their goods. By reaſon wherof being thus beſieged, they began quicklie to want vittels, ſo that either they muſt of neceſſitie yeeld, either elſe by ſome iſſue auoid that danger wherein they were preſentlie bewrapped.

Dublin beſieged.

But forſomuch as they ſaw no great likelihood of good ſucceſſe in that exploit, in the end it was concluded amongſt them, that (ſith there was no meane for thoſe noble men which were incloſed within that citie to eſcape the enimies hands, and that there were none other of anie reputation abroad able to defend the countrie from the Scotiſhmens puiſſance) they ſhould fall to ſome treatie with the Scotiſh king for a peace to be had, with ſo reaſonable conditions as might be obteined: for other remedie in that preſent sent mischiefe they could deuise none, and therefore this was iudged the best waie of the whole number, namelie of Cormach bishop of Dublin, a man for his singular vertue and reputation of vpright life, of no small authoritie amongst them.

He tooke vpon him also to go vnto Gregorie to breake the matter, & so comming afore his presence, besought him most humblie to haue compassion vpon the poore miserable citie, and in such sort to temper his wrath, if he had conceiued anie peece of displeasure against the citizens, that it might please him yet vpon their humble submission to receiue them vnto his mercie, and further to accept into his protection his cousine yong Duncane, vnto whome the kingdome of Ireland was due of right, as all the world well vnderstood. He besought him also to remember, that it apperteined more to the honor of a king, to preserue the lawfull right of other kings and princes with the quiet state of cities and countries, than by violent hand to seeke their destruction.

Wherevnto the king answered, that he was not come into Ireland for anie couetous desire he had to the realme, or to the intent to spoile his kinsman of the gouernement thereof, but onelie to reuenge such iniuries as the Irishmen had done to his subiects. Not the Scots but the Irishmen themselues were they that had giuen the occasion of the warre, which they had derelie bought with no small portion of their bloud (which had bene shed) as punished for that crime worthilie by the iust iudgement of almightie God. But as touching an end to be had of his quarell, & for the reseruing of the kingdome vnto yong Duncans behoofe, when he had the citie at his pleasure, he would then take such order as he should thinke most conuenient.

This answer of the Scotish king being reported vnto them within the citie, they determined forthwith to set open their gates to receiue him: who, when he had caused search to be made whether all things were truelie ment according to the outward shew or not, he marched forth towards the citie to enter the same in order of battell, with all his whole armie, into the which he was receiued with procession of all the estates: for first there met him all the priests and men of religion, with the bishop the foresaid Cormach, who hauing vpon him his pontificall apparell, bare in his hand the crucifix: then followed the nobles with the other multitude.

Which order when Gregorie beheld, he commanded his battell to staie a little, and therewith he himselfe aduanced forth on foot till he came to the bishop, and falling downe vpon his knees, he reuerentlie kissed the crucifix, whereupon receiuing humble thanks with high commendation of the bishop for such his clemencie, he entered the citie, not staieng till he came into the market place, where commanding one part of his armie to keepe their standing, he went with the residue vnto the church of our ladie, and after to that of saint Patrike, where hearing the celebration of diuine seruice, when the same was ended, he entered the castell, where his lodging was prepared. In the morning he caused execution to be done of certeine vnrulie persons of his armie, who in the night passed had broken vp the houses of some of the citizens, and rauished diuerse women. And for this act Gregorie being had in high reuerence of the Irish people, lodged part of his armie within the citie, and part he commanded to lodge without in the campe.

At length hauing remained a season in this estate at Dublin, he caused the Irish lords to assemble in councell, where in the end the peace was concluded betwixt him and them, with these articles and couenants. First it was agreed that the yong king Duncane should be brought vp vnder the gouernement of wise and discréet persons, to be instructed in all princelie knowledge, within a strong castell, (wherein he had hitherto remained euer since his fathers decease) till he came to yeres of discretion. And that in the meane time Gregorie should haue the gouernance of the realme, receiuing all the fortresses into his possession. He should also haue the appointment of the magistrates, who should see iustice ministred according to the old statutes & ordinances of the Irish kingdome. That the Irishmen should receiue neither Englishman, Britaine, nor Dane, into their countrie, no not so much as for trade of merchandize, without safe conduct to be granted by him. So that things being thus brought to a quietnesse in Ireland, he receiued an oth of the chiefest of them for performance of the couenants, and herewith taking with him three score hostages, he returned with his victorious armie backe into Scotland.

After this there chanced no notable trouble to the Scots, neither forreine nor ciuill, by all the time of king Gregories reigne, so that passing the rest of his life in quietnesse, he studied chiefle for the politike gouernement of his people in good order and rule, to the aduancement of the common-wealth: and finallie died an happie old man, in a castell called Dundore within the countrie of Garioth, in the 18 yeere after his entring into his estate, and after the birth of our Sauiour 893. He was neuer maried, but liued in continuall chastitie: for his famous victories and other his princelie doings, he deserued of the Scots to be numbered amongst their most high and renowmed princes. Amongst other his princelie acts which he set forward in his life time, to the adornement of his countrie and common-wealth; Aberdine (of a village) was aduanced by him to the state and dignitie of a citie, and the church there indowed with faire reuenues, and sundrie priuiledges. His bodie was conueied vnto the abbeie of Colmekill, and there buried with all solemne pompe and exequies: ouer the which his next successor, Donald the fift of that name, caused a faire tombe to be erected.

In the daies of this Gregorie also, there liued that famous clearke John Scot, a Scotishman in déed borne, but brought vp in studie of good literature at Athens, where hauing learned the Greeke tong, he was sent for into France, to come vnto the emperour Lewes, with whom he remained in seruice for a time: and by whose commandement he translated the booke of saint Dionyse, intituled Hierarchia, into Latine. Afterwards being sent ambassador from the same Lewes vnto Alured or Alfred king of England, he continued with him and taught his children, hauing a place thereto appointed him within the abbeie of Malmesburie, where he had such resort of hearers and scholers, that it was a wonder to behold. Notwithstanding, at length when he ceassed not to blame and sharpelie to reproue the corrupt maners of such his scholers, as were giuen more to libertie than learning, he was by them murthered with daggers, as he was reading vnto them, and was afterwards registred amongst the number of martyrs.

BVt to our purpose. After Gregorie succéeded Donald the 5 in gouernement of the kingdome, he was the sonne of Constantine the second; who finding the state of the realme in good quiet and flourishing in welth, he applied his whole studie to maintéine the same in semblable plight and condition. And before all things he caused iustice to be dulie ministred, so that no iniurie, speciallie if it were done to anie poore person, escaped vnpunished. Christ the Lord of all vertue had giuen him such a godlie disposed

But to our purpoſe touching the gouernement of Donald, it chanced afterwards, that he had knowledge how Gormond a Dane was landed with a puiſſant armie vpon the coaſts of Northumberland, and had pitched his campe neere vnto the ſhore, without doing anie damage to the countrie: ſo that it was vncerteine what he intended, whether to begin a conqueſt there, or to paſſe ouer Humber to make warres on the Engliſhmen. To preuent therefore all dangers, Donald haſted towards Northumberland; howbeit he was not farre forwards on his iornie, but that word came to him, how Gormond was alreadie paſſed ouer Humber, and entered into the Engliſh borders. But yet did not Donald ſtaie his iournie, till he heard certeinelie that Gormond keeping vpon his way, was aduanced forward at the leaſt 40 miles off from the riuer of Humber, doubting leaſt happilie he had ment ſome deceit, as ſuddenlie to haue returned vpon the Scots in Northumberland, when the king had beene once gone backe.

But now, when it was knowne that his purpoſe was onelie to aſſaile the Engliſh countries, according to the league newlie confirmed, Donald ſent 5000 Scotiſhmen vnto the aid of the Engliſhmen; and alſo appointed two thouſand horſſemen to remaine with him in Northumberland (where he ſtaied for a time) diſcharging the reſidue, & licencing them to returne vnto their homes. Shortlie after Gormond fought with Alured at Abingdon, where in the end the victorie abode with the Engliſhmen and Scots, though the ſame was got with ſuch loſſe of men after long and doubtfull battell, that they were not able to purſue the enimies in chaſe, but conſtreined immediatlie after to conclude a neceſſarie peace with them, on condition that the Danes ſhould enioy common ſeats with the Engliſhmen in Albion, & that Gormond with his Danes ſhould be baptiſed and profeſſe the chriſtian religion. Herevpon alſo were pledges deliuered on both parts, and Gormond comming to receiue baptiſme had his name changed and was called Athelſtane, during whoſe life the peace continued betwixt the two nations.

Whileſt things paſſed thus in England, there roſe a peece of trouble betwixt the inhabitants of Murrey land and Roſſe, which diſquieted king Donald not a little. The occaſion grew by reaſon of certeine theeues, which comming forth of Roſſe in the night time, ſecretlie entered into Murrey land, to fetch bowties from thence. At the firſt they of Murrey land made reſiſtance againſt them as well as they might, but after calling their neighbours to aid them, they ſkirmiſhed in ſuch wiſe, that within two moneths ſpace, there were ſlaine betwixt them two thouſand of the one ſide and of the other. This trouble being in this ſort quieted, he went into Northumberland, to be there in a readineſſe, if the Danes or Engliſhmen (whome he ſuſpected) ſhould attempt anie thing againſt his ſubiects in thoſe parties: where in the end, after he had reigned almoſt 11 yeers, he departed this world. Conſtantine.

AFter Donald the firſt, there ſucceeded in rule of the realme Conſtantine the third of that name, the ſonne of Ethus the ſwift, beginning his reigne in the yeere after the incarnation 903. He was more apt for ciuill gouernement, than for the ordering of warlike affaires. King Edward that latelie ſucceeded Alured in rule ouer the Engliſhmen being ware thereof, ſent vnto him an herald at armes, commanding him to reſtore vnto his ſubiects the Engliſhmen, the countries of Northumberland, Cumberland, & Weſtmerland (which the Scotiſh king Gregorie had in times paſt by occaſion of the troubleſome ſeaſon taken from the right owners by force) either elſe to looke for warres at his hands within fortie daies after this ſummons.

Conſtantine hereunto anſwered, that if king Edward were minded to make him wars for thoſe lands which he held by rightfull title, he with his people would be readie to defend themſelues, hoping in the almightie God that he would turne the puniſhment on them that vniuſtlie had pſked the quarrell. Herevpon inſued manie rodes and forraies betwixt the Engliſhmen and Scots, made (as occaſion ſerued) into ech others countrie, with diuers ſkirmiſhes and light bickerings for twelue moneths ſpace together, without anie notable incounter of their maine powers. In which meane time the Danes increaſed in puiſſance, more than was thought requiſite for the ſuertie either of the Engliſhmen or Scots, which moued king Edward by perſuaſion of his nobles, to make meanes vnto Conſtantine to haue the peace renewed: whereunto Conſtantine lightlie agreed: ſo that the league was confirmed againe with the former articles betwixt the Engliſh and Scotiſh nations.

Forewarnings of war.

The peace was renewed and the league confirmed.

Shortlie after alſo the warre was renewed betwixt the Engliſhmen and Danes, and a peace againe confirmed by concluſion of a mariage betwixt Sithrike king of Northumberland, and Beatrice daughter of king Edward, till at length Sithrike was poiſoned by his wife the ſaid Beatrice: and then becauſe Aualaffus (whome the Engliſh writers name Aulafe) and Godfrie, the ſonnes of Sithrike, put the ſame Beatrice to death, hir father king Edward moued warre againſt them, and in foughten field diſcomfited them, but was ſlaine in that battell himſelfe (as Hector Boetius ſaith.) But for the further truth of this matter, ye may read more in the hiſtorie of England.

The Danes were diſcomfited.

The Danes being certified, that king Edward was thus ſlaine, conceiued ſuch hope of good ſucceſſe after to come, that albeit they were at this time vanquiſhed, they immediatlie made new preparation for the warre, and firſt of all Aualaffus the one of the two brethren before mentioned, ſent vnto Conſtantine the Scotiſh king, to allure him to ioine with them againſt the Engliſhmen, which with great gifts and large promiſes he eaſilie brought to paſſe, the league notwithſtanding which remained betwixt the English and Scotish nations. Herevpon both the Scots and Danes made the greatest prouision that might be, thinking verelie to subdue the Englishmen, and to bring them to vtter destruction.

Malcolme sonne to king Donald was appointed by king Constantine to haue the leading of the Scotish armie, conteining the number of twentie thousand men. The same Malcolme also at the same time was created heire apparant of the realme, hauing Cumberland assigned vnto him for the maintenance of his estate. And euen then it was ordeined, that he which should succéed to the crowne after the kings decease, should euer inioy that prouince. Malcolme ioining his power with Aualassus and Godfrie (who had assembled in like manner a mightie host of Danes) they all togither brake into the English confines, sparing no kind of crueltie that might be deuised, murthering the people without anie pitie or compassion in all places where they came, to the intent that the Englishmen moued with the slaughter of their kinsfolks and friends, should come forth into the field to giue battell, supposing they should not be able to withstand the force of the Danes and Scotishmen now ioined in one armie togither.

They begin a cruell warre.

But the more vilanie they shewed in their doings, the soner were they punished for the same. For Athelstane the base sonne of king Edward (whome the Englishmen had chosen to succéd in gouernement of their kingdome after his fathers decease) with all spéd sought to be reuenged of such iniurious doings. Whereupon getting togither an armie, he incountred with them at a place called Broningfield, or Brunenburgh, in July, in the yeare 937, where the English at the first of purpose gaue somthing backe, as though they had fled: which manner when the Danes and Scots beheld, supposing the Englishmen had fled in déed, they began to pursue amaine, leaning their order of battell, ech of them striuing who might be the formost.

The Scots and Danes out of order.

The Englishmen (according to the order appointed to them by their capteins) suddenlie fell into arrate againe, and fiercelie returning vpon their enimies, did beat them downe in great numbers, & so atchiued a most triumphant victorie. There died in this mortall battell manie thousands of Danes and Scotishmen, but chieflie the Scotish nobilitie bought the bargaine most déere, who chosing rather to die in the field than to suffer rebuke by dishonorable flight, it came so to passe that few of them escaped. There died on that side (as some write) 20000 men in this battell, togither with Wilfert king of the Guentes, Hanwall king of Brittains, and seuen dukes that came to helpe the Scots and Danes. Athelstane by good aduise following the victorie, entred into Northumberland, and finding the countrie dispurueied of men of warre, he easilie made a full conquest therof, hauing all the holds and fortresses deliuered into his hands.

The Scots and Danes ouerthrowne.

The nobilitie went to wracke.

Athelstane tooke Northumberland.

Then without further delaie he passed into Westmerland, and after into Cumberland, where the inhabitants of both those regions bare-foted and bare-headed, in token of most humble submission, yéelded themselues vnto him, promising from thencefoorth to continue his faithfull subiects. In the meane time Malcolme being sore wounded in the battell, escaped; yet with great danger, and in an horsse-litter was conueied home into his countrie, where he declared to king Constantine the whole circumstance of the ouerthrow and losse of his countries aforesaid. Whereupon Constantine caused a councell to be called at Abirnethie, where he perceiued how sore his realme was infeebled through lacke of such of the nobilitie as were lost in the last battell, by reason the residue that were left, seemed through want of yéeres, neither able by counsell nor by force to defend the realme, so as he vtterlie despaired either to be of power to beate backe the enimies, or to gouerne his realme in such politike sort as he would haue wished. And therefore, to rid himselfe of all such cares and troubles, and withall despising all such worldlie pompe as might withdraw him from diuine contemplation (wherevnto he was partlie bent) he gaue ouer his kinglie estate, and became a canon within the abbeie of saint Andrewes amongst the couent there.

Constantine becommeth a canon.

This was in the yeare of our Sauiour 943, and in the fortith yeare of his owne reigne (as Hector Boetius saith:) but if he did thus forsake the world, and entred into religion immediatlie after the battell fought at Broningfield or Brunenburgh (for so we find it named by some writers) then must it néedes be before this supposed time alledged by the same Boetius, for that battell was fought anno 937, as the best approued amongst our English writers do report, so that it should rather séeme that Constantine refused in déed to deale with the gouernement of the realme, about the same yeare of our Lord 937, or shortlie after; and that Malcolme gouerned as regent and not as king whilest Constantine liued, who departed this life (after he had continued in the abbeie of saint Andrewes a certeine time) in the foresaid yeare 943, falling in the fortie yeare after he first began to reigne. He was first buried in the church there amongst the bishops, but afterwards he was taken vp and translated vnto Colmekill, where he had a tombe set ouer him, as was conuenient for the memorie of his name.

Constantine died.

In the 36 yeare of his reigne there were two monstrous creatures borne in Albion, the one amongst the Danes being an hermophrodyte, that is to say, a child with both seres, hauing the head like a swine, the brest standing forth more in resemblance than the common shape of man, a fat bellie, with féete like a goose, legs like a man, full of brissels, and a verie euill fauored thing to behold. The other was borne in Northumberland, onelie hauing a mans ser, with one whole bellie from the nauill downe, but aboue the same diuided with two brests creassed or compassed ridge-wise, and not broad like to the shape of man: beside this it had foure armes and two heads. And euen as from the nauill vpwards it was thus diuided into two bodies, so did it appeare there was two contrarie wils or desires in the same, euer lusking contrarilie, as when the one did sléepe, the other would wake; when the one required to haue meat, the other passed for none at all. Oftentimes would they chide and brall togither, insomuch that at length they fell so far at variance, that they did beat and rent either other verie pitifullie with their nailes. At length the one with long sickenesse wearing away and finallie deceassing, the other was not able to abide the greeuous smell of the dead carcase, but immediatlie after died also.

A monster.

Two contrarie willes in this monster.

One part died before the other.

About the same time there issued forth a founteine of bloud out of the side of a mounteine in Galloway, and flowed in great abundance for the space of seuen daies togither, so that all the riuers therabout (whereof there is great store in that countrie) had their waters mired with bloud, and so running into the sea, caused the same to séeme bloudie certeine miles distant from the shore. These prodigious sights put men in great feare, for that diuinours did interpret the same to signifie some great bloudshed to fall vpon the Scots shortlie after. They were also the better beléeued, for that within a while after, that great ouerthrow happened at Broningfield, as before is specified.

Blond issued out of an hill.

What was ment by these wonders.

After

Malcolme

AFter that Constantine (as is said) was entred into religion, the before named Malcolme the sonne of Donald was admitted king, or rather regent: who although he perceiued right well how the force of the realme was so infeebled, that there was no hope to mainteine warres abroad; yet his chiefe studie was by all means possible to defend the borders of the Scotish dominion, and before all things to procure peace with the Englishmen. But as he was about to haue sent ambassadours vnto king Athelstane, to haue treated for peace, he was crediblie informed, how Athelstane had giuen Northumberland vnto Aualaffus, and made a league with him to haue his aid against the Scots. Which newes put Malcolme in wonderfull dread, for that he vnderstood how his realme was vnpurueied of skilfull capteins to make resistance. Yet he caused a councell to be called, wherein when such as were assembled proponed manie fond and childish reasons, it might happen there was small hope of anie good conclusion; but euen as they were at a point to haue broken vp without anie certeine resolution, word was brought how through seditious discord, which had chanced betwixt the Danes and Englishmen being assembled togither in campe, they had fought a right cruell and bloudie battell, the victorie in the end remaining with the Englishmen, who ceased not to pursue the Danes in chase, so long as anie day light appeered in the skie.

Aualaffus had giuen him Northumberland.

A councel called.

The English men and the Danes fall out togither, and fight.

Aualaffus with such Danes as he might get togither after that ouerthrow, fled into Westmerland, and within three daies after, in such ships as he found there vpon the coast, he sailed ouer into the Ile of Man, and spoiling the same, with all the preie he passed from thence ouer into Ireland. In the meane time king Athelstane hauing lost no small number of his people in the foresaid battell, omitted his iournie into Scotland, and lay still in Northumberland, no man vnderstanding what he intended to do. Which newes were so pleasant to the Scotishmen, that there was common supplications and processions made through the whole realme, in rendering thanks to almightie God for deliuering the people by this means from so great and present a danger.

Aualaffus fled into Westmerland, rifled the Ile of Man, and got him into Ireland.

They go in procession in Scotland for ioy.

Shortlie after came ambassadours from Athelstane vnto Malcolme, to moue means for a peace to be concluded betwixt the Scotish and English nations, according to the articles of the old league, which motion was ioifullie heard of Malcolme, though he set a countenance of the matter as though he passed not whether he had warre or peace: but in the end, for that (as he said) peace was most necessarie for all parts, he shewed himselfe willing to haue the old former league renewed betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, with anie reasonable conditions which should be thought requisit.

Imbassadors sent vnto Malcolme.

The league was confirmed againe.

After the returne of the ambassadours, the league was newlie confirmed betwixt the two kings and their people, with the semblable articles as were comprised in the old league, with this article onelie added thereunto; that Northumberland, being as now replenished most with Danish inhabitants, should remaine to the Englishmen; and Cumberland with Westmerland to the Scots: vpon this condition, that he which should succeed as heire vnto the crowne of Scotland after the kings decease, being heire apparant, should hold those regions, and do homage vnto the king of England as his vassall perpetuallie for the same. The peace being thus established betwixt these nations, Indulph the sonne of Constantine the third was proclamed prince of Cumberland, and inheritour to the crowne of Scotland.

Northumberland allotted vnto England.

Cumberland and westmerland to do homage vnto England.

After this, Malcolme passed the residue of his life in good quiet, without anie troubles of warre, as a man onelie studieng to maintein the state of his realme in good order, as well for the wealth of the temporaltie, as spiritualtie, wherevnto he was equallie inclined. At length, as he rode about the prouinces of his realme, to see the lawes dulie ministred, at Ulrine a village in Murrey land, where he caused iustice to be somewhat streictlie executed vpon offendors, he was murthered in the night season by treason of a few conspirators, in the fifteenth yeare of his reigne. But such as did this wicked deed with their complices, by diligent examination were tried out, and on the next day being apprehended, suffered due execution, according as they had deserued, being torne in peeces with wild horsses, and those peeces sent vnto sundrie cities, where they were hanged vp on the gates and towers, vntill they rotted away.

King Malcolme was murthered.

The conspirators were put to execution.

The murtherers were torne with horsses.

They that were the deuisers of the murder also, and procured the doers thereunto, were thrust quite through vpon sharpe stakes, and after hanged vp aloft on high gibbets; and other of the conspirators were put to other kinds of death, as the case seemed to require. The death of Malcolme chanced in the yeare after the death of our Sauiour 959. ¶ Here we haue thought good to put you in remembrance, that either the Scots are deceiued in their account of yeares; or else mistake the names of the kings of England: for where they write that this Malcolme departed this life about the 22 yeare of Athelstane king of England, that can not be; if Malcolms decease chanced in the yeare 959, for Athelstane was dead long before that time, to wit, in the yeare 940, and reigned but fiftéene yeares.

The procurers of the murther were staied.

The mistaking of the names and times of the English kings in the Scotish writers.

Moreouer, where the Scotish writers make mention of the warres which king Edmund that succeeded Athelstane had against Aulafe and the Danes of Northumberland, in the daies of king Indulph that succeeded Malcolme, it can not stand by anie means (if they mistake not their account of yeares:) for the same Edmund was slaine in the yeare 948. But verelie this fault in the iust account of yeares is but too common in the Scotish historie, and therefore to him that should take vpon him to reforme the errors thereof in this behalfe, it were necessarie to alter in a maner the whole course of the same historie. And therefore we will not wish anie man to giue anie credit vnto their account in yeares, touching the reignes of the English kings, further than they shall see them to agree with our writers, whome in that behalfe we may more safelie follow, and by conferring the same with the Scotish writers in some places, happilie perceiue the true time, aswell of the reignes of their kings, as of acts done, to fall out in yeares and seasons, much differing from their account: whereof to admonish the reader, aswell here as in the English historie, we haue thought it not impertinent.

And albeit that some may aske what reason we haue to moue vs to doubt of their account of years, more than we do of that in our owne writers? We will referre the same vnto their iudgements that are learned, and haue trauelled indifferentlie alike, aswell in perusing the one as the other without affection. But as the errors are sooner found than amended, so haue we thought good to set downe in the margent of this booke, the yeares as we find them noted in the Scotish writers, speciallie in places where we differ anie thing from them, because we will not seeme by way of controlment to preiudice the authors, further than by due consideration the well aduised reader shall thinke it expedient.

But to my purpose. After the corps of Malcolme was once buried (according to the custome) amongst mongſt his predeceſſors in the abbie church of Colmekill, Indulph prince of Cumberland was placed in the marble chaire at Scone, there receiuing the crowne and other the inueſtures of the kingdome. In the adminiſtration whereof he continued for the ſpace of fiue yeares without anie notable trouble, in the end of which terme, he was required by meſſengers ſent vnto him from Aualaſſus, to ioine with him in league againſt the Engliſhmen, in reuenge of that ouerthrow, which aſwell the Danes as Scots had receiued at Broningfield, alledging that opportunitie was now offered, ſith after the deceſſe of Athelſtane, the Engliſhmen had created Edmund to be their king, a man of a dull wit, & not fit for the adminiſtration of high affaires: neither did the league concluded betwixt Athelſtane and Malcolme inforce anie impediment, but that he might enter the warre againſt the Engliſhmen, conſidering that both the princes that were the authors of that league were departed out of this life, by whoſe deceaſſe the ſaid league was ended.

Indulph is prouoked by Aualaſſus to warre againſt England.

His perſuaſions.

But Indulph for anſwere hereunto declared, that the league was concluded betwixt Malcolme and Athelſtane, by great deliberation of aduiſe, and by conſent of all the eſtates of both realmes, taking their ſolemne oths for the true obſeruing thereof, ſo that he could not, vnleſſe he ſhould violate that oth, attempt anie thing to the breach of peace with the Engliſhmen, procuring the iuſt indignation of almightie God againſt him and his people in that behalfe. Herevpon the Danes accounting Indulph but a ſlouthfull and negligent perſon for this kind of anſwere, as he that regarded not the honor of his realme and people, in letting paſſe ſo great opportunitie to be reuenged of the Engliſhmen for the death of ſuch Scots as died in the ouerthrow at Broningfield, determined not to be noted with the like ſpot of reproch: but with all ſpæd ſending for aid into Norwaie, prepared to paſſe ouer into England, vnder the conduct of Aualaſſus, who ioining his power with the Norwegians, which came to his aid vnder the leading of a right valiant capteine called Rainold, tranſported with all ſpæd ouer into Northumberland, vnto whome the gouernour there named Elgarine, acknowledging himſelfe to be deſcended of the Daniſh blood, yeelded all the caſtels, townes & forts, promiſing to aid Aualaſſus againſt king Edmund to the vttermoſt of his power.

Indulph his anſwere.

The Danes not pleaſed with ſuch an anſwere procure warre againſt England.

The Norwegians come to the aid of Aualaſſus.

Rainold a baliant capteine.

Elgarine yeelded the forts vnto the Danes.

These newes comming to the knowledge of Edmund, with all ſpæd he gathereth his power, and ſending into Scotland for ſuch aid as he ought to haue from thence by couenants of the league, there came vnto him ten thouſand Scotiſhmen with ready wils to ſerue him in theſe his wars againſt the Danes. Then ioining his owne people with thoſe Scotiſhmen, he ſet forward towards the enimies. There were an 8000 Northumberland men with Aualaſſus, the which vpon the firſt incounter with the Engliſhmen, fell ſtreight to running away, which made an open and readie breach vnto the Engliſh part, to atteine the victorie: for the Danes being not able to reſiſt the violent force of their enimies, incouraged now with the flight of the Northumbers, were quicklie conſtreined to giue backe, and in the end to flee amaine, the Engliſhmen and Scots following in the chaſe with ſuch fierceneſſe, that all ſuch as they ouertooke died vpon the ſword, though they ſubmitted themſelues neuer ſo humblie in requiring mercie.

10000 ſouldiers ſent vnto king Edmund.

Elgarine is taken priſoner.

Elgarine yet chancing to fall into his enimies hands was taken aliue: for ſo had Edmund commanded, that if anie man might take him, he ſhould in anie caſe ſaue his life, that he might put him to death in moſt cruell wiſe, to the example of other.

After this, and for the ſpace of three daies after the battell, Edmund lay ſtill in the fields nere vnto the place where they fought, and then repaired vnto Yorke, where Elgarine for his treaſon was drawen in peeces with wild horſes. There chanced alſo no notable trouble in Albion, during the ſpace of foure yeares after this ſaid ouerthrow of the Danes with their capteine Aualaſſus, who is alſo otherwiſe called Aulafe, as is to be ſeene in the Engliſh hiſtories, where the ſame make mention of the foreſaid king Edmund, whome likewiſe they affirme to be the brother of Athelſtane, and not his ſonne, as before is partlie touched. Indulph in this meane time did with great diligence ſee to the good order of his realme, ſhewing therein what belonged to the office of a worthie prince. But euen as all things ſeemed to reſt in peace & quietnes through the whole Ile of Albion, Hagon king of Norwaie, and Helrike king of Denmarke, of purpoſe to reuenge the ſlaughter of their countrimen latelie made in Northumberland, came with a mightie nauie vnto the coaſts of Scotland, aſſaieng to land with their whole armie, firſt in the Forth, then in the riuer of Taie; but yet through ſuch reſiſtance as the Scots made, being aſſembled togither to keepe them off, they were faine to withdraw, and wafting alongſt the coaſts of Angus, the Marnes, Mar, and Buthqhane, at length faining as though they would haue taken their courſe homewards, they lanched forth into the high ſeas. But within foure daies after returning againe to the ſhore, they landed their people earlie in one morning vpon the coaſt of Boen, at a place called Cullane, a countrie ioining vnto Buthqhane, putting ſuch of the countrie people to flight, as preſented themſelues to impeach their landing and inuaſion.

Elgarine is drawen in peeces.

K. Indulph was diligent in his office.

The kings of Denmarke and Norwaie enter with an armie into Scotland.

The enimies are put off.

They land in Boen.

But Indulph being aduertiſed hereof, forthwith aſſembling the whole power of his realme, drew towards that part with ſuch ſpæd, that he was come into Boen before his enimies were certified that he was ſet forward. So ſone therefore as they heard he was come, ſuch as were abroad forraieng the ſame countrie, were called backe to the campe. But Indulph without protracting of time came ſtill forward, and vpon his approch to the enimies, he prepared to giue battell, and with a ſhort oration began to incourage his people to fight manfullie. But before he could make an end, the Danes gaue the onſet with ſuch violence, that the battell a long ſpace continued doubtfull on both ſides, the Danes on the one part and the Scots on the other, doing their vttermoſt indeuours to atchiue the victorie, till at length they of Louthian with their capteins Dunbar and Grame began to appeare on the backe halfe of the Danes. With which ſight they were put in ſuch feare, that thoſe which fought in the fore ward, retired backe vnto the middle ward, whome the Scots eagerlie purſuing, beat downe euen till they came vnto the reare ward, which coueting rather to die in the fight, than to giue backe, and ſo to be ſlaine in the chaſe (for thoſe in the reare ward were heauie armed men) continued the battell more with a certeine ſtiffe ſtubbornes of mind, than with anie great force or forcaſt, being ſo ouermatched as they were, & forſaken of their fellowes: for other of the Danes, namelie the archers and Kernes fled their waies, ſome towards their ſhips, and ſome here and there being ſcattered abroad in the fields, fell into the moſſes, the mareſh grounds, and other ſtreicts, where they were ſlaine euerie one by ſuch as followed in the chaſe.

King Indulph draweth nere towards the enimies.

The Danes fled.

Indulph himſelfe with certeine companies about him, departing from his maine battell to diſcouer the fields, as though all had beene quiet on each ſide, fell by chance vpon a whole band of the Danes, where the same lay in couert within a close vallie, being fled from the field thither vpon the first ioining of the battels, with the which entering into fight, he was shot through the head with a dart, and so died; but not before he was reuenged of those his enimies, the whole number of them being slaine there in the place. His bodie was first buried in Cullane, a towne of Boene, and after translated vnto the abbie of Colmekill, and there interred amongest other his predecessors the Scotish kings. Indulph reigned about nine yeares and died thus valiantlie, though infortunatlie, in the yeare after the incarnation 968, as saith Hector Boetius.

Duffe.

AFter the corps of Indulph was remoued vnto Colmekill and there buried, Duffe the sonne of K. Malcolme was crowned K. at Scone with all due solemnitie. In the beginning of his reigne, Culene the sonne of K. Indulph was proclaimed prince of Cumberland: immediatlie whereupon the king transported ouer into the westerne Iles, to set an order there for certeine misdemeanors vsed by diuers robbers and pillers of the common people. At his arriuall amongst them he called the thanes of the Iles afore him, commanding streightlie as they would auoid his displeasure, to purge their countries of such malefactors, whereby the husbandmen and other commons might liue in quiet, without veration of such barrettors and idle persons as sought to liue onlie vpon other mens goods.

The king went vnto the westerne Iles.

He purged the Iles.

The thanes vpon this charge giuen them by the king, toke no small number of the offendors, partlie by publike authoritie, & partlie by lieng in wait for them where they supposed their haunt was to resort, the which being put to execution according to that they had merited, caused the residue of that kind of people either to get them ouer into Ireland, either else to learne some manuall occupation wherewith to get their liuing, yea though they were neuer so great gentlemen borne. Howbeit the nobles with this extreme rigor shewed thus by the king against their linage, were much offended therwith, accounting it a great dishonor for such as were descended of noble parentage, to be constreined to get their liuing with the labor of their hands, which onlie appertained to plowmen, and such other of the base degrée as were borne to trauell for the maintenance of the nobilitie, and to serue at their commandement by order of their birth, and in no wise after such sort to be made in maner equall with them in state and condition of life.

Barretors taken and put to death.

Vagabounds compelled to learne an occupation.

The nobles were discontented with the kings dooings.

Furthermore, they murmured closelie amongest themselues, how the king was onlie become friend to the commons & cleargie of his realme, hauing no respect to the nobilitie, but rather declared himselfe to be an vtter enimie thereof, so that he was vnworthie to haue the rule of the nobles and gentlemen, vnles he knew better what belonged to their degrée. This murmuring did spread not onelie among them in the Iles, but also through all the other parts of his realme, so that they ceased not to speake verie euill of the gouernement of things. In the meane time the king fell into a languishing disease, not so grieuous as strange, that none of his physicians could perceiue what to make of it. For there was séene in him no token, that either choler, melancholie, flegme, or any other vicious humor did any thing abound, whereby his bodie should be brought into such decaie and consumption (so as there remained vnneth anie thing vpon him saue skin and bone.)

The occasion of murmuring of the nobilitie.

The king fell sicke.

And sithens it apeared manifestlie by all outward signes and tokens, that naturall moisture did nothing faile in the vitall spirits, his colour also was fresh and faire to behold, with such liuelines of loks, that more was not to be wished for; he had also a temperat desire and appetite to his meate & drinke, but yet could he not sléepe in the night time by anie prouocations that could be deuised, but still fell into exceéding sweats, which by no means might be restreined. The physicians perceiuing all their medicines to want due effect, yet to put him in some comfort of helpe, declared to him that they would send for some cunning physicians into forreigne parts, who happilie being inured with such kind of diseases, should easilie cure him, namelie so soone as the spring of the yeare was once come, which of it selfe should helpe much thereunto.

Howbeit the king, though he had small hope of recouerie, yet had he still a diligent care vnto the due administration of his lawes and good orders of his realme, deuising oft with his councell about the same. But when it was vnderstood into what a perillous sickneesse he was fallen, there were no small number, that contemning the authoritie of the magistrats, began to practise a rebellion. And amongst the chiefest were those of Murrey land, who slaieng sundrie of the kings officers, began to rage in most cruell wise against all such as were not consenting to their misordered tumult. The kings physicians forbad in anie wise, that the king should be aduertised of such businesse, for doubt of increasing his sicknes with trouble of mind about the same. But about that present time there was a murmuring amongst the people, how the king was vered with no naturall sickneesse, but by sorcerie and magicall art, practised by a sort of witches dwelling in a towne of Murrey land, called Fores.

The king being sicke, yet he regarded iustice to be executed.

A rebellion practised.

The rebellion was kept frõ the kings knowledge.

Witches in Fores.

Where vpon, albeit the author of this secret talke was not knowne: yet being brought to the kings eare, it caused him to send forthwith certeine wittie persons thither, to inquire of the truth. They that were thus sent, dissembling the cause of their iornie, were receiued in the darke of the night into the castell of Fores by the lieutenant of the same, called Donwald, who continuing faithfull to the king, had kept that castell against the rebels to the kings vse. Vnto him therefore these messengers declared the cause of their comming, requiring his aid for the accomplishment of the kings pleasure.

Inquirie was made.

The souldiers, which late there in garrison, had an inkling that there was some such matter in hand as was talked of amongst the people; by reason that one of them kept as concubine a yong woman, which was daughter to one of the witches as his paramour, who told him the whole maner vsed by hir mother & other hir companions, with their intent also, which was to make awaie the king. The souldier hauing learned this of his lemman, told the same to his fellowes, who made report to Donwald, and hée shewed it to the kings messengers, and therewith sent for the yong damosell which the souldier kept, as then being within the castell, and caused hir vpon streict examination to confesse the whole matter as she had séene and knew. Whereupon learning by hir confession in what house in the towne it was where they wrought there mischeefous mysterie, he sent forth souldiers about the middest of the night, who breaking into the house, found one of the witches rosting vpon a woodden broch an image of wax at the fier, resembling in each feature the kings person, made and deuised (as is to be thought) by craft and art of the diuell: an other of them sat reciting certeine words of inchantment, and still basted the image with a certeine liquor verie bustlie.

The matter appeareth to be true.

A witches daughter is examined.

The witches are found out.

An image of wax rosting at the fire.

The souldiers finding them occupied in this wise, toke them togither with the image, and led them into the castell, where being streictlie examined for what purpose they went about such manner of inchantment, they answered, to the end to make away the king: for as the image did walke afore the fire, ſo did the bodie of the king breake forth in ſweat. And as for the words of the inchantment, they ſerued to keepe him ſtill waking from ſléepe, ſo that as the wax euer melted, ſo did the kings fleſh: by the which meanes it ſhould haue come to paſſe, that when the war was once cleane conſumed, the death of the king ſhould immediatlie follow. So were they taught by euill ſpirits, and hired to worke the feat by the nobles of Murrey land. The ſtanders by, that heard ſuch an abhominable tale told by theſe witches, ſtreightwaies brake the image, and cauſed the witches (according as they had well deſerued) to bée burnt to death.

The nobles of the countrie ſet the witches on worke.

The witches were burnt.

It was ſaid, that the king at the verie ſame time that theſe things were a doing within the caſtell of Fores, was deliuered of his languor, and ſlept that night without anie ſweat breaking forth vpon him at all, & the next daie being reſtored to his ſtrength, was able to do anie maner of thing that lay in man to do, as though he had not béene ſicke before anie thing at all. But howſoeuer it came to paſſe, truth it is, that when he was reſtored to his perfect health, he gathered a power of men, & with the ſame went into Murrey land againſt the rebels there, and chaſing them from thence, he purſued them into Roſſe, and from Roſſe into Cathneſſe, where apprehending them, he brought them backe vnto Fores, and there cauſed them to be hanged vp, on gallows and gibets.

The king is reſtored to health.

The king with an armie purſued the rebels.

The rebels are executed.

Amongeſt them there were alſo certeine yong gentlemen, right beautifull and goodlie perſonages, being neere of kin vnto Donwald capteine of the caſtell, and had béene perſuaded to be partakers with the other rebels, more through the fraudulent counſell of diuerſe wicked perſons, than of their owne accord: wherevpon the foreſaid Donwald lamenting their caſe, made earneſt labor and ſute to the king to haue begged their pardon; but hauing a plaine denial, he conceiued ſuch an inward malice towards the king (though he ſhewed it not outwardlie at the firſt) that the ſame continued ſtill boiling in his ſtomach, and ceaſed not, till through ſetting on of his wife, and in reuenge of ſuch vnthankefulneſſe, hée found meanes to murther the king within the foreſaid caſtell of Fores where he vſed to ſoiourne. For the king being in that countrie, was accuſtomed to lie moſt commonlie within the ſame caſtell, hauing a ſpeciall truſt in Donwald, as a man whom he neuer ſuſpected.

Captein Donwald craued pardon for them but not granted.

Donwald conceiued hatred againſt the king.

But Donwald, not forgetting the reproch which his linage had ſuſteined by the execution of thoſe his kinſmen, whome the king for a ſpectacle to the people had cauſed to be hanged, could not but ſhew manifeſt tokens of great griefe at home amongſt his familie: which his wife perceiuing, ceaſſed not to trauell with him, till ſhe vnderſtood what the cauſe was of his diſpleaſure. Which at length when ſhe had learned by his owne relation, ſhe as one that bare no leſſe malice in hir heart towards the king, for the like cauſe on hir behalfe, than hir huſband did for his friends, counſelled him (ſith the king oftentimes vſed to lodge in his houſe without anie gard about him, other than the garriſon of the caſtell, which was wholie at his commandement) to make him awaie, and ſhewed him the meanes whereby he might ſoneſt accompliſh it.

Donwalds wife counſelled him to murther the king.

Donwald thus being the more kindled in wrath by the words of his wife, determined to follow hir aduiſe in the execution of ſo heinous an act. Wherevpon deuiſing with himſelfe for a while, which way hée might beſt accompliſh his curſſed intent, at length gat opportunitie, and ſped his purpoſe as followeth. It chanced that the king vpon the daie before he purpoſed to depart forth of the caſtell, was long in his oratorie at his praiers, and there continued till it was late in the night. At the laſt, comming forth, he called ſuch afore him as had faithfullie ſerued him in purſute and apprehenſion of the rebels, and giuing them heartie thanks, he beſtowed ſundrie honorable gifts amongſt them, of the which number Donwald was one, as he that had béene euer accounted a moſt faithfull ſeruant to the king.

The womans euill counſell is followed.

The king rewarded his friends.

At length, hauing talked with them a long time, he got him into his priuie chamber, onelie with two of his chamberlains, who hauing brought him to bed, came forth againe, and then fell to banketting with Donwald and his wife, who had prepared diuerſe delicate diſhes, and ſundrie ſorts of drinks for their reare ſupper or collation, wherat they ſate vp ſo long, till they had charged their ſtomachs with ſuch full gorges, that their heads were no ſoner got to the pillow, but aſléepe they were ſo faſt, that a man might haue remoued the chamber ouer them, ſoner than to haue awaked them out of their drunken ſléepe.

The king went to bed.

His chamberleins went to banketting.

When Donwald, though he abhorred the act greatlie in heart, yet through inſtigation of his wife hæ called foure of his ſeruants vnto him (whome he had made priuie to his wicked intent before, and framed to his purpoſe with large gifts) and now declaring vnto them, after what ſort they ſhould worke the feat, they gladlie obeied his inſtructions, & ſpædilie going about the murther, they enter the chamber (in which the king lai) a little before cocks crow, where they ſecretlie cut his throte as he lay ſléeping, without anie buſkling at all: and immediatlie by a poſterne gate they caried forth the dead bodie into the fields, and throwing it vpon an horſſe there prouided readie for that purpoſe, they conuey it vnto a place, about two miles diſtant from the caſtell, where they ſtaied, and gat certeine labourers to helpe them to turne the courſe of a little riuer running through the fields there, and digging a déepe hole in the chanell, they burie the bodie in the ſame, ramming it vp with ſtones and grauell ſo cloſelie, that ſetting the water in the right courſe againe, no man could perceiue that anie thing had béene newlie digged there. This they did by order appointed them by Donwald as is reported, for that the bodie ſhould not be found, & by bléeding (when Donwald ſhould be preſent) declare him to be guiltie of the murther. ¶ For ſuch an opinion men haue, that the dead corps of anie man being ſlaine, will bléed abundantlie if the murtherer be preſent. But for what conſideration ſoeuer they buried him there, they had no ſoner finiſhed the worke, but that they ſlue them whoſe helpe they vſed herein, and ſtreightwaies there vpon fled into Orknie.

The ſaboyner ſeruants cut the kings throte.

The king his buriall.

The poore laborers are ſlaine.

Donwald, about the time that the murther was in doing, got him amongſt them that kept the watch, and ſo continued in companie with them all the reſidue of the night. But in the morning when the noiſe was raiſed in the kings chamber how the king was ſlaine, his bodie conueied awaie, and the bed all beraied with blood; he with the watch ran thither, as though he had knowne nothing of the matter, and breaking into the chamber, and finding cakes of blood in the bed, and on the floore about the ſides of it, he forthwith ſlue the chamberleins, as guiltie of that heinous murther, and then like a mad man running to and fro, he ranſacked euerie corner within the caſtell, as though it had béene to haue ſæne if he might haue found either the bodie, or anie of the murtherers hid in anie priuie place: but at length comming to the poſterne gate, and finding it open, he burdened the chamberleins, whome he had ſlaine, with all the fault, they hauing the keies of the gates committed to their keeping all the night, and therefore it could not be otherwiſe (ſaid he) but that they were of counſell in the committing of that moſt deteſta-ble murther.

Some wiser than other. The matter suspected.

Finallie, such was his ouer earnest diligence in the seuere inquisition and triall of the offendors herein, that some of the lords began to mislike the matter, and to smell forth shrewd tokens, that he should not be altogither cleare himselfe. But for so much as they were in that countrie, where he had the whole rule, what by reason of his friends and authoritie togither, they doubted to vtter what they thought, till time and place should better serue therevnto, and herevpon got them awaie euerie man to his home.

Prodigious weather.

For the space of sir moneths togither, after this heinous murther thus committed, there appeered no sunne by day, nor mone by night in anie part of the realme, but still was the skie couered with continuall clouds, and sometimes such outragious winds arose, with lightenings and tempests, that the people were in great feare of present destruction.

Culene.

IN the meane time Culene prince of Cumberland, the sonne (as I haue said) of king Indulph, accompanied with a great number of lords and nobles of the realme, came vnto Scone, there to receiue the crowne according to the manner: but at his comming thither, he demanded of the bishops what the cause should be of such vntemperate weather. Who made answer, that vndoubtedlie almightie God shewed himselfe thereby to be offended most highlie for that wicked murther of king Duffe: and suerlie vnlesse the offendors were tried forth and punished for that deed, the realme should feele the iust indignation of the diuine iudgement, for omitting such punishment as was due for so grieuous an offense.

The king asked the cause of the foule weather. The bishops answer vnto the king.

Culene herevpon required the bishops to appoint publike processions, fastings, and other godlie exercises to be vsed of the priests and people, through all parts of the realme, for the good appeasing of Gods wrath in this behalfe; and in such sort and manner as in semblable cases the vse and custome in those dates was. He himselfe made a solemne vow, confirming it with a like oth, before all the peeres & nobles there assembled, that he would not ceasse till he had reuenged the death of king Duffe vpon the false inhabitants of Murrey land, to the example of all other.

The king required publike praiers to be had.

The king made an oth.

The multitude being present, getting them to armor, followed their prince, taking his iournie without further delaie towards Murrey land, the inhabitants of which region hearing of his approch, and the cause of his comming, were striken with exceeding feare: but namelie Donwald, being giltie in conscience, doubted lest if he were put to torture, he should be inforced to confesse the truth. Wher vpon without making his wife priuie to his departure, or anie other of his familie, saue a few such as he toke with him, he secretlie got him to the mouth of the riuer of Spey, where finding a ship readie, he went abord the same, purposing to haue fled his waies by sea into Norwaie: for this is the peculiar propertie of a giltie conscience, to be afraid of all things, and either in gesture or countenance to bewraie it selfe, accounting flight most sure, if occasion may serue thereto. For this Donwald, whome no man (though some partlie suspected him) might well haue burdened with the crime of his maisters death (by reason of his faithfull seruice shewed towards him afore time) had he not thus sought to haue auoided the countrie, was now detected of manifest treason, euerie man detesting his abhominable fact, and wishing him to be ouerwhelmed in the raging flouds, so to paie the due punishment, which of right he owght, for his vile treason in murthering his naturall lord.

Giltie conscience accuseth a man.

Donwald getteth him secretlie awaie.

The murther of the king is reuealed.

Culene being herevpon aduertised, passed ouer Spey water, and taking the castell of Fores, slue all that he found therein, and put the house to sacke and fire. Donwalds wife with his three daughters were taken: for Culene commanded, that whosoeuer could light vpon them, should in anie wise saue their liues, and bring them vnto him. Which being done, he had them to the racke, where the mother vpon hir examination confessed the whole matter, how by hir procurement chieflie hir husband was moued to cause the deed to be done, who they were that by his commandement did it, and in what place they had buried the bodie. Heere would the multitude haue run vpon hir and torne hir in peeces, but that they were restreined by commandement of an officer at armes. The K. with the residue for that night rested themselues, and in the morning toke order for due prouision of all things necessarie to take vp the bodie of king Duffe, and then to conueie it vnto Colmekill, there to be buried amongest his predecessors.

The castell of Fores is taken and all the inhabitants slaine.

The murther is wholie confessed.

King Duffe his bodie to be taken vp.

But as they were busie heereabout, word came that the traitor Donwald was by shipwracke cast vpon the shore within foure miles of the castell, as though he were by Gods prouision brought backe into his owne countrie to suffer worthie punishment for his demerits. Wherevpon the inhabitants of the places next adioining toke him, and kept him fast bound till they knew further of the kings pleasure: who verie glad of the newes, sent forth immediatlie a band of men to fetch him. They that were sent did as they were commanded: and being scarse returned, there came in diuerse lords of Rosse, bringing with them Donwalds foure seruants, which (as before is said) did execute the murther. Thus all the offendors being brought togither vnto the place where the murther was both contriued and executed, they were arraigned, condemned, and put to death in maner as followeth, to the great reioising of the people that beheld the same.

Donwald is taken prisoner

Donwalds foure seruants were taken also.

They were first scourged by the hangman, and then bowelled, their entrails being throwen into a fire and burnt, the other parts of their bodies were cut into quarters, and sent vnto the chiefest cities of the realme, and there set vp aloft vpon the gates & highest towers, for example sake to all such as should come after, how heinous a thing it is to pollute their hands in the sacred bloud of their prince. This dreadfull end had Donwald and his wife, before he saw anie sunne after the murther was committed, and that by the appointment of the most righteous God, the creator of that heauenlie planet and all other things, who suffereth no crime to be vnreuenged. Those that were the takers of the murtherers were highlie rewarded for their paines and trauell therein sustained, being exempt from charges of going forth to the warres, and also of all manner of paiments belonging to publike duties, as tributes, subsidies, and such like.

Rewards giuen vnto the takers of those murtherers.

These things being thus ordered, the bodie of king Duffe was taken vp, and in most pompous maner conueied vnto Colmekill, accompanied all the waie by Culene, and a great multitude of lords both spirituall and temporall, with other of the meaner states. There be that haue written how his bodie (though it had laine sir moneths vnder the ground) was nothing impaired either in colour or otherwise, when it was taken vp, but was found as whole and sound as though it had beene yet aliue, the skarres of the wounds onelie excepted. But to proceed, so soone as it was brought aboue the ground, the aire began to cleare vp, and the sunne brake forth, shining more brighter than it had beene seene afore time, to anie of the beholders remembrance. And that which put men in most deepe consideration of all, was the sight of manifold flowers, which sprang forth ouer all the fields immediatlie herevpon, cleane contrarie to the time and season of the yeere.

The bodie of king Duffe honorablie buried.

Marueilous things are seene.

Within a few yeres after this, there was a bridge made made ouer the water in the same place, where the bodie had bene buried, and a village builded at the one end of the bridge, which is called vnto this day, Killos, that is to say, the church of flowers: taking that name of the wonder there happened at the remouing of the kings bodie, as the same authors would seeme to meane. But there is now (or was of late) a rich abbeie, standing with a verie faire church, consecrat in the honor of the virgine Marie. Monstrous sights also that were seene within the Scotish kingdome that yeere were these: horsses in Louthian, being of singular beautie and swiftnesse, did eate their owne flesh, and would in no wise taste anie other meate. In Angus there was a gentlewoman brought forth a child without eies, nose, hand, or foot. There was a sparhawke also strangled by an owle. Neither was it anie lesse wonder that the sunne, as before is said, was continuallie couered with clouds for sir moneths space. But all men vnderstood that the abhominable murther of king Duffe was the cause heereof, which being reuenged by the death of the authors, in maner as before is said; Culene was crowned as lawfull successor to the same Duffe at Scone, with all due honor and solemnitie, in the yeere of our Lord 972, after that Duffe had ruled the Scotish kingdome about the space of foure yeeres.

The beginning of Culenes reigne, begun with righteous execution of iustice, promised a firme hope of an other manner of prince, than by the administration which followed he declared himselfe to be: for shortlie after loosing the rains of lasciuious wantonnesse to the youth of his realme, through giuing a lewd example by his owne disordered doings, all such as were inclined vnto licentious liuing, followed their sensuall lusts and vnbrideled libertie, abandoning all feare of correction more than euer had bene seene or heard of in anie other age. For such was the negligence of the king, or rather maintenance of misordered persons, that whatsoeuer anie of the nobilitie did either against merchants, priests, or anie of the commons, though the same were neuer so great an iniurie, there was no punishment vsed against them: so that all men looked for some commotion in the common-wealth thereupon to insue, if there were not other order prouided therefore in time. The ancient peeres of the realme also being greeued thereat, spared not to admonish the king of his dutie, declaring vnto him into what danger the realme was likelie to fall through his negligent behauiour.

King Culene did not continue as his beginning was.

He followes his sensuall lustes.

Euill doers were not punished.

God counsell was not heard

Culene answered them, that he wist well inough how young men were not at the first borne graue and sage personages, like to them with hoarie heads: wherefore their first youthfull yeeres could not be so stable as they might be hereafter by old age and continuance of time. But as for such rigorous extremitie as diuerse of his elders had vsed towards their subiects, he minded not (as he said) to follow, being taught by their example (as by the kings, Indulph, Duffe, and such other) into what danger he might incurre by such sharpe seueritie shewed in the gouernment of the estate. Whereupon he was determined so to rule, as he might giue cause rather to be beloued than feared, which was the onelie meane (as he thought) to retaine his subiects in due and most faithfull obedience. This answer was such, that although it seemed nothing agreeable for the preseruation of the publike state in quiet rest and safetie, yet was there no man, by reason of his regall authoritie, that durst reproue the same, but diuerse there were that praised him therein, as those that hated all such as loued the vpright administration of iustice.

The kings answer vnto his graue peeres.

He would not displease.

But such ancient councellors as had trulie serued in rule of the common-wealth in the daies of the former kings, Indulph & Duffe, misliking the state of that present world (wherin the youth of the realme, namelie all such as were descended of noble parentage, and vsed to be about the king, followed their wilfull & sensuall lusts, growing euerie day through want of correction to be worse and worse) departed from the court, and withdrew to their homes, without medling anie further with the publike administration. In whose place there crept in others, that with their flatterie corrupted the residue of such sparks of good inclination as yet remained in the king, if anie were at all; insomuch that in the end he measured supreame felicitie by the plentifull inioieng of voluptuous pleasures and bodilie lusts. He fansied onelie such as could deuise prouocations thervnto, and in filling the bellie with excesse of costlie meates and drinks, those that could excell other were chieflie cherished, and most highlie of him esteemed.

Ancient councellors leaue the court.

The youthfull court followeth their sensuall lusts.

A wicked time of voluptuousnesse.

Herewithall he was giuen vnto leacherie beyond all the bounds of reason, sparing neither maid, widow, nor wife, prophane nor religious, sister nor daughter (for all was one with him) that to heare of such villanie and violent forcings as were practised by him and his familiars, it would loth anie honest hart to vnderstand or remember. He was so farre past all shame in this behalfe, that when his leacherous lust by too much copulation was so tired, that he might no more exercise his former lewdnesse, he tooke speciall pleasure yet to behold other to do it in his presence, that his decaied lust might be the more stirred vp with sight of such filthinesse. This abhominable trade of life he practised for the space of three yeeres togither, giuing occasion of much spoile, rauine, manslaughter, forcings, and rauishments of women, with all such kind of wicked and diuelish transgressions: no execution of lawes (instituted by authoritie of the former kings, for restreint of such flagitious offenses) being put in vre, through negligence of this monstruous creature.

A leacherous king.

Forcing of womenkind exceeded.

So farre forth also increased the libertie of theeues, robbers, and other offendors, maintained by such of the nobilitie as consented vnto their vnlawfull doings, and were partakers with them in the same, that if anie man went about to withstand them, or refused to accomplish their requests and demands, he should be spoiled of all that he had, and happilie haue his house burnt ouer his head, or otherwise by misused in such outragious and violent sort, that it would greeue all those that had anie zeale to iustice, to heare of such enormities as were dailie practised in that countrie. Holbeit, at length the death of king Culene brought an end to all such wicked dealings: for falling into a filthie disease (through abuse of excessiue drinking and leacherie) called the wasting of nature, he consumed awaie in such wise by rotting of his flesh, that he appeared more like vnto a dead carcase, than vnto a liuelie creature, insomuch that his owne seruants began to abhor him.

O beastlie behauiour!

All honestie exiled.

Robberie, theft, &c. were maintained.

Whereupon the lords and other honorable personages of the realme, vnderstanding his case, caused a parlement to be summoned at Scone, where they determined to depose king Culene, and appoint some other (whome they should iudge most meetest) to reigne in his place. Culene also not knowing wherefore this councell was called, as he was going thitherwards, at Methen castell, being almost in the mid waie of his iournie, was murthered by one Cadhard the thane of that place, whose daughter he had rauished before time amongst diuerse other. This end had Culene togither with all his filthie sensualitie: but the reprochfull infamie thereof remaineth in memorie with his posteritie, and is not like to be forgotten gotten whileſt the world goeth about. He was thus diſpatched in the fift yéere of his reigne, and after the

976. birth of our Sauiour 976, the nobles & great péeres of the realme reioiſing at his death, though they allowed not of the manner thereof.

Kenneth. After that the bodie of king Culene was once conueied vnto Colmekill, and there buried amongſt his elders, the nobles and great péeres aſſembled togither at Scone, where they proclaimed Kenneth the ſonne of Malcolme the firſt, and brother vnto Duffe, king of the realme. In the beginning of his reigne, he had inough to do to reduce the people from their wild and ſauage kind of life (into the which they were fallen through the negligent gouernment of his predeceſſor) vnto their former trade of ciuill demeanor. For the nature of the Scotiſhmen is, that firſt the nobles, and then all the reſidue of the people transforme themſelues to the vſage of their prince: therefore did Kenneth in his owne trade of liuing ſhew an example of chaſtitie, ſobrietie, liberalitie, and modeſtie, miſuſing himſelfe in no kind of vice, but refraining himſelfe from the ſame. He baniſhed all ſuch kind of perſons as might prouoke either him or other vnto anie lewd or wanton pleaſures. He mainteined amitie aſwell with ſtrangers as with his owne people, puniſhing moſt rigorouſlie all ſuch as ſought to moue ſedition by anie manner of meanes. He toke buſie care in cauſing the people to auoid ſloth, and to aplie themſelues in honeſt exerciſes, iudging (as the truth is) that to be the waie to aduance the common-wealth from decaie to a flouriſhing ſtate.

Thus when he had ſomewhat reformed the miſorders of his ſubiects, he indeuored himſelfe by all meanes he could deuiſe to puniſh offendors againſt the lawes and wholeſome ordinances of the realme, and to purge all his dominions of théeues, robbers, and other ſuch as went about to diſquiet common peace. At Lanerke, a towne in Kile, was a ſeſſions apointed to be kept for execution of iuſtice, where certeine offendors were ſummoned to appéere. But at their comming thither, perceiuing that ſuch manifeſt proofes would be brought againſt them of ſuch crimes as they had committed, that they were not able to excuſe the ſame, through perſuaſion of diuerſe noble men vnto whom they were of kin, they fled ſecretlie their waies, ſome into the weſterne Iles, and ſome into other places, where they thought moſt expedient for ſafegard of their liues. The king perceiuing that through the diſloiall meanes of the lords his purpoſe was ſo hindered, that he might not miniſter iuſtice, according to the inſtitution of his lawes, he diſſembled his wrath for a time, and licenced euerie man to depart to their houſes, his traine onelie excepted. Then went he into Galloway to viſit ſaint Ninian for performance of his vow, which he had made ſo to do. Héere he inuented (by conference which he had with ſome of his priuie councell) a deuiſe, whereby he might fetch againe the offendors vnto iudgement: but this was kept cloſe till the yéere following, for doubt leaſt if thoſe lords which bare them good will had come to anie inkling thereof, they would by vttering it haue diſappointed his purpoſe.

At length, after a yéere was paſſed, he apointed all the lords and nobles of his realme to aſſemble at Scone, as though it had béene to haue communed about ſome weightie affaires touching the ſtate of the realme. The night then before they ſhould come togither into the councell-chamber, he cauſed by ſome of his faithfull miniſters, a ſort of armed men to be laid cloſe in a ſecret place, with commandement giuen to their capteine, that in no wiſe he ſhould ſtirre with his band till the next day that all the lords were aſſembled togither, and then without delaie to execute that which ſhould be giuen him in commandement.

The king and lords ſitting, the armed men ſtep forth.

On the morrow after the nobles comming togither into the councell-chamber, they had no ſooner taken their places, euerie one according to his degrée about the king, but that the armed men before mentioned, came ruſhing into the houſe, placing themſelues round about them that were ſet, according to the order preſcribed by former appointment. The lords with this preſent ſight being much amazed, beheld one an other, but durſt not ſpeake a word. Then the king perceiuing their feare, began to declare vnto them the whole cauſe of his calling them to councell at that time, and why he had appointed thoſe armed men to be there attendant. The effect of his oration there made vnto them was, that he had not cauſed thoſe armed men to come into the chamber for anie harme ment towards anie of their perſons, but onelie for the publike preſeruation of the realme. For ſo much as they knew, there was one kind of people much noiſome to the common-wealth, being confederate as it were togither by one conſent to exerciſe all ſorts of miſchiefe and oppreſſion againſt the poore people, as to rob, ſpoile, and take from them all that they had, to raviſh their wiues, maids, & daughters, and ſome times to burne their houſes: the which licentious libertie in ſuch wicked perſons, through want of due puniſhment in the daies of king Culene, what danger it had brought vnto the whole ſtate of the Scotiſh common-wealth, there was none but might well vnderſtand.

The king putteth the lords out of doubt.

An oration made by the king.

A rehearſall of all enormities

For ſith it was ſo, that the lords and other high eſtates liued by the trauell of the commons, then if the ſame commons ſhould in anie wiſe decaie, the lords and ſuch other high eſtates could in no wiſe proſper: for if the labourer through iniurie of the robber were forced to giue ouer his labour; where ſhould the lord or gentleman haue whereupon to liue? So that thoſe which robbed the huſbandman, robbed alſo the lord and gentleman; and they that ſought to mainteine ſuch loitering perſons as vſed to rob the poore man, went about the deſtruction both of king, lord, and gentleman; yea and finallie of the vniuerſall ſtate of the whole common-wealth. Therfore he that loued the common-wealth, would not ſéeke onelie to defend the commons from ſuch iniuries as théeues and robbers dailie offered them; but alſo would helpe to ſée iuſt execution done vpon the ſame théeues and robbers, according to the laudable lawes and cuſtomes of the land. The laſt yeare (ſaid he) you your ſelues remember (I thinke) how I purpoſed by your helpe and counſell to haue proceéded by order of the lawes againſt all enimies and perturbers of the peace. At Lainrike was the day apointed for them to haue appeared, but there was not one of them that would come in, but contemptuouſlie diſobeieng our commandement kept them awaie, by whoſe counſell I know not. But I haue béene informed by ſome how diuers of you fauoring thoſe rebels, by reaſon they were of your linage, were of counſell with them, in withdrawing themſelues ſo from iudgement.

Lainrike, or Lanerke.

The often ſending of meſſengers betwixt them and you, well néere perſuaded vs to thinke that this report was true. But yet not withſtanding, I haue put away all ſuch ſiniſter ſuſpicion out of my head, wiſhing you (as I truſt you be) void of all ſuch diſſimulation. And now I require you, not as fautors of the rebelles, but as defendors of the common-wealth, though happilie ſomewhat ſlacke heretofore in diſcharge of your dueties, to ſhew your ſelues ſuch in helping to apprehend the offendors, as that the world may perceiue you to haue made full ſatisfaction for your fault and error, if before in you there were were anie. In the end he was plaine with them, and told them flatlie that they should assure themselues to haue those armed men which they saw there present, to be continuallie attendant about them, till he might haue all the rebelles at commandement.

The lords gentle submission, with a large promise.

The lords hauing heard the kings speech, and perceiuing what his meaning was, first partlie excused themselues so well as they might of their cloked dissimulation, and then falling downe vpon their knées afore him, besought him to put away all displeasure out of his mind, and clearelie to pardon them, if in anie wise they had offended his maiestie, promising that they would with all diligence and faithfulnesse accomplish his desire, in causing the offendors to be brought in vnto iudgement: and till the time that this were brought to passe, they were well contented to remaine in such place where he should appoint them to abide. The councell then being broken vp, the king with those lords passing ouer the riuer of Taie, went vnto Bertha, which towne during the kings abode in the same, was streictlie kept with watch and ward, that no creature might enter or go forth without knowledge of the officers appointed by the king to take héed thereunto. If anie idle person were espied abroad in the streets, streightwaies the sergeants would haue him to ward.

The king went to Bertha.

Roges punished.

The nobles remained in the kings house, or in other lodgings to them assigned, procuring by their friends and ministers to haue such offendors as vsed to rob and spoile the husbandmen, apprehended and brought to the king to Bertha, there to receiue iudgement & punishment according to their merits: for so they perceiued they must néeds worke, if they minded the safegard of their owne liues. Hereof it followed also, that within short space after, there were brought vnto Bertha to the number néere hand of fiue hundred such idle loiterers as vsed to liue by spoile and pillage, manie of them being descended of famous houses: all which companie being condemned for their offenses to die, were hanged vp on gibbets about the towne, and commandement giuen by the king, that their bodies should not be taken downe, but there to hang still to giue example to other, what the end was of all such as by wrongfull meanes sought to liue idelie by other mens labours.

Iniurious men brought vnto Bertha.

A great number of vagabonds were iudged to die.

The rebelles being thus executed, king Kenneth licenced the lords to depart to their owne houses, exhorting them to remember their duties towards the common-wealth, and to studie for preseruation of peace and quietnesse according to their vocation. After this, the realme continued in quietnesse without anie forraine or inward trouble for the space of certeine yeares following, and had remained in the same state still, if the Danes had not made a new inuasion, who being sore grœued in their hearts for such displeasures as they had susteined in Albion, determined now with great assurance to reuenge the same. Wherevpon gathering an huge multitude of men togither, they were imbarked in vessels prouided for them; and sailing forth, they purposed to take land vpon the next coast of Albion where they should chance to arriue; & being once on land, to destroie all before them, except where the people should submit & yæld themselues vnto them. This nauie being once got abroad, within short time arriued at that point of land in Angus, which is called the red Braes, or red head, not far from the place where the abbie of Abirbroth, or Abirbrothoke was afterward founded.

The lords haue licence to depart.

The Danes séeke for to reuenge old losses.

The Danes take the sea to go into Albion.

The Danes arriue at the red head, or red Braes in Angus.

Here the Danish fléet first casting anchor, their capteins fell in consultation what they were best to do. Some of them were of this opinion, that it was not most expedient for them to land in that place, but rather to passe from thence into England; for at the Scotishmens hands being poore, and yet a fierce and hardie nation, there was small good to be got, being thereto accustomed to giue more ouerthrowes than they commonlie receiued. Againe, the soile of that countrie was but barren, and in manner ouergrowen with woods (as it was in déed in those daies) with few townes & small habitations, and those so poore, that no man knowing the same, would vouchsafe to fight for anie possession of them: wherein contrariwise England (that part namelie which lieth towards the south) was so fruitfull of corne and cattell, so rich of mines, and replenished with so manie notable cities and townes inhabited with men of great wealth and substance, that few were to be found comparable thereto. So that the matter being well considered, they could not do better, than to saile into Kent, where they might be sure of rich spoile, without anie great resistance. Other there were that held how that this iournie was attempted by the counsell of their superiors, onelie to reuenge such iniuries as the Danish nation had receiued at the hands of the Scotishmen, and not to atteine riches or anie dominion.

The Danes consult to go into England.

They consult for to saile into Kent.

They onelie sought reuenge.

The Scots also being a cruell people, & readie to fight in defense of other mens possessions (as in the warres of Northumberland it well appeared) would suerlie be readie to come to the aid of the Englishmen into Kent, euen so sone as it was knowen that the Danes were on land in those parts: so that by this means they should be constreined to haue to do both with the Scotishmen and Englishmen, if they first went into Kent: where if they set on land here in Scotland, they should incounter but onelie with the Scots. Therefore, the best were according to their first determination, to land amongest the Scots, sith chance had brought them vnto those coasts; adding that when they had somewhat abated the arrogant presumption of their enimies there, then might they passe more safelie into England, after a luckie beginning of fier and sword, to proceed against their aduersaries in those parties as fortune should lead them. This deuise was allowed of the greatest number, being glad to get beside the water. Wherevpon the mariners (vpon commandement giuen) drew with their ships into the mouth of the riuer called Eske, the which in those daies washed on the walles of a towne in Angus called then Celurke, but now Mountros. Here the Danes taking land, put the inhabitants of the countrie thereabouts in great feare, so that with all spéed for their safegard they got them into Mountros: but the towne being quickelie assailed of the Danes, was taken, put to the sacke, and after raced, cassell and all to the bare ground, not one liuing creature being left aliue of all such as were found within the same.

Some thought best to land in Scotland.

The Danes do land at Mountros.

Mountros taken, and all within was slaine.

From thence the armie of the Danes passed through Angus vnto the riuer of Taie, all the people of the countries by which they marched fléeing afore them. King Kenneth at the same time laie at Sterling, where hearing of these grœuous newes, he determined forthwith to raise his people, & to go against his enimies. The assemblie of the Scotish armie was appointed to be at the place where the riuer of Erne falleth into the riuer of Taie. Here when they were come togither in great numbers at the day appointed, the day next following word was brought to the king, that the Danes hauing passed ouer Taie, were come before the towne of Bertha, and had laid siege to the same. Then without further delaie, he raised with the whole armie, and marched streight towards his enimies, comming that night vnto vnto Loncart a village not far distant from the riuer of Taie, famous euer after, by reason of the battell fought then neere vnto the same. The Danes hearing that the Scots were come, detracted no time, but forthwith prepared to giue battell.

King Kenneth set his men in aray.

Kenneth as sone as the sunne was vp, beholding the Danes at hand, quickelie brought his armie into order. Then requiring them earnestlie to shew their manhood, he promiseth to release them of all tributs and paiments due to the kings cofers for the space of fiue yeares next insuing: and besides that he offered the summe of ten pounds, or else lands so much worth in value to euerie one of his armie, that should bring him the head of a Dane. He willed them therefore to fight manfullie, and to remember there was no place to atteine mercie; for either must they trie it out by dint of sword, or else if they fled, in the end to looke for present death at the enimies hands, who would not ceasse till time they had found them forth, into what place so euer they resorted for refuge, if they chanced to be vanquished. The Scots being not a little incouraged by the kings words, kept their order of battell according as they were appointed, still looking when the onset should be giuen. Malcolme Duffe prince of Cumberland led the right wing of the Scots; and Duncane lieutenant of Atholl the left: King Kenneth himselfe gouerned the battell. The enimies on the other part had taken their ground at the foot of a little mounteine right afore against the Scotish campe. Thus both the armies stood readie ranged in the field, beholding either other a good space, till at length the Scots desirous of battell, and doubting least the Danes would not come forth to anie euen ground, aduanced forward with somewhat more hast than the case required, beginning the battell with shot, and throwing of darts right freshlie.

The king exhorted the Scots vnto valiantnesse.

The order of the Scotish battell aray.

The Danes had the aduantage of a little mounteine.

The Scots begin the battell.

The Danes being backed with the mounteine, were constreined to leaue the same, and with all speed to come forward vpon their enimies, that by ioining they might auoid the danger of the Scotishmens arrowes and darts: by this meanes therefore they came to hand-strokes, in maner before the signe was giuen on either part to the battell. The fight was cruell on both sides: and nothing hindered the Scots so much, as going about to cut off the heads of the Danes, euer as they might ouercome them. Which maner being noted of the Danes, and perceiuing that there was no hope of life but in victorie, they rushed forth with such violence vpon their aduersaries, that first the right, and then after the left wing of the Scots, was constreined to retire and flee backe, the middle-ward stoutly yet keeping their ground: but the same stood in such danger, being now left naked on the sides, that the victorie must needes haue remained with the Danes, had not a renewer of the battell come in time, by the appointment (as is to be thought) of almightie God.

The two wings of the Scots fled.

For as it chanced, there was in the next field at the same time an husbandman, with two of his sons busie about his worke, named Haie, a man strong and stiffe in making and shape of bodie, but indued with a valiant courage. This Haie beholding the king with the most part of the nobles, fighting with great valiancie in the middle ward, now destitute of the wings, and in great danger to be oppressed by the great violence of his enimies, caught a plow-beame in his hand, and with the same exhorting his sonnes to do the like, hasted towards the battell, there to die rather amongest other in defense of his countrie, than to remaine aliue after the discomfiture in miserable thraldome and bondage of the cruell and most vnmercifull enimies. There was neere to the place of the battell, a long lane fenced on the sides with ditches and walles made of turfe, through the which the Scots which fled were beaten downe by the enimies on heapes.

Haie with his two sonnes.

Here Haie with his sonnes, supposing they might best staie the flight, placed themselues ouerthwart the lane, beat them backe whome they met fleeing, and spared neither friend nor foe: but downe they went all such as came within their reach, wherewith diuerse hardie personages cried vnto their fellowes to returne backe vnto the battell, for there was a new power of Scotishmen come to their succours, by whose aid the victorie might be easilie obteined of their most cruell aduersaries the Danes: therefore might they chose whether they would be slaine of their owne fellowes comming to their aid, or to returne againe to fight with the enimies. The Danes being here staied in the lane by the great valiantie of the father and the sonnes, thought verelie there had beene some great succors of Scots come to the aid of their king, and therevpon ceasling from further pursute, fled backe in great disorder vnto the other of their fellowes fighting with the middle ward of the Scots.

Haie staied the Scots from running away

The Scots were driuen to their battell againe.

The Danes fled towards their fellowes in great disorder.

The Scots also that before was chased, being incouraged herewith, pursued the Danes vnto the place of the battell right fiercelie. Wherevpon Kenneth perceiuing his people to be thus recomforted, and his enimies partlie abashed, called vpon his men to remember their duties, and now sith their aduersaries hearts began (as they might perceiue) to faint, he willed them to follow vpon them manfully, which if they did, he assured them that the victorie vndoubtedlie should be their's. The Scots incouraged with the kings words, laid about them so earnestlie, that in the end the Danes were constreined to forsake the field, and the Scots egerlie pursuing in the chase, made great slaughter of them as they fled. This victorie turned highlie to the praise of the Scotish nobilitie, the which fighting in the middle ward, bare still the brunt of the battell, continuing manfullie therein euen to the end. But Haie, who in such wise (as is before mentioned) staied them that fled, causing them to returne againe to the field, deserued immortall fame and commendation: for by his meanes chieflie was the victorie atchiued. And therefore on the morrow after, when the spoile of the field and of the enimies campe (which they had left void) should be diuided, the chiefest part was bestowed on him and his two sonnes, by consent of all the multitude; the residue being diuided amongst the souldiers and men of warre, according to the ancient custome vsed amongst this nation.

K. Kenneth called vpō his men to remember their duties.

The Danes forsake the fields.

The spoile is diuided.

The king hauing thus vanquished his enimies, as he should enter into Bertha, caused costlie robes to be offered vnto Haie and his sonnes, that being richlie clad, they might be the more honoured of the people: but Haie refusing to change his apparell, was contented to go with the king in his old garments whither it pleased him to apoint. So entring with the king into Bertha, he was receiued with little lesse honor than the king himselfe, all the people running forth to behold him, whome they heard to haue so valiantlie restored the battell, when the field was in maner lost without hope of all recouerie. At his entring into the towne he bare on his shoulder the plow-beame, more honourable to him than anie sword or battell are might haue beene to anie the most valiant warrior. Thus Haie being honored of all estates, within certeine daies after, at a councell holden at Scone, it was ordeined, that both he and his posteritie should be accepted amongst the number of the chiefest nobles and peeres of the realme, being rewarded (besides monie and other great gifts) with lands and reuenues, such as he should chose sufficient sufficient for the maintenance of their estates.

It is said, that by the counsell of his sonnes, who knew the fruitfulnes of the soile, he did aske so much ground in those parts where the riuer of Taie runs by the towne of Arrole ouer against Fife, as a falcon would flie ouer at one flight. Which request being freelie granted of the king, the place was appointed at Inschire for the falcon to be cast off: the which taking hir flight from thence, neuer lighted till shee came to a great stone neere a village called Rosse, not passing foure miles from Dundee. By which meanes all that countrie which lieth betwirt Inschire aforesaid, and the said stone (being almost six miles in length, and foure in breadth) fell vnto Haie and his sons. The name of the stone also being called the falcons stone to this daie, doth cause the thing better to be beleeued, and well neere all the foresaid ground still continueth in the possession of the Haies euen vnto this day. Besides this, to the further honoring of his name, the king gaue him armes three scutchons gules in a field of siluer, a plowbeame added thereunto, which he vsed in stead of a battell are, when he fought so valiantlie in defense of his owne countrie. Thus had the Haies their beginning of nobilitie, whose house hath atteined vnto great estimation of honor, and hath beene decorated with the office of the constableship of Scotland, by the bounteous beneuolence of kings that succeeded. These things happened in the first yeere of king Kenneth.

In the residue of the time that he reigned, though there chanced no great businesse by forren enimies, yet by ciuill sedition the state of the realme was wonderfullie disquieted. First a companie of Kerns of the westerne Iles inuading Rosse, to the intent to haue fetched a bootie, were met withall by the waie and ouerthrowne by the inhabitants of that countrie. After this skurre, another followed, farre more dangerous to the whole state of the common-welth, raised by one Cruthlint, one of the chiefest lords of the Mernes, who was sonne vnto a certeine ladie named Fenella, the daughter of one Cruthneth, that was gouernor of that part of Angus which lieth betwirt the two riuers, the one called Southeske, and the other Northeske. So it chanced, that on a time Cruthlint came vnto the castell of Delbogin to see his grandfather, the said Cruthneth as then lieng in the same: where vpon light occasion a fraie was begun amongst the seruingmen, in the which two of Cruthlints seruants fortuned to be slaine. Which iniurie when Cruthlint declared by waie of complaint vnto his grandfather, he was so slenderlie heard, and answered in such reprochfull wise, as though he himselfe had bin the author of the businesse, so that Cruthneths seruants perceiuing how little he was regarded of their maister, fell vpon him and beat him, that not without danger of life he brake forth of their hands, and hardlie escaped away.

In his returne homewards, he came to his mother Fenella, where she lay within the castell of Fethircarne, the chiefest fortresse of all the Mernes. Where being incensed through his mothers instigation, being a woman of a furious nature, he attempted forthwith to be reuenged of the iniurie receiued: so that assembling a number of his friends and kinsfolks so secretlie as he might togither, with a band of the inhabitants of the Mernes, he entereth into Angus, and comming vnto the castell of Delbogin in the night season, was suffered to enter by the keepers of the gate, nothing suspecting anie treason in the world, by reason wherof was Cruthneth suddenlie oppressed, the house sacked and raced, not one that was found within the same being left aliue. The spoile also was diuided by Cruthlint amongst them which came with him. The next day likewise he forraied the countrie all there abouts, returning home with a great bootie.

They of Angus prouoked herewith, rested not long; but assembling themselues togither inuaded the countrie of Perns, where making great slaughter on each side, they left the countrie void almost both of men and cattell. Thus did the people of those two countries pursue the warre one against another a certeine time, with dailie incursions and wastings of either others countries, in such cruell wise, that it was thought the one of them must needs shortlie come to vtter destruction, if speedie remedie were not the sooner prouided. The king being informed of this mischiefe and great trouble, which was fallen out through sedition amongst those his subiects, hee made proclamation by an herald, that those of Angus and Mernes, whom he vnderstood to be culpable, should appeare within fiftene daies after at Scone, there to make answer afore appointed iudges, to such things as might be laid to their charge, vpon paine of death to euerie one that made default. When the day of appearance came, there were but few that did appeare.

The most part of them doubting to be punished for their offenses with Cruthlint their capteine, fled out of Mernes, taking with them their wiues, and their children, and all their goods. The king being sore moued herewith, perceiued how readie the Scotish people were by nature vnto rebellion, when they were gentlie vsed: and againe how they obeied the magistrates best when they were restreined from their wild outragious doings by due punishment and execution of iustice. He considered therefore that if he did not cause those seditious rebels which had thus disobeied his commandements to be punished according to the order of the lawes, he should haue the whole realme shortlie disquieted with ciuill warre and open rebellion. Whereupon with all speed he caused earnest pursute to be made after Cruthlint, and the residue of the offendors, the which at length being taken in Lochquhabir, were brought vnto a castell in Gowrie called Dounsinnam, where after iudgement pronounced against them, Cruthlint first, and then other the chiefest stirrers on either side were put to execution. The commons, for that it was thought they followed their superiors against their willes, were pardoned and licenced to depart to their houses.

For this equitie shewed in ministring iustice by the king, he was greatlie praised, loued, and dread of all his subiects; so that great quietnesse followed in the state of the common-wealth, greatlie to the aduancement thereof, and so continued till the 22 yeere of this Kenneths reigne. At what time the blind loue he bare to his owne issue, caused him to procure a detestable fact, in making away one of his neerest kinsmen. This was Malcolme the sonne of king Duffe, created in the beginning of Kenneths reigne prince of Cumberland, by reason wherof he ought to haue succeeded in rule of the kingdome after Kenneths death. Whereat the same Kenneth greeuing not a little, for that thereby his sonnes should be kept from inioieng the crowne, found meanes to poison him. But though the physicians vnderstanding by such euident signes as appeared in his bodie, that he was poisoned indeed, yet such was the opinion which men had of the kings honor and integritie, that no suspicion at all was conceiued that it should be his deed.

The cloked loue also which he had shewed toward him at all times, and so sudden commandement giuen by him vpon the first newes of his death, that his funerals should be celebrated in euerie church and chappell for his soule; and againe, the teares which he shed ſhed for him, in all places where anie mention chanced to be made of the loſſe which the realme had ſuſteined by the death of ſo worthie a prince, made men nothing miſtruſtfull of the matter, till at length ſome of the nobles perceiuing the outward ſorow (which he made) to paſſe the true griefe of the heart, began to gather ſome ſuſpicion, that all was not well: but yet becauſe no certeintie appeared, they kept their thoughts to themſelues. About the ſame time came ambaſſadors forth of England from king Edward the ſonne of Edgar (which after through treaſon of his ſtepmother Elculda, was made a martyr) requiring that ſith Malcolme the prince of Cumberland was deceaſſed, it might pleaſe the king with the eſtates of the realme to chooſe ſome other in his place, who doing his homage vnto the king of England, according as it was couenanted by the league, might be a meane to confirme the ſame league betwixt the two nations for the auoiding of all occaſions of breach thereof that otherwiſe happilie might inſue.

Kenneth at the ſame time held a councell at Scone, where hauing heard the requeſt of theſe ambaſſadors, in preſence of all his nobles, he anſwered that he was glad to vnderſtand that king Edward was ſo carefull for maintenance of loue and amitie betwixt his ſubiects and the Scotiſhmen, according to the articles of the ancient league in times paſt concluded betwixt them, the ratification whereof for his part he likewiſe moſt earneſtlie deſired, and therefore in rendering moſt heartie thanks vnto him for his gentle aduertiſement, he purpoſed by the aduiſe of his nobles, and the other eſtates of his realme as then there aſſembled, to elect a new prince of Cumberland, without anie further delaie: and thereupon required the ambaſſador to be preſent on the morrow, to heare what he was whom the nobles ſhould name to be preferred vnto that dignitie. The ambaſſadors hereupon departing forth of the councell chamber, were conueied to their lodging by diuerſe of the nobilitie that were appointed to keepe them companie.

Then Kenneth with a long oration went about to perſuade the peeres, and other the eſtates of the realme there (as I ſaid) aſſembled, to alter the cuſtome and ancient order vſed by their elders in chooſing of him that ſhould ſucceed in the gouernance of the realme, after the deceaſſe of him that was in poſſeſſion. He vſed ſo manie reaſons as was poſſible for him to deuiſe in that behalfe, thereby to induce them to his purpoſe, which was to haue an act eſtabliſhed for the crowne to go by ſucceſſion, onelie to this end, that one of his ſonnes might inioy the ſame immediatlie after his deceaſſe. He declared alſo what diſcommodities, ſeditions, and great inconuenences had growne, in that the crowne had gone in times paſt by election: for though it was ordeined at the firſt that it ſhould ſo doo, vpon a good intent and great conſideration, yet in proceſſe of time proofe and experience had ſhewed, that more hinderance happened vnto the common-wealth thereby (beſide the danger euer inſuing incidentlie vnto ſuch iſſue as the king left behind him) than profit, if the ſundrie murthers, occaſions of ciuill diſcord, and other wicked practiſes were throughlie weied and conſidered, the ſumme whereof he recited from point to point, and ſo in the end with great inſtance beſought them, that ſo pernicious a cuſtome might be aboliſhed and taken away, to the great benefit of the whole ſtate of the realme, ſpeciallie ſith in all realmes commonlie the order was, that the ſonne ſhould without anie contradiction ſucceed the father in the heritage of the crowne and kinglie eſtate.

The king had no ſooner made an end of his long oration, which he handled after the pitifulleſt ſort hee could, but that diuerſe of the noble men which were there amongſt other, being made priuie to the matter aforehand, motioned meanes to haue Malcolme the ſon of Kenneth created prince of Cumberland, that he might ſo haue an entrance to the crowne after the deceaſſe of his father. This motion by and by was in manie of their mouthes, which Kenneth perceiuing, he required of the moſt ancient peeres whome they would name to be prince of Cumberland, that there might be a meane to ratifie and confirme the league betwixt the Scots and Engliſhmen, Conſtantine the ſonne of king Cullin, and Grime the nephue of king Duffe by his brother Mogall: howbeit by the force of the former law they might by good reaſon haue loked to haue had the preferment themſelues.

But yet perceiuing it was in vaine to denie that which would be had by violence (although they ſhould neuer ſo much ſtand againſt it) being firſt demanded of the herald what they thought, they anſwerd (notwithſtanding againſt their minds indeed) that the king might order all things as ſhould ſtand with his pleaſure, appointing whom he thought moſt meet to bee prince of Cumberland, and to abrogate the ancient law of creating the kings, in deuiſing new ordinances for the ſame, as ſhould ſeeme vnto him and thoſe of his councell moſt requiſite and neceſſarie. The multitude then following their ſentence, cried with lowd & vndiſcreet voices, to haue Malcolme the ſonne of king Kenneth created prince of Cumberland. And thus the ſame Malcolme (though as yet vnder age) was by the voices of the people ordeined prince of Cumberland, in place of the other Malcolme ſonne to king Duffe. The daie next following, the ambaſſadors comming into the councell chamber, heard what was decreed touching their requeſt, and then being highlie rewarded of the kings bountious liberalitie, they returned into England, and Malcolme with them, to be acquainted with king Edward, and to doo his homage for the principalitie of Cumberland, as the cuſtome was.

At the ſame time alſo there was a new act deuiſed and made, the old being abrogated (by the appointment of the king) for the creation of the Scotiſh kings in time to come, manie of the nobles rather conſenting with ſilence, than greatlie allowing it either in harts or voices, though ſome curriſauours among them ſet forward the matter to the beſt of their powers. The articles of this ordinance were theſe. The eldeſt heire male of the deceaſſed king, whether the ſame were ſonne or nephue, of what age ſoeuer he ſhould be, yea though he ſhould be in the mothers wombe at the time of the fathers deceaſſe, ſhould from thence-forth ſucceed in the kingdome of Scotland. The nephue by the ſonne ſhould be preferred before the nephue by the daughter, in atteining to the heritage of the crowne. And likewiſe the brothers ſonne ſhould be admitted before the ſiſters ſon. The ſame law ſhould be obſerued of all ſuch of the Scotiſh nation, as had anie lands or inheritance comming to them by deſcent. Where the king by this meanes chanced to be vnder age, & not able to rule, there ſhuld be one of the chiefeſt peeres of the realme choſen and elected to haue the gouernance of his perſon and realme, till he came to 14 yeeres of age. The which fourteenth yeere of his age being accompliſhed, he ſhould haue the adminiſtration committed to his owne hands. The heires of all other perſons of ech eſtate and degree ſhould remaine vnder the wardſhip of their appointed gouernors, till they came to the age of 21 yeeres, and not till then to meddle with anie part of their lands and liuings.

King Kenneth miniſtred iuſtice truelie.

These lawes and ordinances being once publiſhed and confirmed, king Kenneth ſuppoſed the kingdome to be fullie aſſured vnto him and his poſteritie, and therevpon indeuored himſelfe to win the harts of the people with vpright adminiſtration of iuſtice, and the fauour of the nobles he ſought to purchaſe with great gifts which he beſtowed amongſt them, aſwell in lands belonging to the crowne, as in other things greatlie to their contentation. Thus might he ſeeme happie to all men, hauing the loue both of his lords and commons: but yet to himſelfe he ſeemed moſt vnhappie, as he that could not but ſtill liue in continuall feare, leaſt his wicked practiſe concerning the death of Malcolme Duffe ſhould come to light and knowledge of the world. For ſo commeth it to paſſe, that ſuch as are pricked in conſcience for anie ſecret offenſe committed, haue euer an vnquiet mind. And (as the fame goeth) it chanced that a voice was heard as he was in bed in the night time to take his reſt, vttering vnto him theſe or the like words in effect:

The good will of the nobilitie he bought with gifts.

The king had a giltie conſcience.

A voice heard by the king.

"Thinke not Kenneth that the wicked ſlaughter of "Malcolme Duffe by thee contriued, is kept ſecret

"by traitorous meanes to do that to thy neighbour,
"which thou wouldeſt haue reuenged by cruell pu-
"niſhment in anie of thy ſubiects, if it had bene offe"red to thy ſelfe. It ſhall therefore come to paſſe, that "both thou thy ſelfe, and thy iſſue, through the iuſt ven"geance of almightie God, ſhall ſuffer worthie pu"niſhment, to the infamie of thy houſe and familie for

"ſecret practiſes to diſpatch both thee and thy iſſue out "of the waie, that other maie inioy this kingdome
"which thou doſt indeuour to aſſure vnto thine iſſue.

The king with this voice being ſtriken into great dread and terror, paſſed that night without anie ſleepe comming in his eies. Wherefore in the morning he got him vnto biſhop Mouean, a man of great holineſſe of life, vnto whome he confeſſed his heinous and moſt wicked offenſe, beſeeching him of counſell, which waie he might obteine pardon and forgiuenes at Gods hands by worthie penance. Mouean hearing how the king bemoned his offenſe committed, he willed him to be of good comfort. For as the wrath of almightie God was prouoked by ſinne and wicked offenſes, ſo was the ſame pacified againe by repentance, if ſo be we continue penitent and willing to amend. King Kenneth being confirmed in hope of forgiueneſſe by theſe and ſundrie other the like comfortable words of the biſhop, ſtudied vnfeinedlie to do worthie penance, leauing nothing vndone which he thought might ſerue for a witneſſe of his penitent hart, thereby to auoid the vengeance which he ſtood in feare of to be prepared for him, by reaſon of his heinous and wicked crime.

The king taketh great repentance.

It chanced hereupon, that within a ſhort time after he had bene at Fordune, a towne in Mernes, to viſit the reliks of Paladius which remaine there, he turned a little out of the waie to lodge at the caſtell of Fethircarne, where as then there was a foreſt full of all manner of wild beaſts that were to be had in anie part of Albion. Here was he receiued by Fenella ladie of the houſe, whoſe ſon (as ye haue heard) he cauſed to be put to death, for the commotion made betwixt them of Mernes and Angus. She was alſo of kin vnto Malcolme Duffe, whome the king had made awaie, and in like manner vnto Conſtantine and Grime, defrauded of their right to the crowne, by the craftie deuiſe of the king (as before is partlie mentioned.) This woman therefore being of a ſtout ſtomach, long time before hauing conceiued an immortall grudge towards the king, vpon the occaſions before rehearſed (namelie aſwell for the death of hir ſonne Cruthlint, as hauing ſome inkling alſo of the impoiſoning of Malcolme Duffe, though no full certeintie therof was knowne) imagined night and day how to be reuenged.

The king went to Fordune in pilgrimage.

Fenella was of kin vnto Malcolme.

She vnderſtood that the king delighted aboue meaſure in goodlie buildings, and therefore to the end to compaſſe hir malicious intent, ſhe had cauſed a tower to be made, ioining vnto hir owne lodging within the foreſaid caſtell of Fothircarne. The which tower was couered ouer with copper finelie ingrauen with diuerſe flowers and images. Hereto was it hong within with rich cloths of arras wrought with gold and ſilke, verie faire and coſtlie. Behind the ſame were there croſſebowes ſet readie bent with ſharpe quarrels in them. In the middeſt of the houſe there was a goodlie braſen image alſo, reſembling the figure of king Kenneth, holding in the one hand a faire golden apple ſet full of pretious ſtones, deuiſed with ſuch art and cunning, that ſo ſone as anie man ſhould draw the ſame vnto him, or remoue it neuer ſo little anie waie forth, the croſſebowes would immediatlie diſcharge their quarrels vpon him with great force and violence.

She was deſirous for to reuenge.

Fenella hir malicious intent.

Croſſebowes readie bent, hidden.

Fenella therefore being thus prouided aforehand, after meate deſired the king to go with hir into that inner chamber, into the which being entered, he could not be ſatiſfied of long with the beholding of the goodlie furniture, aſwell of the hangings as of diuerſe other things. At the laſt hauing viewed the image which ſtood (as is ſaid) in the midſt of the chamber, he demanded what the ſame did ſignifie? Fenella anſwered, how that image did repreſent his perſon, and the golden apple ſet ſo richlie with ſmaragds, iacints, ſaphires, topaſes, rubies, turkaſſes, and ſuch like pretious ſtones, ſhe had prouided as a gift for him, and therefore required him to take the ſame, beſeeching him to accept it in good part, though it were not in value worthie to be offered vnto his princelie honor and high dignitie. And herewith ſhe hirſelfe withdrew aſide, as though ſhe would haue taken ſome thing forth of a cheſt or coffer, thereby to auoid the danger.

Fenella had the king into the inner chamber.

But the king delighted in beholding the gems and orient ſtones, at length remouing the apple, the better to aduiſe it, incontinentlie the croſſebowes diſcharged their quarrels ſo directlie vpon him, that ſtriking him through in ſundrie places, he fell downe ſtarke dead, and lay flat on the ground. Fenella aſ ſone as ſhe beheld him fall to the ground readie to die, ſhe got forth by a backe doore into the nert woods, where ſhe had appointed horſſes to tarie for hir, by meanes whereof ſhe eſcaped out of all danger of them that purſued hir, yer the death of the king were openlie knowne vnto them. His ſeruants ſtill waiting for his comming forth in the vtter chamber, at length when they ſaw he came not at all, firſt they knocked at the doore ſoftlie, then they raped hard thereat: laſtlie, doubting that which had happened, they brake open doore after doore, till at length they came into the chamber where the king lay cold dead vpon the floore.

The king was ſlaine with the croſſebowes.

Fenella eſcaped from the hall.

His ſeruants looked for the king.

The doores broken open they find him dead.

The clamor and crie hereupon was raiſed by his ſeruants, and Fenella curſſed and ſought for in euerie place, that had committed ſo heinous and wicked a deed: but the vngratious woman was conueied ſo ſecretlie out of the waie, that no where could ſhe be heard of. Some ſuppoſed that ſhe fled firſt vnto Conſtantine, by whoſe helpe ſhe got ouer into Ireland. The ambitious deſire which the ſame Conſtantine ſhewed he had to ſucceed in gouernment of the kingdome after Kenneths deceaſſe, increaſed that ſuſpicion greatlie. For immediatlie after it was known that Kenneth was dead, he got his friends togither, and went vnto diuerſe places, requiring the lords to aſſiſt aſſiſt him in atteining to the crowne, which by the old ordinance and law of the realme (inſtituted in the beginning, and obſerued till now of late, that Kenneth by his priuate authoritie had gone about to abrogate the ſame) ought to deſcend vnto him, as all the world verie well vnderſtood.

Fenella could not be found.

Fenella got hirſelfe into Ireland by the helpe of Conſtantine.

Conſtantine aſpired vnto the crowne.

COnſtantine procured friends ſo on ech ſide, that by their meanes being of high authoritie in the realme, he was brought by them vnto Scone, and there crowned king the 12 day after Kenneths deceaſſe, in the 25 yeere after that the ſame Kenneth had begun his reigne ouer the Scotiſhmen, and in the yéere of our ſaluation a thouſand iuſt, in the which yéere (as is ſaid) ſundrie vnkeuth ſights were ſéene as well in Albion, as in other places. The ſea left vpon the ſands on the coaſts of Buchquane, an infinite multitude of fiſhes, the which lieng there dead, cauſed ſuch a filthie ſauour, that the aire being therewith infected, great death of people inſued. The moone appéered of a bloudie colour, to the great terror of them that beheld it. In the ſummer next following, corne failed, and cattell died ſo generallie, that if there had not béene more plentie of fiſh got than was accuſtomed to be, the people had béene famiſhed in manie places. In Albion and alſo France it rained ſtones. But all theſe dreadfull wonders might not withdraw the Scotiſhmen from their wicked vices, wherevnto in thoſe daies they were wholie giuen, though there wanted not diuerſe vertuous men, as well biſhops as other, that in their ſermons exhorted the people to repent and amend their naughtie liuings: for otherwiſe vndoubtedlie ſuch grillie ſights and tokens as chanced in thoſe daies, menaced ſome great miſchiefe to fall vnto the whole nation. And ſuerlie their words proued true: for the Scots continuing in their wilfulneſſe, being ſtubborne harted one againſt another, brought their countrie into danger of vtter deſtruction.

Malcolme the ſonne of Kenneth, created (as ye haue heard in his fathers life time) prince of Cumberland, hearing that Conſtantine (againſt the ordinance latelie made) had vſurped the crowne, aſſone as his fathers bodie was buried in Colmekill, with ſuch funerall pompe as apperteined, he deſired his fathers friends to giue him ſuch faithfull counſell as they thought moſt expedient, which way he were beſt to worke for the appeaſing of the ſedition now begun, by reaſon of Conſtantines preſumptuous attempt. There were ſome amongeſt that companie that toke it to be beſt, firſt to vnderſtand the minds of all the péeres and nobles of the realme, before they went about anie exploit againſt the tyrant; leaſt whileſt Malcolme ſhould ſéeke to deliuer himſelfe from danger, he might haplie wind himſelfe further into trouble, than without extreame perill of the common-wealth he ſhould be able to get forth thereof againe. Other there were that iudged it beſt ſuddenlie to go againſt Conſtantine before he made himſelfe ſtrong: for if they came vpon him yer he were prouided for their comming, manie of them that feigned themſelues to be his friends, would forſake him, ſo ſone as they ſaw anie power of his enimies at hand. And then ſhould he either fall into their hands, or be driuen to flée the realme for ſafegard of his life.

The fierce yong man following this counſell as the beſt to his ſéeming, & truſting more to his owne wit than to the graue aduiſe of men of skill, aſſembled togither in all haſt poſſible about the number of ten thouſand men, with whome making towards Conſtantine with ſpéedie iornies, at length he came into Louthian. Conſtantine being informed of all his aduerſaries doings, had gotten togither alſo an huge power, ſo that paſſing forth with the ſame to incounter them, the brute which ran of his great number and puiſſance, cauſed Malcolme for verie feare that he ſhould not be able in anie part to match him, to breake vp his armie, and to flée backe into Cumberland: by reaſon whereof he had béene put to ſuch hinderance and diſhonor, as would not eaſilie haue béene recouered, had not Kenneth the baſtard ſonne of his father the aboue mentioned Kenneth incamped with a mightie power about Sterling, & defended the paſſages of the Forth, that Conſtantine with his armie could not come ouer. Then roſe there great famine and penurie of vittels in both hoſts, ſo that Conſtantine with great indignation was conſtreined to breake vp his campe, and ſo to leaue his enterprize for that ſeaſon.

Malcolme thought himſelfe too weake.

Lacke of vittels cauſed Conſtantine to breake vp his campe.

Thus was the realme diuided into two ſundrie factions, whereupon followed waſtings and incurſions made into each others poſſeſſions, with ſuch crueltie, that the ſame might be a ſufficient inſtruction what miſchiefe happeneth through ciuill diſcord. The poore commons and huſbandmen were brought to ſuch miſerie through the often ſpoilings and robberies vſed by the men of warre, that they were not able to till their grounds. Finallie, there roſe one miſchiefe ſo faſt in the necke of an other, that no kind of crueltie was ſpared, robbing, reauing, and forcible extortion was exerciſed on all ſides without hope of anie redreſſe or amendment. Whileſt the Scotiſhmen were thus at diuiſion amongeſt themſelues, renting and pulling in péeces their owne miſerable natiue countrie, Edward king of England being oppreſſed with inuaſion of Danes, was glad to buie peace at their hands, for himſelfe and his people, with right large ſummes of monie; but perceiuing that his enimies ceaſſed not dailie to ſpoile and rob his ſubiects, he purpoſed to trie what he might do by making them warre: and to make his part the ſtronger, he required Malcolme prince of Cumberland to aid him againſt the Danes, according to the couenant of the ancient league. Malcolme conſenting to K. Edwards requeſt, came with a mightie armie of Cumberland men to ſupport him: by reaſon whereof the Danes doubting to be ouermatched, after certeine light ſkirmiſhes, without anie great bloudſhed, condeſcended to haue peace, which was concluded with theſe conditions: that king Edward ſhould paie vnto the Danes a thouſand pounds of gold, for the which they ſhould content themſelues with thoſe lands which they had alredie in poſſeſſion, and to inuade no further vpon the Engliſhmen; but contrariwiſe to be readie to fight in their defenſe, if anie forreine enimie ſought to make anie warres vpon them. In the meane time, whileſt Malcolme was thus in England occupied in aid of king Edward againſt the Danes, king Conſtantine thought the time to ſerue verie well for his purpoſe, to reduce all thoſe regions of Scotland, which toke part with his aduerſarie (the foreſaid Malcolme) vnder his ſubiection.

King Edward, or rather Ethelred, purchaſed peace of the Danes.

Malcolme is readie to helpe king Edward againſt the Danes.

King Edward made peace with the Danes.

He aſſembled therefore twentie thouſand men, and comming into Louthian, heard how Kenneth the baſtard aforeſaid (being left by his brother Malcolme to reſiſt Conſtantines attempts) had got togither an huge armie of his brothers friends, and was come vnto Crawmond, where the riuer falleth into the Forth, three miles from Edenburgh, purpoſing there to abide his enimies, if they minded to aſſaile him. Conſtantine herevpon haſted thitherwards, and comming within ſight of his enimies, ſtreightwaies ioined battell with them; immediatlie wherewith there roſe ſuch an outragious tempeſt of wind, comming out of the eaſt, & driuing the ſand in the faces of Conſtantines men, that they were not able to ſée about them to make anie defenſe against these enimies that then preassed vpon them right eagerlie. By meanes whereof the discouenture lighted vpon Constantines side, though neither part had anie great cause to reioise: for in the hotest of the fight, Constantine and Kenneth chanced to incounter togither, and so fighting man to man, either slue other. Thus Constantine ended his life by dint of the enimies sword, in the third yeare of his reigne, 1002 & in the yeare after the incarnation 1002, & his bodie was buried in Colmekill amongst his predecessors.

Grime.

Then Grime nephue to king Duffe, hearing of the slaughter made betwixt king Constantine and Kenneth, gathered togither the residue of Constantines armie, being scattered abroad after the ouerthrow, supposing that by the death of Kenneth, the partie of his brother Malcolme was sore weakened, & thereupon he came vnto the abbeie of Scone, and there caused himselfe to be crowned king, as lawfull successor vnto Constantine, by force of the old laws and ordinances of the realme. And to establish himselfe the more firmelie in the state, he shewed great gentlenesse towards all them that were friends vnto Constantine, and bestowed vpon them manie bountious gifts. Neither was his liberalitie shut vp from other that had fauored Malcolme, for to the end he might allure them to beare him good will, he rewarded them highlie both in lands and treasure: but other of the same faction, whome he saw by no meanes could be wone, he caused them to be proclamed traitors, and confiscated their goods as rebels to his person, and enimies to the crowne.

Grime vsed liberalitie and gentlenesse towards Constantines friends.

Malcolme prince of Cumberland is moued against Grime.

Malcolme prince of Cumberland being moued with these things, & thinking it good counsell to preuent the purposes of his enimies, before they were ripe for execution, got him into Northumberland, and there gathering his friends togither, made himselfe strong, and so entered into Scotland, destroieng the countrie before him with fire and sword, and comming forward vntill he came to Lothian, where he was ioined with a great power of men, which came vnto him out of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmerland, and also out of Galloway, Carrike, Kile, Cuningham, Lennox, Argile, and the Ilands, which were all readie to reuolt from Grime, if they might find anie to take their part against him.

A good counsell.

Malcolme sendeth priuilie to the lords of Scotland.

Malcolme his promise vnto the Scots.

Malcolme his messengers are committed to prison.

Malcolme being offended therewith, gathered an armie.

Grime is of greater force than Malcolme.

Malcolme would not haue his people to vnderstand the trueth thereof.

His aduise auailed not.

Malcolme sent foorth secret messengers vnto those lords that tooke part with Grime, requiring them to remember their promised faith, giuen vnto his father king Kenneth, concerning the obseruance of the law established by their consent for the succession of their kings: which if they would doo in renouncing their obeisance vnto the vsurper Grime, he promised so to gouerne the realme with equall iustice, that no estate in reason should find cause to mislike with his doings. Manie of the nobles by meanes of this message reuolted from the said Grime soliciting their friends by earnest trauell to doo the like. But other & the greater number tooke those that brought the message, & sent them as prisoners vnto Grime, who presentlie committed them to prison.

Malcolme sore offended therewith, by counsell of his friends, assembled an armie to go against them, that (contrarie to the law of all nations, as he seemed to take the matter) had imprisoned his pursuants and messengers: but as he was marching forward on his purposed iournie, he heard by the way, how his aduersarie king Grime had gathered a farre greater power than he had with him, not onelie of all such of the Scotish nation inhabiting beyond the riuers of Forth and Clide, but of them also of the westerne Iles. Malcolme doubting least if the certeintie hereof were once bruted amongest his people, the fame would increase the terror more than needed; he gaue commandement therfore that no maner of wight should be suffered to come into his armie, vnlesse he were first brought to his presence. But this deuise nothing auailed him: for thereby that which he desired to be concealed and kept most secret, became the more manifest, by reason that such as had some inkeling of the matter, told it from one to another; making it much more than it was indeed. For there rose a murmuring amongest them, that there was such treason contriued, that if Malcolme with his armie went forward to ioine with his aduersaries, he should not be in danger onelie of them, which he knew to come against him in Grimes host; but also of no small number of them which were in his owne armie, who vpon the ioining had determined to turne their speare points against him in Grimes quarell.

A brute spred in Malcolme armie of treason.

This rumor passing from one to another, put the whole number in great feare. It was first raised by certeine merchantmen, of whome there was a great number in Malcolms host, hauing more skill in buieng and selling, than in anie warlike feats or enterprises. These at the first suing for licence to depart home, and could haue no grant, began to lament their miseries, in such dolefull wise, that all the campe was troubled with the noise; insomuch that euen the old men of warre, and diuerse of the capteins were not a little discomfited and amazed with such wailefull clamors. Malcolme being aduertised hereof, thought not good to match in battell against his fierce enimies with his people thus astonied through dread and terror, and therefore gaue licence to the most part of his host to depart for that time, and abood onelie with certeine bands of his most faithfull friends nere to the water of Forth, to stop his enimies from passing ouer that riuer.

Whilest the realme of Scotland was thus disquieted and troubled with ciuill discord, Fothadus the great bishop of Scotland, a man of right approued vertue and clemencie, sore lamenting to see his countrie thus diuided and rent as it were in peeces, got him into his pontificall vestures, with a multitude of other reuerend priests and ecclesiasticall ministers, in humble wise comming and presenting themselues before king Grime, who with great reuerence receiuing them, willed to vnderstand the cause of their comming. Then Fothadus answered, that he was come as the seruant of Christ, the author of all peace and concord, beseeching him by way of humble supplication to take ruth and pitie of the great trouble and miserie fallen to the realme, since the time he had taken the gouernance vpon him, the state of things being such, as if some redresse were not found in all spedie wise, the vtter ruine of the common-wealth must nedes insue, by reason of the sundrie debats and factions dailie rising among the people of all sorts and degrees, so that murthers, robberies, rapes, with all other kinds of iniuries & mischiefs were still put in practise without restreint or punishment, in such licentious sort that no man could assure himselfe of his owne: for whether it were within doores, or without, the robber was as redie to laie hands on it as the owner. Neither was there anie hope of reformation so long as the ciuill wars lasted. Therefore if it might stand with the pleasure of king Grime in releefe of the poore commons of Scotland, to condescend vnto some necessarie agreement with Malcolme, Fothadus offered to vndertake to conclude a peace betwixt them, in such wise as should in no maner of behalfe be preiudiciall to his honor and roiall maiestie.

Fothadus vndertaketh to conclude a peace betwixt the parties.

Grime moued with the words of the bishop (who most instantlie besought him, although the calamitie and great affliction of his people did but little mollifie his heart; yet in respect of his owne suertie, which might not continue if his people were once destroied, to remit part of his high displeasure) answered, that peace he could be contented to haue, so the same might be concluded with his honor saued: for suerlie wars he neuer desired but onelie in defense of

of his good title and right, which he had to the crowne deſcended vnto him by the old lawes and ancient ordinances of the realme, and therefore he purpoſed not to leaue the ſame with life, but to fight for it againſt Malcolme, and all his partakers, euen vnto death. But if it were ſo, that Malcolme would content himſelfe with the principalitie of Cumberland, and ſo thereupon breake vp his campe, and depart forth of the lands perteining vnto the crowne, he would gladlie come to a communication with him for peace; but if Malcolme refuſed thus to doo, he aſſured him that he would not leaue off to purſue him to the vttermoſt of his power, as his moſt cruell and fierce enimie.

Fothadus hauing heard Grimes words, beſought him to ſtaie a time, till he might go vnto Malcolme, to vnderſtand what his full mind was in this behalfe not doubting but to find him conformable vnto anie reaſonable motion, for relieuing of the poore afflicted ſtate of the land. Grime granting vnto this requeſt, Fothadus in like ſort and habit as he came vnto Grime, went vnto Malcolme, whome he found at Sterling; where comming before his preſence with a long oration, he greatlie bewailed the dolorous calamities of the Scotiſh common-wealth, into the which it was fallen through ciuill ſedition onlie, and herewith declared alſo by great likelihood of ſubſtantiall reaſons, how infortunat and miſerable the end ſhould be of the warres, if the ſame were purſued to the vttermoſt. His tale being throughlie heard and well digeſted, wrought ſo with Malcolme, that he promiſed to withdraw into Cumberland without anie further attempt, if Grime would in like caſe breake vp his campe, and agree to haue a truce for three moneths ſpace, in which meane time they might by certeine commiſſioners appointed and authoriſed thereto, talke and common for concluding of a finall peace and concord betwixt them.

Grime refuſed not this offer, and ſo thereupon licenced his people to depart to their homes, repairing himſelfe with certeine of his nobles into Angus vnto the caſtell of Forfair, there to take further aduiſe what was to be done touching the appointed communication of peace. But Fothadus would in no wiſe reſt, till the commiſſioners were met and aſſembled togither in communication at Scone, where within few daies after (chieflie through his earneſt diligence) peace was concluded with theſe conditions. Firſt, that Grime during his life time ſhould inioy the crowne, and after his deceaſſe the ſame to remaine to Malcolme & his heirs by lineall deſcent for euer, according to the ordinance & decree made & eſtabliſhed by K. Kenneth. And whoſoeuer ſhould go about either by word or deed to impeach or hinder the ſaid ordinance and decree, ſhould be reputed for a traitor to the common-wealth & realme. Furthermore all the lands lieng betwixt Louthian & Northumberland, and betwixt Clide and Weſtmerland, euen from the Almaine ſeas to the Iriſh ſeas, ſhould preſentlie remaine & be tranſported vnto the dominion & gouernement of Malcolme, with the which contenting himſelfe, during the naturall life of Grime, he ſhould continue in friendſhip with the ſaid Grime, & ſo in no wiſe ſtirre or moue anie warre or debate, either againſt him or anie of his friends: for if he did, and went about to breake anie of the articles of this peace, he ſhould not onelie loſe thoſe lands which he now held, but alſo be depriued of all the right, title, claime, and intereſt which either he or his poſteritie might make or pretend vnto the crowne at anie time hereafter.

When both the princes had bound themſelues by ſolemne othes to performe euerie point and points in theſe articles compriſed, they laid armor aſide, and began to take order for reforming of all miſdemeanours, which had happened within the land, by reaſon of the ciuill contention moued betwixt them and their partakers. Howbeit, commandement was giuen by either of theſe princes, that their ſubiects ſhould be ſtill in a readineſſe with armour and weapons (if need required) to defend themſelues againſt all ſudden inuaſions of their neighbours, whereby it may be gathered, that the one had the other ſtill in ſome miſtruſt, what countenance ſoeuer they ſhewed outwardlie. Yet notwithſtanding, for the ſpace of 8 yeares togither, the peace continued without breach, or anie notable trouble betwixt them.

But Grime at length of a chaſt & liberall prince, through long ſlouth and increaſe of riches, became a moſt couetous tyrant, and ſo corrupted in maners and conditions, that it paſſed the bounds of all reaſon and equitie: inſomuch that when he had put vnto death diuerſe of his nobles, to the end he might haue their lands and goods as forfeited by atteindor, he oppreſſed the people by continuall eractions alſo each day more than other. His ſubiects being thus brought into extreame miſerie through his wicked and vniuſt gouernement, not knowing where to ſeeke for redreſſe, ſaue onelie at the hands of almightie God, the puniſher of all ſinne, beſought him to haue pitie of their afflictions and miſeries, and to change the gouernment of the realme into ſome better ſtate. The lords alſo hauing great indignation of the trouble fallen to the realme, by the kings miſgouernance and auaricious crueltie, appointed a certeine number of gentlemen to go vnto him as ambaſſadors from them, to require him to put awaie from him ſuch naughtie perſons as by euill counſell had peruerted his mind, & moued him to doo things contrarie to his honor, and the wealth of his realme.

One of theſe ambaſſadors (to whome the charge was giuen) had the words in name of them all, who comming before the kings preſence, declared to him that they were ſent from the reſidue of the nobles and peeres of his realme, to admoniſh him of things perteining to the ſuertie of his eſtate, and common wealth of his dominions: which was, that whereas through perſuaſion of euill councellors he ſuffered manie enormities to be committed by his miniſters and officers againſt his ſubiects, to their vtter impoueriſhment and vndoing, the rebuke whereof did redound vnto his diſhonour; if it would pleaſe him to remoue out of his preſence and ſeruice all ſuch diſloiall perſons as ſought the hinderance of the common-wealth, he ſhould win therby the loue of all his liege ſubiects, which now could not but grudge and repine at this his gouernement, as men by the ſame brought into ſuch calamitie, that better it were for them in their iudgements to be dead than aliue, if reformation were not the ſooner had againſt ſuch extortions as his ſeruants and officers did dailie practiſe, and for the which no doubt he muſt needs anſwer, ſith the ſword was committed vnto him, not to inrich couetous perſons, nor to oppreſſe innocent and true dealing people, but contrarilie to puniſh and correct guiltie and vniuſt dealers.

When king Grime had heard what meſſage theſe ambaſſadors had brought, he anſwered to the ſame with fained words, and willed them vnder the pretext of courteſie to a banket, in purpoſe to haue put them all in priſon: but they being aduertiſed thereof got them in all haſt to their horſſes, and fled forthwith vnto Bertha, where the reſidue of the nobles at the ſame time were aſſembled. Grime hauing thus no regard to the wholeſome aduertiſement of his nobles, thought that all things would come forward with ſuch felicitie and hap as he wiſhed, not ceaſſing from raiſing new paiments and eractions ſtill of his ſubiects, till at length he was aduertiſed how his nobles had raiſed open warre againſt him, at which newes being ſore kindled with diſpleaſure, he got together a great number of men, and marched forth towards them that had ſo rebelled againſt him. Then followed more miſchæfe and trouble than euer had béene ſéene afore that time in Scotland: for by reaſon of this ciuill diſſention, caſtels were raced and ouerthrowne, townes burned vp, corne deſtroied, fields waſted, and the people ſlaine in all places, yea as well in churches as elſewhere.

Malcolme prince of Cumberland hearing of ſuch cruell wars as were thus raiſed in Scotland betwixt the king and the nobles of the realme, to the danger of the vtter ouerſion of the whole common-wealth, returned with all ſpéed forth of England (where he was with an armie as then in aid of king Egeldred againſt the Danes) into his owne countrie for defenſe of his ſubiects, if anie attempt ſhould happilie be made againſt them in that troubleſome ſeaſon.

Malcolme is required to receiue the Scotiſh eſtate.

Howbeit, he was no ſooner returned home, but the nobles of Louthian came vnto him, beſeeching him to take pitie vpon his miſerable and torne countrie, & to imploie his whole force to remoue away from the people ſuch imminent deſtruction as dailie haſted towards them, which to do they thought it was partlie euen his dutie, ſith God had beſtowed vpon him ſuch gifts, both of bodie, mind, and fortune, as moſt plentiouſlie appeared in him, not onelie for the weale of himſelfe, but alſo of his friends & countrie, & therefore his part was to ſhew his earneſt diligence to deliuer the common-wealth of ſuch tyrannie as was practiſed by the miſgouernement of Grime and his vnhappie councellors. Which being done, he might order all things as ſhould like him beſt.

Malcolme conſenteth to make warres againſt Grime.

Malcolme moued with theſe and the like perſuaſions of the Scotiſh lords, which dailie reſorted vnto him, reſolued with promiſe of their ſupport to leuie warre againſt Grime in this ſo neceſſarie a quarell, and ſo aſſembling a great puiſſance together, he did ſet forth towards his aduerſarie. By the way alſo there came ſtill vnto him great numbers of men from each ſide to aid him in this enterpriſe, offering by ſolemne othes to become his liegemen and ſubiects. Grime likewiſe being aduertiſed of thoſe newes, with all ſpéed got togther ſuch people as hee might aſſemble for the time, and comming forward with the ſame at the towne of Auchnabart, both the armies pitched downe their tents, the one faſt by the other, on the Aſcenſion daie. Here Grime ſuppoſing that he might take his enimies at ſome aduantage, if he came vpon them on the ſudden, for that being giuen to deuotion, they would looke for nothing leſſe than for battell on that daie, he got forth of his campe in the dawning of that morning, in purpoſe forthwith to aſſaile them.

Notwithſtanding, Malcolme being aduertiſed thereof, ſent vnto Grime, requeſting him to deſiſt from battell for reuerence of that bleſſed feaſt, but Grime would in no wiſe aſſent thereto, but néedes would come on without ſtop or ſtaie; wherevpon both the armies ruſhing togither met right fiercelie, ſo that in the beginning there was great ſlaughter made on both ſides, but within a while king Grimes ſide was put to the worſſe, and in the end clearelie diſcomfited. In the chaſe were manie ſlaine, but yet no ſuch number as ſo notable a victorie required. It is ſaid that Grime was taken aliue ſtanding at defenſe, & moſt fiercelie fighting, who being ſore wounded in the head, had both his eies put out, and afterwards continuing ſo in great miſerie and languor certeine daies, at length departed out of this life, in the 9 yéere of his reigne, and was buried in Colmekill, after the incarnation 1010 yéeres.

After this victorie thus obteined by Malcolme, he called ſuch noble men as were taken priſoners in this battell before him, vſing manie gentle words toward them, declaring that the right of the crowne apperteined vnto him, and that the warres which hée had made, were not attempted againſt the common wealth of the Scotiſh eſtate, but rather in reliefe thereof, to the end the people might be deliuered of the tyrannie exerciſed by Grime and his councellors. When he had thus vttered his mind vnto them, he appointed a publike aſſembly to be kept at Scone (for the election of a new king) there to be holden within 15 daies after. Whither the Scotiſh nobilitie comming togither at the time & place appointed, and conſenting to crowne Malcolme king, he vtterlie refuſed to receiue the crowne, except the law eſtabliſhed by his father Kenneth for the ſucceſſion thereof were firſt confirmed and approued, wherevpon the lords bound themſelues by ſolemne othes to performe the ſame, and neuer to breake and violate it in anie condition. His requeſt herein being granted with generall conſent both of the nobles and commons, the crowne was ſet vpon his head, he being placed in the chaire of marble, to the great reioiſing of all the people preſent.

Malcoln

When the ſolemnitie of this coronation was ended, he called before him againe all the lords and péeres of his realme; of the which, part had aided him in the laſt warres, and part had béene aſſiſtant vnto his aduerſarie Grime: and there vſed the matter in ſuch wiſe amongſt them, that he made them all friends, each one promiſing to other to forget all former offenſes, diſpleaſures, and controuerſies paſt, which he did to auoid all inteſtine trouble that might grow out of the rotes of ſuch rancor and malice, as in time of the ciuill diſcord had ſprong vp among them. Further, for the better adminiſtration of iuſtice in due forme and maner, he beſtowed publike offices vpon diſcréet perſons, ſkilfull in the laws and ordinances of the realme. Other offices perteining to the warres & defenſe of the realme, he committed to ſuch as were practiſed & trained in ſuch exercíſes, ſo that iuſtice was miniſtred on all ſides throughout the kingdome, with ſuch equitie and vprightneſſe, as had not bæne heard of in anie age before him. Whileſt the Scotiſh eſtate was gouerned in ſuch happie wiſe, by the prudent policie of king Malcolme; it chanced that Sueno king of Danes landed in England with a mightie naule, in purpoſe to reuenge the iniuries done before vnto his people by the Engliſhmen.

Malcolme agréeth the nobles of his realme.

Malcolmes wiſdome in ordeining officers.

Sueno king of Denmarke landed in England.

This Sueno (as appeareth more at large in the hiſtorie of Denmarke) firſt being an earneſt perſecutor of chriſtian men, and puniſhed by the diuine prouidence for his crueltie in that behalfe, ſhewed by ſundrie ouerthrowes receiued at the enimies hands, as in being thriſe taken priſoner, and in the end driuen and expelled out of his kingdome, he came into Scotland for reliefe and ſuccour, where through the wholeſome inſtruction of godlie and vertuous men, he renounced his heathenith beléefe, and receiued the chriſtian faith, and being baptiſed, at length was reſtored home to his kingdome. Shortlie after with a mightie armie of Danes, Gothes, Norwegians, and Swedeners, with other northerne people, he arriued (as is ſaid) in England, and chaſed king Egeldred into Northumberland, who there receiuing aid from the Scots, according to the league which latelie before he had contracted with them, he determined eftſones to trie the chance of battell with his enimies. Marching forwards therefore towards them, he came to the riuer of Diwſe, néere to the banks whereof, not farre from Yorke, he pitched downe downe his tents.

Sueno mesſage to the Scots.

Then Sueno not forgetfull of the benefits and pleaſures receiued but latelie at the Scotiſhmens hands, ſent an herald at armes vnto them, commanding them to depart their waies home, and to refuſe Egeldreds companie; either elſe to looke for moſt cruell battell at the hands of the Danes, the Norwegians, and others the people of Germanie, there readie bent to their deſtruction. Egeldred being aduertiſed that his aduerſaries meſſenger was thus come into his campe, cauſed him to be ſtaied and arreſted for a ſpie. And the ſame day he brought forth his battels readie ranged into the fields, to trie the matter by dint of ſword, if Sueno were ſo minded; who verie deſirous to accept the offer, brought forth alſo his people in perfect order and well arraied to fight, ſo that there was no ſtaie on either part, but that togither they flue moſt fiercelie, & in ſuch eger wiſe, that neither ſide had leaſure to beſtow their ſhot, but euen at the firſt they buckled togither at handblowes, continuing certeine houres with great & cruell ſlaughter, till at length the Engliſhmen were put to flight, leauing the Danes a verie déere and bloudie victorie. The murther alſo that day of the Scots was great, but yet nothing to the number of the Engliſhmen. Egeldred himſelfe with a few other, got a bote and paſſed ouer Duſe, ſo eſcaping out of the enimies hands, but the reſt were for the moſt part either taken or ſlaine.

The battell betwixt Egelred & Sueno

The Engliſh men put to flight by the Danes.

Egeldred eſcapeth by flight.

Thus Egeldred being vtterlie vanquiſhed and deſpairing of all recouerie, fled out of England ouer into Normandie, where he was verie friendlie receiued of Richard as then duke of Normandie, and afterwards purchaſed ſuch fauour there amongſt the Normans, that he maried the ladie Emme, daughter vnto the ſaid duke, and begot of hir two ſonnes, Alured and Edward, as in the Engliſh chronicles more at large it doth appéere. Sueno hauing thus ouercome his enimies, and now put in poſſeſſion of the whole realme of England, was in mind to haue deſtroied all the Engliſh generation, ſo to eſtabliſh the kingdome to him and his poſteritie for euer, without anie impeachment afterwards to be made by ſuch as ſhould ſuccéed of them that were then aliue.

Suenos cruell imaginations.

The nobles of England their humble petition vnto Sueno.

But the nobles of England aduertiſed of Suenos determination, came humblie before his preſence, & falling downe on their knées at his féet, beſought him in moſt pitifull wiſe to haue compaſſion on their miſerable eſtate, who in times paſt being a moſt puiſſant nation, both by ſea and land, were now ſatiſfied (if he would grant them life) to continue vnder what bondage and ſeruitude it ſhould ſtand with his pleaſure to preſcribe, for they deſired neither poſſeſſion of caſtels, townes, or other ſouereignties, but onelie to liue with their wiues and children vnder ſubiection within their owne natiue countrie, at the victors will and appointment.

Under what conditions Sueno licenced the Engliſhmen to liue in their owne countrie.

Sueno, albeit he was of nature verie cruell, yet he qualified his diſpleaſure by this humble ſubmiſſion of the Engliſh nobilitie; in ſuch ſort, that he vſed the victorie farre more gentlie, than at the firſt he had purpoſed, commanding that the whole Engliſh nation ſhould remaine in the countrie, but in ſuch wiſe, as by no meanes they ſhould preſume to beare anie armor or weapon, but to applie themſelues vnto huſbandrie, and other ſeruile occupations vnder the gouernement of the Danes, vnto whom they ſhould reſigne and deliuer all their caſtels, forts, and ſtrong holds: and taking an oth to be true liege men vnto Sueno, as their ſouereigne lord and king; they ſhould bring in (to be deliuered vnto his vſe) all their weapons and armor, with other munition for the warres, alſo all their gold and ſiluer, aſwell in plate as coine. If anie of the Engliſhmen refuſed thus to dow, proclamation was made that he ſhould immediatlie loſe his life as a rebell and a diſobedient perſon. Theſe conditions were hard, and hardlie vrged. The Engliſhmen were brought vnto ſuch an extremitie, that they were faine to accept theſe conditions of peace, for other meane to auoid preſent death they knew none. And thus was the dominion of England conquered by the Danes, after the Saxons had reigned in the ſame 564 yéeres.

529. H.B.

The miſerie of the Engliſhmen vnder the bondage of the Danes.

Such tyrannie alſo after this was vſed by the Danes, that none of the Engliſh nation was admitted to anie office or rule within the realme, either ſpirituall or temporall, but were vtterlie remoued from the ſame, and ſome of them caſt in priſon and dailie put in hazard of their liues. Finallie, the Engliſhmen were brought into ſuch miſerable thraldome, that euerie houſholder within the realme was conſtreined to receiue and find at his owne proper coſts and charges, one Dane, who ſhould continuallie giue good watch what was ſaid or done in the houſe, and to aduertiſe the king thereof, for doubt of conſpiracies or treaſons to be contriued and practiſed againſt his perſon and roiall eſtate. This Dane by the good man of the houſe and his familie, for honor ſake, was called lord Dane, which word was afterwards turned to a name of reproch, as where anie idle perſon liued loitering, without the vſe of ſome honeſt exerciſe to get his liuing withall, the people were and yet are accuſtomed to call him a lordaine.

The name of lordain how it came vp.

¶ Thus farre out of Hector Boetius we haue ſhewed of Suenos doings in England, the which although it agrée not in all points with our Engliſh hiſtories, yet ſith the hiſtorie of Scotland in this place ſéemeth partlie to hang thereon, we haue thought good to ſet it downe as we find it in the ſame Boetius: but aduertiſing the reader withall, that if our hiſtories be true, this which followeth touching Suenos inuading of Scotland, chanced before that Egeldred, whome the Scotiſh writers name Eldred, was driuen to flée into Normandie. For when that Sueno laſtlie returned into England, and conſtreined Egeldred ſo to forſake the land, he liued not long after but departed this life about Candelmas, in the yéere 1014 (as in the Engliſh hiſtories ye may read more at large) not hauing time to make anie ſuch iournie into Scotland: ſo that it may be thought, if he did enterpriſe anie ſuch exploit there, it was before this his laſt arriuall in England.

Sueno landed héere this laſt time of his comming forth of Denmarke into England in Julie, in the yéere 1013, & departed this life in the beginning of Februarie, in the yéere 1014

But now to proceed according to that which we find in the foreſaid Boetius. Sueno hauing ſpoiled the Engliſhmen of their liberties (in manner before remembred, or rather brought them to become tributaries vnto him, as at the firſt time of his arriuall here he did in deed), he thought it neceſſarie, for the more ſuertie of his eſtate in England, to conclude ſome peace or league with his neighbours the Normans, Britains, & Scots, vnder condition that they ſhould not ſupport anie Engliſhman againſt him. But forſomuch as he could not compaſſe his intention héerein, he furniſhed all the caſtels and fortreſſes on the ſea-coaſts, ouer againſt Normandie, with men, munition, and vittels, to reſiſt all ſudden inuaſions that might be attempted on that ſide. And on the other part towards the north, he made all the prouiſion he could deuiſe to make mortall wars vpon the Scots: and the more to annoie his enimies, he ſent commandement vnto Olauus his lieutenant in Norwaie, and to Onetus his deputie in Denmarke, to come with all the power they might leauie into Scotland, to make warres on his enimies there.

their wiues, children, and goods (such as they could conueie awaie with them) into places where they thought to remaine most out of danger. But the Danes, after their manner, burne and spoile all before them, aswell churches and chapels, as other buildings and edifices. Such of the people as could not flee in time, but by chance fell into their hands, were slaine without all mercie. Also all the strengths and holds in the countrie were taken by the Danes, three castels onelie excepted: that is to say, Elgin, Fozes, and Narne, which the Danes named afterwards Burg, and for that they trusted (when the same was wone) the other two would yeeld without anie further defense, they first laid siege vnto this castell of Narne, inforsing themselues with all their power to win it: but in the meane time, they were informed how Malcolme the Scotish king was come within fiue miles of them with all the forces of his realme to giue them battell.

The cruelties of the Danes.

The castell of Narne besieged.

Incontinentlie herevpon they raised their siege, and hasted forth to meet him, with no lesse courage than if victorie were alreadie present in their hands. Shortlie after, there came vnto them heralds also from Malcolme, to vnderstand whie they had thus inuaded his realme with open and most cruell warre, hauing no occasion giuen by him or his subiects so to do: who scarselie had done their message, but that they were slaine forthwith by cruell outrage of the Danes. Malcolme being sore moued to vnderstand the law obserued by all nations for the safetie of messengers to be thus violated by the enimies, kept on his iournie with the more fierce courage, till he came to a medow a little beside Killos, where he incamped for that night. Great noise and clamour was heard throughout the armie, euerie man being desirous of battell, to reuenge the iniuries done by the Danes against their friends and countriemen: notwithstanding on the morrow, when they saw their enimies in farre greater number, and in better order than euer had béene séene by anie of them before that time, their hart began to wax faint, hauing greater care which waie to saue their owne liues, than to giue the onset vpon their enimies.

Malcolme sendeth ambassadors to the Danes.

The Danes slea the ambassadors.

The Scots through feare are astonied.

Malcolms words to his nobles.

Malcolme perceiuing such dread to be entred into the harts of his people, that they were now more like to run awaie than to fight, if he should bring them forth to battell, got him to a little hill, and calling his nobles about him, he declared vnto them how he could not but detest their great cowardise, that were thus astonied at the first sight of their enimies, without further triall of their forces. ¶ At home (said he) ye are most hardie and valiant, where no danger appéreth. What rebuke then is it vnto you, to be thus faint harted (now that ye are come where valiancie should be shewed) in degenerating so far from your worthie fathers and noble progenitors, the which at Loncart vnder the conduct of my father Kenneth, obteined so famous a victorie of the selfe same nation, whose furious puissance ye séeme now so much to feare? There hath béene triall made in battell with this enimie in our time, both within the bounds of Scotland, and also of England, to the great honor and renowme of our elders. What discomfitures the Danes haue receiued are yet fresh in memorie, so manie of them losing their liues amongst vs, that Albion may well be reckoned the sepulture of Danes; as some of you can well record by your owne remembrance, and other haue heard by report of their forefathers and ancestors. Ye ought then (said he) to be of good courage, rather than to faint now at need, considering ye haue to do with those enimies, who are but the remnant of the other, which before haue béene vanquished and ouerthrowne by Scotishmen, both at Loncart, and in diuerse other places; yea and besides that, such as moouing warres now at this present without iust occasion, haue violated the lawes both of God and man, deseruing thereby iust vengeance at Gods hands, the punisher of all such vniust offendors. There is great hope therefore of victorie (said he) left vnto all such as fight against these enimies, if we take manlie harts vnto vs, and shew our selues in valiant constancie like to our elders, whereby it shall then appéere what outragious follie remained in the Danes, to inuade vs without occasion of iniuries preceding. Therefore if ye haue not more regard to the safetie of your fraile bodies, which must needes at length perish, than to the defense and preseruation of your common countries; why passe ye not forward, sith there is now no place nor time to take longer aduise in the matter, as ye may well vnderstand by the presence of the enimie readie to ioine?

Loncart.

Albion the sepulture of Danes.

The nobles moued with these words of their prince, began boldlie to exhort their people to battell. Incontinentlie herevpon rose such noise and raging furie through the armie, that without measuring either their owne forces or their enimies, they rush forth vpon them without anie order or good araie. Olauus & Onetus beholding the Scots to come thus furiouslie against them, boldlie incountred them with arraied battels. Herevpon insued a verie terrible fight, with great manhood shewd on both sides, nothing being let passe that might apperteine to worthie capteins: the Scots inforcing themselues to defend their countrie and ancient liberties on the one side, and the Danes doing their best indeuour by valiant hardinesse to saue their liues and honors on the other. At length, after huge murther & slaughter made on both parts, the Scots were put to flight, Malcolme was sore wounded, & had his helmet so fast beaten to his head, that it might not well be got off, yet was he conueied out of the field in manner for dead, and kept secret in a wood, till he was somewhat amended, and then got him into places out of danger. The Danes hauing got this victorie, and gathered the spoile of the field, returned to besiege eftsones the castell of Narne, with more force and violence than before.

The Scots without order rush forth to battell.

The Scots put to flight. Malcolme is wounded.

This castell in those daies was inclosed on each side with the sea, hauing one narrow passage as an entrie vnto it, made by craft of man in manner of a bridge. Those that were within it, hauing knowledge of the ouerthrow and losse of the field, rendered the fortresse, on condition, that leauing all their armor, weapon, and other munitions behind them, they might depart with their liues and other goods saued. Neuertheless the Danes, contrarie to their faith giuen, being once entred the castell, hanged all those which they found within it ouer the wals, in most despitefull manner. Thus was Narne wone by the Danes, the strongest hold within Murrey land, and so garnished with men, munition, and vittels, that it was thought impregnable. Then those souldiers which kept Elgin and Fozes, hearing what cruelties the Danes had thus vsed, fled out of those castels, and left them void without anie person to defend them. The Danes reioising at this good fortune, trusted to establish themselues sure seates in Murrey land, and therevpon sent backe their ships into Norwaie and Denmarke, to fetch from thence their wiues and children. In the meane time they constreined such Scots as they had laid hands on, to reape and inne the corne growing abroad in the fields, vnto their vse and commoditie.

ors, and came into the land of Angus, where at Marthlake a battell was fought betweene them and the Scots, with great slaughter on both parts, but in the end the Danes were put to flight, manie of them being slaine, and but few taken. Olaus beholding the discomfiture of his people, with his companions and chiefe men of warre, fled into Murrey land, and there sate downe about him.

The Scots and Danes afraid of another.

The next day, as he was minding to have pursued the residue of his valiant captens that had left the battell, and the spoile of the field amongst his men, and dealing from further pursute of the Danes at that time with his Angus, where he remained the residue of the verie winter, he called a counsell with his nobles touching the publike affaires of the realme, and how to recouer his countrie of Murrey land out of the enimies hands. King Suend hearing in the meane time how luckie successe his people had sped this in Scotland at the battell of Marthlake, in reuenge thereof determined to inuade the Scots with two mightie armies, the one to be rigged in England, and to come forth of the riuer of Thames, and the other to be sent from Denmarke, one Camus a Dane, verie expert in warlike knowledge, being appointed to be generall of all the men of warre that should come from both those parties.

Suend prepareth a new armie to inuade Scotland.

Camus appointed captaine generall of the Danes.

The yeare next insuing, both these fleets according to commandement and order giuen, arrived and met together within the mouth of the Forth, neere to saint Ebbes head. Here Camus going about to land his men, was kept off by the stout resistance of the Scots, there assembled for the same intent. Camus then plucking vp the sailes, directed his course vnto the Ile of Sketh, where riding at anchor for the space of one moneth, and abiding for some prosperous wind, at length when the same came once about, he passed from thence vnto the Redbraes, called in Latine Rubrum promontorium, & there landed his whole armie, before the countrie could be gathered to resist him. Camus being once landed, got him to the next hill, and beholding the ruine of the towne of Montros, which a few yeares before had beene destroied by the Danes, he reioised not a little, for that his chance was to come on land in the selfe same place, where the Danes had earst vanquished their enimies, hoping of like lucke in this his enterprise and present expedition.

After this, he tooke his iournie through Angus, sparing no maner of crueltie that might be deuised: cities, townes, villages, and churches, with all maner of other buildings publike and priuat were consumed with fire. At his comming to Brechine, for that the castell there in those daies was of such strength, that it might not be hastilie woone, he caused the towne and church being right faire and sumptuouslie built in honor of the Trinitie (to whom it was dedicated) to be spoiled, & so raced to the earth, that one stone was not left standing vpon an other. With these and the semblable cruelties, Camus raging both against God and man, was finallie aduertised that king Malcolme was come to Dundee with all the power of Scotland. Then suddenlie he tooke the nert way towards the sea side, comming the nert day following vnto a village called Balbrd, where he pitched downe his tents. The same day, king Malcolme making all haste possible to succour his subiects, and preserue the countrie from the cruell outrage of the Danes, came to the towne of Barre two little miles from the place, where his enimies were incamped. In the morning he drew into the field, in purpose to giue them open battell.

lage got by theuerie, and not by anie iust warres: enimies not onelie to the christian faith, but also to all innocent people, whome they sought vniustlie to inuade, without hauing occasion so to do, saue onelie vpon an iniurious meaning to liue by spoile of other mens goods, wherein they haue no maner of propertie. He willed them therfore to remember how they were come thus against those enimies in defense of their natiue countrie, appointed vndoubtedlie by God to reuenge the cruell iniuries done by the Danes against his name, and people that professed the same. They ought not then to measure force in number of souldiers, but rather in manhod and valiancie of heart. Camus likewise exhorted his people, not vsing manie words, but yet pithie, desiring them to remember how it behoued them either to win immortall fame by victorie, either else to die with miserie in an vncouth land, by the hand of their most fierce and cruell enimies.

Herewith Malcolme imbattelling his people, brought them forth stronglie ranged in good order to incounter the Danes, which likewise approched towards him in good arraie of battell. His heart was filled the more with hope of victorie, for that he had tried sundrie times before the force of the enimies in diuers conflicts and encounters. For such is the nature of noble and valiant stomachs, the more experience they haue in honorable enterprises, the more are they kindled in desire to shew their powers in famous acts and worthie attempts. The armies here vpon on both sides, fiercelie rushing togither, began a battell right cruell & terrible, continuing certeine houres with such bloudshed, that the riuer of Lochtæ ran with a purple hue downe into the Almaine seas. The fields also where they fought, though they were full of sand (as the nature of the soile giueth) yet were they made moist by the abundance of blond spilled in the same. Manie there were so earnestlie bent to be reuenged on the enimie, that after they had their deaths wound, they would run themselues forward vpon their aduersaries weapon, till they might close with him, inforcing their vttermost powers to dispatch him also; so that diuers were séene to fall to the ground togither fast grasping one another, and so immediatlie both of them to die withall: such burning hatred kindled their harts, that thus were they wholie set on reuenge. At length yet the honor of the field remained with Malcolme.

Camus peceiuing the discomfiture to light on his side, with a small companie about him thought to haue escaped by flight vnto the next mounteins, but being pursued of his enimies, he was slaine by them yer he was got two miles from the place of the battell. The place where he was slaine, is named after him vnto this day, and called Camestone, where is an obeliske set vp in memorie of the thing, with his picture grauen therein, and likewise of those that slue him. The principall slear of Camus was one Keith, a yong gentleman of right hardie courage, whose seruice in the battell was verie notable, in recompense whereof he was rewarded by king Malcolme, with sundrie lands and faire possessions in Louthian. His familie (saith Hector Boetius) hath and doth continue in great honor amongest Scotishmen euen vnto this day, and is decorated with the office of the marshalship of Scotland, to the high renowme and fame thereof, amongest the chiefest péers of the realme.

An other companie of the Danes flieng from this ouerthrow were slaine at Abirlemnon, not past foure miles from Brechin, where is set vp a great stone or obeliske, grauen with certeine characters or letters, to aduertise them that passe that waies forth, of this slaughter of Danes there made by our worthie elders. The residue of the Danes that escaped with life from the field, hauing certeine Scotishmen to their guides corrupted with monie fled to their ships, declaring to their fellowes what mishap had fortuned. King Malcolme after he obteined this famous victorie (as before is said) at Barre, he caused the spoile of the field to be diuided amongest his souldiers, according to the laws of armes; and then caused the dead bodies of the Danes to be buried in the place where the field had béene fought, and the bodies of the Scotishmen which were found dead were conueied vnto the places of christian buriall, and there buried with funerall obsequies in sundrie churches and churchyards. There are séene manie bones of the Danes in those places where they were buried, there lieng bare aboue ground euen vnto this day, the sands (as it often chanceth) being blowen from them. The other Danes, which escaped to their ships, pulled vp sailes to haue passed into Murrey land vnto Olaus, but remaining on the seas the space of foure daies togither, tossed to and fro by contrarie winds, at length by a streinable east wind they were driuen vpon the coast of Buchquhan, and through want of conuenable harbrough were in présent danger to haue béene cast away. At length, after they had ridden at anchor in the Firth there, to their great displeasure a long space, and finding no prosperous winds to depart from the shore, for that their vittels began to faile them, they set fiue hundered of their best and lustiest souldiers on land, to fetch in some bootie or preie of cattell, therewith to relieue their hunger and famine. They that were thus sent forth, being perfectlie appointed with armour and weapon, ranged abroad till they had got togither a great number of beasts, with the which drawing towards their ships, they were incountred by the way by Warnachus the thane of Buchquhane accompanied with the power of that countrie, whose force when they saw how they were not well able to resist without some aduantage of place, they got them vp into an high crag, where, with tumbling downe stones vpon the Scotishmen as they mounted vp towards them, they caused them somewhat to staie; but at length through the earnest exhortation of Warnachus, the Scots (as people inflamed with wood desire to be reuenged) mounted the hill in despight of their enimies, though diuers of them were slaine in that assault. Those which wan the height of the crag vpon the Danes, made such a cruell battell with them, that there was not one Dane that escaped their hands.

Bones of Danes.

Warnachus thane of Buchquhan

This conflict was fought nére vnto Gemmer a village or towne in Buchquhane, where, in memorie thereof, lie manie great bones of the Danes to be séene yet euen vnto these daies. It should appeare by the same bones, that men in former time were of more huge growth and stature, than they be at this présent. The other Danes which were on ship bord, vnderstanding what had happened to their fellowes (because they returned not againe to the ships) so soone as the wind came about for their purpose, hoised vp sailes, and toke their course forthright towards Murrey land. In the meane time king Sueno hearing of these ouerthrowes, which his people had in such sort receiued at the Scotishmens hands, as a prince of a right haughtie courage, not lightlie ouercome with anie aduerse fortune, made preparation in all spédie wise to be reuenged, appointing his brother Canute, as then hauing the administration of Denmarke; to come from thence with a new fléete and armie against the Scots. It is said, that this Canute, according to order prescribed him by his brother Sueno, landed first in Buchquhane, and destroied destroied a great part of that countrie by fire and sword, in reuenge of the slaughter of his countriemen the Danes, which had beene there made latelie before.

King Malcolmes determination.

Malcolme sore kindled in wrath by these iniuries, though through continuance of the wars his power was greatlie decaied, yet did he assemble an armie with all speed he could deuise, and marched with the same towards the Danes, in purpose to staie them with often skirmishes and light incounters, but in no wise to ieopard with them in anie pitcht field or generall battell, for feare least if he had the ouerthrow, he should not be able to furnish a new power for defense of his countrie, against the rage of the enimies. For the space therefore of fiftéene daies togither, there was often skirmishing betwixt the parties. The which terme being expired, the Scots beholding so huge murder of their countriemen and friends, with the spoile of the fields, and destruction of the townes and villages, burning and blasing on each side before their faces, they come to king Malcolme, and desired him that he would grant them licence to fight with their enimies, protesting plainelie, that if he would not consent thereto, they would giue battell at their owne choise.

The Scotishmens request vnto their king for licence to fight.

Malcolme perceiuing the earnest minds of his people to incounter their enimies in plaine field, and that he might no longer protract the time, he granted their petition, and therewith beseeching them to remember their honors and dueties: incontinentlie the onset was giuen with great hatred and malice on either part, so that most egerlie continuing in fight a long time, they inforced themselues to rid each other out of life: so that all the nobles well neere on both sides were slaine, the name of victorie rather than the victorie it selfe remaining with the Scots, who were so feeble and faint with long fight & slaughter, that in the end of the battell they were not able to pursue those few of the Danes, which escaping with life fled faintlie out of the field. And so for that night, which followed the day of this bloudie battell, they lodged heere and there in seuerall places, at aduenture as well as they might.

The onset is giuen.

The Scots wan the name of victorie, rather than victorie it selfe.

On the morow after, when it was vnderstood on both parties, what losse they had sustained, their minds were conuerted rather to peace than to renew battell, bicause they were not of power longer to mainteine it. Whereupon by mediation of such as toke vpon them to treat a peace, the same was concluded with these articles. First, that the Danes should depart out of Murrey land, Buchquhan, and all other the bounds of Scotland. That the warres should clearelie ceasse betwixt the Danes and Scotishmen, during the naturall liues of Sueno and Malcolme, or either of them. That neither of those two nations should aid or in anie wise support the others enimies. That the field where the last battell was fought, should be hallowed for christian buriall, within the which the Danes that were slaine in the same battell should be buried, and a church to be built there, and lands appointed forth for the maintenance of priests, to celebrate there according to the order of the christian religion, then vsed by both the people: for the Danes latelie before that season had also receiued the faith. This peace being ratified by the solemne othes of both the kings, Sueno and Malcolme, Canute with his Danes resigning vp the possession of such holds and places as they held in Murrey land, Buchquhan, or else where within anie part of the Scotish dominions, got him to his fleet, and departed with the same home into Denmarke.

Peace concluded for want of power to mainteine battell.

Canute returneth into Denmarke.

King Malcolme hauing thus restored his countrie vnto ioifull peace, thought nothing so good as to performe the articles of the agréement accorded betwixt him and the Danes, and therefore caused a church to be builded in the place appointed, dedicating the same in honor of saint Olaaus patrone of Denmarke and Norwaie, to signifie vnto such as came after, that sundrie nobles of the Danes laie buried in that church. In memorie hereof, the lands that were giuen to the same church, are called euen yet vnto these daies Crowdan, which signifieth as much as if ye should say, The slaughter of Danes. The church which was first builded there, chancing as often happeneth in those parties, to be ouercast with sands, an other was erected in place not farre off, hauing a more commodious site. Sundrie of the bones of them that were buried in this place, being left bare by reason that the sands were blowne away besides them, Hector Boetius (the writer of the Scotish chronicle) beheld in the yeare 1521, which séemed more like vnto giants bones, than to men of common stature (as he auoucheth) whereby it should appeare, that men in old time were of much greater stature and quantitie of bodie, than anie that are to be found in these our daies.

Malcolme being thus deliuered of his enimies the Danes, caused publike praiers generallie to be made throughout the realme, in rendring thanks to almightie God, that it had pleased him to deliuer his people from the troubles of warre. He toke order also, that churches should be repared, which by the enimies in time of the warres had béene destroied. And further, he caused the administration of the lawes and wholsome ordinances of the realme to be vsed and put in practise, according to the due forme of the same, which manie yéeres before could haue no place, by reason of the warres. He caused an assemblie of all the estates of his realme to be called at Bertha castell, in those daies standing not farre from the place where the towne of Perth now standeth. In which conuention were manie things enacted, both for the setting forth of Gods honor, and the weale of the realme, whereby Malcolme wan much praise amongst his subiects, to the eternall memorie of his name.

A parlement at Bertha.

After this, supposing it most honorable to aduance the bloud of such as had serued well in the last warres, or had their fathers or other friends slaine in the same, he called a parlement at Scone, in the which, causing partition to be made of the realme, by diuiding it into baronies, he bestowed it amongest the nobles, according to the qualitie of euerie one his merits, reseruing in maner nothing to the maintenance of the crowne, common entries onelie excepted, with the mounteine wherin the marble chaire stood, and a few other possessions which he purposed to giue vnto churches and chapels. The nobles on the other part, to the end the king might haue sufficient wherewith to mainteine his roiall estate, granted vnto him and his successors for euer the cuskodie and wardship of their heires, if they chanced to die leauing them vnder the age of 21 yéeres: and in the meane time till the same heires came to the said age, they agréed that the king and his successors should inioy the vse and profits of their lands, whether they were men or women, and when they came to the age of 21 yéeres, that then they should enter into the possession of their lands, yéelding vnto him or his successors one yéeres rent in name of a relefe: and if they chanced not to be married before their fathers decease, then also should they marrie at the kings appointment, or else compound with him for the same.

Thus ended the parlement for that season, with great ioy and comfort on each hand, for that the king had shewed such liberall bountiousnesse towards his barons, and they no lesse mindfull of their duties had declared such beneuolent hearts, as appeared in that their free and large gift granted in forme and maner as before is expressed. Neither did Malcolme forget the vow which he made at Murthlake, when he was in danger to haue receiued the ouerthrow at the hand of the Danes. For according to the same vow, he caused a church to be built in the same place, erecting a bishops see there, and indowed it with the lands & possessions of these three places, Murthlake, Cleometh, and Dunmeth, with all ecclesiasticall iurisdictions and tithes apperteining thereto. The bishops that sat in this see were called the bishops of Murthlake, till the daies of king Dauid the first, who changing the name, caused them to be called the bishops of Abirden, augmenting the see with sundrie faire reuenues to the better maintenance thereof.

The see of Murthlake, otherwise Aberden.

Malcolme thus hauing purchased rest from further troubles of warre, gouerned the realme a certeine time after in good order of iustice, and caused a booke to bee set forth, called Regia maiestas, conteining the lawes and ordinances wherby the realme should be gouerned: and assigning forth in the same what fees also should be giuen vnto the chancellor, secretarie, constable, marshall, chamberleine, iustice, treasuror, register, comptroller, and other the officers of his house. Such princelie doings and noble vertues were found in this Malcolme for a season, that if the same had continued with him in his latter age, there had neuer reigned ante king in Scotland, that might haue bene thought to haue passed him in worthie fame: neuertheles his excellent qualities were stained at length by that reprochfull vice of vile auarice. For as it oftentimes happeneth, couetousnesse and age laid hold on him both at once. He then began to repent in that he had beene so liberall in giuing away his lands to his barons; & to recouer the same againe, he surmized feigned matter by vntrue suggestions against diuerse of the chiefest nobles, putting some to death, & banishing other, that he might by this meanes inioy their lands and goods as confiscate to the crowne for their supposed offenses.

The nobles hauing great indignation at such crueltie vsed by the king against them and their linage, and that vpon no iust causes, but onelie vpon forged deuises, they conspired in sundrie meetings secretlie appointed amongst them, to find some meanes to dispatch him out of life. At length he chanced to haue some inkling whereabout they went, & doubting to fall into their hands, fled for safegard of his life vnto Glammis, where diuerse of the conspirators were brought into his lodging, by some of his owne household seruants, and there slue him in reuenge of their friends, whome he before had wrongfullie put to death. These murtherers with their complices incontinentlie fled with all speed possible to auoid further danger for this their act: but missing their way (for the ground was quite couered as then with snow) they finallie came to the loch of Forfair, which was the same time frozen ouer. They therefore thinking to passe ouer it, when they came into the midst, the ise brake vnder them, so that sinking in, they were finallie drowned. Howbeit their bodies were afterwards drawne forth of the loch with drags, and dismembred, and their heads and quarters were sent to diuerse townes of the realme, and there hong vp for a signification of their wicked treason. This was the end of king Malcolme in the 32 yeere of his reigne, if ye reckon from the death of Constantine, or 25 after the death of Grime, and after the incarnation of our Sauiour 1034 yeeres. He was buried in Colmekill with his ancestors.

Strange sights.

In this season was seene manie wonders and strange sights in Albion. On Christmas daie there was an earthquake, and a great rift of the earth made therewith in the midst of Striueling towne, out of the which issued such an abundant streame of water, that it bare away the next wood that was adioining to the riuer of Forth. In the summer the sea rose higher, & flowed further into the land, than euer it had beene seene at anie other time. On Midsummer daie, which is the feast of saint Iohn Baptist, there was such a vehement frost, that the corne and other fruits of the earth were blasted and killed, so that thereupon followed a great dearth in all the countrie.

Duncane.

After Malcolme succeeded his nephue Duncane the sonne of his daughter Beatrice: for Malcolme had two daughters, the one which was this Beatrice, being giuen in mariage vnto one Albanath Crinen, a man of great nobilitie, and thane of the Iles and west parts of Scotland, bare of that mariage the foresaid Duncane; the other called Doada, was maried vnto Sinell the thane of Glammis, by whom she had issue one Makbeth a valiant gentleman, and one that if he had not beene somewhat cruell of nature, might haue beene thought most worthie the gouernement of a realme. On the other part, Duncane was so soft and gentle of nature, that the people wished the inclinations and maners of these two cousins to haue beene so tempered and interchangeablie bestowed betwixt them, that where the one had too much of clemencie, and the other of crueltie, the meane vertue betwixt these two extremities might haue reigned by indifferent partition in them both, so should Duncane haue proued a worthie king, and Makbeth an excellent capteine. The beginning of Duncans reigne was verie quiet and peaceable, without anie notable trouble; but after it was perceiued how negligent he was in punishing offendors, manie misruled persons tooke occasion thereof to trouble the peace and quiet state of the common-wealth, by seditious commotions which first had their beginnings in this wise.

Duncan of too soft a nature.

Banquho the thane of Lochquhaber, of whom the house of the Stewards is descended, the which by order of linage hath now for a long time inioied the crowne of Scotland, euen till these our daies, as he gathered the finances due to the king, and further punished somewhat sharpelie such as were notorious offendors, being assailed by a number of rebels inhabiting in that countrie, and spoiled of the monie and all other things, had much a do to get awaie with life, after he had receiued sundrie grieuous wounds amongst them. Yet escaping their hands, after hee was somewhat recouered of his hurts, and was able to ride, he repaired to the court, where making his complaint to the king in most earnest wise, he purchased at length that the offendors were sent for by a sergeant at armes, to appeare to make answer vnto such matters as should be laid to their charge: but they augmenting their mischiefous act with a more wicked deed, after they had misused the messenger with sundrie kinds of reproches, they finallie slue him also.

Then doubting not but for such contemptuous demeanor against the kings regall authoritie, they should be inuaded with all the power the king could make, Makdowald one of great estimation among them, making first a confederacie with his nerest friends and kinsmen, tooke vpon him to be chiefe capteine of all such rebels as would stand against the king, in maintenance of their grieuous offenses latelie committed against him. Manie slanderous words also, and railing tants this Makdowald vttered against his prince, calling him a faint-hearted milksop, more meet to gouerne a sort of idle monks in some cloister, than to haue the rule of such valiant and hardie men of warre as the Scots were. He vſed alſo ſuch ſubtill perſuaſions and forged allurements, that in a ſmall time he had gotten togither a mightie power of men: for out of the weſterne Iles there came vnto him a great multitude of people, offering themſelues to aſſiſt him in that rebellious quarell, and out of Ireland in hope of the ſpoile came no ſmall number of Kernes and Galloglaſſes, offering gladlie to ſerue vnder him, whither it ſhould pleaſe him to lead them.

Makdowald diſcomfiteth the kings power.

Makdowald thus hauing a mightie puiſſance about him, incountered with ſuch of the kings people as were ſent againſt him into Lochquhaber, and diſcomfiting them, by mere force take their capteine Malcolme, and after the end of the battell ſmote off his head. This ouerthrow being notified to the king, did put him in wonderfull feare, by reaſon of his ſmall ſkill in warlike affaires. Calling therefore his nobles to a councell, he aſked of them their beſt aduiſe for the ſubduing of Makdowald & other the rebels. Here, in ſundrie heads (as euer it happeneth) were ſundrie opinions, which they vttered according to euerie man his ſkill. At length Makbeth ſpeaking much againſt the kings ſoftnes, and ouermuch ſlacknelſe in puniſhing offendors, whereby they had ſuch time to aſſemble togither, he promiſed notwithſtanding, if the charge were committed vnto him and vnto Banquho, ſo to order the matter, that the rebels ſhould be ſhortly vanquiſhed & quite put downe, and that not ſo much as one of them ſhould be found to make reſiſtance within the countrie.

Makbeths offer.

And euen ſo it came to paſſe: for being ſent forth with a new power, at his entring into Lochquhaber, the fame of his comming put the enimies in ſuch feare, that a great number of them ſtale ſecretlie awaie from their capteine Makdowald, who neuertheleſſe inforced thereto, gaue battell vnto Makbeth, with the reſidue which remained with him: but being ouercome, and fleeing for refuge into a caſtell (within the which his wife & children were incloſed) at length when he ſaw how he could neither defend the hold anie longer againſt his enimies, nor yet vpon ſurrender be ſuffered to depart with life ſaued, hee firſt ſlue his wife and children, and laſtlie himſelfe, leaſt if he had yeelded ſimplie, he ſhould haue beene executed in moſt cruell wiſe for an example to other. Makbeth entring into the caſtell by the gates, as then ſet open, found the carcaſſe of Makdowald lieng dead there amongſt the reſidue of the ſlaine bodies, which when he beheld, remitting no peece of his cruell nature with that pitifull ſight, he cauſed the head to be cut off, and ſet vpon a poles end, and ſo ſent it as a preſent to the king, who as then laie at Bertha. The headleſſe trunke he commanded to bee hong vp vpon an high paire of gallowes.

Makbeths cruelltie.

Them of the weſterne Iles ſuing for pardon, in that they had aided Makdowald in his traitorous enterpriſe, he fined at great ſums of monie: and thoſe whome he tooke in Lochquhaber, being come thither to beare armor againſt the king, he put to execution. Herevpon the Ilandmen conceiued a deadlie grudge towards him, calling him a couenant-breaker, a bloudie tyrant, & a cruell murtherer of them whome the kings mercie had pardoned. With which reprochfull words Makbeth being kindled in wrathfull ire againſt them, had paſſed ouer with an armie into the Iles, to haue taken reuenge vpon them for their liberall talke, had he not beene otherwiſe perſuaded by ſome of his friends, and partlie pacified by gifts preſented vnto him on the behalfe of the Ilandmen, ſeeking to auoid his diſpleaſure. Thus was iuſtice and law reſtored againe to the old accuſtomed courſe, by the diligent means of Makbeth. Immediatlie whereupon word came that Sueno king of Norway was arriued in Fife with a puiſſant armie, to ſubdue the whole realme of Scotland.

Makbeth deemed by the Ilandmen.

Iuſtice & law reſtored.

Sueno king of Norway landed in Fife

But here to the intent it maie be the better perceiued, what this Sueno was, I will ſomwhat touch from whence he deſcended. That Sueno, who (as ye haue heard) conquered the realme of England, being alſo king of Denmarke and Norwaie, had three ſonnes, Harold, Sueno, and Canute; the firſt he made king of England, the ſecond king of Norwaie, and the third king of Denmarke. Harold inioied not the ſame dominion of England paſt three yeeres after his fathers deceaſſe, but was ſlaine by Ethelred or Egelred, whom his father Sueno had chaſed into Normandie. But the ſame Ethelred kept not long the kingdome in peace, for Canute king of Denmarke, to reuenge his brothers death, landed in England with a mightie hoſt, and ſleaing Ethelred, recouered the kingdome to the vſe of the Danes: but yet one Edmund ſonne to the foreſaid Ethelred, ſurnamed Ironſide, maintained the warre againſt Canute for a ſeaſon, till at length by both their conſents they agreed to fight a combat ſingularlie man to man, ſo to trie the matter betwixt them, who ſhould reigne as king ouer the Engliſhmen.

This agreeth not with our Engliſh writers.

Harold that reigned king of England, was not the ſon of Sueno but of Canute and was not ſlaine, but died of naturall diſeaſe. See more hereof in England.

Canute king of Denmarke, Edmund Ironſide.

In this fight when they had continued a long ſpace, and ſhewed right notable proofes of their manhood: Edmund (ſaith Canute) ſith it hath pleaſed almightie God, that thou ſhouldeſt thus trie the force of my hand without hurt or wound, I thinke it bee likewiſe his pleaſure, that thou ſhouldeſt inioy part of the realme: go to therefore, I receiue thee as partener with me in the kingdome, ſo that (if thou be contented let vs diuide the kingdome betwixt vs without anie more contention. Edmund gladlie accepted this condition of agreement, ſuppoſing it better to haue halfe the kingdome, than to ſtand to the doubtfull triall of loſing the whole: for he had receiued a wound at Canutes hands, though Canute vnderſtood not ſo much: againe, he foreſaw that occaſion hereafter might be offered, whereby he might without all trouble come to inioy the whole. Herevpon either of them lept beſide their wearied horſſes in that fierce & earneſt fight, & imbracing each other became good friends, in diuiding the realme according to the aboue mentioned motion of Canute. That part of England that lieth ouer againſt France was aſſigned vnto Canute; and the other, that is, the north parts vnto Edmund. In the meane time Emma the wife of Ethelred, with hir two ſonnes (which ſhe had by the ſame Ethelred) Alured and Edward, fled ouer into Normandie, doubting leaſt this concord betwixt Canute and Edmund ſhould turne ſmallie to hir aduancement.

But now touching the arriuall of Sueno the Norwegian king in Fife (as before is expreſſed) ye ſhall vnderſtand, that the pretenſe of his comming was to reuenge the ſlaughter of his vncle Camus, and other of the Daniſh nation ſlaine at Barre, Crowdane, and Gemmer. The crueltie of this Sueno was ſuch, that he neither ſpared man, woman, nor child, of what age, condition or degree ſoeuer they were. Whereof when K. Duncane was certified, he ſet all ſlouthfull and lingering delaies apart, and began to aſſemble an armie in moſt ſpeedie wiſe, like a verie valiant capteine: for oftentimes it happeneth, that a dull coward and ſlouthfull perſon, conſtreined by neceſſitie, becommeth verie hardie and actiue. Therefore when his whole power was come togither, he diuided the ſame into three battels. The firſt was led by Makbeth, the ſecond by Banquho, & the king himſelfe gouerned in the maine battell or middle ward, wherein were appointed to attend and wait vpon his perſon the moſt part of all the reſidue of the Scotiſh nobilitie.

The Scotiſh armie diuided into three battels.

The armie of Scotiſhmen being thus ordered, came vnto Culros, where incountering with the enimies, after a ſore and cruell foughten battell, Sueno remained victorious, and Malcolme with his Scots diſcomfited. Howbeit the Danes were ſo broken by this battell, that they were not able to make long chaſe on their enimies, but kept themſelues all night in order of battell, for doubt leaſt the Scots aſſembling togither againe, might haue ſet vpon them at ſome aduantage. On the morrow, when the fields were diſcouered, and that it was perceiued how no enimies were to be found abrode, they gathered the ſpoile, which they diuided amongſt them, according to the law of armes. Then was it ordeined by commandement of Sueno, that no ſouldier ſhould hurt either man, woman, or child, except ſuch as were found with weapon in hand readie to make reſiſtance, for he hoped now to conquer the realme without further bloudſhed.

But when knowledge was giuen how Duncane was fled to the caſtell of Bertha, and that Makbeth was gathering a new power to withſtand the incurſions of the Danes, Sueno raiſed his tents, & coming to the ſaid caſtell, laid a ſtrong ſiege round about it. Duncane ſeeing himſelfe thus enuironed by his enimies, ſent a ſecret meſſage by counſell of Banquho to Makbeth, commanding him to abide at Incheuthill, till he heard from him ſome other newes. In the meane time Duncane fell in fained communication with Sueno, as though he would haue yelded vp the caſtell into his hands, vnder certeine conditions, and this did he to driue time, and to put his enimies out of all ſuſpicion of anie enterpriſe ment againſt them, till all things were brought to paſſe that might ſerue for the purpoſe. At length, when they were fallen at a point for rendring vp the hold, Duncane offered to ſend forth of the caſtell into the campe great prouiſion of vittels to refreſh the armie, which offer was gladlie accepted of the Danes, for that they had béene in great penurie of ſuſtenance manie daies before.

Duncane fled to the caſtell of Bertha.

Sueno beſieged king Malcolme.

Fained treatie.

The Scots héerevpon toke the iuice of mekilwort berries, and mired the ſame in their ale and bread, ſending it thus ſpiced & confectioned, in great abundance vnto their enimies. They reioiſing that they had got meate and drinke ſufficient to ſatiſfie their bellies, fell to eating and drinking after ſuch greedie wiſe, that it ſéemed they ſtroue who might deuoure and ſwallow vp moſt, till the operation of the berries ſpread in ſuch ſort through all the parts of their bodies, that they were in the end brought into a faſt dead ſléepe, that in manner it was vnpoſſible to awake them. Then forthwith Duncane ſent vnto Makbeth, commanding him with all diligence to come and ſet vpon the enimies, being in eaſie point to be ouercome. Makbeth making no delaie, came with his people to the place, where his enimies were lodged, and firſt killing the watch, afterwards entered the campe, and made ſuch ſlaughter on all ſides without anie reſiſtance, that it was a wonderfull matter to behold, for the Danes were ſo heauie of ſléepe, that the moſt part of them were ſlaine and neuer ſtirred: other that were awakened either by the noiſe or other waies forth, were ſo amazed and dizzie headed vpon their wakening, that they were not able to make anie defenſe: ſo that of the whole number there eſcaped no more but onelie Sueno himſelfe and ten other perſons, by whoſe helpe he got to his ſhips lieng at rode in the mouth of Taie.

The moſt part of the mariners, when they heard what plentie of meate and drinke the Scots had ſent vnto the campe, came from the ſea thither to be partakers thereof, and ſo were ſlaine amongſt their fellowes: by meanes whereof when Sueno perceiued how through lacke of mariners he ſhould not be able to conueie awaie his naule, he furniſhed one ſhip throughlie with ſuch as were left, and in the ſame ſailed backe into Norwaie, curſing the time that he ſet forward on this infortunate iournie. The other ſhips which he left behind him, within thrée daies after his departure from thence, were toſſed ſo togither by violence of an eaſt wind, that beating andruſhing one againſt another, they ſunke there, and lie in the ſame place euen vnto theſe daies, to the great danger of other ſuch ſhips as come on that coaſt: for being couered with the floud when the tide commeth, at the ebbing againe of the ſame, ſome part of them appéere aboue water.

The place where the Daniſh veſſels were thus loſt, is yet called Drownelow ſands. This ouerthrow receiued in manner afore ſaid by Sueno, was verie diſpleaſant to him and his people, as ſhould appéere, in that it was a cuſtome manie yéeres after, that no knights were made in Norwaie, except they were firſt ſworne to reuenge the ſlaughter of their countriemen and friends thus ſlaine in Scotland. The Scots hauing woone ſo notable a victorie, after they had gathered & diuided the ſpoile of the field, cauſed ſolemne proceſſions to be made in all places of the realme, and thanks to be giuen to almightie God, that had ſent them ſo faire a day ouer their enimies. But whileſt the people were thus at their proceſſions, word was brought that a new fléet of Danes was arriued at Kingcorne, ſent thither by Canute king of England, in reuenge of his brother Suenos ouerthrow. To reſiſt theſe enimies, which were alreadie landed, and buſie in ſpoiling the countrie; Makbeth and Banquho were ſent with the kings authoritie, who hauing with them a conuenient power, incountred the enimies, ſlue part of them, and chaſed the other to their ſhips. They that eſcaped and got once to their ſhips, obteined of Makbeth for a great ſumme of gold, that ſuch of their friends as were ſlaine at this laſt bickering, might be buried in ſaint Colmes Inch. In memorie whereof, manie old ſepultures are yet in the ſaid Inch, there to be ſéene grauen with the armes of the Danes, as the maner of burieng noble men ſtill is, and héeretofore hath béene vſed.

A peace concluded betwixt Scots and Danes.

A peace was alſo concluded at the ſame time betwixt the Danes and Scotiſhmen, ratified (as ſome haue written) in this wiſe: That from thenceforth the Danes ſhould neuer come into Scotland to make anie warres againſt the Scots by anie maner of meanes. And theſe were the warres that Duncane had with forren enimies, in the ſeuenth yéere of his reigne. Shortlie after happened a ſtrange and vncouth wonder, which afterward was the cauſe of much trouble in the realme of Scotland, as ye ſhall after heare. It fortuned as Makbeth and Banquho iournied towards Fores, where the king then laie, they went ſporting by the waie togither without other companie, ſaue onelie themſelues, paſſing thorough the woods and fields, when ſuddenlie in the middeſt of a laund, there met them thrée women in ſtrange and wild apparell, reſembling creatures of elder world, whome when they attentiuelie beheld, wondering much at the ſight, the firſt of them ſpake and ſaid; All haile Makbeth, thane of Glammis (for he had latelie entered into that dignitie and office by the death of his father Sinell.) The ſecond of them ſaid; Haile Makbeth thane of Cawder. But the third ſaid; All haile Makbeth that héereafter ſhalt be king of Scotland.

The prophecie of three women ſuppoſing to be the weird ſiſters or feiries.

Then Banquho; What manner of women (ſaith he) are you, that ſéeme ſo little fauourable vnto me, whereas to my fellow héere, beſides high offices, ye aſſigne alſo the kingdome, appointing forth nothing for me at all? Yes (ſaith the firſt of them) we promiſe

cc miſe greater benefits vnto thée, than vnto him, for he cc ſhall reigne in déed, but with an vnluckie end: neicc ther ſhall he leaue anie iſſue behind him to ſuccéed in cc his place, where contrarilie thou in déed ſhalt not cc reigne at all, but of thée thoſe ſhall be borne which cc ſhall gouerne the Scotiſh kingdome by long order
cc of continuall deſcent. Herewith the foreſaid women vaniſhed immediatlie out of their ſight. This was reputed at the firſt but ſome vaine fantaſticall illuſion by Mackbeth and Banquho, inſomuch that Banquho would call Mackbeth in ieſt, king of Scotland; and Mackbeth againe would call him in ſport likewiſe, the father of manie kings. But afterwards the common opinion was, that theſe women were either the weird ſiſters, that is (as ye would ſay) the goddeſſes of deſtinie, or elſe ſome nymphs or feiries, indued with knowledge of prophecie by their necromanticall ſcience, bicauſe euerie thing came to paſſe as they had ſpoken. For ſhortlie after, the thane of Cawder being condemned at Fores of treaſon againſt the king committed; his lands, liuings, and offices were giuen of the kings liberalitie to Mackbeth.

The ſame night after, at ſupper, Banquho ieſted with him and ſaid; Now Mackbeth thou haſt obteined thoſe things which the two former ſiſters prophecied, there remaineth onelie for thée to purchaſe that which the third ſaid ſhould come to paſſe. Wherevpon Mackbeth reuoluing the thing in his mind, began euen then to deuiſe how he might atteine to the kingdome: but yet he thought with himſelfe that he muſt tarie a time, which ſhould aduance him thereto (by the diuine prouidence) as it had come to paſſe in his former preferment. But ſhortlie after it chanced that king Duncane, hauing two ſonnes by his wife which was the daughter of Siward earle of Northumberland, he made the elder of them called Malcolme prince of Cumberland, as it were thereby to appoint him his ſucceſſor in the kingdome, immediatlie after his deceaſſe. Mackbeth ſore troubled herewith, for that he ſaw by this means his hope ſore hindered (where, by the old lawes of the realme, the ordinance was, that if he that ſhould ſucceed were not of able age to take the charge vpon himſelfe, he that was next of bloud vnto him ſhould be admitted) he began to take counſell how he might vſurpe the kingdome by force, hauing a iuſt quarell ſo to do (as he tooke the matter) for that Duncane did what in him lay to defraud him of all maner of title and claime, which he might in time to come, pretend vnto the crowne.

The words of the three weird ſiſters alſo (of whom before ye haue heard) greatlie incouraged him herevnto, but ſpeciallie his wife lay ſore vpon him to attempt the thing, as ſhe that was verie ambitious, burning in vnquenchable deſire to beare the name of a queene. At length therefore, communicating his purpoſed intent with his truſtie friends, amongſt whome Banquho was the chiefeſt, vpon confidence of their promiſed aid, he ſlue the king at Enuerns, or (as ſome ſay) at Botgoſuane, in the firſt yeare of his reigne. Then hauing a companie about him of ſuch as he had made priuie to his enterpriſe, he cauſed himſelfe to be proclamed king, and forthwith went vnto Scone, where (by common conſent) he receiued the inueſture of the kingdome according to the accuſtomed maner. The bodie of Duncane was firſt conueied vnto Elgine, & there buried in kinglie wiſe; but afterwards it was remoued and conueied vnto Colmekill, and there laid in a ſepulture amongſt his predeceſſors, in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour, 1046.

Malcolme Cammore and Donald Bane the ſons of king Duncane, for feare of their liues (which they might well know that Mackbeth would ſéeke to bring to end for his more ſure confirmation in the eſtate) fled into Cumberland, where Malcolme remained, till time that ſaint Edward the ſonne of Ethelred recouered the dominion of England from the Daniſh power, the which Edward receiued Malcolme by way of moſt friendlie entertainment: but Donald paſſed ouer into Ireland, where he was tenderlie cheriſhed by the king of that land. Mackbeth, after the departure thus of Duncanes ſonnes, vſed great liberalitie towards the nobles of the realme, thereby to win their fauour, and when he ſaw that no man went about to trouble him, he ſet his whole intention to mainteine iuſtice, and to puniſh all enormities and abuſes, which had chanced through the féeble and ſlouthfull adminiſtration of Duncane. And to bring his purpoſe the better to paſſe without anie trouble or great buſineſſe, he deuiſed a ſubtill wile to bring all offendors and miſdoers vnto iuſtice, ſoliciting ſundrie of his liege people with high rewards, to challenge and appeale ſuch as moſt oppreſſed the commons, to come at a day and place appointed, to fight ſingular combats within barriers, in triall of their accuſations. When theſe théeues, barrettors, and other oppreſſors of the innocent people were come to darren battell in this wiſe (as is ſaid) they were ſtreight waies apprehended by armed men, and truſſed vp in halters on gibbets, according as they had iuſtlie deſerued. The reſidue of miſdoers that were left, were puniſhed and tamed in ſuch ſort, that manie yeares after all theft and reiſings were little heard of, the people inioieng the bliſſefull benefit of good peace and tranquillitie. Mackbeth ſhewing himſelfe thus a moſt diligent puniſher of all iniuries and wrongs attempted by anie diſordered perſons within his realme, was accounted the ſure defenſe and buckler of innocent people; and hereto he alſo aplied his whole indeuor, to cauſe yoong men to exerciſe themſelues in vertuous maners, and men of the church to attend their diuine ſeruice, according to their vocations.

He cauſed to be ſlaine ſundrie thanes, as of Cathnes, Sutherland, Stranauerne, and Ros, becauſe through them and their ſeditious attempts, much trouble dailie roſe in the realme. He appeaſed the troubleſome ſtate of Galloway, and ſlue one Makgill a tyrant, who had manie yeares before paſſed nothing of the regall authoritie or power. To be briefe, ſuch were the worthie doings and princelie acts of this Mackbeth in the adminiſtration of the realme, that if he had atteined thereunto by rightfull means, and continued in vprightneſſe of iuſtice as he began, till the end of his reigne, he might well haue béene numbred amongeſt the moſt noble princes that anie where had reigned. He made manie holeſome lawes and ſtatutes for the publike weale of his ſubiects.

No man shall sit as iudge in anie temporall court without the kings commission authorizing him thereto.

All conuentions, offices, and acts of iustice, shall passe in the kings name.

Reteiners.

He that is reteined or becommeth a sworne man to anie other person saue onelie to the king, shall lose his life for it; and euerie man shall be bound to defend the king against all other creatures.

Raisers of the kings people, or vnlawfull assemblies.

He that raiseth the kings liege people, shall lose life, goods, and lands, and so shall they do that assemble togither by his procurement.

Waiters vpon other men.

He that attendeth anie man to the church, market, or to anie other publike assemblie, as a reteiner, shall suffer death, except he haue liuing at his hands, on whome he so attendeth.

Keeping of horsses.

A horsse kept by anie of the commons or husbandmen to anie other vse than for tillage and laboring of the earth, shall be forfeited to the king by escheat.

Counterfet fooles, minstrels, iesters, and these kind of iuglers, with such like idle persons, that range abroad in the countrie, hauing no speciall licence of the king, shall be compelled to learne some science or craft to get their liuing; if they refuse so to do, they shall be drawen like horsses in the plough and harrows.

Possession of lands.

Though the sonne chance to be put in possessiō of his fathers lands by the kings licence, during the life of his father; yet shall the same lands be forfeited to the king if his father be afterwards conuicted of treason committed against the kings person.

Dowrie of wiues.

All such women, that are maried to anie lord or baron (though she haue no issue by him) shall yet haue the third part of his lands after his decease, and the remanent shall go to his heires.

Mariage of lords and barons.

All maner of lords and great barons, shall not contract matrimonie with other, vnder paine of death, speciallie if their lands and rowmes lie neere togither.

Wearing of armour.

All armour and weapon borne to other effect than in defense of the king & realme in time of warre, shall be confiscated to the kings vse, with all other moueable goods of the partie that herein offendeth.

Capteins.

Such as be appointed gouernors, or (as I may call them) capteins, that buy within those limits, where their charges lie, anie lands or possessions, shall lose both lands, & possessions, and the monie which they haue paid for the same.

And if anie of the said capteins or gouernors marie their sonnes or daughters vnto anie maner of person that dwelleth within the bounds of their rowmes, they shall lose their office: neither shall it be lawfull for anie of their sonnes or coparteners to occupie the same office.

Makbeths counterfeit zeale and equitie.

These and the like commendable lawes Makbeth caused to be put as then in vse, gouerning the realme for the space of ten yeares in equall iustice. But this was but a counterfet zeale of equitie shewed by him, partlie against his naturall inclination to purchase thereby the fauour of the people. Shortlie after, he began to shew what he was, in stead of equitie practising crueltie. For the pricke of conscience (as it chanceth euer in tyrants, and such as atteine to anie estate by vnrighteous means) caused him euer to feare, least he should be serued of the same cup, as he had ministred to his predecessor. The words also of the three weird sisters, would not out of his mind, which as they promised him the kingdome, so likewise did they promise it at the same time vnto the posteritie of Banquho. He willed therefore the same Banquho with his sonne named Fleance, to come to a supper that he had prepared for them, which was in deed, as he had deuised, present death at the hands of certeine murderers, whom he hired to execute that deed, appointing them to meete with the same Banquho and his sonne without the palace, as they returned to their lodgings, and there to slea them, so that he would not haue his house slandered, but that in time to come he might cleare himselfe, if anie thing were laid to his charge vpon anie suspicion that might arise.

Makbeths guiltie conscience.

Makbeths deuise to slea Banquho and his sonne.

Banquho is slaine, but his sonne escapeth.

It chanced yet by the benefit of the darke night, that though the father were slaine, the sonne yet by the helpe of almightie God reseruing him to better fortune, escaped that danger: and afterwards hauing some inkeling (by the admonition of some friends which he had in the court) how his life was sought no lesse than his fathers, who was slaine not by chancemedlie (as by the handling of the matter Makbeth would haue had it to appeare) but euen vpon a prepensed deuise: wherevpon to auoid further perill he fled into Wales. ¶ But here I thinke it shall not much make against my purpose, if (according to th'order which I find obserued in the Scotish historie) I shall in few words rehearse the originall line of those kings, which haue descended from the foresaid Banquho, that they which haue inioied the kingdome by so long continuance of descent, from one to another, and that euen vnto these our daies, may be knowen from whence they had their first beginning.

Fleance Banquhos sonne fleeth into Wales.

The line of the Scotish kings.

Fleance therefore (as before is said) fled into Wales, where shortlie after by his courteous and amiable behauiour, he grew into such fauor and estimation with the prince of that countrie, that he might vnneath haue wished anie greater; at length also he came into such familiar acquaintance with the said princes daughter, that she of courtesie in the end ſuffered him to get hir with child; which being once vnderſtood, hir father the prince conceiued ſuch hateſull diſpleaſure towards Fleance, that he finallie ſlue him, & held his daughter in moſt vile eſtate of ſeruitude, for that ſhe had conſented to be on this wiſe deſloured by a ſtranger. At the laſt yet, ſhe was deliuered of a ſonne named Walter, who within few yeares prooued a man of greater courage and valiancie, than anie other had commonlie béene found, although he had no better bringing vp than (by his grandfathers appointment) among the baſer ſort of people. Howbeit he ſhewed euer euen from his infancie, that there reigned in him a certeine ſtoutneſſe of ſtomach, readie to attempt high enterpriſes.

It chanced that falling out with one of his companions, after manie tawnting words which paſſed betwixt them, the other to his reproch obiected that he was a baſtard, and begotten in vnlawfull bed; wherewith being ſore kindled, in his raging furie he ran vpon him and ſlue him out of hand. Then was he glad to flée out of Wales, and comming into Scotland to ſéeke ſome friendſhip there, he happened into the companie of ſuch Engliſhmen, as were come thither with quéene Margaret, and behaued himſelfe ſo ſoberlie in all his demeanours, that within a while he was highlie eſteemed amongeſt them. Not long after by ſuch means atteining to the degrée of high reputation, he was ſent with a great power of men into the weſterne Iles, into Galloway, & other parts of the realme, to deliuer the ſame from the tyrannie and iniurious oppreſſion there exerciſed by diuers miſgouerned perſons; which enterpriſe according to his commiſſion he atchiued, with ſuch prudent policie and manhod, that immediatlie vpon his returne to the court, he was made lord ſteward of Scotland, with aſſignement to receiue the kings rents and duties out of the parts of the realme.

This Walter Steward had a ſonne named Alane Steward, who went after with Godfreie of Bullogne duke of Lozaine, & Robert duke of Normandie ſonne to king William the baſtard that conquered England, into the holie land, at what time they with other weſterne princes made the great iournie thither, in the yeare 1099. Alane had iſſue Alexander Steward, that founded the abbeie of Paſleie of ſaint Benedicts order. Walter Steward, whoſe valiancie was well notified at the battell of Largis, as hereafter ſhall be ſhewed, was the ſonne of the ſaid Alexander. The ſame Walter had iſſue two ſons, the one named Alexander, fought right valiantlie in defenſe of his father at the foreſaid battell; and the other named Robert Steward got the lands of Terbowtoune, and maried the heire of Crukeiſtoune, from whom deſcended the earles of Leuenor and Dernlie. Moreouer, the aboue mentioned Alexander Steward that founded Paſleie, had diuerſe mo ſonnes, as John and James, with ſundrie other. Howbeit they toke new ſurnames by the name of thoſe lands, vnto the which they ſucceéded. The afore recited John Steward, after the death of his brother James, maried the heire of Bonkill a virgine of great beautie, and had by hir Walter Steward that inherited the lands of Bonkill, Ranfrew, Rotheſſaie, Bute, and Stewatoune, after that his father the forenamed John was ſlaine at Falkirke.

The eldeſt ſonne hight John Steward otherwiſe named Robert, who ſucceéded immediatlie after his fathers deceaſſe in gouernance of the crowne. The ſecond called Robert was made earle of Fife and Menteith, alſo he was created duke of Albanie, and ruled the realme of Scotland vnder the name of gouernour, for the ſpace of fifteéne yeares. The third ſonne named Alexander was earle of Buchquhane and lord of Baudzenot. The eldeſt daughter was maried to James that was the ſonne and heire of William earle of Dowglas. The ſecond daughter was maried to John Dunbar, brother to George of Dunbar earle of March, and was made to the aduancement of his further fame earle of Murrey. He begot on hir one onelie daughter, that was maried to the Dowglas, and ſo Dowglas came to the earledome of Murrey. This Walter ſollicited Robert duke of Albanie, to ſlea Dauid Steward duke of Rothſaie. And after that James the firſt was returned home forth of England, hée did what he could to moue him to ſlea all the linage of the ſaid duke ſtill being in hope after the diſpatch of his kinſmen to come to the crowne himſelfe, which hope moued him to procure his nephue Robert Steward, and Robert Graham his daughters ſon, to ſlea king James the firſt alſo, for the which crime the ſame Walter was after conuicted and deſtroied with all his ſonnes. His brother Dauid earle of Buchquhane died without iſſue, and ſo the lands of both theſe brethren returned againe to the crowne, without anie memorie of their blood. The firſt died in Falkland, and the other atteined the crowne, and was called James the firſt, and maried the ladie Jane daughter to Johin Beauford erle of Summerſet in England. He had by hir two ſonnes borne at one birth, Alexander and James. The firſt died yong, the ſecond atteined the crowne, named James the ſecond. James the firſt had alſo ſir daughters, of the which the eldeſt was giuen in mariage to the Dolphine of France, the ſecond to the duke of Britaine, the third to the lord of Fair, the fourth to the lord of Dalkeith, the fift to the earle of Huntley, and the firſt had no ſucceſſion. After the death of the lord Bold, the husband of this first daughter of James the second, she was eftsones maried to the lord Hammilton, and by that means was the house of the Hammiltons honored with the kings bloud. The other sister was maried to the lord Creichton, of whom came small succession worthie to be mentioned. James the third maried Margaret daughter to the king of Denmarke. Of the which mariage was borne James the fourth, Alexander that was bishop of saint Andrews & duke of Albanie, and John Steward earle of Mar, but these two died without issue.

But to returne vnto Makbeth, in continuing the historie, and to begin where I left, ye shall vnderstand that after the contriued slaughter of Banquho, nothing prospered with the foresaid Makbeth: for in maner euerie man began to doubt his owne life, and durst vnneth appeare in the kings presence; and euen as there were manie that stood in feare of him, so likewise stood he in feare of manie, in such sort that he began to make those awaie by one surnamed cauillation or other, whome he thought most able to worke him anie displeasure.

James the fourth.

Makbeths dread.

His cruelitie caused through feare.

At length he found such sweetnesse by putting his nobles thus to death, that his earnest thirst after bloud in this behalfe might in no wise be satisfied: for ye must consider he wan double profit (as hee thought) hereby: for first they were rid out of the way whome he feared, and then againe his coffers were inriched by their goods which were forfeited to his vse, whereby he might better mainteine a gard of armed men about him to defend his person from iniurie of them whom he had in anie suspicion. Further, to the end he might the more cruellie oppresse his subiects with all tyrantlike wrongs, he builded a strong castell on the top of an hie hill called Dunsinane, situate in Gowrie, ten miles from Perth, on such a proud height, that standing there aloft, a man might behold well neere all the countries of Angus, Fife, Stermond, and Ernedale, as it were lieng vnderneath him. This castell then being founded on the top of that high hill, put the realme to great charges before it was finished, for all the stuffe necessarie to the building, could not be brought vp without much toile and businesse. But Makbeth being once determined to haue the worke go forward, caused the thanes of each shire within the realme, to come and helpe towards that building, each man his course about.

The castell of Dunsinane builded.

At the last, when the turne fell vnto Makduffe thane of Fife to build his part, he sent workemen with all needfull prouision, and commanded them to shew such diligence in euerie behalfe, that no occasion might bee giuen for the king to find fault with him, in that he came not himselfe as other had done, which he refused to do, for doubt least the king bearing him (as he partlie vnderstood) no great good will, would laie violent hands vpon him, as he had done vpon diuerse other. Shortlie after, Makbeth comming to behold how the worke went forward, and bicause he found not Makduffe there, he was sore offended, and said; I perceiue this man will neuer obeie my commandements, till he be ridden with a snaffle: but I shall prouide well inough for him. Neither could he afterwards abide to looke vpon the said Makduffe, either for that he thought his puissance ouer great; either else for that he had learned of certeine wizzards, in whose words he put great confidence (for that the prophesie had happened so right, which the three faries or weird sisters had declared vnto him) how that he ought to take heed of Makduffe, who in time to come should seeke to destroie him.

Makbeth is offended with Makduffe.

Makbeths confidence in wizzards.

And suerlie herevpon had he put Makduffe to death, but that a certeine witch, whome hee had in great trust, had told that he should neuer be slaine with man borne of anie woman, nor vanquished till the wood of Bernane came to the castell of Dunsinane. By this prophesie Makbeth put all feare out of his heart, supposing he might do what he would, without anie feare to be punished for the same, for by the one prophesie he beleeued it was vnpossible for anie man to vanquish him, and by the other vnpossible to slea him. This vaine hope caused him to do manie outragious things, to the greeuous oppression of his subiects. At length Makduffe, to auoid perill of life, purposed with himselfe to passe into England, to procure Malcolme Cammore to claime the crowne of Scotland. But this was not so secretlie deuised by Makduffe, but that Makbeth had knowledge giuen him thereof: for kings (as is said) haue sharpe sight like vnto Lynx, and long ears like vnto Midas. For Makbeth had in euerie noble mans house, one slie fellow or other in fee with him, to reueale all that was said or done within the same, by which slight he oppressed the most part of the nobles of his realme.

Lynxs eies and Midas. eares.

Immediatlie then, being aduertised whereabout Makduffe went, he came hastilie with a great power into Fife, and forthwith besieged the castell where Makduffe dwelled, trusting to haue found him therein. They that kept the house, without anie resistance opened the gates, and suffered him to enter, mistrusting none euill. But neuertheless Makbeth most cruellie caused the wife and children of Makduffe, with all other whom he found in that castell, to be slaine. Also he confiscated the goods of Makduffe, proclamed him traitor, and confined him out of all the parts of his realme; but Makduffe was alreadie escaped out of danger, and gotten into England vnto Malcolme Cammore, to trie what purchase hee might make by means of his support, to reuenge the slaughter so cruellie executed on his wife, his children, and other friends. At his comming vnto Malcolme, he declared into what great miserie the estate of Scotland was brought, by the detestable cruelties exercised by the tyrant Makbeth, hauing committed manie horrible slaughters and murders, both as well of the nobles as commons, for the which he was hated right mortallie of all his liege people, desiring nothing more than to be deliuered of that intollerable and most heauie yoke of thraldome, which they sustained at such a caitifes hands.

Makduffes words vnto Malcolme.

Malcolme hearing Makduffes words, which he vttered in verie lamentable sort, for meere compassion and verie ruth that pearsed his sorowfull hart, bewailing the miserable state of his countrie, he fetched a deepe sigh; which Makduffe perceiuing, began to fall most earnestlie in hand with him, to enterprise the deliuering of the Scotish people out of the hands of so cruell and bloudie a tyrant, as Makbeth by too manie plaine experiments did shew himselfe to be: which was an easie matter for him to bring to passe, considering not onelie the good title he had, but also the earnest desire of the people to haue some occasion caſion miniſtred, whereby they might be reuenged of thoſe notable iniuries, which they dailie ſuſteined by the outragious crueltie of Makbeths miſgouernance. Though Malcolme was verie ſorowfull for the oppreſſion of his countriemen the Scots, in maner as Makduffe had declared; yet doubting whether he were come as one that ment vnfeinedlie as he ſpake, or elſe as ſent from Makbeth to betraie him, he thought to haue ſome further triall, and therevpon diſſembling his mind at the firſt, he anſwered as followeth.

Malcolme Cammore his anſwer.

I am trulie verie ſorie for the miſerie chanced to my countrie of Scotland, but though I haue neuer ſo great affection to relieue the ſame, yet by reaſon of certeine incurable vices, which reigne in me, I am nothing meet thereto. Firſt, ſuch immoderate luſt and voluptuous ſenſualitie (the abhominable fountein of all vices) followeth me, that if I were made king of Scots, I ſhould ſeeke to defloure your maids and matrones, in ſuch wiſe that mine intemperancie ſhould be more importable vnto you, than the bloudie tyrannie of Makbeth now is. Hereunto Makduffes anſwer.

Makduffe anſwered: This ſuerlie is a verie euill fault, for manie noble princes and kings haue loſt both liues and kingdomes for the ſame; neuertheleſſe there are women enow in Scotland, and therefore follow my counſell. Make thy ſelfe king, and I ſhall conueie the matter ſo wiſelie, that thou ſhalt be ſo ſatiſfied at thy pleaſure in ſuch ſecret wiſe, that no man ſhall be aware thereof.

Then ſaid Malcolme, I am alſo the moſt auaritious creature on the earth, ſo that if I were king, I ſhould ſeeke ſo manie waies to get lands and goods, that I would ſlea the moſt part of all the nobles of Scotland by ſurmized accuſations, to the end I might inioy their lands, goods, and poſſeſſions; and therefore to ſhew you what miſchiefe may inſue on you through mine vnſatiable couetouſnes, I will rehearſe vnto you a fable. There was a fox hauing a ſore place on him ouerſet with a ſwarme of flies, that continuallie ſucked out hir bloud: and when one that came by and ſaw this manner, demanded whether ſhe would haue the flies driuen beſide hir, ſhe anſwered no: for if theſe flies that are alreadie full, and by reaſon thereof ſucke not verie egerlie, ſhould be chaſed awaie, other that are emptie and fellie an hungred, ſhould light in their places, and ſucke out the reſidue of my bloud farre more to my greeuance than theſe, which now being ſatiſfied do not much annoie me. Therefore ſaith Malcolme, ſuffer me to remaine where I am, leaſt if I atteine to the regiment of your realme, mine vnquenchable auarice may prooue ſuch; that ye would thinke the diſpleaſures which now grieue you, ſhould ſeeme eaſie in reſpect of the vnmeaſurable outrage, which might inſue through my comming amongſt you.

Couetouſnes the root of all miſchiefe

Makduffe to this made anſwer, how it was a far worſe fault than the other: for auarice is the root of all miſchiefe, and for that crime the moſt part of our kings haue beene ſlaine and brought to their finall end. Yet notwithſtanding follow my counſell, and take vpon thee the crowne. There is gold and riches inough in Scotland to ſatiſfie thy greedie deſire.

Diſſimulation and deiting in lies.

Then ſaid Malcolme againe, I am furthermore inclined to diſſimulation, telling of leaſings, and all other kinds of deceit, ſo that I naturallie reioiſe in nothing ſo much, as to betraie & deceiue ſuch as put anie truſt or confidence in my words. Then ſith there is nothing that more becommeth a prince than conſtancie, veritie, truth, and iuſtice, with the other laudable fellowſhip of thoſe faire and noble vertues which are comprehended onelie in ſothfaſtneſſe, and that lieng vtterlie ouerthroweth the ſame; you ſee how vnable I am to gouerne anie prouince or region: and therefore ſith you haue remedies to cloke and hide all the reſt of my other vices, I praie you find ſhift to cloke this vice amongſt the reſidue.

Then ſaid Makduffe: This yet is the worſt of all, and there I leaue thee, and therefore ſaie; Oh ye vnhappie and miſerable Scotiſhmen, which are thus ſcourged with ſo manie and ſundrie calamities, ech one aboue other! Ye haue one curſſed and wicked tyrant that now reigneth ouer you, without anie right or title, oppreſſing you with his moſt bloudie crueltie. This other that hath the right to the crowne, is ſo repleit with the inconſtant behauiour and manifeſt vices of Engliſhmen, that he is nothing worthie to inioy it: for by his owne confeſſion he is not onelie auaritious, and giuen to vnſatiable luſt, but ſo falſe a traitor withall, that no truſt is to be had vnto anie word he ſpeaketh. Adieu Scotland, for now I account my ſelfe a baniſhed man for euer, without comfort or conſolation: and with thoſe words the brackiſh teares trickled downe his cheekes verie abundantlie.

At the laſt, when he was readie to depart, Malcolme tooke him by the ſleeue, and ſaid: Be of good comfort Makduffe, for I haue none of theſe vices before remembred, but haue ieſted with thee in this manner, onelie to proue thy mind: for diuerſe times heeretofore hath Makbeth ſought by this manner of meanes to bring me into his hands, but the more ſlow I haue ſhewed my ſelfe to condeſcend to thy motion and requeſt, the more diligence ſhall I vſe in accompliſhing the ſame. Incontinentlie heerevpon they imbraced ech other, and promiſing to be faithfull the one to the other, they fell in conſultation how they might beſt prouide for all their buſineſſe, to bring the ſame to good effect. Soone after, Makduffe repairing to the borders of Scotland, addreſſed his letters with ſecret diſpatch vnto the nobles of the realme, declaring how Malcolme was confederat with him, to come haſtilie into Scotland to claime the crowne, and therefore he required them, ſith he was right inheritor thereto, to aſſiſt him with their powers to recouer the ſame out of the hands of the wrongfull vſurper.

In the meane time, Malcolme purchaſed ſuch fauor at king Edwards hands, that old Siward earle of Northumberland was appointed with ten thouſand men to go with him into Scotland, to ſupport him in this enterpriſe, for recouerie of his right. After theſe newes were ſpread abroad in Scotland, the nobles drew into two ſeuerall factions, the one taking part with Makbeth, and the other with Malcolme. Heerevpon inſued oftentimes ſundrie bickerings, & diuerſe light ſkirmiſhes: for thoſe that were of Malcolmes ſide, would not ieopard to ioine with their enimies in a pight field, till his comming out of England to their ſupport. But after that Makbeth perceiued his enimies power to increaſe, by ſuch aid as came to them forth of England with his aduerſarie Malcolme, he recoiled backe into Fife, there purpoſing to abide in campe fortified, at the caſtell of Dunſinane, and to fight with his enimies, if they ment to purſue him; howbeit ſome of his friends aduiſed him, that it ſhould be beſt for him, either to make ſome agreement with Malcolme, or elſe to flee with all ſpeed into the Iles, and to take his treaſure with him, to the end he might wage ſundrie great princes of the realme to take his part, & reteine ſtrangers, in whome he might better truſt than in his owne ſubiects, which ſtale dailie from him: but he had ſuch confidence in his propheſies, that he beleeued he ſhould neuer be vanquiſhed, till Birnane wood were brought to Dunſinane; nor yet to be ſlaine with anie man, that ſhould be or was borne of anie woman.

Malcolme following hastilie after Makbeth, came the night before the battell vnto Birnane wood, and when his armie had rested a while there to refresh them, he commanded euerie man to get a bough of some trée or other of that wood in his hand, as big as he might beare, and to march forth therewith in such wise, that on the next morrow they might come closelie and without sight in this manner within view of his enimies. On the morrow when Makbeth beheld them comming in this sort, he first maruelled what the matter ment, but in the end remembred himselfe that the prophesie which he had heard long before that time, of the comming of Birnane wood to Dunsinane castell, was likelie to be now fulfilled. Neuertheless, he brought his men in order of battell, and erhorted them to doo valiantlie, howbeit his enimies had scarselie cast from them their boughs, when Makbeth perceiuing their numbers, betooke him streict to flight, whom Makduffe pursued with great hatred euen till he came vnto Lunfannaine, where Makbeth perceiuing that Makduffe was hard at his backe, leapt beside his horsse, saieng; Thou traitor, what meaneth it that thou shouldest thus in vaine follow me that am not appointed to be slaine by anie creature that is borne of a woman, come on therefore, and receiue thy reward which thou hast deserued for thy paines, and therwithall he lifted vp his sword thinking to haue slaine him.

Makbeth fleeth, & is pursued of Makduffe.

But Makduffe quicklie auoiding from his horsse, yer he came at him, answered (with his naked sword in his hand) saieng: It is true Makbeth, and now shall thine insatiable crueltie haue an end, for I am euen he that thy wizzards haue told thée of, who was neuer borne of my mother, but riped out of her wombe: therewithall he stept vnto him, and slue him in the place. Then cutting his head from his shoulders, he set it vpon a pole, and brought it vnto Malcolme. This was the end of Makbeth, after he had reigned 17 yéeres ouer the Scotishmen. In the beginning of his reigne he accomplished manie worthie acts, verie profitable to the common-wealth (as ye haue heard) but afterward by illusion of the diuell, he defamed the same with most terrible cruelties. He was slaine in the yéere of the incarnation, 1057, and in the 16 yéere of king Edwards reigne ouer the Englishmen.

Malcolme

MAlcolme Cammore thus recouering the relme (as ye haue heard) by support of king Edward, in the 16 yéere of the same Edwards reigne, he was crowned at Scone the 25 day of Aprill, in the yéere of our Lord 1057. Immediatlie after his coronation he called a parlement at Forfair, in the which he rewarded them with lands and liuings that had assisted him against Makbeth, aduancing them to fees and offices as he saw cause, & commanded that specialtie those that bare the surname of anie offices or lands, should haue and inioy the same. He created manie earles, lords, barons, and knights. Manie of them that before were thanes, were at this time made earles, as Fife, Menteth, Atholl, Leuenor, Murrey, Cathnes, Rosse, and Angus. These were the first earles that haue béene heard of amongst the Scotishmen (as their histories do make mention.) Manie new surnames were taken vp at this time amongst them, as Cauder, Lokart, Gordon, Seton, Lauder, Wawane, Meldrum, Schaw, Leirmouth, Libertoun, Strachquhen, Cargill, Rattrey, Dundas, Cockbourne, Mirtoun, Menzeis, Abercrummie, Lillie, with manie other that had possessions giuen them, which gaue names to the owners for the time. Others got their surnames by offices, as Steward, Durward, and Banerman. Also the proper names of manie valiant capteins were turned into generall surnames, as Kennedie, Graham, Hay, with diuerse other too long héere to rehearse. So that it came to passe then, as it hath done manie times since, that new surnames haue worne the old out of vse.

In the foresaid parlement thus holden at Forfair, in the beginning of his reigne, there were manie holesome ordinances established, both apperteining to ciuill administration, and also to the ecclesiasticall iurisdiction. In reward also of Makduffes seruice, who (as ye haue heard) chieflie aided him to the atteining of the crowne, he honored him and his posteritie with three sorts of priuileges. First, that the earle of Fife for the time being, at the coronation of a king, should by his office set the crowne on the kings head. The second was, that when the king should giue battell to his enimies, the same earle should lead the vauntgard of his host. The third, that the linage of Makduffe should inioy regall authoritie and power within all their lands and roomes, as to appoint officers and iudges for the hearing and determining of all matters and controuersies (treason onelie excepted) and that if anie of their men or tenants were called to answer in anie court out of their circuit, they might appeale to their owne iudges to be appointed, as before is expressed.

Priuileges granted vnto Makduffes linage.

Iohannes Maior writeth in his chronicles, that the third priuilege, which Malcolme granted vnto this Makduffe and his posteritie, was this, that for euerie gentleman that anie of them should hap to kill by chancemedlie, and not vpon pretensed malice, for the summe of 24 marks he should redéeme his punishment due for the same: & for the casuall slaughter of a meaner person he should be fined at twelue marks. So that murtherers were wont to say, that if they were able to paie that summe to the Kinboc, they ought to be released of further punishment, by Makduffes priuilege. But this third priuilege, together with the other two former grants, the said Maior forbeareth, and not without cause, as may appéere, considering the naturall inclination of that people vnto murther, which by this meanes nourishing secret hatred and malice in their harts, might vnder the cloke of casuall falling out, slea whom they listed.

Iohannes Maior.

It was ordeined also at this parlement, that barons which had liberties within themselues, should make gibbets, whereon men that deserued death should suffer execution: and also drawe-wels, wherein women that were condemned should be drowned, according to the order of the ciuill lawes vsed in Scotland. Moreouer, all the lawes that Makbeth had ordeined, were abrogated at this parlement. Thus whilest Malcolme was busied in setting orders amongst his subiects, tidings came that one Lugtake surnamed the fole, being either the sonne, or (as some write) the cosen of the late mentioned Makbeth, was conueied with a great number of such as had taken part with the said Makbeth vnto Scone, and there by their support receiued the crowne, as lawfull inheritor thereto. To appease this businesse, was Makduffe earle of Fife sent with full commission in the kings name, who incountring with Lugtake at a village called Essen in Vogdale, slue him, and discomfited his whole power, ordering the matter with them in such wise, that afterwards there was no more trouble attempted in that behalfe.

After this, the realme continued in peace certeine yeares, till it chanced a great number of theeues and robbers assembling themselues togither at Cockbourne pethes, did much hurt, by robbing and spoiling the people in the countries of Mers and Louthian: howbeit, at length one Patrike Dunbar of Dunbar, by commandement of the king, fought with them, slue their capteine, with six hundred of his compane,

And thus hauing deliuered the countrie of thoſe pælers, with loſſe of fortie of his owne men, he returned to the king, with the head of the capteine of that rout: ſo that for his manhood herein ſhewed, he was made by the king earle of March, and for the maintenance of his eſtate, had the lands of Cockbourne Pethes giuen to him and his heires for euer, vpon this condition, that in times comming, the earles of March ſhould purge Yers and Louthian of all théeues and robbers. In memorie whereof, he was commanded to beare in his armes a fellons head ſprinkled with bloud.

Shortlie after he got knowledge, how there were certeine gentlemen that had conſpired to ſlea him, & therefore taking occaſion to go on hunting, where this act ſhould haue béene executed, he calleth the chiefe author of the conſpiracie apart into a certeine vallie, which was cloſed on euerie ſide with thicke woods, and there brake the matter vnto him, in reproouing him verie ſharpelie, for that he had ſo traitorouſlie conſpired his death, whoſe preſeruation he ought chieflie to haue wiſhed, conſidering the manifold benefits he had receiued at his hands. And herewith leaping from his horſſe, drew his ſword, commanding the other likewiſe to draw his, that now hauing conuenient time and place thereto, they might trie the matter betwirt them, who ſhould be thought moſt worthie of life, by open force of knightlie prowéſſe. The conſpirator hearing theſe words, as a man altogither aſtoniſhed, fell downe vpon his knées at the kings féet, beſeeching his grace of mercie for his wicked purpoſe and heinous offenſe: who ſeeing him thus penitent, bad him ariſe, and ſaid; I am content hereupon to forgiue thee, ſo that thou be not of counſell hereafter in anie ſuch traitorous practiſe.

Whileſt things paſſed thus in Scotland, great and maruellous chances came to paſſe within the realme of England. For after the death of king Edward, ſurnamed the Confeſſor, Harold the ſonne of earle Godwine toke on him the kingdome. But William baſtard duke of Normandie, pretending title to the crowne of England, at length inuaded the land, and ſleaing Harold in field, made a full conqueſt of the realme, and was crowned king at London by Eldred archbiſhop of Yorke. Here ye haue to vnderſtand, that king Edward in his life time had ſent for his nephue Edward, the ſonne of his brother Edmund Ironſide, to come home forth of Hungarie, whither (after his fathers deceaſſe) he and his brother Edwine had béene ſent awaie, as in the hiſtorie of England it appéareth more at large. This Edward had married the daughter of the emperor Henrie, named Agatha, ſiſter to the quéene of Hungarie, and not the king of Hungaries daughter, although the Scotiſh writers do ſo affirme. By hir he had iſſue a ſonne named Edgar, and two daughters, the one named Margaret, and the other Chriſten.

King Edward ment that his nephue the ſaid Edward ſhould haue ſucceded him, and (as ſome write) he would in his life time haue reſigned the crowne vnto him. But he (a thing worthie of admiration) vtterlie refuſed it, and would not once meddle therewith during his vncles life time; & (as it chanced) he died, whileſt his vncle king Edward was yet liuing. His ſonne Edgar therefore, to whom it ſéemed that the crowne was due, when he ſaw the realme conquered by the Normans, deſpairing to recouer it out of their hands, got a ſhip, and determined with his mother and ſiſters to paſſe ouer into Germanie to his friends and kinſfolke there: but by contrarie winds he was driuen to ſhore in the Forth, at a place called vnto this day the quæenes ferrie, Malcolme being at the ſame time at Dunfermeling, when he heard of the arriuall of this ſhip, and vnderſtood what they were that were aboord in hir, he reſorted thither with an honorable companie about him, to viſit them for honors ſake, vpon fauour he bare towards them, for that they were deſcended of that noble prince king Edward, in whome afore time he had found ſo much gentleneſſe and friendſhip.

Finallie, when he vnderſtood their eſtate, he brought them home with him to his palace, ſhewing them all the loue and friendſhip he could deuiſe; and in the end conſidering the excellent beautie, wiſdome, and noble qualities of the ladie Margaret, ſiſter to the ſame Edgar, he required of Agatha hir mother to haue hir in mariage, whereunto Agatha gladlie condeſcended. Shortlie after, with an aſſemblie of all the nobles of Scotland, this mariage was made and ſolemnized after the octaues of Eaſter, in the yeare 1067, with all the ioy & triumph that might be deuiſed. K. William conqueror of England, being informed hereof, feared leaſt this aliance betwirt Malcolme and Edgar might bréed ſome trouble and diſquietneſſe to his eſtate, ſith the ſame Edgar had manie friends through all the parties of England. To preuent therefore the occaſions of inteſtine troubles, he confined all the linage of the foreſaid Edgar, by reaſon whereof, a great number of Engliſhmen came into Scotland vnto king Malcolme, and manie of them obteining liuings at his hands, remained there continuallie during their liues, leauing to their poſteritie their names & poſſeſſions. Amongſt whome were theſe, Lindſeie, Maus, Ramſeie, Louell, Touhris, Preſtoune, Sandlands, Biſſart, Sowlis, Wardlaw, Parwell, with diuerſe other.

There came diuerſe alſo out of Hungarie with quéene Margaret, who likewiſe left their names to their families, which yet remaine euen vnto this day, as Creichtoune, Fotringham, Giffart, Melvill, Worthwike, and others. Alſo there haue come at ſundrie ſeaſons out of France diuers ſurnames into Scotland, as Fraſer, Sinclare, Boſwell, Mowtray, Mountgummerie, Campbell, Bois, Betoun, or Betuin, Taillefer, and Bothwell, beſides ſundrie other which were but ſuperfluous to rehearſe at this time. ¶ But to the order of the hiſtorie. It is recorded by writers, that theſe (which at this time came out of England vnto Edgar) brought great quantitie of gold and ſiluer with them; alſo manie relikes of ſaints, and (amongſt other) that blacke croſſe which king Dauid gaue vnto the abbeie of Holie rod houſe in Louthian, which he founded at his owne charges. Shortlie after the proſcription of theſe Engliſhmen, William the conqueror ſent an herald at armes vnto king Malcolme, demanding to haue Edgar deliuered into his hands, and threatning that if he refuſed to deliuer him, he would ſuerlie fetch him, and that ſmallie for Malcolms commoditie.

But Malcolme, though he vnderſtood that he ſhould be ſure of wars at K. Williams hands for his deniall; yet he declared plainelie to the herald, that his maiſters requeſt was vnreaſonable, & therefore he minded not in anie wiſe to gratifie him therein. King William receiuing this anſwere from king Malcolme, proclaimed open warre againſt Scotland. In the meane time all Northumberland toke part with K. Malcolme, for that he was their earles ſiſters ſonne. Whereupon K. William ſent a valiant capteine, a Norman borne named Roger, to inuade Northumberland. Which Roger gathering a power of men, came haſtilie into that countrie, howbeit he abode a ſhort time there in honor, for by the Scots & Northumberland men his armie was diſcomfited, and he himſelfe traitorouſlie ſlaine by his owne ſouldiers.

The earle of Gloceſter.

But king William nothing diſcouraged with this ouerthrow: ſent one Richard earle of Gloceſter (whome amongeſt all the Engliſhmen he had moſt in truſt) with a mightie armie into Cumberland, againſt whome were ſent the earles of March and Menteith, who defended the countrie right manlie from the inuaſion of the ſaid earle, ſo that he was not able to take anie aduantage of them. King William aduertiſed hereof, ware wonderfull wroth, that no more good was done againſt his enimies, whereupon he ſent a new power thither with all ſpeed, vnder the leading of his brother Odo, who was both biſhop of Baieux, and earle of Kent. By this laſt armie, the countrie of Northumberland was ſore ſpoiled, and a great number both of Scots and Northumberlandmen diſcomfited and ſlaine. But as Odo was preparing to returne, there came Malcolme, with all the power he might make, and giuing an onſet vpon his enimies, ſlue a great number of them, and recouered all the bootie which Odos men had got in the countrie, and ſo right ioifull of that victorie, returned into Scotland. King William yet nothing abaſhed for theſe miſhaps, ſent his ſonne called Robert, with a far greater power than at anie time he had ſent before, into Northumberland, who remaining a long ſeaſon in campe neere to the riuer of Tine, attempted no notable enterpriſe, ſauing that he repared and newlie fortified the towne of Newcaſtell, which ſtandeth vpon the ſame riuer of Tine; and then at length a peace was concluded betwixt the two kings vnder theſe conditions, that king Malcolme ſhould inioy that part of Northumberland which lieth betwixt Tweed, Cumberland, and Stainmore, and to do homage to the K. of England for the ſame. In the midſt of Stainmore there ſhall be a croſſe ſet vp, with the king of Englands image on the one ſide, and the king of Scotlands on the other, to ſignifie that the one is march to England, and the other to Scotland. This croſſe was called the roiecroſſe, that is, the croſſe of the kings. Moreouer, it was concluded that Waltheof or Voldoſius (as the Scotiſh writers name him) the ſonne of Siward earle of Northumberland ſhould marie king Williams neece, borne of his daughter, and to be free from all paiments and exactions due to the king by anie maner of prerogatiue or means, for the ſpace of twentie yeares next inſuing.

In the necke of this peace thus concluded betwixt the kings, happened new trouble in Scotland, by reaſon of inteſtine rebellion: for the people of Galloway, and the Iland men, roſe in great numbers, and ſpoiled the borders of their neighbors, not ſparing from ſlaughter in all parts, where they were anie thing reſiſted. Againſt theſe rebels was ſent by king Malcolme, Walter the ſonne of Fleance (of whome there is mention made before) with a conuenient armie, who at his comming into Galloway, firſt gaue the people of that countrie an ouerthrow, and ſlue their chiefe capteine Makglaue. Then afterwards fighting with them of the Iles, he ſubdued them in ſuch wiſe, that all things were pacified euen at commandement. For which high prowes and diligence in this peece of ſeruice ſhewed, he was created by Malcolme high ſteward of the realme, ſo that afterwards both he and his poſteritie euer ſince haue borne that ſurname, euen vnto theſe our daies.

After the quieting of this buſineſſe, there ſprang a new tumult more dangerous than the former, for the Murreyland men, procuring them of Roſſe and Cathnes, with diuers other to ioine with them in confederacie, did not onelie ſlea the kings ſeruants, and thoſe that were appointed vnder him to ſee iuſtice miniſtred, but through ſupport of one Makduncane, whome they choſe to be their capteine, they alſo waſted and deſtroied the kings poſſeſſions, with more crueltie than euer had beene heard of before. Wherefore to puniſh theſe traitorous attempts, Makduffe was ſent with an armie into Mar. But the traitors doubting leaſt they ſhould not be able to withſtand his puiſſanee, thought nothing more auailable than to ſtop him with monie: but in the meane time came the king himſelfe in good ſeaſon into Monimuſke, where he was aduertiſed, that in maner all the north parts of Scotland with the Iles, were confederat with the Murreyland men againſt him. The king aſtoniſhed ſomething at theſe newes, vowed to giue the baronnie of Monimuſke (which he vnderſtood to be lands perteining to the crowne) vnto the church of ſaint Andrew in Fife, if it might pleaſe God to ſend him victorie ouer his enimies.

The kings vow.

At length comming vnto the water of Speie, he beheld his enimies on the further ſide, in greater number, and in better furniture for armor than he thought had beene poſſible to haue found in all Scotland: he perceiued alſo that his ſtandard-bearer began to ſhrinke, and not to ſhew the like cheerefull countenance as he ought to haue done. Wherefore he pulled the banner from him, and gaue it to ſir Alexander Carron, who with this his new office obteined ſundrie faire lands and poſſeſſions, to him and to his heires for euer: but his ſurname was afterwards changed, and called Skrimgeour; of the which is deſcended a noble houſe, continuing yet in great honor in the ſame ſurname and office. When the king was once paſſed the water, and the armies on both ſides readie to haue ioined, through mediation of biſhops and other vertuous men, the matter was taken vp, and peace made on theſe conditions; That the commons that tooke part with the rebels, ſhould returne home out of hand, and the gentlemen to ſubmit themſelues to the kings pleaſure, their liues and lands ſaued. Howbeit manie of them were kept in perpetuall priſon during their liues, and all their goods confiſcated to the kings vſe.

All ciuill trouble and commotion being thus quieted, king Malcolme (ſpeciallie by the good admoniſhment and exhortation of his wife queene Margaret, a woman of great zeale vnto the religion of that time) gaue himſelfe in maner altogither vnto much deuotion, and workes of mercie; as in doing of almes deeds, by prouiding for the poore, and ſuch like godlie exerciſes: ſo that in true vertue he was thought to excell all other princes of his time. To be briefe, herein there ſeemed to be in maner a certeine ſtrife betwixt him, and that vertuous queene his wife, which of them ſhould be moſt feruent in the loue of God, ſo that manie people by the imitation of them were brought vnto a better life. Agatha and hir daughter Chriſtine alſo, by the example of theſe two holie liuers, renounced the pompe of the court, and got them to a priuat and ſolitarie life, wherein they gaue themſelues wholie to diuine contemplation. Furthermore, Malcolme by the ſetting on of the queene his wife, ceaſſed not to ſet his indeuor wholie to the aduancement of the chriſtian religion, and to reſtore things that were decaied by the negligence of his predeceſſors. Therefore whereas before his time, there were but foure biſhops ſees in Scotland, as ſaint Andrews, Glaſcow, Galloway, and Murthlake, and two of them, that is to ſay, ſaint Andrews and Murthlake remaining onelie in good reparation (the other being decaied) he reſtored the other two to their former beauties, and furthermore erected two other of new, as Murrey and Cathnes, placing men of ſingular vertue and pureneſſe of life in the ſame.

But

But to proceed. It is ſaid, that ſuch outragious riot entred at this time, and began to grow in vſe among the Scotiſhmen, togither with the language and maners of the Engliſh nation (by reaſon that ſuch a multitude of the ſame, flieng out of their countrie, were dailie receiued as then into Scotland to inhabit there, as before is ſhewed) that diuerſe of the nobles perceiuing what diſcommoditie and decaie to the whole realme would inſue of this intemperance, came to the king, lamenting greuouſlie the caſe, for that this venemous infection ſpred ſo faſt ouer the whole realme, to the peruerting and vtter remouing of the ancient ſobrietie of diet vſed in the ſame. Wherefore they beſought him to prouide ſome remedie in time, before hope of redreſſe were paſt, that the people might be againe reduced vnto their former frugalitie, who hitherto vſed not to eat but once in the day, and then deſiring no ſuperfluous meates and drinks to be ſought by ſea and land, nor curiouſlie dreſſed or ſerued forth with ſawces, but onelie feeding to ſatiſfie nature, and not their greedie appetites.

Riot and ſuperfluous chere brought into Scotland.

The lamentation of the Scotiſh nobilitie for the intemperate ſurfetting begun to grow in vſe in their countrie.

The ancient ſparenelle of diet amongſt the Scots.

Through this their ſober fare, with the exerciſing of their bodies herewith in continuall trauell, they grew more ſtrong and greater of bodie, than their offſpring are found to be in theſe daies: for they were more in reſemblance like vnto giants than vnto men of our time, with great and huge bodies, mightie armes and limbs, preſſing vpon their enimies like vnto fierce lions, bearing downe all before them, without dread of anie danger, for that they exceeded all humane ſtrength and power. Herevpon king Malcolme toke great paines to haue redreſſed this infectiue poiſon, and vtterlie to haue expelled it forth of his realme. Howbeit the nature of man is ſo prone and readie to imbrace all kinds of vice, that where the Scotiſh people before had no knowledge nor vnderſtanding of fine fare or riotous ſurfet; yet after they had once taſted the ſweet poiſoned bait thereof, there was now no meane to be found to reſtreine their licorous deſires. ¶ And yet thoſe corrupted abuſes and riotous ſuperfluities (which came into the realme of Scotland with the Engliſhmen) planted therein by the daies of king Malcolme, are not to be compared in exceſſe with things vſed in our time. For in thoſe daies, as yet the nature of man was not ſo ouercome with the abuſe of ſuperfluities, as it is now adaies; for then though they were gone from the ancient ſparenelle of diet, they yet did not eat paſt twiſe a day, and had but two diſhes at a meale: but now the greedie taſte of mens inſatiable luſt is ſuch, that no kind of fleſh, fiſh, fruit, or whatſoeuer may be gotten, is vneth able to quench their gluttonous appetit & rauenous gormandizing; ſo that neither land, ſea, nor aire, is left vnſought to ſatiſfie the ſame, as though they were worthie of moſt high commendation that may deuour moſt: wherein they may be iuſtlie compared to greedie wolues and coruorants. But to bewaile that in words which cannot be amended in deeds, is but a follie: for the infection is ſo entered into the inner parts of the intrails, that neither with purging, cutting, nor ſearing, it may be holpen. Sooner ſhall you deſtroie the whole nation, than remoue this vice.

In the meane time whileſt things paſſed thus in Scotland, king William the Conqueror died in the 21 yeere of his reigne, and after the incarnation 1087. About which time king Malcolme cauſed the old church of Durham to be plucked downe and builded vp a new, beginning euen at the firſt floore. In which ſeaſon, one Egelwin or William (as the Scotiſh writers ſay) was biſhop of that ſee, and prior of the abbeie was one Turgot, who afterward was made biſhop of ſaint Andrews, and wrote the liues of quæne Margaret and Malcolme hir huſband in the Scotiſh tong. Afterward he deceaſſed in ſaint Andrews, but his bodie was brought vnto Durham, and there buried, becauſe he was firſt prior thereof. King Malcolme by perſuaſion of this Turgot, builded alſo a church in Dunfermling, dedicated to the Trinitie, ordeining from thenceforth that the common ſepulture of the kings ſhould be there, in like maner as it had beene afore time in the Ile of Iona at the abbeie of Colmekill.

Amongſt other vertuous ordinances alſo, which were deuiſed and made by king Malcolme (through exhortation of his wife quéene Margaret) mentioned by Turgot in the booke which he wrote of their liues, this is not to be forgotten, that he abrogated that wicked law, eſtabliſhed by king Ewin the third, appointing halfe a marke of ſiluer to be paid to the lord of the ſoile, in redemption of the womans chaſtitie, which is vſed to be paied yet vnto this day, and is called the marchets of woman: where otherwiſe by tenor of king Ewins law, the lord had the vſe of their bodies all the firſt night after their mariage. King William ſurnamed the Red, the ſecond ſonne of king William the Conqueror, and ſucceſſor to him in the kingdome of England, not well contented nor pleaſed in his mind, that the Scots ſhould inioy a great portion of the north parts of England, anciently belonging to his crowne as parcell thereof, he raiſed a great armie, and before anie denouncing of warre by him made, inuaded Northumberland, and toke the caſtell of Anwike, putting all ſuch to the ſword as were found in the ſame.

King Malcolme, to withſtand ſuch exploits attempted by his enimie, leuied a great hoſt of his ſubiects, and comming with the ſame into Northumberland, beſieged the ſaid caſtell of Anwike. And now when the keepers of the hold were at point to haue made ſurrender, a certeine Engliſh knight conceiuing in his mind an hardie and dangerous interpriſe, mounted on a ſwift horſſe without armor or weapon, ſauing a ſpeare in his hand, vpon the point whereof he bare the keies of the caſtell, and ſo iſſued forth at the gates, riding directlie towards the Scotiſh campe. They that warded, miſtruſting no harme, brought him with great noiſe and clamour vnto the kings tent. Who hearing the noiſe, came forth of his pauilion to vnderſtand what the matter ment. The Engliſhman herewith couched his ſtaffe, as though it had bene to the end that the king might receiue the keies which he had brought. And whileſt all mens eies were earneſt in beholding the keies, the Engliſhman ran the king through the left eie, and ſuddenlie daſhing his ſpurres to his horſſe, eſcaped to the nert wood out of all danger. The point of the ſpeare entered ſo farre into the kings head, that immediatlie falling downe amongſt his men, hée yeelded vp the ghoſt. This was the end of king Malcolme in the midſt of his armie.

The Scots after the ſlaughter of their king, brake vp their campe, and buried his bodie within the abbeie of Tinmouth in England. But his ſonne Alexander cauſed it afterwards to be taken vp, and buried in Dunfermling before the altar of the Trinitie. At the ſame time was Scotland wounded with another miſhap. In the same yeere, manie vncouth things came to passe, and were séene in Albion. By the high springtides which chanced in the Almaine seas, manie townes, castels, and woods were drowned, as well in Scotland as in England. After the ceassing of which tempest, the lands that sometime were earle Godwins (of whome ye haue heard before) lieng not farre from the towne of Sandwich, by violent force and drift of the sea, were made a sand-bed, and euer sithens haue bene called Godwins sands. The people haue thought that this vengeance came to that péece of ground being possessed by his posteritie, for the wicked slaughter of Alured, which he traitorouslie contriued. Also Veremond a Spanish priest, but dwelling in Scotland, florished about the same time, and wrote the Scotish historie, whome Hector Boetius so much followeth. Malcolme had by his wife quéene Margaret (otherwise called for hir holinesse of life saint Margaret) six sonnes, Edward (as is said) was slaine: Ethelred, which died in his tender age, and was buried in Dunfermling: and Edmund which renounced the world, and liued an holie life in England: the other three were named Edgar, Alexander, and Dauid. There be that write how Edmund was taken, and put to death by his vncle Donald Bane, when he inuaded the kingdome, and vsurped the crowne, after the decease of his brother king Malcolme, and so then was Edgar next inheritor to the crowne.

Donald Bane

This Donald Bane, who (as before is mentioned) fled into the Iles to eschue the tyrannicall malice of Makbeth, after he once heard that his brother king Malcolme was dead, returned into Scotland by support of the king of Norwaie, vnto whom he couenanted to giue the dominion of all the Iles, if by his means & furtherance he might obteine the crowne of Scotland. Herevpon landing with an armie in the realme, he found small resistance, and so with little ado receiued the crowne. For manie of the people abhorring the riotous maners and superfluous gormandizing brought in among them by the Englishmen, were willing inough to receiue this Donald for their king, trusting (bicause he had béene brought vp in the Iles with the old customes and maners of their ancient nation, without tast of the English likerous delicats) they should by his seuere order in gouernement recouer againe the former temperance of their old progenitors.

The respect that the people had to receiue Donald Bane for their king.

As sone as Edgar Etheling brother to Quéene Margaret was aduertised that Donald Bane had thus vsurped the crowne of Scotland, he sent secretlie for his three nephues, Edgar, Alexander, and Dauid, with two sisters which they had, to come vnto him into England, where he had not kept them anie long while, but that a knight whose name was Organ or Orgar, accused him of treason, alledging how he nourished his sisters sonnes and daughters within the realme, in hope to make them inheritors to the crowne: but the malice of this false surmize remained not vnpunished, for one of Edgars friends, taking in hand to darraine battell with Organ, in defense of Edgars innocencie, slue him within lists. After that Donald had receiued the crowne at the abbeie of Scone, he perceiued that some of the nobles grudged at his preferment, shewing by some tokens that they had more affection vnto king Malcolmes children, than vnto him: and therefore he cast out a word amongst his familiars, that yet it were long the nobles should repent them of their doing, if they applied not them selues the more to his opinion.

Donald threatneth.

Which words being marked, and deepelie imprinted in some of their hearts, turned afterwards to his great displeasure. For shortlie after came Duncane the bastard sonne of king Malcolme out of England into Scotland, supported with an armie of men appointed by king William the Red, to place him in the kingdome, and to expell Donald out of the same by force of armes, if he attempted anie resistance. Now when Donald approched with his puissance, in purpose to haue giuen battell, the most part of his people did forsake him, and drew vnto Duncans side, so that Donald thus abandoned of them that should haue aided him, was constreined for his refuge to flee againe into the westerne Iles: and so Duncane then comming vnto Scone, receiued the crowne of Scotland. But for that he had béene trained the most part of his life in the warres both in England and France, he had small skill in ciuill gouernement, iudging that thing onelie to stand with iustice, which was decided with speare and shield. By reason whereof Scotland was shortlie filled with new troubles and seditious diuisions.

Donald Bane being aduertised of all those things, that thereby happened in Scotland, sollicited Makpender erle of Mernes to take his part, and by some meanes to slea K. Duncane, which enterprise Makpender taking in hand, at length (in Menteth) accomplished the same in the night season, when he had espied such aduantage and opportunitie of time, that not so much as one man was found to pursue him. But to say the truth, Duncane was so farre out of the peoples fauor, that more reioised than were sorie for his death. After he was thus dispatched, his vncle Donald was restored againe to the kingdome, chiefliе by support of the forenamed Makpender, after his nephue the foresaid Duncane had reigned one yeere and an halfe, where Donald himselfe had reigned (before he was expelled by his said nephue) the space of six moneths, and now after he had recouered the kingdome, he continued in the regiment thereof three yeeres, not without great trouble and intestine commotions: for the most part of the lords maligning his aduancement, sought occasions dailie to depose him.

In the meane time the Flandrens made some stirre, neither did the warres with England ceasse, (though without anie great exploit or enterprise worthie of remembrance) sauing a few light skirmishes betwixt the parties, as occasion serued. At length came Magnus king of Norwaie with a great fléet, and sailing about the westerne Iles, garnished all the strengths within them in most defensible wise, with men, munition, and vittels, vsurping the dominion as souereigne lord of the same Iles: and at the same time ordeined those lawes and constitutions,

Then Edgar by counſell of his vncle Edgar Etheling, purchaſing an aid of men at the hands of king William Rufus, ſet forwards toward Scotland. At his coming to Durham, he was admoniſhed by a viſion in his ſléepe, that if he tooke with him the banner of ſaint Cutbert, he ſhould haue victorie. On the morrow after, he came into the abbeie church, where firſt hearing diuine ſeruice, when the ſame was ended, he diſplaied the foreſaid banner, and cauſed it to be borne before him in that iournie. Neuertheles king Donald met him with a mightie armie, and after long fight, was chaſed into the Iles, where he was taken and brought vnto Edgar. ¶ Some ſay that when the battels were readie to haue ioined, his men beholding the banner of ſaint Cutbert ſpred againſt them, immediatlie forſooke him, ſo that he being deſtitute of ſuccour, fled, in purpoſe to haue ſaued himſelfe in ſome one of the weſterne Iles: but being apprehended by the inhabitants, was brought (as is ſaid) vnto Edgar, by whome he was (howſoeuer the hap of his taking chanced) caſt immediatlie into priſon, wherein he ſhortlie after died. The victorie thus atchiued, Edgar went vnto Edenburgh, and from thence vnto Dunfermeling to viſit the ſepultures of his mother and brethren.

Afterwards comming to the abbeie of Scone, and aſſembling the lords of the realme, he receiued the crowne, and ſhortlie after was annointed by the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews named Godrike, in the yéere of our redemption 1101. For his mother queene Margaret purchaſed a little before hir death of Urbane the pope, that from henceforth all the kings of Scotland ſhould be annointed. This priuiledge was confirmed afterwards by pope Iohn the ſecond of that name. The firſt king that was annointed according to that grant, was this Edgar, in the yere aforeſaid. About two yéers before this Edgar recouered thus the crowne of Scotland, was that generall paſſage made into the holie land vnder Godfrie of Bullongne, and other chriſtian princes.

Amongſt them, as one of the chiefe, Robert duke of Normandie went, and ſhould haue béene created king of Ieruſalem, had he not at the ſame time heard how his brother William Rufus the king of England was ſlaine by chance, through glanſing of an arrow ſhot at a déere in the new forreſt; and then hoping to ſucceéd him in the kingdom of England, he preferred that honor to the other, wherein he ſaw to be more trauell than gaine. But at his coming home, he found that his yongeſt brother Henrie ſurnamed Beauclerke, was placed in the kingdome of England, and ſo was duke Robert his hope fruſtrate of both the kingdomes, and that worthilie (as moſt men thought) for that he refuſed ſo neceſſarie a dignitie, wherein he might haue ſerued the common cauſe of the chriſtian common-wealth. Vnto Henrie Beauclerke in the ſecond yere of his reigne king Edgar maried one of his ſiſters called Mauld. The other named Marie he coupled with Euſtace earle of Bullongne: in which mariage was borne a daughter that was the onelie heire of the ſame Euſtace in the countie of Bullongne, the which when ſhe came to womans ſtate, was maried vnto Stephan earle of March in England, and of Morteigne in France, nephue to Henrie Beauclerke by his ſiſter. The king of England Henrie, had iſſue by quéene Mauld, two ſonnes and two daughters, William and Richard, Euſame and Mauld.

But now to returne to king Edgar, to ſhew ſome token of thanks towards ſaint Cutbert for his aid ſhewed, as was thought, in the battell againſt his vncle Donald, he gaue vnto the monks of Durham the lands of Coldingham: and to the biſhop of Durham called Canulph, he gaue the towne of Berwike. But for that the ſame biſhop wrought afterwards treaſon againſt him, he loſt that gift, and the king reſumed that towne into his hands againe. I do not find that Edgar had anie warres anie waie forth during all the time of his reigne, a prince rather reuerenced than dreaded amongſt his ſubiects for his ſingular equitie and vpright dealing. He departed out of this life at Dundée, in the 9 yéere of his reigne, and after the birth of our Sauiour 1107.

Alexander.

After the deceaſſe of this Edgar, ſucceéded his brother Alexander the fierce, ſo called for his rigorous valiancie in purſuing of théeues and robbers. In the beginning of his reigne, the inhabitants of Murrey land and Roſſe, beholding him to be moſt an end in the church at his praiers, and diuine ſeruice, after the maner of his parents, ſuppoſed he would proue no great quicke ſufficier in puniſhing offendors, and therevpon moſt preſumptuouſlie they began to rob and reaue on ech ſide, not ſparing to kill and ſlea all ſuch as came in their hands, without reſpect to age or ſex; inſomuch that the yong infants ſmiling vpon the murtherers, being about to execute their deteſtable crueltie, paſſed by the ſword as well as the reſiſters: ſuch rooted malice remained in their beaſtlie harts, which vpon renewing their old grudges they now accordinglie ſhewed. King Alexander therefore aduertiſed hereof, came into thoſe parts with a competent armie, and apprehending the chiefe authors and capteins, ſtroke off their heads. As he returned backe through Mernes, there came a woman vnto him weéping in moſt lamentable ſort, who fell vpon hir knées at his féet, beſéeching him to pitie hir caſe, hauing loſt both hir huſband & ſonne, by the tyrannous crueltie of the maiſter of Mernes, who for that they had called him before a iudge in an action of debt, had ſlaine and murthered as well the one as the other. The king moued with this deteſtable kind of iniurie, lighted from his horſſe, and would not mount vp againe, till he had ſéene the author of that heinous treſpaſſe hanged vp on a gibbet. After his comming into Gowrie, he tooke in hand to finiſh and make vp the caſtell of Baledgar, the foundation whereof his brother Edgar had begun, that it might be an aid to chaſtiſe a ſort of théeues and robbers which haunted the woods thereabout, to the great diſquietnes of all the countrie. He gaue alſo to the maintenance of that houſe certeine lands, which the earle of Gowrie had giuen him at the font ſtone, when he became his godfather.

Neuertheleſſe, ſuch purſute was made after them, that manie of them were apprehended, & vpon their examination, being brought before the king, they declared plainlie how they were incouraged to worke that treaſon which they had gone about, by ſundrie great barons and gentlemen of the countrie. Finallie, the matter was ſo handled with them, that they diſcloſed the names of thoſe that had thus procured them to the treaſon. Whereupon the king gathering an armie, he marched forth to purſue them, but before he came vnto the water of Spaie, the conſpirators had gotten togither their power, & were lodged on the further ſide of the ſame water, to ſtop him from paſſing ouer.

The king ſéeing them thus aſſembled to impeach his paſſage, ſent his banner-man ſir Alexander Carron with a choſen part of his armie to paſſe the water, and to fight with his enimies, where, by the hardie onſet of the ſaid ſir Alexander, they were quicklie put to flight, and manie of them that were taken in the chaſe ſuffered death, according as they had well deſerued. The realme after this execution done on theſe offendors, continued manie yéeres after in good tranquillitie. This Alexander Carron alſo for that he was ſéene in the kings ſight that day to fight moſt manfullie, in ſleaing diuerſe of the rebels with a crooked ſword which he had in his hand (of which ſort manie were vſed in thoſe daies) he was highlie rewarded at the kings hands, & euer after named Skrimgeour, that is to ſay, An hardie fighter. After that king Alexander had appeaſed the inteſtine commotions thus within his realme, he ſet in hand to repare the abbeie of Scone, wherein he placed regular canons, dedicating the church in the honor of the Trinitie, and ſaint Michaell. Not long after this alſo, he chanced to come into ſaint Colmes Inch, where he was conſtreined to abide three daies togither through violent rage of weather and tempeſts: and becauſe he found ſome relieſe of meate & drinke, by meanes of an heremit that dwelt within the ſame Inch, and kept a chappell there dedicated to ſaint Colme, he made of that chappell an abbeie of regular canons, in the honor of ſaint Colme, endowing it with ſundrie lands and rents for the maintenance of the abbat and conuent of that houſe. He alſo gaue to the church of ſaint Andrewes, the lands called the Boarrinke, ſo named, for that a great boare was ſlaine vpon the ſaid ground, that had done much hurt in the countrie thereabout. Whileſt king Alexander was thus occupied in building and reparing of religious houſes, his brother Dauid liued in England with his ſiſter quéene Mauld, & through fauour which the king hir huſband bare towards him, he obteined in marriage one Mauld, daughter vnto Woldoſius, or rather Waltheof earle of Huntington and Northumberland, begot of his wife the ladie Judith that was neece vnto king William the Conqueror. And for that the ſaid Woldoſius or Waltheof had no other iſſue to inherit his lands, Dauid in right of his wife Mauld inioied the ſame, and was made earle of Huntington and Northumberland, and had iſſue by his wife a ſon named Henrie, by whome the lands of Huntington, and ſome part of Northumberland were annexed vnto the crowne of Scotland, as after ſhall appéere. Mauld the daughter of king Henrie Beauclerke, was maried vnto Henrie the emperor, the fourth of that name. Their mother the ſaid Mauld was before that time departed out of this life. It was not long after, but that Alexander deceaſſed alſo, and was buried in Dunfirmling beſides his fathers ſepulture, in the 17 yéere of his reigne complet, and from the incarnation of Chriſt 1125 yéeres.

In the daies of this king Alexander, the kinred of the Cummings had their beginning, by one John Cumming, a man of great proweſſe and valiancie, obteining of the king in reſpect therof, certeine ſmall portions of lands in Scotland. The houſe of theſe Cummings roſe in proceſſe of time thus from a ſmall beginning to high honor and puiſſance, by reaſon of the great poſſeſſions & ample reuenues which they afterwards atteined. At length (as often happeneth) the importable height of this linage was the onelie cauſe of the decaie and finall ruine therof, as in the ſequele of this hiſtorie ye may at full perceiue. Also in the daies of king Alexander, the order of knights of the Rhodes had their beginning, and likewiſe the order of White monks, the author whereof was one Nodobert. About the ſame time liued that holie man Richard de ſancto Victore, a Scotiſhman borne, but dwelled for the more part of his time at Paris in France, where he died, & was buried within the cloiſter of the abbeie of ſaint Victor, being a brother of the ſame houſe.

But now to proceed with the hiſtorie. After the deceaſſe of Alexander the fierce and firſt of that name, his brother Dauid came vnto Scone, and there receiued the crowne, as lawfull heire to his brother, for that he left no heire behind him. This Dauid, according to the example of his noble parents, ſet his whole care about the due miniſtring of iuſtice, to the honor of almightie God, and the weale of his realme. He had no trouble by warres with anie forraine enimies, ſo long as king Henrie Beauclerke liued. Therefore hauing opportunitie of ſuch a quiet time, he rode about all the parts of his realme, and vſed to ſit in hearing of iudgement himſelfe, ſpeciallie concerning poore mens cauſes and matters: but the controuerſies of the lords and barons he referred to the hearing of other iudges. If he vnderſtood that anie man were indamaged by anie wrongfull iudgement, he recompenſed the partie wronged, according to the value of his loſſe and hindehinderance, with the gods of the iudge that pronounced the iudgement.

Banketting geare banished.

Thus in the firſt years of his reigne he did manie things to the aduancement of the common-wealth, and baniſhed ſuch banketting cheare as was vſed amongſt his people after the example of the Engliſhmen, perceiuing the ſame to breed a great weakening & decaie of the ancient ſtoutneſſe of ſtomach, that was wont to remaine in the Scotiſh nation.

King Dauid built 15 abbeies.

He builded to the number of fiftéene abbeies, part of them in the beginning of his reigne before the warres were begun which he had with the Engliſhmen, and part after the ſame warres were ended.

The names of the abbeies builded by king Dauid.

The names of thoſe abbeies are as followeth: Holie rood houſe, Kelſo, Jedburgh, Melroſſe, Newbottell, Holmecultrane, Dundranane, Cambuſkenneth, Kinlois, Dunfirmling, Holme in Cumberland; alſo two nunries, the one at Carleill, and the other at north Berwike: with two abbeies beſide Newcaſtell, the one of ſaint Benedicts order, and the other of white monkes. He erected alſo foure biſhoprikes within his realme, Roſſe, Brechin, Dunkeld, and Dublane, indowing them with rich rents, faire lands, and ſundrie right commodious poſſeſſions. Moreouer he tranſlated the biſhops ſee of Murthlake vnto Aberden, for ſundrie aduiſed conſiderations, augmenting it with certeine reuenues, as he thought expedient.

Foure biſhopries erected in Scotland.

He was admoniſhed (as the report goeth) in his ſléepe, that he ſhuld build an abbeie for a religious order to liue in togither. Wherevpon he ſent for workemen into France and Flanders, and ſet them in hand to build this abbeie of canons regular, as he was admoniſhed, dedicating it in the honor of a croſſe (wherevnto he bare ſpeciall deuotion) for that verie ſtrangelie it ſlipped into his hands (on a time) as he was purſuing and following of a hart in the chaſe. But inough of theſe monkiſh deuiſes.

Holie rood houſe builded.

Manie prudent men blame greatlie the vnmeaſurable liberalitie of king Dauid, the which he vſed towards the church, in diminiſhing ſo hugelie the reuenues of the crowne, being the cauſe that manie noble princes his ſucceſſors haue come to their finall ends, for that they haue béene conſtreined through want of treaſure to maintéine their roiall eſtates, to procure the fall of ſundrie great houſes, to poſſeſſe their lands and liuings; alſo to raiſe paiments and exactions of the common people, to the vtter impoueriſhment of the realme. And ſometime they haue béene conſtreined to inuade England by warres, as deſperat men, not caring what came of their liues. Otherwhiles they haue béene inforced to ſtampe naughtie monie, to the great preiudice of the common-wealth. All which miſchiefes haue followed ſince the time that the church hath béene thus inriched, and the crowne impoueriſhed.

Liberalitie in king Dauid toward the church reprooued.

The church inriched, and the crowne impoueriſhed.

Therefore king James the firſt, when he came to king Dauid his ſepulture at Dunfirmling, he ſaid, that he was a fore ſaint for the crowne, meaning that he left the church ouer-rich, and the crowne too poore. For he tooke from the crowne (as Iohn Maior writeth in his chronicles) 60 thouſand pounds Scotiſh of yéerelie reuenues, wherewith he indowed thoſe abbeies. But if K. Dauid had conſidered how to nouriſh true religion, he had neither indowed churches with ſuch riches, nor built them with ſuch roialtie: for the ſuperfluous poſſeſſions of the church (as they are now vſed) are not onelie occaſion to euill prelats to liue in moſt inſolent pompe & corrupt life, but an aſſured net to draw gold and ſiluer out of realms. But now to returne where I left, touching the hiſtorie, ye ſhall note that (as I ſaid before) Dauid had by his wife Mauld inheritor of part of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Huntington, a ſonne named Henrie, who maried the earle of Warrens daughter, a ladie of high parentage, as deſcended of moſt noble bloud both French and Engliſh. On whome he begat three ſonnes, Malcolme, William, and Dauid; alſo three daughters, Adhama, Margaret, and Mauld. But now in the meane time, whileſt the eſtate of the common-wealth in Scotland ſtood in high felicitie, vnder the proſperous gouernement of king Dauid, there happened to him an heauie loſſe. For the quéene his wife the foreſaid Mauld deceaſſed in hir flouriſhing age, a woman of paſſing beautie and chaſtitie, which two points (as is thought) commend a woman aboue all the reſt. King Dauid therefore tooke ſuch griefe for hir death, that he would neuer after giue his mind to marie anie other, but paſſed the reſidue of his life without companie of all women. She was buried in Scone, in the yeare of our Lord God 1132.

Whileſt theſe things came thus to paſſe in Scotland, Henrie Beauclerke king of England, cauſed all the nobles of his realme to take their oths, that after his deceaſſe they ſhould receiue his daughter Mauld the empreſſe for their ſouereigne ladie and quéene. She was as then returned into England; for hir huſband the emperour was latelie before deceaſſed. King Dauid alſo tooke his oth, and therefore when king Stephan (who vſurped the crowne of England after king Henries deceaſſe againſt the ſaid empreſſe) ſent vnto king Dauid to come and do his homage for the earledomes of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Huntington (according as by his tenure he was bound to do) with intimation that if he refuſed, king Stephan would inuade him with open warre; king Dauid anſwered, that he had giuen his faith once aforehand for thoſe lands vnto the empreſſe Mauld, which he minded not to breake for the threatning words of anie new inuaſions. King Stephan moued with this anſwere, ſent a power of men to the borders of Northumberland, (which as then was vnder the dominion of the Scots) to make a rode vpon the inhabitants of that countrie. They that had the charge of this enterpriſe, entering into the lands of their enimies, put all to fire and ſword that came in their way. The Scots kindled with that diſpleaſure, roded into England, and did the like diſpleaſures and hurts there. For the yeare after, the earles of March, Menteth, and Angus entred into England with a great armie, againſt whome came the earle of Gloceſter, and giuing them battell at Northalerton, loſt the field, and was taken priſoner himſelfe, with diuers other nobles of England. King Stephan therefore, conſtreined to redéeme the captiues, gaue not onelie a great ſumme of monie for them; but alſo made reſignation of all ſuch title, claime, or intereſt, as either he or anie of his ſucceſſors might make or pretend to the counties of Northumberland and Cumberland. Howbeit his nobles were no ſooner returned home, but that repenting him of that reſignation, he gathered his puiſſance againe, and entering into Northumberland, fought with the Scots that came forth to reſiſt him, and obteining the victorie, tooke a great part of the countrie into his poſſeſſion.

King Dauid, to redreſſe theſe iniuries, gathered a mightie armie, with deliberat mind, either to expell the Engliſhmen out of all the bounds of his dominions, or elſe to die in the fæld. But ſhortlie after, Thurſtane archbiſhop of Yorke came vnto Roxburgh, called in thoſe daies Marken, to treat for peace, where a truce was concluded for three moneths, with condition, that the Engliſhmen ſhould deliuer vp the dominion of Northumberland vnto the lord Henrie king Dauid his ſonnes. But for ſo much much as this couenant was not performed on king Stephans ſide, king Dauid inuaded that part of the countrie which the Engliſhmen held, making great ſlaughter of all them that he found there about to reſiſt him. King Stephan moued herewith leuied his people, and came in puiſſant araie vnto Rorburgh; but for that he had ſecret knowledge that ſome of the nobles in his armie ſought his deſtruction, he was conſtreined to returne without atchiuing of anie worthie enterpriſe.

The yeare next inſuing, a peace was talked vpon, the archbiſhops of Canturburie and Yorke appointed commiſſioners in the treatie thereof on the behalfe of king Stephan, and the biſhops of Glaſcow, Aberden, and ſaint Andrews on the part of king Dauid. But Mauld queene of England, the daughter of Euſtace earle of Bullongne, and neece to king Dauid by his ſiſter Marie, was the chiefeſt doer in this matter, to bring them to agréement. The one of the kings, that is to ſay Stephan, laie at Dureſme with his nobles; and the other, that is to ſay Dauid, lay at Newcaſtell, during all the time of this treatie, which at length ſorted to the concluſion of a peace, on theſe conditions: that the counties of Northumberland and Huntington ſhould remaine in the gouernement of Henrie prince of Scotland, as heire to the ſame by right of his mother; but Cumberland ſhould be reputed as the inheritance and right of his father king Dauid. And for theſe lands and ſegniories the forenamed prince Henrie & his ſucceſſors, princes of Scotland, ſhould do homage vnto king Stephan and his ſucceſſors kings of England, for the time being.

The peace thus ratified betwixt the two kings and their ſubiects, K. Stephan returned into Kent, and king Dauid repaired into Cumberland, where he fortified the towne of Carleill with new walles and ditches. Thus paſſed the firſt three yeares of king Stephans reigne. In the fourth yeare came Mauld the empreſſe into England to claime the crowne thereof (as in the Engliſh hiſtorie more plainelie may appeare.) But whileſt England was ſore tormented with warres by contrarie factions of the nobles for the quarels of theſe two perſons, no ſmall ſorrow hapned to Scotland for the death of Henrie the prince of that land, and onelie ſonne vnto king Dauid, who died at Kelſo, and was buried in the abbeie church there, in the yeare of our redemption, 1152. His death was greatlie bemoned aſwell of his father the king, as of all other the eſtates and degrées of the realme, for ſuch ſingular vertue and noble conditions as appeared in him. But yet, for that he left iſſue behind him three ſonnes and three daughters (as before is mentioned) the realme was not thought vnprouided of heires.

The death of Henrie prince of Scotland.

Prince Henrie his iſſue.

The king alſo being mortified from the world, tooke the death of his ſonne verie patientlie, conſidering that all men are ſubiect vnto death by the law of nature, and are ſure no longer to remaine here, than their day appointed by the eternall determination of him that giueth and taketh away life & breath when it pleaſeth him, as by dailie experience is moſt maniſeſt. Therefore that king Dauid weied the loſſe of his ſonne in ſuch balance, it may appeare by an oration which he made to his nobles, at what time (after his ſonnes deceaſſe) they came to comfort him. For he perceiuing them to be right heauie and ſorrowfull for the loſſe which he and they had ſuſteined by the death of ſo towardlie a prince, that was to haue ſucceéded him, if God had lent him life thereto; in the end of a roiall feaſt, the which he made vnto thoſe nobles that came thus to viſit him, he began in this wiſe.

The lawes of nature.

An oration.

How great your fidelitie and care is, which you beare towards me, although oftentimes heretofore I haue proued it, yet this preſent day I haue receiued moſt ample fruit thereof: for now do I plainelie ſée, that you lament no leſſe for the loſſe of my late deceſſed ſonne, than if you had buried ſome one of your owne ſonnes, and are therefore come to your great trauell and paine to comfort me, whome you eſteéme to be ſore afflicted for the ouer-timelie death of my ſaid moſt obedient ſonne. But to let paſſe for this time due yéelding of thanks to you for the ſame, till occaſion and leaſure may better ſerue thereto; this now may ſuffice, that I acknowledge my ſelfe to be ſo much beholden to you, that whatſoeuer thing I haue in the world, the ſame is readie to do you pleaſure. But concerning the cauſe of your comming hither, in ſhewing your courteſies therein, you ſhall vnderſtand, that my parents, whom I truſt to be in heauen, and (as ſaints) inioy the fruits of their vertuous trauels here taken on earth, did ſo inſtruct me from my tender youth, that I ſhould worſhip with all reuerence the moſt wiſe creator and prudent gouernor of all things; and to thinke that nothing was done by him in vaine, but that the ſame is prouided and ordeined to ſome good vſe by his high and vnſearchable counſell. And therefore whileſt day and night I haue and do reuolue and call to remembrance the precepts and inſtructions of my parents, whatſoeuer hath chanced either tuching aduerſitie or proſperitie, good hap or bad, the ſame hath ſéemed to me (at the firſt) receiuing all things with equall and thankefull mind, and interpreting them to the beſt, farre more light than they commonlie ſéeme to others; and leſſe they did diſquiet me: ſo as with vſe I haue learned at length, not onelie patientlie to beare all aduerſities that may happen, but alſo to receiue the ſame as things pleaſant and euen to be deſired. And verelie my hap hath béene to be greatlie exerciſed in this behalfe, for I haue firſt ſéene my father, more déere to me than anie earthlie treaſure; and no leſſe profitable than greatlie deſired of all the people: and yet neither the loue of the people, nor of his kinſmen and friends might warrant him from this fatall neceſſitie of death. I haue knowen my mother right famous in the world for hir ſingular vertue to paſſe hence in like maner. My brethren that were ſo louing, and againe ſo greatlie beloued of me; alſo my wife whome I eſteémed aboue all other creatures, are they not gone the ſame way, and compelled to beare deaths hard ordinance? So verelie ſtandeth the caſe, that no man might yet at anie time auoid the violence of his force when he commeth, for we all alike owe this life vnto him, as a due debt that muſt néeds be paid. But this is to be receiued with a thankefull mind, in that the bountifull benevolence of our God hath granted that we ſhall be all immortall, if we our ſelues through vice, & as it were ſpotted with filthie diſeaſes of the mind, do not fall into the danger of eternall death. Wherefore of right (me thinke) I haue cauſe to reioiſe, that God by his ſingular fauour hath granted to me ſuch a ſonne, which in all mens iudgements was worthie to be beloued whileſt he was here amongſt vs, and to be wiſhed for now, after he is departed from hence. But ought we to take it heauilie, that he to whome he belonged, and who had lent him vnto vs, ſhould call for him againe, and take him that was his owne? For what iniurie is it, if (when I ſée occaſion) I ſhall aſke that againe, which you haue poſſeſſed through my benefit as lent to you for a time? Neither do I truſt to want him long, if God ſhall be ſo mercifull vnto me, as I wiſh him to be: for I hope ſhortlie to be called hence by commandement of that moſt high king, and to be caried vp to reſt among that fellowſhip of heauenlie ſpirits, where I ſhall

Death cannot be diſpenſed with.

Why we ought to take the death of our children and friends patientlie.

cc shall find my father and mother, my brethren, wife, and sonne in far better estate than here I knew cc them. Therefore that I may repeate it once againe, cc I reioise (I say) to haue obteined in my sonne, by cc the grace of the supernall God, that I am assured by cc faith, he is alreadie in that place to the which all we cc do earnestlie wish that we may atteine, and do in- cc deuour by all means, that when the time commeth cc in which our soules are to be losed forth of these cc fraile bodies of ours, as out of prisons, they may be found worthie of that companie, in which our confi- cc dence is that he now most blissefullie is remaining. cc Except anie man may thinke that we are so enui- cc ous, that therefore we do lament, because as yet cc we sticke fast ouerwhelmed and drowned in such fil- cc thie miers, and cumbred in such thornie thickets and cc bushes, out of the which he (being now deliuered of all cares) hath escaped. But let vs rather by follow- cc ing the footsteps of him and other vertuous persons cc that are gone afore vs, labor both day and night, that cc at length (through heauenlie fauour) we may come cc to the place where we do reckon that by diuine power he is alreadie arriued.

After that the king had made an end of his oration, and thanks giuen to God for his bountifull magnificence, they rose from the table, and departed to their lodgings, they all greatlie marueling at the kings high prudence and godlie wisdome. Then was Malcolme, the eldest sonne of the before mentioned prince Henrie, proclamed in his place prince of Scotland, and conueied through the most parts of the realme by Duncane earle of Fife, and other of the nobles appointed to attend vpon and to receiue the oths of all the barons for their allegiance in his name. William the second sonne of prince Henrie was conueied into Northumberland by the foresaid nobles, and there proclamed and created earle of that countrie. Then went king Dauid himselfe vnto Carleill, where he met with Henrie the sonne of the empresse, who receiued the order of knighthod there at his hands. This was a little before that the same Henrie came to an agréement with king Stephan, whereby he was admitted to the possession of halfe the realme of England, and promised by oth of assurance (as the Scotish writers say) that he should neuer go about to take the countries of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Huntington from the crowne of Scotland.

Shortlie after was king Dauid taken with a sore disease and maladie, which continued with him to the end of his life. And so when he perceiued himselfe to wax faint and feeble, he required to be borne in to the church, where he receiued the sacrament of the Lords bodie and bloud, with most solemne reuerence: and then being brought againe to his chamber, he called togither his nobles, and commending to them his yong nephues, the sons of his son the forenamed prince Henrie, he kissed ech one of them after an other, most instantlie desiring them in the honor of almightie God, to séeke the preseruation of common quiet, to the aduancement of the publike weale. This done, he departed out of this life in the 29 yeare of his reigne, or rather in the 30 yeare, if he reigned 29 and two moneths, as Iohn Maior saith. His bodie was buried in Dunfirmeling, after the incarnation of Christ our Sauiour 1153 yeares.

How farre this prince king Dauid excelled in noble vertues and sober conuersation of life, I haue thought it better to passe ouer with silence, than to go about in few words to comprehend that, wherein if I should spend much time, I were not able in anie wise worthilie to performe. For where in such cases few things are slenderlie shewed, the residue may séeme to be omitted though fault of the writer.

But yet this is not to be forgotten, that where his singular pitifull regard, which he had toward the releefe of the poore, passed all other his notable vertues, he purged his court also in such wise of all vicious rule and misordered customes, that his whole familie was giuen onelie to the exercise of vertue. No riotous banketting nor surfetting chére was vsed amongst them, no lasciuious word heard come forth of anie mans mouth, nor yet anie wanton signes shewed to prouoke sensuall lust or carnall concupiscence. All the words, works, and whole demeanor of his seruants tended to some conclusion: nothing moued to stirre strife or sedition, but all things ordered in such friendlie and peaceable sort, that the chaine of brotherly loue séemed to haue linked them all in one mind and will. Such a rule was their maister king Dauid vnto them and all other, to direct and frame a perfect and godlie life after.

Malcolme

KIng Dauid being dead & buried (as is before said) Malcolme nephue to him by his son Henrie succéeded in the estate. He was but 13 yéeres of age, when he began his reigne; but yet his modestie and vertuous conditions were such, that all men conceiued a good hope that he would proue a right noble and worthie prince. He was nourished and brought vp in such vertue, euen from his infancie, that delting in chast conuersation and cleannesse of bodie and mind, he liued single all the daies of his life, and without mariage: wherefore he was surnamed Malcolme the maid. About the time of his entring into the possession of the crowne, there was a great derth through all the bounds of Scotland. And sone after followed a sore death both amongst men and beasts, though it was not perceiued that the disease whereof they died was anie thing contagious.

A death not contagious.

Hereof did one Somerled the thane of Argile take occasion to attempt an higher enterprise than stood with the baseneslie of his linage and estate: for considering that the one halfe of the realme was consumed by mortalitie, and the other halfe néere hand famished through lacke of food, he thought it an easie matter for him, now whilest the king was vnder yéeres of ripe discretion, to vsurpe the gouernance of the realme into his owne hands, and so assembling togither an huge companie of such as in hope of preie lightlie consented to his opinion, bécame forwards, to make as it were a full conquest, sleaing and spoiling all such in his way as went about to resist him. But his presumptuous enterprise was shortlie represt: for Gilcrist earle of Angus lieutenant of the kings armie, raised to resist Somerleids attempts, incountred with him in battell, & slue 2000 of his men. Somerleid hauing receiued this ouerthrow, and escaping from the field, fled into Ireland, and so saued his life.

Gilcrist sent with an armie against Somerleid.

Henrie the second of that name king of England, hearing that Malcolme had thus subdued his domesticall enimies, feared least he being imboldened therewith, should now attempt somewhat against the Englishmen; and therefore by counsell of his nobles, he sent an herald vnto king Malcolme, commanding him to come vp to London, there to do his homage vnto him, for the lands of Cumberland, Northumberland, and Huntington, in maner and forme as his grandfather king Dauid had before done vnto his predecessor Henrie the first, with certificat, that if he failed, he would take from him all the said lands. King Malcolme obeied this commandement of king Henrie: but yet vnder condition (as the Scotish writers affirme) that it should in no maner wise preiudice the franchises and liberties of the Scotish kingdome. At the same time king Henrie had warres against Lewes the first, king of France, and so passing ouer into that realme, constreined king Malcolme to go with him in that iornie against his will, notwithstanding that he had a safe conduct frelie to come and go. In this voiage king Henrie did much hurt to the Frenchmen, and at length besieged the citie of Tholouse.

In all which enterprises he had Malcolme present with him, to the end that Malcolme might incurre such hatred and displeasure of the Frenchmen, that therby the bond betwixt them and the Scots might finallie be dissolued. But in the end king Henrie hauing lost diuers of his noble men by sickenesse, returned into England, and then licenced king Malcolme to returne home into Scotland; who at his comming home, sent the bishop of Murrey, and one of his secretaries vnto the see of Rome, as ambassadors vnto the pope, which as then hight Eugenius the third of that name, to recognise the obedience which he owght to the Romane see. Shortlie after also, there was a parlement holden at Scone, where king Malcolme was sore rebuked by his lords, in that he had borne through his owne follie, armor against the Frenchmen their old confederate friends and ancient allies: but king Malcolme excused the matter with humble words, saieng he came vnwarilie into king Henries hands, and therefore might not chose but accomplish his will and pleasure at that time; so that he supposed verelie the French king would take no great displeasure with his doings, when he once vnderstood the truth of the matter.

K. Malcolmes excuse.

King Henrie hauing perfect vnderstanding of this grudge betwixt the Scotish lords and their king, thought to renew the same with more displeasure, and therevpon sent for king Malcolme to come vnto Yorke, to a parlement which he held there, where at his comming he was burdened with a right grieuous complaint surmized against him by king Henrie, for that he should reueale vnto the Frenchmen all the secrets of the English armie, when he was with him in France, at the aboue remembred iournie, alledging the same to be sufficient matter, for the which he ought to forfeit all the lands which he held of the crowne of England, as Cumberland, Northumberland, and Huntington. And though king Malcolme by manie substantiall reasons declared those allegations to be vntrue and vniustlie forged, yet by king Henries earnest inforcing of the matter, sentence was giuen against him, by the generall consent of all the estates there in that parlement assembled. And moreouer, to bring king Malcolme in further displeasure with the nobles, king Henrie gaue notice vnto them, before king Malcolme returned backe into his countrie, how he had of his owne accord renounced all his claime, right, title, and interest, which he had to the foresaid lands, supposing by this means to make king Malcolme farre more odious to all his lieges and subiects, than euer he was before.

Fond dealing and not likelie to be true.

Sentence giuen against K. Malcolme at Yorke.

Malcolme therefore, vpon his returne into his countrie, not vnderstanding anie thing of that subtill contriued policie and slanderous report, was besieged within the castell of Bertha by the thane of Ernedale, and diuerse others. But after it was knowne how euill king Malcolme had beene vsed, and most vntrulie slandered, they desired pardon of their offense, as induced thereto by vntrue reports, which once being granted, they brake vp their siege, and euer after continued in faithfull allegiance like true and most obedient subiects. But king Malcolme sore moued for that he was thus iniuriouslie handled by king Henrie, first desiring restitution to be made of all such things as had beene wrongfullie taken from him, and so deteined by th' Englishmen, proclamed open warres against them. At length, after sundrie harmes done, as well on the one part as the other, they came to a communication in a certeine appointed place, not far from Carleill, where (to be briefe) it was finallie concluded, that K. Malcolme should receiue againe Cumberland and Huntington: but for Northumberland, he should make a plaine release thereof vnto king Henrie, and to his successors for euer.

K. Malcolme hated of his people.

Open warres proclamed against the Englishmen.

A conclusion of agréement.

For the which agréement he ran so farre into the hatred of his people, that he might neuer after find means to win their fauor againe; but doubting least if they should stirre anie rebellion against him, they might become an easie preie vnto the Englishmen, they remained quiet for a time. Howbeit shortlie after, there arose another péece of trouble, though lesse in outward apperance, by reason of the small power remaining in the author, yet dangerous inough, considering it was within the realme it selfe. One Angus as then the thane of Galloway, perceiuing he might not by secret practise atchiue his purposed intent (whatsoeuer the same was) determined by open force to assaie what luckie succes fortune would send him; hoping that those which through feare sate as yet still, would assist him in all his attempts, so soone as they saw anie commotion raised by him to occasion them thereto. Herevpon he assembled together a great companie: but before he could worke anie notable feat, to make anie account of, Gilcrist earle of Angus (whose faithfull valiancie was before manifestlie approued in the suppression of Somerleds rebellion) discomfited his power, in three sundrie bickerings, & chased Angus himselfe into Whiterne, where is a place of sanctuarie priuileged for the safegard of all offendors that flie thereto for succor in the honor of saint Ninian.

Malcolme then, for that he durst not breake the franchises of that place, set a band of men of warre round about it, to watch that he should by no means escape awaie; so that at length wearied as it had bene with long siege, he yéelded himselfe to the king, who taking his sonne to pledge for his good abearing in time to come, licenced him to go whither it should please him: but the most part of his lands and liuings were confiscat to the kings vse. Wherevpon when he saw he might not mainteine his estate as he had done before, he became a canon in Holie rood house, and there ended his life (as it is reported.) It was not long after the pacifieng of this trouble, but that a new rebellion was raised: for the Murrey land men, by the prouocation of their capteine called Gildo, walked with fire and sword the countries of Rosse, Bowgewall, or Bougdale, Mar, Gareoch, Buchquhane, and the Mernes, in more cruell sort than anie forreine & most barbarous nation would haue done; insomuch that when the king sent diuers of his seruants vnto them to vnderstand the cause of their rebellious doings, they slue those messengers, contrarie to the law of nations.

To punish such iniurious attempts, the aboue named Gilcrist was sent with an armie into Murrey land: but the rebels nothing discouraged with the knowledge of his approued prowesse, met him in the field, and put him to flight. Herevpon the king himselfe, supposing that his presence was needfull to incourage his people after this ouerthrow, came with a farre greater power than he had sent forth before, with displaied banner, ouer the riuer of Spele, neere to the mouth whereof he fought with the enimies, and in the end (after sore and long fight continued with great slaughter and bloudshed) he gaue them the ouerthrow, and in reuenge of their cruelties shewed in time of this their rebellion, and to giue example to all other his subiects that should go about to attempt the

In this meane time, Somerleid the thane of Argile, who (as ye haue heard) was fled ouer into Ireland, vpon truſt of the hatred into the which Malcolme was run, with the moſt part of all his nobles and commons, thꝛough this ſlaughter of his people, and namelie of them of Murrey land, he thought to aſſaie foꝛtunes chance once againe, and ſo thereupon returned with certeine Kernes and naked men into Scotland. But this laſt enterpꝛiſe of his came to a moꝛe vnluckie end than the firſt, foꝛ being vanquiſhed in battell at Renfrow, he loſt the moſt part of all his men, and was taken pꝛiſoner himſelfe, and after hanged on a gibbet, by commandement of the king, accoꝛding to that he had iuſtlie merited. Malcolme hauing thus ſubdued his aduerſaries, and being now in reſt and quiet, he ſet his mind wholie to gouerne his realme in vpꝛight iuſtice, and hauing two ſiſters mariable, he coupled the elder named Margaret with Conon duke of Bꝛitaine, and the ponger called Adhama he maried with Flozens earle of Holland.

After this, there was a councell holden at Scone of all the Scotiſh nobilitie, where when they were aſſembled togither in the councell-chamber, Arnold archbiſhop of ſaint Andꝛewes ſtod vp, and by a verie pithie oꝛation, toke vpon him to aduiſe the king to change his purpoſe touching his vow, which (as appéered) he had made to liue chaſt. He declared vnto him by manie weightie reaſons, that it was not onlie neceſſarie foꝛ him and his realme, that he ſhould take a wife (by whome he might raiſe vp ſéed to ſucceed him in the poſſeſſion of the cꝛowne) but alſo that he might not chooſe a moꝛe perfect ſtate of life (conſidering the office wherein he was placed) than matrimonie, being inſtituted, not by this law-maker oꝛ that, but by God himſelfe, who in no one of all his oꝛdinances might erre oꝛ be deceiued. Againe foꝛ pleaſure, he affirmed how nothing could be moꝛe delectable to him, than to haue a woꝛthie ladie to his bedfellow, with whome he might conferre all the conceits of his hart, both of griefe and gladneſſe, ſhe being a comfoꝛt vnto him as well in weale as in woe, an helpe both in ſickneſſe & health, redie to aſſwage anger, and to aduance mirth, alſo to refreſh the ſpirits being wearied oꝛ in anie wiſe faint thꝛough ſtudious trauell and care of mind.

Then ſhewed he what an aid childꝛen were vnto their parents, namelie to kings, how in peace they might gouerne vnder them, to the great commoditie of the common-wealth, and in warre ſupplie their roomes as lieutenants in defenſe of their countries, to the no ſmall terꝛoꝛ of the enimies. Wherefoꝛe ſith men are not boꝛne onelie foꝛ their owne weale, but alſo foꝛ the pꝛofit of their friends, and commoditie of their countrie; it could not be choſen, but that he ought to perſuade with himſelfe to alter his purpoſed intention, concerning the obſeruance of chaſtitie, and to take a wife to the great ioy and comfoꝛt of his ſubiects, ſith it was commendable both before God and man, and ſo neceſſarie withall and pꝛofitable, as nothing might be moꝛe. But theſe and manie other moſt weightie reaſons could nothing moue his conſtant mind, hauing euen from his tender yéeres affianced his virginitie vnto Chriſt, truſting that God would ſo pꝛouide, that the realme ſhould not be deſtitute of conuenient heires, when the time came that it ſhould pleaſe his diuine maieſtie to take him hence to his mercie from amongſt his ſubiects. K. Malcolme might not be perſuaded to take a wife.

Shoꝛtlie after it chanced that king Malcolme fell ſicke, continuing ſo a long time, by reaſon whereof he ſought meanes to conclude a peace with Henrie king of England; which being bꝛought to paſſe, he ſet woꝛkemen in hand to laie the foundation of ſaint Rewles abbeie, which afterwards bare the name of ſaint Andꝛewes. When he had finiſhed this houſe, being a goodlie péece of woꝛke, and verie coſtlie, as may apéere at this day by the view thereof, he aſſigned foꝛth certeine rents foꝛ the ſuſtentation of the canons, whome he placed there of the oꝛder of ſaint Auguſtine, not ſo largelie as ſerued foꝛ the maintenance of ſuperfluous chære, but yet ſufficient foꝛ their neceſſarie finding: by reaſon whereof, the canons of that abbeie liued in thoſe daies in moſt feruent deuotion, hauing no pꝛouocations at all to inoꝛdinate luſts and ſenſuall pleaſures; but onelie giuen to diuine contemplation, without reſpect to auarice, oꝛ inlarging the poſſeſſions and reuenues of their houſe. He founded alſo the abbeie of Couper of the Ciſteaux oꝛder, and indowed it with manie faire lands and wealthie poſſeſſions. Finallie, being vered with long infirmitie, he departed out of this life at Jedburgh the 12 yære of his reigne. A certeine comet oꝛ blaſing ſtarre appéered 14 daies togither befoꝛe his death, with long beames verie terrible to behold. His bodie was buried at Dunfermling, after the incarnation 1185 yéres. After Malcolme ſucceeded his bꝛother William, ſurnamed foꝛ his ſingular iuſtice, the Lion. Shoꝛtlie after his coꝛonation, he ſent ambaſſadoꝛs vnto Henrie king of England, requiring him, that accoꝛding to iuſtice, he would reſtoꝛe vnto him the earledome of Noꝛthumberland, ſith it apperteined by good and lawfull intereſt vnto his inheritance. King Henrie anſwered the meſſengers, that if king William would come vnto London, and there do his homage foꝛ Cumberland and Huntington, he ſhould be aſſured to haue all things ſo oꝛdered, as he reaſonablie could wiſh oꝛ demand. Hereupon king William went into England, and ſo came to London, and after he had done his homage foꝛ Cumberland and Huntington, he required the reſtitution of Noꝛthumberland. But king Henrie made anſwer as then, that foꝛſomuch as the ſame was annexed to the cꝛowne, he might not without the aſſent of all the eſtates of his realme make reſtitution thereof. Notwithſtanding, in the next parlement, he pꝛomiſed to cauſe the matter to be pꝛoponed: and if it came to paſſe that his demand were found to ſtand with reaſon, he would do therein accoꝛding to conſcience, when time expedient ſhould ſeꝛue thereto.

The anſwer of king Henrie.

About the ſame ſeaſon, king Henrie paſſed ouer into Noꝛmandie with an armie, and cauſed king William, with manie other nobles of Scotland, to go with him in that iournie. Foꝛ K. William would not diſobeie his commandement at that pꝛeſent, in hope to atteine in quiet and peaceable maner his ſute touching the reſtitution of Noꝛthumberland (as the Scotiſh wꝛiters do affirme) but in the end, after he had continued a long time with king Henrie, and pꝛceiued no comfoꝛt to recouer his lands, he got licence with much adoo to returne home: and ſo coming backe into England, paſſed thꝛough the realme with with his nobles into Scotland, where he applied his whole indeuour to vnderstand the state of the common-wealth of his subiects, and speciallie he toke order in most diligent wise, to punish cruelties done by theeues and robbers, which vndoubtedlie was one of the most profitable acts that he could deuise to accomplish at that present, considering the state of his realme, as it then stood. For if the damages & skathes committed by theeues and robbers were equallie pondered with the hurts and hinderances which dailie grow by open warre against anie forren nation, it may well appeare, that more harme ariseth, & more heinous cruelties are exercised against the poore and miserable commons and innocent people, by such as liue by rapine & spoiling at home, than by anie outward enimies, be they neuer so fierce and strong in the field. And therefore the prudent consideration of this prince was no lesse to be commended, in that he sought to represse the licentious outrage of such arrand theeues and priuie murtherers, than if he had slaine manie thousands of forren enimies.

Scotland more indamaged by domesticall theeues than by forraine enimies.

When he had once clensed the realme of those misgouerned persons, he sent eftsoones his ambassadors to king Henrie, requiring (as before) to haue Northumberland restored vnto him, with notice giuen, that if he might not haue it with fauour, he would assaie to recouer it by force. King Henrie perceiuing that he must either satisfie king Williams request, either else haue open warres with the Scots, by aduise of his nobles, restored to king William so much of Northumberland as his grandfather K. Malcolme had in possession. King William accepted the offer, but so, as he protested that he receiued not that part in full recompense of the whole which was due vnto him (so saie the Scotish writers) but so as his entier right might alwaies be saued as well to the residue as to that which was then restored. Within few yeeres after, king Henrie feeling what hinderance it was for him to forbeare the commodities of those lands, which were thus deliuered vp to the Scotish kings vse, repented him of that bargaine: and therefore to find some occasion to recouer the same again, he procured his subiects that dwelled vpon the borders, to make forreies into the lands perteining to the Scots, so to prouoke them to battell.

A portion of Northumberland restored to the Scots.

King Henrie repenting him selfe of that which he had deliuered to the Scots seeketh new occasions of warre.

Complaint of these iniuries being brought vnto the warden of the Scotish borders, by such Scots as had lost such goods as were taken awaie by the Englishmen, he sent to demand restitution; but forsomuch as he could haue no towardlie answer, he got together a great number of men, the which entering into the English ground, did much hurt on ech side where they came. At the same time was king Henrie in France, and therefore the Englishmen thought it sufficient to defend themselus as well as they might without attempting anie notable enterprise in reuenge of the displeasures done by the Scots. Harnest was also at hand, and there vpon they ceassed on either part from further inuasions, till the winter season, which passed also without anie exploit atchiued worthie to be remembred; sauing certeine small rodes made by the Scots into the English borders as they saw occasion to serue thereto.

Warres with England.

But in the summer next following, king William raised a mightie armie, and came with the same into Cumberland, the right wing of the which armie was led by Gilcrist, whose approued valiancie often shewed in the time of king Malcolme, had aduanced him to marie with the kings sister. The left wing was assigned vnto the conduct of one Rowland the kings cosen, who was also lieutenant of the borders. The middle ward or battell the king himselfe led. The Englishmen, to the intent they might haue time and leasure to assemble their power, sent vnto king William, offering vnto him, not onelie large summes of monie, if he would returne backe with his armie without further inuasion, but also redresse of all maner of iniuries and wrongs, if anie such on their behalfe were to be proued. But king William for answer hereunto declared, that he had not begun the warre for anie desire he had to monie; neither had he first giuen the occasion, as one that was euer willing to liue vpon his owne: so that if they could be contented to restore Northumberland being his rightfull heritage, he was not so desirous of bloud, but that he would gladlie ceasse from all further attempts.

The answer of king William.

The Englishmen hauing receiued this answer, to the end they might protract the time in sending still to and fro, till they might espie some occasion to worke such feates as they had imagined, addressed forth other ambassadors vnto king William, with diuerse faire offers and golden promises. In the meane time, to take the Scotishmen at some aduantage, they conueie their whole power in the night season neere vnto the place where the same Scotishmen laie in campe, & diuiding themselues into two parts, the one was appointed to abide in the fields, till the sunne were vp, and then to shew themselues to the enimies, to traine them forth to battell: the other companie was laid closelie in a vallie not farre off, to take the aduantage as they saw their time. In the morning about the rising of the sunne, those that were appointed to procure the skirmish, approched so neere to the enimies campe, till they came euen within sight of them. The Scots amazed with the strangenesse of the thing, for that they had not heard before of anie assemblie of the Englishmen, at the first were somewhat afraid: but anon incouraging one another, they boldlie issued forth vpon their enimies, who of purpose (at the first) made but weake resistance, and at length fled amaine, to the intent to cause the Scotishmen to breake their arraie of battell in pursuing them, which they did so egerlie, that they left their king but slenderlie garded with a small companie about him. Then the ambushment lieng in the vallie, brake forth vpon him, according to the order before appointed, and in the meane time, the other that fled cast themselues about, and manlie abode their enimies, so earnestlie laieng it to their charge, that in fine they droue them backe, and constreined them to flee in good earnest, which they themselues had but onelie counterfeited to do before.

The king left but weakelie garded.

King William perceiuing his people thus discomfited, and himselfe inclosed on ech side amongst his enimies, after he had assaied to breake forth on some side from amongst them, when he saw his indeuour could by no meanes preuaile, and that the enimies made onelie at him, he yéelded himselfe. There was not much bloud spilled on either side at this bickering, for the one part in the beginning of the fraie (as ye haue heard) fleeing of set purpose to the place where their ambush laie, escaped without much hurt; and the other, scared by the breaking forth of the ambush, abode the brunt but a small while, returning immediatlie towards the king; and then perceiuing they could do no good, they made the best shift they could ech man for himselfe, to escape the enimies handes. The king being thus taken of his enimies, was conueied to king Henrie ouer into Normandie, where he was as then remaining. The yeere that king William was thus taken, was after the birth of our Sauiour Christ 1174, and the ninth of king Williams reigne.

Northumberland, not ceassing till he came to Anwike, where he staied for a time to haue had battell: but in the meane while the Englishmen laie close together without noise or appearance, in such wise that no Scotishman could haue vnderstanding where they were. At length king William wearied with long tarieng thus at Anwike, and seeing no enimies to appéere, determined to worke some exploit yet before his returne, and thereupon sent forth the most part of all his armie abroad into the countrie, to forreie the same, kéeping no great companie about him, till the returne of the other thus sent forth. Whereupon incontinentlie a great ambushment of Englishmen came vpon him with counterfeited Scottish ensignes, and were not once suspected for Englishmen, till the king was compassed in by them on ech side, and so finallie taken and led awaie per anie Scotishman wist thereof, saue a few which were left (as is said) with him for the time. In déed Wilhelmus Paruus, a canon sometime in the abbeie of Bridlington in Yorkeshire, in that his booke which he writes of the Norman kings of England, affirmes how there were not manie more than about three score horssemen with king William, while he was thus taken; and that the Englishmen were not past foure hundred horssemen, which toke vpon them that enterprise; whose capteins (as he reciteth) were these: Robert de Stuteuill, Ranulfe de Glanuill, Bernard de Baliioll, and diuerse other.

The same author writeth, that after the taking of the king, there rose a mutinie amongst the Scots: for whereas the Irish Scots bare a naturall grudge against the English Scots, yet whilest the king was present amongst them, they durst not vtter their malicious intentions: but now that he was thus taken from them, so manie of the English Scots as fell into the hands of the Irish, paid déerelie for the bargaine, being cruellie murthered and slaine: so that the residue were constreined to get them out of the waie into castels and towers, where they might be receiued. But now it is to be considered, that bicause there was no great slaughter made at the taking of king William, the warres notwithstanding continued betwixt England and Scotland: for the two before specified chiefteins Gilcrist and Rowland stoutlie withstood the Englishmen, and beat them backe as they enterprised to enter into Cumberland. At length a peace was taken, during the time that king William remained in captiuitie; vnder these conditions, that Northumberland should continue vnder the dominion of the Englishmen, and Cumberland (with the earledome of Huntington) to remaine (as before) vnder the gouernance of the Scotishmen.

Northumberland vnder the Englishmen.

Immediatlie vpon the taking of king William thus at Anwike, his brother Dauid earle of Huntington, thorough licence of king Henrie came into Scotland, to haue the gouernement of the realme, till the king his brother might be redeemed. So soone therefore as he had once established the realme in good quiet and iustice, he sent Richard the bishop of saint Andrewes, with diuerse other noblemen, ouer into Normandie, to take order there with K. Henrie for the ransome of the king his brother, which was agreed in this manner. First, it was accorded, that king William should become and acknowledge himselfe to be the king of Englands liege man, against all men for the realme of Scotland and his other lands; and for the same should do fealtie to the said king of England, as to his liege soueraigne lord, in like sort as other his liege people were accustomed to do. And further, he should also do fealtie vnto the lord Henrie, the king of Englands sonne, (sauing alwaies the faith which he owght the king his father.) And in like manner it was couenanted and agreed, that all the prelats of Scotland, and their successors, should recognise their wonted subiection to the church of England, and do fealtie to the king of England, so manie of them as he should appoint. And likewise the earle and barons of Scotland, and their heires for their part, should do their homage and fealties vnto the said king of England, and to the lord Henrie his sonne, so manie as thereunto should be required.

Moreouer, the king of Scots should paie for his redemption one hundred thousand pounds sterling, the one halfe to be paid in hand: and for sure paiment of the other halfe, the earledomes of Cumberland, Huntington, and Northumberland should be deliuered vnto king Henrie in pledge or mortgage, till the time that the same summe was paid. And for the more suertie of these couenants, and that the Scots should moue no warre against the Englishmen, foure of the strongest castels within Scotland, that is to saie, Berwike, Edenburgh, Rorburgh, & Striueling, were deliuered into the Englishmens hands. These things being thus ordered the eight day of December 1175, & the king restored home; there followed a new stirre in Scotland, for Gilbert of Galloway, a right cruell and most mischéefous person, purposing to conquer the crowne by force, made great slaughter of all them that withstood his desire. And because his brother reproued his doings, he put out his eies, and cut off his hands. Against this Gilbert was Gilcrist sent with an armie by the king. There was fought a sore battell betwixt them, for the most part of those that followed Gilberts commandement, were desperat fellowes, such commonlie as for murder and other heinous crimes by them committed were in danger of the lawes, and therefore vpon hope of pardon desired a change; but yet in the end, Gilcrist with multitude won the field of them, and slue more in the chase than in the battell. Gilbert himselfe escaped and got ouer into the Ile of Man, and fled from thence into Ireland. Wilhelmus Paruus reporteth this matter somewhat otherwise, as thus: In the armie of king William (saith he) when he was taken neere vnto Anwike, were two brethren, Gilbert and Uared, that were lords of Galloway, hauing there with them a great retinue of their countriemen. These were the sonnes of Fergustus, sometime lord of that prouince; after whose decease the king of Scots that is superiour lord thereof, diuided the countrie betwixt these two brethren. But Gilbert the eldest brother found himselfe much grieued to haue anie part of those lands (which were his fathers) giuen from him; yet doubting punishment at the kings hands, he durst not attempt anie thing against his brother, till it fortuned the king to be taken. And then deliuered of the feare which had staied his mischéefous purpose, he taketh his brother at vnwares, and cruellie murdered him, after no common maner; but rather martyred him in beastlie wise, so to satisfie the instinct of his diuelish nature. And immediatlie after inuading the vpper countries, he exerciseth great slaughter of men on each hand. But his brother had a sonne called Rowland, which proouing a valiant young gentleman, boldlie resisted his vncles rage, with the assistance and aid of his fathers friends. And thus was Scotland brought into trouble (as Wilhelmus Paruus recordeth) till by the foresaid Gilcrist the murderer was expelled, as before is expressed. In the yeare following came Hugo cardinall of saint Angelo as legat from the pope into England, with authoritie to reforme the English churches, in such cases as were thought requisit; and after he had made an end there, to do the like in Scotland.

The bishops of Scotland summoned to a conuocation at Northampton.

Scotland. When he had therefore finished with England, he cited all the bishops of Scotland to appeare before him at a day prefixed at Northampton. They came according to his appointment, and being assembled there in consistorie, he went about in most earnest wise to persuade them to receiue the archbishop of Yorke for their metropolitane. But one Gilbert a yong man, howbeit singularlie well learned, and for his holinesse of life much commended (as Hector Boetius writeth) being sent of purpose by king William vnto this conuocation, to foresee that nothing were concluded in the same, prejudiciall to the ancient liberties and franchises of the realme of Scotland, did argue so stifflie to the contrarie, that the cardinall left off the pursute of such maner of matter, and brake vp that councell without determination of anie thing to the pupose in that behalfe.

Gilbert a learned man defended the liberties of Scotland.

This Gilbert that thus defended the cause and liberties of the Scotish clergie, was afterwards made bishop of Cathnes, and finallie after his departure out of this transitorie life, registred for his supposed perfect holinesse of life among the number of saints. The chiefest cause that moued the Scotish cleargie to withdraw their obedience from the primasie of Yorke, was the dissention and continuall enimitie betwixt the two nations for superioritie in temporall causes. The same yeare that this councell was holden at Northampton, sundrie vnketh wonders were séene in Albion. On Midsummer day being the feast day of the natiuitie of saint John the Baptist, there fell such a storme of haile, that it killed manie shéepe and small cattell: people that were out of houses, and from vnder couert anie where abroad, were beaten to the earth with violence of that storme. The sunne in September about nonetide was darkened for the space of two houres togither, without anie eclipse or cause naturall by interposition of clouds. In Yorkeshire was such terrible thunder with strange lightening, that manie abbeies and churches were consumed with the fire.

About this season, the abbeie of Arbroth was built in most magnificent wise, and indowed with lands and reuenues in such ample sort, that few houses within the bounds of Albion might compare therewith. The church was dedicated in the yeare of Grace 1178, by king William, in honor of Thomas Becket archbishop of Canturburie, with whome (as is said) he had great familiaritie in time of his yong yeares. At the same time the abbeie of Hadington was founded by Adhama the mother of king William, and shortlie after she had built it, she died. Not long after, king William sent as ambassadors John bishop of saint Andrews, and Reignald abbat of Arbroth vnto pope Alexander the third, to present vnto him his obeisance, according as he thought good with his duetie. The pope séeming to reioise thereat, sent shortlie after vnto the king a rose of gold, filled with balme, and certeine new priuileges concerning the libertie of the church of Scotland. At the same time Gilcrist, hauing his wife in suspicion of adulterie, droue hir out of doores, and afterwards strangled hir in a village called Manis, not past a mile from Dundée. The king (for that she was his sister) toke such indignation therewith, that he seized vpon all his lands and goods, purposing to haue put him to death if he might haue got him into his hands: but when he saw he could not be found, he proclamed him traitor, and raced his castell (wherein he had dwelled) quite to the ground, in such wise that vnneth remaineth anie token at this day where it stood. This Gilcrist had a brother that hight Bredus, who before this mischance had got the lands of Ogiluie: of whome the house of the Ogiluies toke their beginning, that after came to great authoritie in the court, though at this time (through Gilcrists offense) his whole familie was néere hand destroied. About this time also, the queene, king William his wife, deceassed. A daughter which he had by hir, named Adhama, he gaue in mariage vnto the earle of Laon: but he himselfe after the decease of this his first wife maried Emengard, daughter to Richard vicount of Beaumount that was sonne to a daughter of king William the Conquerour. By this mariage and aliance, the peace was newlie confirmed betwixt England and Scotland, in such wise, that neither part might receiue anie rebels to the other, by means whereof Gilcrist, that before was fled into England, was constreined to returne into Scotland, disguised in poore weed, with two of his sonnes, and there passed forth his life a long time in great miserie amongest the woods and in out places, vnknowen to anie man what he was, by reason of his poore and simple habit. Somewhat before the aboue remembred mariage, Henrie king of England at the motion of Hugh bishop of Durham rendered vp the castell of Edenburgh into K. William his hands.

About this time the Souldane named Saladine prospered hugelie against the christians in the holie land, making such cruell slaughter of them, that to heare thereof, all christian hearts were moued to pitifull commiseration and dolorous teares: in so much that Henrie king of England vowed to go thither with an armie to relieue the common necessitie of the christian publike weale, and had gone in deed, if he had not béene hindered by the conspiracie of his sonne, whome latelie before he had caused to be crowned king, that went about to vsurpe the sole administration to himselfe now in his fathers life time. About the same time William went with an armie into Rosse, against Makulzen and Makbein, two capteins of the westerne Iles, which vsed vpon occasion to passe ouer into Rosse, Cathnes and Murrey land, spoiling and wasting those countries; & when they heard of anie power comming against them, they would streight returne to their ships, and repasse againe into the Iles. But at this time, the king had sent forth a nauie to burne all those vessels, wherein the robbers had passed ouer and had left at anchor, by reason whereof when they were inclosed in on euerie side by the king, and taken prisoners, they after had suffered death on the wheele, according to the maner of the ciuill law.

The king in his returne from this iournie, came by the abbeie of Abirbrothoke, to view the worke of that house, how it went forwards, commanding them that were ouerséers and maisters of the works to spare for no costs, but to bring it vp to perfection, and that with most magnificence. After his departure from thence, he toke the way toward Bertha, and by aduenture espied where Gilcrist was deluing vp turfes, togither with his two sonnes. And though he knew not what they were, yet he mused to see two such goodlie yong men, as by resemblance they appeared to be, to be thus occupied in such toiling and base labour. Incontinentlie herewith Gilcrist with his bald head came afore him, and falling downe on his knees at the kings feet, said: If there be anie mercie in thée (most ruthfull prince) for them that are brought through their offenses into extreme miserie, hauing suffered condigne punishment for the same; I beséech thée for the loue that Christ had to all sinfull people, not sparing to shed his most pretious bloud for their redemption, to haue some pitie & compassion on me, & these my poore & miserable sons, which with me haue suffered much griefe and penurie, not hauing deserued the same by anie crime by them

At the last, when king William had inquired of him what he was, and how it chanced he fell into such kind of miserie, the teares came so fast trickeling from his eies, that of a long time he was not able to declare his owne name. At length being come to himselfe, he said: I am Gilcrist (noble prince) the most sorowfull creature on earth, which (alas) put my hands in thy bloud, and was therefore disherited of all my lands, and banished with these my two sonnes out of thy realme, whereupon we remained in England for a time, till through proclamation made against outlawes, I was constreined to come hither againe with my said sonnes, where we haue liued by roots all the summer season, and now in the winter are glad to get our liuing with trauell of hand thus in digging and deluing of clods. Therefore if anie ruth or pitie haue place in thy heart, or that thine indignation be qualified, haue mercie on our sorowfull estate, and remit the offense, whereby thou maiest not onelie purchase great honor and fame by example of pitie, being highlie renowmed for that vertue amongest all nations, but also win great merit afore God, for shewing thy selfe the follower of Christ, the giuer of all mercie, grace, and peace.

The king moued by these words, and remembring the good seruice which Gilcrist had imploid so oftentimes afore in defense of the realme; and againe pitieng his case, to consider from what degrée of honor he was fallen into the deepest bottome of extreme miserie, he toke him wholie to his fauour, and not onelie forgaue him his former offenses, but also restored vnto him, and to his sonnes, all such lands as sometimes apperteined vnto them, except so much as the king had alreadie giuen vnto the abbeie of Abirbrothoke. Gilcrist euer after perseuered in due obedience to his prince. And forsomuch as his eldest sonne deceassed before him without heires, & that his yonger sonne, by reason of some impediment which he had, was vnmeet for marriage, he gaue the most part of his lands after his owne decease vnto the said house of Abirbrothoke. His yonger sonne also, no lesse well affectionated towards the same house, gaue the residue of his lands thereunto. The father and both his sonnes are buried before the altar of S. Gilcrists gift vnto the house of Abirbrothoke.

Though king William was earnestlie occupied in the aduancing forward of the building of Abirbrothoke, yet did he not forget his dutie in the administration of his lawes; but diligentlie caused iustice to be executed, to the punishing of the wicked, and the rewarding of them that well deserued. He made also sundrie new lawes for the restreining of thèeues and oppressors of the people, so rigorous, that they might be in feare to heare him named. Furthermore, where as the church of Scotland was subiect to the church of Yorke, he obteined of pope Clement the third of that name, letters of exemption for his clergie, whereby the church of Scotland (within the which were conteined the bishops sées of saint Andrews, Glasco, Dunkeld, Dublaine, Brighne, Aberden, Murrey, Rosse, and Cathnesse) was declared exempt from all other forrein iurisdictions, except onelie from that of the see of Rome, so as it might not be lawfull from thencefoorth for any that was not of the realme of Scotland, to pronounce sentence of interdiction or excommunication, or otherwise to deale in iudgement of ecclesiasticall causes, except such one as the apostolike sée of Rome should speciallie appoint, and send thither with legantine power. The date of the said bull or letters of exemption thus obteined was at the popes palace of Laterane, the third Ides of March, and first yéere of the said pope Clements gouernment. Shortlie after, to wit in the yéere 1198, died Henrie king of England, after whom succéeded his second sonne Richard: for Henrie his eldest sonne deceassed before his father.

The death of Henrie king of England.

King Richard, after his coronation, prepared him selfe to passe with an armie into the holie land, and therefore made peace with all his neighbors, that no trouble should follow to his realme by reason of his absence: and here vpon to keepe the Scots in friendship, rather by beneuolence than by feare, he rendred into their hands the castels of Roxburgh, Berwike, and Sterling: and moreouer that part of Northumberland which his father had taken from king William when he toke him prisoner. He also deliuered the earledomes of Huntington & Cumberland; but vnder condition, that all the castels and holds within them, should be in the keeping of his capteins and souldiors, such as he should appoint. He released to king William also the residue of such summes of monie as were due for the foure castels laid to gage, ten thousand pounds onelie excepted, which he receiued in hand at that present towards the charges of his iournie. When king William had thus receiued his lands and castels by surrender, he made his brother Dauid earle of Huntington, who therevpon doing his homage vnto king Richard, according to the old ordinance deuised by king Malcolme the first, went with him also in that voiage with fiue hundred Scotishmen, or rather fiue thousand (as the translator of Hector Boetius saith) if no fault be in the printer.

As the christian armie laie at siege before the citie of Acres, otherwise called Acon, it chanced that one Oliuer a Scotishman borne, was within the towne reteined in seruice among the Saracens; for being conuict of felonie in his native countrie he was banished out of the same, and fled to the Saracens, remaining so long amongst them, that he had learned their tong verie perfectlie, so that as then few knew what countriman he was. It fortuned that this Oliuer had one of the gates in keeping, on that side the towne where was but a single wall, without trenches or anie other fortification. He happened by some good aduenture to espie amongst the watch of those that were of the retinue of Dauid earle of Huntington, one of his owne kinsmen named John Durward, with whom of long time before he had béene most familiarlie acquainted; and incontinentlie he called to the same Durward, desiring vnder assurance to talke with him. After certeine communication, for that this Oliuer had not as yet vtterlie in his heart renounced the christian faith, he apointed with Durward to giue entrie at a certeine houre vnto earle Dauid, and to all the christian armie, vpon condition that earle Dauid would sée him restored againe vnto his land and heritage in Scotland. The houre set, earle Dauid came with a great power of men to the gate before rehersed, where he was suffered to enter according to appointment, and incontinentlie with great noise and clamour brake into the midst of the citie.

In the morning betimes, king Richard perceiuing the citie thus woone, entred the same, and shortly after wan a tower, which the Saracens for a while manfullie defended. Thus was the citie of Acres woone from the Saracens, chieflie by meanes of the Scotishmen. But now touching their returne from this voiage (for sith in other places more large mention is made of such exploits as there atchiued herein, I passe ouer to make anie longer discourse thereof in this place) ye shall vnderstand, that in that streinable tempest, in the which king Richards nauie was dispersed in his comming homewards (as in the historie of England is more at large expressed) the ship also that earle Dauid was in, chanced to be throwne on land on the coasts of Aegypt, where being taken prisoner, and led into Alexandria, at length he was redéemed by certeine merchants of Uenice, and first conueied vnto Constantinople, and after vnto Uenice, where he was bought out & redéemed by the English merchants, and in the end suffered to depart home. At his comming into Flanders, hée hired a vessell at Sluis, therwith to returne into Scotland; but being losed a little off from the shore, such a vehement tempest suddenlie arose, that droue him, not without great danger of life, néere to the coasts of Norwaie and Shetland.

He went to Scotland.

Here in the midst of this extreame ieopardie (as hath béene reported) after he had made a vow to build a church in the honor of the virgin Marie, if he might escape that danger of seas, he arriued at length in Taie water beside Dundée, not far from saint Nicholas chappell, without either rudder or tackle. The place where he arriued before that time hight Alectum, but he as then changed the name, and called it Dundée, which signifieth as though ye should say, The gift of God. When his brother the king heard that he was returned, supposing long time before, that he had béene dead, he came spédilie vnto Dundée to welcome him home, shewing himselfe most glad of his returne, insomuch that he caused publike processions to be celebrate through the realme, to giue God thanks that had thus restored his brother home into his countrie. Earle Dauid, according as he had vowed, builded a church in the field commonlie called the wheat field, and dedicating it in honor of the virgin Marie, made it a parish church. At a parlement also holden after this at Dundée, licence was granted vnto him to build an abbie in what place it should please him within Scotland, and to indow it with lands and rents as hée should thinke good. There were also manie priuileges granted the same time vnto Dundée, which indure to this day.

Earle Dauid not refusing the grant and beneuolence of the king his brother, builded an abbeie called Lundoris, for monks of the order of saint Benet. One thing there is much to be wondered at, as a strange singularitie. For whereas that house standeth in a vallie, inclosed on each side with wood and water, by reason whereof there is great abundance of adders; yet doth no man catch hurt by anie of them, insomuch that ye shall see yong children play and run vp and downe amongst a great number of them, without anie skath or hurt following vnto them thereof. In this meane while, Richard king of England (who also in his returne out of the holie land was taken prisoner by the emperour of Almaine) was deliuered for a great summe of monie, and so returned into his countrie. King William hearing of king Richards returne into England, to congratulate the same, toke his brother earle Dauid with him, and came vnto London, where, in token of ioy, that he had vnfeinedlie conceiued for his safe comming home, after all troubles and dangers which he had passed, he gaue vnto him two thousand markes sterling, for that he knew at what great charges he had béene, aswell for furnishing of his voiage, as also for redéeming of his libertie.

K. Richards returne into England.

The gift of king William to king Richard.

By these friendlie points of humanitie shewed, there followed great amitie and loue betwixt these two kings. But king William fell sicke in England, and as it often happeneth, such as were vnquiet persons, desirous to be deliuered of all feare of lawes, were streight way put in an vntrue beliefe, that he was dead: and causing it to be bruted abrode, began to exercise all kind of misdemeanors by inuading the poore and simple people, with spoilings and slaughters in all parts. But after it was certeinlie knowne, that the king was not onelie aliue, but also recouered of his infirmitie, and comming homewards, those raskals and wicked rebels withdrew vnder the conduct of one Herald the thane of Cathnes, and erle of Orkenie, vnto the vttermost bounds of Scotland. Howbeit the king pursued them in such diligent and earnest maner, that he apprehended the most part of them in Cathnes, and commanded iustice to be done on them, in such wise, that mercie was not yet wanting: for such as were thought to be after a sort guiltlesse, were pardoned, and the other punished, euerie one according to the measure of his offenses.

A bruit raised that the king was dead.

But the principall leader of them, that is to say, the forenamed Herald, for that time escaped into the westerne Iles, but shortly after, returning to Cathnes, he was taken and brought to the king, who caused his eies first to be put out, then gelded, and lastlie to be hanged on a paire of gallowes. Also all those of his linage that were men, were likewise gelded, that no succession should follow of so wicked a wéed. In the yeere next insuing was more dearth felt in Scotland, than euer was heard of before: for a measure of barlie, in Scotish called a boll, was sold for fiue crownes; and yet in the yeere next following, accounting from the natiuitie of our Sauior 1199, was more plentifull abundance than euer had béene séene afore. The same yeere king Williams wife Ermengard was deliuered of a yong sonne named Alexander. The same yeere also died Richard king of England, & his brother John succeeded in his place. About three yeeres after this, was the foresaid Alexander the kings sonne created prince of Scotland. And the same yeere came a legat from the pope sent to K. William, presenting vnto him a sword, with a sheath & hilts of gold set full of rich pretious stones. He presented vnto him also a hat or bonet, made in maner of a diademe of purple hue, in token (as it should meane) that he was defender of the church. Manie indulgences and priuileges were granted at the same time by the pope, for the libertie of the church of Scotland. It was ordeined also the same time, that saturdaie should be kept as holidaie from none forward, and great punishment appointed for them that transgressed this ordinance, in doing anie bodilie worke from saturdaie at none, vntill mondaie in the morning.

After this, king William returned againe into England to do his homage vnto king John, for the lands of Cumberland, Huntington, and Northumberland. Immediatlie whereupon king John willed him to passe with him into France, to make warres against the Frenchmen. And bicause he refused so to do, king John made claime to all the foresaid lands as forfeited to the crowne of England, and caused a great bootie of goods to be fetched out of the same: so that open warres had immediatlie followed, if the English lords had not compelled K. John to make restitution of all the goods so taken; bicause they thought it not expedient in anie wise to haue wars with the Scots at the same time, being alreadie in trouble with the Frenchmen. In the winter following, the frost was so vehement, & continued so long, that till mid March, no plough might be put into the ground. Ale was frozen in such wise within houses, and cellers, that it was sold by weight. Such a great snow fell also therewith, that beasts died in manie places in great numbers. Moreouer, from the Twelfthtide till Februarie, there was euerie day verie terrible earthquakes.

Earthquakes

After the end of winter, king John hauing made an end of his warres with France, began to build a castell

a caſtell in Northumberland ouer againſt Berwike, vpon purpoſe to haue ſome quarell to fall out with the Scots. King William being aduertiſed thereof, ſent his ambaſſadors vnto king John, requiring him to deſiſt from ſuch attempts, and not to ſéeke anie occaſion of new trouble: but forſomuch as he receiued no towardlie anſwer againe from K. John, he aſſembled a power, & comming to the caſtell which king John had cauſed to be builded, he ouerthrew the ſame, and raced it to the earth. King John ſore offended herewith, raiſed a mightie armie, and came towards Scotland, but at his comming to the borders, he found his aduerſarie king William readie to receiue him by battell, if he had come forward; howbeit through mediation of prudent men, the matter was taken vp betwixt them, ſo that on either ſide the armies were diſſolued, & both the kings repairing to Yorke, eſtabliſhed a peace there, with theſe conditions, that Margaret and Iſabell daughters to king William, after the tearme of 9 yéeres then next inſuing were once expired, ſhould be coupled in mariage with Henrie and Richard the ſons of king John, vpon this paction and couenant, that if the one died, the other ſhould ſucceéd to the crowne. For the which it was couenanted, that king William ſhould giue a right large dower. Alſo the caſtell which king John had builded, and king William raced, it was agréed that it ſhould remaine ſo defaced, and neuer after againe to be repared. For the ſure performance of theſe articles thus betwixt the two kings concluded, nine noble men of Scotland were appointed to be deliuered as hoſtages vnto king John. In that aſſemblie there at Yorke, King William alſo ſurrendered into the hands of king John, the lands of Cumberland, Huntington, and Northumberland; to the intent he ſhould aſſigne thoſe lands againe vnto his ſonne prince Alexander, and he to do homage for the ſame, according to the maner and cuſtome in that caſe prouided, for a knowledge and recognition that thoſe lands were holden of the kings of England, as ſuperior lords of the ſame. During the abode of theſe two kings at Yorke, there was brought vnto them a child of ſingular beautie, ſonne and heire to a gentleman of great poſſeſſions in thoſe parties, being ſore vexed with diuerſe and ſundrie diſeaſes; for one of his eies was conſumed & loſt through an iſſue which it had of corrupt and filthie humors, the one of his hands was dried vp; the one of his féet was ſo taken, that he had no vſe thereof; and his tong likewiſe that he could not ſpeake. The phyſicians that ſaw him thus troubled with ſuch contrarie infirmities, iudged him incurable. Neuertheleſſe, king William making a croſſe on him, reſtored him immediatlie to health. By reaſon whereof, manie beléeued that this was done by miracle, through the power of almightie God, that the vertue of ſo godlie a prince might bée notified to the world.

After his returne from Yorke into Scotland, he indowed the churches of Newbottell, Melros, Holie rod houſe, Dunfirmling, and Aberden, with manie faire poſſeſſions, as the letters patents made therof by him beare manifeſt teſtimonie. He alſo erected one new biſhops ſée called Argile, giuing therto ſufficient lands towards the maintenance and ſuſtentation thereof. After this, comming vnto the towne of Bertha, he had not remained there manie daies, but there chanced ſuch a floud, by reaſon of the riſing and inundation of the two riuers, Taie & Almond, that through violence of the ſtreme the towne wals were borne downe, and much people in the towne drowned, per they could make anie ſhift to ſaue themſelues, inſomuch that though the king with his wife, and the moſt part of his familie eſcaped out of that great danger and ieopardie, his yongeſt ſonne yet named John, with his nurſſe and twelue other women periſhed, and twentie other of his ſeruants beſide. Héere was heard ſuch clamor, noiſe, & lamentable cries, with bitter rorings and dreadfull ſhrikings, as is vſed in time when anie towne is ſuddenlie taken and ſurpriſed by the enimies: for as the cómon prouerbe witneſſeth; Fier & water haue no mercie: and yet of theſe two, water is more terrible and dangerous: for there is no force or wit of man able to reſiſt the violence of inundations, where they ſuddenlie breake in.

King William, after that the towne of Bertha was thus deſtroied and ouerflowed with water, began the foundation of an other towne, which was after called Perth, by a man of that name that owght the ground where the ſame towne was builded. Furthermore, to aduance the dignitie and augmentation of this towne, the king granted ſundrie beneficiall priuileges and freedoms thereto, that it might the ſooner riſe in riches and wealth. The firſt foundation thereof was laid after the incarnation of our Sauiour 1210 yéeres, but the name was changed afterwards, and called ſaint Johns towne, which name it beareth euen vnto this day. About the ſame time there roſe eftſoones new trouble in Cathnes, for one Gothred the ſonne of Makuilzen (of whoſe rebellion ye haue heard before) ſpoiled with often incurſions and rodes the countrie of Roſſe, and other bounds there abouts. His companie increaſed dailie more and more, by repaire of ſuch number of rebels as came vnto him out of Lochquhaber, & the weſterne Iles. King William, to repreſſe theſe attempts, ſent forth the earles of Fife and Atholl, with the thane of Buchquhane, hauing ſir thouſand in their companie, the which incountering with the enimies in ſet battell, gaue them the ouerthrow, and taking Gothred their chiefe capteine priſoner, brought him vnto the king, who cauſed both him and diuerſe other which were likewiſe taken priſoners, to loſe their heads. Gothred himſelfe was ſore wounded, before he was taken; ſo that if his takers had not made the more ſpéed in the conueieng of him to the king, he had died of his hurts before execution had thus béene done on him accordinglie as was appointed.

About this time aroſe the diſſention and variance betwixt John king of England, and pope Innocent the third, for that the Engliſh cleargie refuſed to aid the ſaid John with ſuch ſummes of monie as he demanded of them. Shortlie after, William king of Scotland, worne with long age, departed out of this world at Striueling, in the 74 yéere of his age, and in the 49 yéere of his reigne, and after the incarnation of Chriſt 1214 yéeres. He was buried in Aberbrothoke, before the high altar within the quier. The yéere afore his death, two comets or blaſing ſtarres apéered in the moneth of March, verie terrible to behold; the one did ſhine before the riſing of the ſunne, and the other before the going downe thereof. The yéere next following, there was a cow in Northumberland that calued a verie monſtruous calfe; for the head and necke reſembled a verie calfe in déed, but the reſidue of the bodie was like vnto a colt. In the winter after, there were ſéene alſo two moones in the firmament, the one being ſeuered from the other, and in ſhape naturallie horned, as ye ſée the moone in hir increaſing or waning. King William in his life time founded the abbeie of Balmernocht, but his wife quéene Ermengard indowed it with lands and poſſeſſions after his deceaſſe. In the 46 yéere of this king Williams reigne, two monks of the Trinitie order were ſent into Scotland by pope Innocent, to whome king William gaue his palace roiall in Aberden, to conuert the ſame into an abbeie for them

Alexander the second is crowned at Scone.

A time of mourning.

AFter the decease of king William, his sonne Alexander the second of that name succeeded, and was crowned at Scone with all due solemnitie; which being finished, he went vnto Abirbrothoke, where he remained 14 daies, in attending the funerall obsequies of his father, and commanded that no publike plaies nor great feasts should be vsed or kept in all that yeere, to the intent the death of his father might be lamented through the whole realme. The king himselfe, and all his seruants also, were clothed in mourning weed, during the space of one whole yeere.

A parlement at Edenburgh

The first parlement which he called, was holden at Edenburgh, in the which he confirmed all the acts and ordinances deuised by his father: and further appointed that all such as had borne offices vnder him, should still inioy the same.

Confirmation of officers.

Namelie he commanded that William Wlod bishop of Dunblaine should still continue lord chancellor, and Alane of Galloway high constable, which is an office of most honor & reputation next to the king, as he that hath power of life and death, if anie man draw bloud of an other by violence within two miles of the court.

The office of the constable.

When this parlement was ended, bicause the old queene his mother determined to remaine, during the residue of hir life, in the place where that holie woman queene Margaret sometime led hir life, he gaue vnto hir towards the maintenance of hir estate, the castels & townes of Forfair, with the lands and possessions to the same belonging. He also appointed certeine sage and most graue personages, to be chosen forth as iudges, which should be resident in euerie citie and good towne of his realme, for the hearing and due determining of all quarrels and matters in controuersie betwixt partie and partie. In this meane time great dissention rose betwixt John king of England, and his barons, by reason whereof great warres insued, as in the English historie doth apeere. The barons made sute both to the French king, & to the king of Scots for aid, so that at length Lewes the French kings sonne came ouer to support them, whereof when king Alexander was aduertised, he likewise came with an armie through England vnto London, causing his souldiers by the waie to absteine from doing anie kind of damage to the people. By his comming things were partlie quieted for a time, and shortlie after that he had communed with Lewes touching sundrie affaires perteining to both the realmes, they passed the seas with ten vessels ouer into France, leauing their powers behind them to assist the English lords.

King Alexander passeth to London.

The French king aduertised thereof, came downe to Bullongne, where finding his son and king Alexander, he renewed the ancient bond of amitie betwixt France and Scotland, with the same Alexander, according to the couenants of the old league, with this addition; that neither prince should receiue the enimies of the others realme, nor to marrie with anie stranger, the one not making the other priuie thereto. These things being ratified, king Alexander and Lewes returned into England: shortlie whereupon, king John died, more through anguish of mind and melancholie, than by force of anie other naturall disease. His son Henrie, the third of that name, succeeded him. And in the meane time had the pope accursed both Lewes, and king Alexander, with all those that fauoured their cause against king John, which curse was pronounced in a generall councell, which was holden at Rome by pope Innocent, there being present foure hundred and twelue bishops, and eight hundred abbats. King Alexander after the decease of king John, returning homewards with his armie, thought he might haue passed quietlie without anie annoiance by the waie, through meanes whereof he lost a certeine number of his men, being suddenlie inuaded by such Englishmen, as watched their time to take the Scots at some aduantage, in straieng abroad out of order: with which iniurie king Alexander was so moued, that he spoiled and harried all the countries by the which he passed, till he was entered within the confines of his owne dominion.

Shortlie after, Cardinall Gualo came into England furnished with the popes authoritie, to denounce the excommunication aboue remembred, against Lewes and Alexander, with all their fautors, whereupon he accursed not onelie the foresaid persons, but also interdicted all the places where they came, insomuch that in the end Lewes was constreined to buy an absolution with no small summes of monie, of that auaricious cardinall Gualo: and after vpon agreement also made with king Henrie, he returned into France. Not long after came K. Henrie with an armie into Scotland, sore indamaging the countrie: but so soone as he was aduertised that king Alexander had assembled all the power of his realme to giue him battell, he retired with all speed into England. The king of England had in his armie at the same time 1200 men of armes, verie perfectlie appointed and furnished with armor and weapon as was requisit, and the king of Scots but onelie fiue hundred. But of footmen there were in the Scotish armie 60000 able personages well appointed, with ares, speares, and bowes, readie to die and liue with their prince, constantlie beleeuing, that to lose this present life heere in his defense, was an assured waie to be saued in an other world.

King Henrie inuadeth Scotland.

Ex codice antiquo S. Albani, written by Mat. Paris (as I take it.)

After that king Henrie was gone backe into England, king Alexander followed after him into Northumberland, where he ouerthrew & beat downe manie castels and strengths, which the Englishmen held. Then marching through the countrie vnto Carleill, he wan that citie, and garnished it with his people. After this, laieng siege vnto Norham castell, when he had continued at the same a certeine time, and perceiued how he lost but his trauell, he left it, and returned home with great honor and triumph for his other atchiued enterprises in that iournie. King Henrie being once aduertised that king Alexander had broken vp his campe, incontinentlie got eftsoons his people togither, and comming to Berwike, wan both the towne and castell. After entring into Scotland, he burned and spoiled the countrie alongst by the sea coasts, till he came as farre as Hadington, putting all such to the sword as were found in the waie; women, preests, and children onelie excepted. He assaied to haue woone the castell of Dunbar, but missing his purpose there, he returned into England.

In the meane time, the auaritious prelat Gualo, vpon trust to purchase some large portion of monie in Scotland, put the same vnder processe of interdicting, & namelie he accursed king Alexander most terriblie, for that he had inuaded England, and (as he alleged) spoiled churches as well as prophane places. These curses so inflamed the hearts of the Scotishmen with hatred against the Englishmen, that the same was not like to haue ended without the vtter destruction and ruine of both their realms. Neuertheless at length, by the diligent trauell of the bishops of Yorke and Salisburie, which came vnto king Alexander to treate an agreement, a finall peace was concluded, vnder these conditions. First it was agreed, that king Alexander should render the citie of Carleill into the Englishmens hands, and king Henrie the towne of Berwike vnto the Scots. Thus the two kings being accorded, the two foreſaid biſhops comming vnto Berwike, abſolued king Alexander, and deliuered his realme of interdiction, by ſuch authoritie as they had procured of the cardinall Gualo. But yet the ſame cardinall, not minding to depart with emptie hands, ſummoned all the prelats of Scotland to appeare before him at Anwike, there to receiue their full abſolution, to the intent by ſuch means to trouble them, till they had diſburſſed to his vſe ſome large portion of monie. Sundrie of them which loued quietneſſe more than contention, ſatiſfied his mind; but others refuſed vtterlie ſo to do, taking great indignation that ſpirituall cauſes were thus diſpatched for monie, and eccleſiaſticall preferments bought and ſold, no otherwiſe than ſecular poſſeſſions and prophane dignities. Incontinentlie thereupon Gualo cited them to Rome, ſuppoſing that rather than to take vpon them ſo long a iournie, they would haue compounded with him at his pleaſure. Notwithſtanding they being nothing in doubt thereof, went vnto Rome, and at their comming thither, made vnto the pope their complaint in moſt greeuous maner, of the inſufferable iniuries attempted in England and Scotland, by his moſt couetous legat the foreſaid Gualo: by reaſon of which complaint, and of ſundrie ſuch letters & informations as dailie came out of England and Scotland, from other biſhops & abbats, conteining right greeuous accuſations, concerning the inſatiable auarice of Gualo, the pope reuoked him home to Rome, to make anſwere in his preſence vnto ſuch matters as were laid to his charge.

At his returne thither, for ſo much as he was not able to diſcharge himſelfe of ſuch manifeſt crimes wherewith he was burdened, the pope condemned him in a great ſumme of monie, to be paid as a fine for his treſpaſſe and tranſgreſſions. And thoſe Scotiſh biſhops, which were come for their abſolution, were abſolued by the pope, and ſuffered to depart in peace. In this meane time, Dauid earle of Huntington, brother to William late king of Scots, (of whome ye haue heard before how he went in the iournie made by the chriſtian princes into the holie land) deceaſſed, and was buried within an abbeie in England. Henrie king of England, after he came to yeares of perfect diſcretion, ſhewed himſelfe to be more deſirous of peace than of warres. Whereupon at Yorke there was a meeting appointed betwixt him and king Alexander, where mutuall alliance was accorded betwixt them on this wiſe. Jane the ſiſter of king Henrie was promiſed to be giuen in mariage to king Alexander, and two ſiſters of king Alexanders were eſpouſed vnto two great princes of the Engliſh nobilitie. Theſe mariages were thus concluded in the yeare of our Lord, 1220.

In the yeare next following, came a legat into Scotland from pope Honorius, with buls to gather a ſumme of monie towards the furniſhing forth of an armie againſt the Turks or rather Saracens. This legat was a cardinall, and named Egidius, who hauing purchaſed no ſmall quantitie of coine both of the cleargie and laitie of Scotland, ſpent the ſame in riot and outragious inſolencie, making his excuſe at his returne to Rome, how it was taken from him by certeine Brigants and robbers. Within ſhort while after, was an other legat with ſemblable commiſſion ſent into Scotland from the foreſaid pope. But king Alexander, being aduertiſed of his comming, called a councell, in the which one of the biſhops (as ſhould ſeeme) toke great indignation, to ſee how couetouſneſſe reigned in moſt ſhamefull wiſe amongeſt the Romiſh legats, and ſpake in maner as followeth.

Albeit ſundrie conſiderations there are which might ſtay me from vttering ſuch things as be moſt preiudiciall to the common-wealth, yet (moſt noble prince) when I conſider thine humanitie, faith, and conſtancie, giuen to nothing more than to the defenſe and weale of thy true liege people, I cannot but (for the zeale I beare to common libertie) declare the truth. For ſith all maner of tyrannie is intollerable, yea euen that which is exerciſed by kings or princes deſcended by lineall ſucceſſion to their rightfull heritage: much more is that tyrannie to be deteſted, which is exerciſed by men of vile and baſe linage. Therefore, if the ſundrie and manifeſt wrongs done to vs theſe manie yeares now paſſed, had come by the popes themſelues, the ſame might ſomewhat more ſufferablie haue béene borne: but ſith naughtie & vile perſons, of baſe birth and obſcure linage, promoted to benefices and eccleſiaſticall dignities onelie for their wicked and horrible vices, haue not onelie interdicted our realme, without lawfull commiſſion; but haue alſo conſumed in maintenance of their wanton and inſolent vices, that monie which they gathered in our countrie by the popes authoritie, vnder colour of raiſing an armie to go againſt the Turks and Infidels; I am of this opinion, that their curſſed auarice ought to haue no further place amongeſt faithfull people, ſpeciallie amongeſt vs, whoſe ſimplicitie and humbleneſſe they haue in contempt. In the yeares paſſed, ye complained of the iniuries done by Gualo, when he had put your realme vnder the cenſure of interdicting, and the moſt part of your prelats vnder the curſſe; becauſe they would not anſwer him with monie, according to his couetous demands, wherewith he might mainteine his outragious luſts. Which Gualo alſo (as ſhould appeare) by moſt certeine coniectures, was of ſuch a diueliſh nature, that though he were ſent to treate a concord betwixt the Engliſhmen and Scots; yet to ſatiſfie his auaritious deſire, he miniſtred ſuch occaſion of warre betwixt them, that both the realmes (had not the matter béene the ſooner taken vp) were at a point to haue entered ſo far into malitious hatred the one againſt the other, that it was not like that anie peace would haue taken place, till the one or both had béene vtterlie deſtroied. But ſince theſe heinous and terrible déeds are manifeſt inough; to what end ſhould I here remember them, ſith the ſame cannot be done without your great griefe and diſpleaſure? Moreouer, after we were deliuered of this Gualo, ſhortlie after commeth another, one ſhewing himſelfe to come forth of the ſame ſhop; for in conuerſation of life he was to be iudged no whit better, but rather worſe: for after that he had got vp amongeſt vs of this realme large ſummes of monie, vnder pretenſe of redéeming the chriſtian priſoners out of the Saracens hands, and waging of new armies againſt them; he waſted the ſame monie in riotous luſt and inſolencie, feining, when it was gone, that it was béreft him by Brigants. Therefore ſith we haue had experience, and are alreadie ſufficientlie taught by the doings of the two fore-remembred legats, to our heauie griefs and no ſmall damages; we may be worthilie reputed vnwiſe and verie foles in déed, if we now admit the third. For it is not to be thought, that this new legat ſhall vſe the matter in anie better ſort, than his fellowes haue done before him. And verelie, if anie man ſhould demand of me, what I thinke ought to be done in this matter, I do for my part proteſt, that neither this legat, nor anie other in times to come, come, ought to be receiued within this realme, conſidering how the ſame hath béene walked & robbed by their continuall exactions. If there be anie amongſt you that hath moꝛe monie than he knoweth which way well to ſpend, he may (in the name of God) beſtow it vpon the poꝛe, rather than to the vſe of ſuch vicious legats, as oꝛder it in ſuch ſoꝛt, that all men haue cauſe to thinke what ſoeuer commeth into their hands, is but caſt away and clearelie loſt.

Legats cannot be receiued.

These woꝛds of this biſhop (whatſoeuer he was) were liked ſo well of all the councell, that the legat could not be receiued into the realme. After the breaking vp of this councell, the mariage was conſummat betwixt king Alexander and Jone, ſiſter to Henrie king of England; alſo betwixt Hubert de Burgh high iuſtice of England, and Margaret ſiſter to king Alexander, by reaſon of which mariages, the peace was confirmed with the Engliſhmen, and as it had bœne ſealed vp foꝛ a moꝛe full and certeine aſſurance. Shoꝛtlie after followed ciuill warres in Scotland, by the motion of one Gileſpie Roſſe, who hauing liued moſt licentiouſlie in riotous outrage, at length arreared open warre againſt the king, and firſt ſleaing diuerſe ſuch of his companions as had kept him companie afoꝛetime in his lewd miſdemeanoꝛs, foꝛ that they refuſed now to sticke to him in this rebellious enterpꝛiſe, he went with the reſidue that offered to take his part vnto the towne of Ennernes, which he toke and burned, with diuerſe other places being of the kings poſſeſſions, till at length John Cumin earle of Buchquhane coming againſt him with an armie deliuered to him by the king, purſued the ſaid Gileſpie in ſuch earneſt wiſe, that finallie he toke him with two of his ſons, and ſtriking off all their thꝛée heads, ſent the ſame to the king as a witneſſe how he had ſped.

This buſineſſe being thus quieted, an other inſued after this maner: The men of Cathnes ſoꝛe offended with their biſhop named Adam, foꝛ that vpon refuſall to pay their tithes he had accurſſed them, fell vpon him within his owne houſe, and firſt ſcourging him with rods, at length ſet fiꝛe vpon him and burnt him within his owne kitchen. Which act being repoꝛted to the king, as then ſoiourning at Edenburgh, he haſted foꝛth with all ſpeed to puniſh the offendoꝛs, not ceaſſing till he had taken foure hundꝛed of them, all the which number he cauſed to be hanged; and foꝛ that he would haue no ſucceſſion to come of ſuch a wicked ſéed, he appointed all their ſons to loſe their ſtones. The place where they were ſo gelded, is called euen to this day the ſtonie hill. The earle of Cathnes, foꝛ that he neither ſuccoured the biſhop in time of néed, noꝛ yet ſought to puniſh the offendoꝛs that did this cruell déed, was depꝛiued of his earledome, and the lands belonging to the ſame. The pope highlie commended king Alexander foꝛ this puniſhment taken of them, that had ſo cruellie murthered their biſhop.

After this, king Alexander comming vnto Aberden, gaue manie large gifts and pꝛiuileges therevnto, although the ſame beforе this time inioied ſundꝛie notable commodities and endowments giuen and confirmed by other kings his pꝛedeceſſoꝛs. The buls which were granted by ſundꝛie popes concerning the liberties of the churches in Scotland, were committed by the king to the cuſtodie of one Gilbert archdeacon of Murrey, who ſuccéeded next after the foꝛeſaid Adam in the ſée of Cathneſſe. In the third yeare after, as king Alexander with his mother Ermingard were ſitting at their banket on the twelfe day in Chriſtmas, otherwiſe called Yule, the earle of Cathnes, hauing good oppoꝛtunitie thereto, pꝛeſented himſelfe beforе the king, and beſought him of grace and pardon foꝛ his paſſed offenſe. King Alexander taking ruth & pitie of him, reſtoꝛed him (vpon his fine to be paied in maner as was agréed betwixt them) vnto all his foꝛmer honoꝛs, lands and poſſeſſions. Neuertheleſſe the offenſe that was pardoned by man, was afterward puniſhed by the iuſt iudgement (as ſome thought) of almightie God: foꝛ he was ſlaine as he lay in bed one night by his own meniall ſeruants, whome he had roughlie intreated, as the ſame went. The houſe alſo wherein he was thus ſlaine, was likewiſe ſet on fiꝛe and burnt ouer him, that no man ſhould haue ſuſpicion of his ſlaughter, but that it might ſéeme as though it had come by ſome ſudden aduenture.

About this time, oꝛ ſomewhat beforе, there came into Scotland (ſent by ſaint Dominicke) certeine blacke friers, of which oꝛder the ſame Dominicke was the firſt authoꝛ. Theſe men that were firſt ſent by him, liued accoꝛding to his inſtitution, moꝛe perfectlie than ſuch as followed: foꝛ as it often happeneth, allthings commonlie from a good beginning fall into woꝛſe eſtate, ſo that the ſucceſſoꝛs of thoſe men declined from all good religion, into moſt inſolent abuſes and miſoꝛders, and ſo continuing in vicious liuing the ſpace of thꝛée hundꝛed yeares, at length were perfectlie reformed into a better rule, by a frier named John Adamſon, that pꝛoceéded doctoꝛ in the pꝛofeſſion of diuinitie in the vniuerſitie of Aberden, at the ſame time that Hector Boetius the Scotiſh chꝛonographer pꝛoceéded there in the ſame facultie. On the ſame maner, about the ſelfe ſame time, were ſent into Scotland, as well as into all other parts of the chꝛiſtian woꝛld, friers minoꝛs, of ſaint Francis his oꝛder. Manie of them alſo after his deceaſſe fell to diſſolute liuing, kéeping no ſuch ſtreict rules, as both he pꝛeſcribed, and alſo obſerued.

But now to returne to the reſidue of the hiſtoꝛie. The Scotiſh people inioied peace a long time after the appeaſing of the trouble in Cathnes, till time that Alane loꝛd of Galloway and conſtable of Scotland departed out of this life; and foꝛ that he had diuided his lands beforе his death amongeſt his thꝛée daughters, his baſtard ſonne gathered an armie of 10000 men, in hope to atteine the poſſeſſion of Galloway by foꝛce of armes; but at length, after he had woꝛought much ſcath in the countrie by his violent inuaſion, he was ſlaine with fiue thouſand of thoſe that toke his part, by the earle of Marth, and Walter Steward of Dunwald, which was ſent againſt him with a power. The eldeſt daughter of the aboue mentioned Alane of Galloway, was giuen in mariage vnto Roger Quincie earle of Winchéſter, who after his father in lawes deceaſſe, was made conſtable of Scotland, which office continued in the hands of his ſucceſſion, till king Robert the ſecond his daies; in whoſe time this Roger of Quincies poſteritie was diſherited and extinguiſhed, foꝛ certeine offenſes committed againſt the kings maieſtie, and then afterwards the office of the conſtable was giuen to the Haies of Arroll. The ſecond daughter of the foꝛeſaid Alane was maried vnto John Baliioll; & the third to the earle of Albemarle. Thus was the loꝛdſhip of Galloway diuided into thꝛée, by reaſon whereof the inhabitants of that countrie, taking diſpleaſure therewith, cleaued vnto the aboue mentioned baſtard, till he was vanquiſhed and ſlaine, as beforе ye haue heard. This trouble being appeaſed thus within the realme, K. Alexander was aduertiſed of great diuiſion riſing betwixt king Henrie of England and his nobles, and therefoꝛe to helpe towards an agréement betwixt them, he went to London with his wife quéene Jane, and Iſabell his ſiſter. Thꝛough his earneſt diligence, all the debates and quarels were remoued, and the parties thꝛoughlie accoꝛded. Which being done, he married Isabell his sister vnto the earle of Norfolke, and in the meane time his wife quéene Jane deceassed, without leauing anie issue behind hir, which chance caused the king hir husband to returne with great griefe and lamentation into Scotland. In the yeare next following, which was after the incarnation 1239, king Alexander (because he had no succession begot of his bodie) married at Rocksburgh the daughter of Ingelram lord of Concie, a virgine of excellent beautie named Marie, on whome he got a sonne named Alexander, which succeeded after his decease in the gouernement of the realme.

About the same time, John Cumin earle of Angus, being sent in ambassage to Lewes the French king, died by the way. Also at Hadington was holden a rotall tornament, where knights and esquiers aduanced themselues by valiant prowesse to win honor: neuertheless the end of all that pleasure and pastime ended in sorow. For Patrike Cumin earle of Atholl was slaine within his lodging in the night, and the house set on fire and burned ouer him, to the intent no suspicion should rise, but that it happened by some euill misfortune, and negligence of fire. But yet was John Billart, with Walter Billart his vncle shrewdlie suspected for the matter, insomuch that though no euident proofe could be had against him, yet were they banished the realme, and lost all their goods by confiscation to the kings vse. After these things were thus passed, a conuocation was called of the cleargie at saint Johns towne. In the which were diuerse prouinciall ordinances and statutes, made by consent of the king and nobles of the realme, which were obserued in the church of Scotland vnto these late daies. About the same time also, one Somerled thane of Argile, the sonne of that Somerled of whome ye haue heard before, following his fathers steps, rebelled against the king, sore indamaging by rodes & forages the parts bordering vpon the confines of his countrie of Argile, till at length the earle of March brought him to the brinke of such extreme necessitie, that he was faine to yéeld himselfe, with a cord about his necke in token of submission; and being so brought before the king, obteined pardon of his heinous offense.

In the same season, Henrie king of England, prouoked by the setting on of such seditious persons remaining in his court, as trusted by warres to aduance their priuat gaine (during which time law and iustice haue no place) began to build a castell iust against Berwike, in the same place where the other was begun afore by king Richard, which (as before is shewed) was raced and throwen downe by king William, by the articles of agréement with couenant that it should neuer be builded vp againe. This attempt of the Englishmen had ministred sufficient occasion of warre, if the nobles of England (considering that the building vp of this castell was contrarie to their bond and promised faith) had not staied the worke, and so thereupon that beginning of new trouble betwixt the English and Scotish nations for that present ceassed.

Matth. Paris disagréeth frō the Scotish writers touching the occasion of this warre, as in the English chronicles ye may read.

In the yeare following came ambassadors forth of France into Scotland, declaring that K. Lewes was readie to passe forward on that iournie, which he had taken in hand to make into Jewrie, and therefore desired aid of king Alexander, to support him in those warres against Gods enimies. With these ambassadors were sent ouer into France, certeine chosen bands of men of warre vnder the leading of Patrike earle of March, Dauid Lindseie of Glenneske, and Walter Steward of Dundonald, three capteins of great wisdome, and perfect experience in feats of chiualrie. The most part of all those Scotishmen, that thus went forth in that iournie, perished in Aegypt either on the sword or by sickenesse, so that few or none of them returned home againe. From henceforth, king Alexander liued not long: but falling into a sore and grieuous sickenesse within a certeine Ile called Carnere, not far distant from the coast of Argile, deceassed in the same Ile shortlie after, in the 51 yeare of his age, the 35 of his reigne, and of our redemption 1249, his bodie (according as he had commanded in his life time) was buried in Melrosse.

The death of king Alexander the second. 38. Io. Ma. but that can not be.

After that Alexander the second was thus dead and buried, his sonne Alexander the third of that name, not passing nine yeares of age, was proclamed king. There was no small adoo on the daie of his coronation amongest the nobles, for that by reason of the obseruation of starres, it was iudged to be an infortunate daie for him to receiue the diademe. And againe some held opinion, how he ought to be made knight first, before he were crowned; so that thus they were at strife togither, in such earnest maner, that it was doubted, least this contention would haue bred some great inconuenience, had not the earle of Fife preuented the same, in causing vpon a sudden the crowne to be set vpon the kings head, being placed in the marble chaire, according to the custome, without regard to the frinolous allegations of them that spake to the contrarie. When the solemnitie was ended, there came before him an Hillandman (for so they call such as inhabit the mountcine countries of Scotland) who in a kind of meeter of the Irish language, saluted him as king, thus: Bennach dere Albin Alexander, mak Alar, mak William, mak Henrie, mak Dauid, and so forth (reciting in maner of a genealogie or pedegrée, all the kings in order of whome he was descended, till he came vp to Gathelus the first beginner of the Scotish name & nation.) The words in English are as followeth: Haile king of Albine, Alexander the sonne of Dauid, the sonne of Alex, the sonne of William, the sonne of Henrie, the sonne of Dauid, and so forth as before. This Hilland Scot was highlie rewarded by the king for his labour, according as was thought requisite.

The salutation of an Hilland man.

In the second yéere of his reigne, king Alexander (or rather such as had the gouernement of the realme vnder him) assembled togither all the prelates and barons of the realme at Dunfirmling, and there ordeined to take vp the bones of his grandmother quéene Margaret, which being done, he caused them to be put into a shrine of siluer, the 21 day of Julie, and minding to place the same where it resteth at this present, as it was borne forth toward that place, when the bearers came against the sepulchre of hir husband king Malcolme, they were not able to remoue the relikes anie further, till by the councell (as is said) of an aged man that was then & there present, they toke vp the bones of the same Malcolme also, and bare them forth with hirs to the place aforesaid, where they after rested in great veneration of the people. Such as were appointed gouernors (during the minoritie of king Alexander) doubting least the tender yéeres of their soueréigne might imbolden the enimies of the relme to attempt some inuasion, sent ambassadors vnto Henrie king of England, requiring that the peace might be ratified anew with him and his people, and further to make a motion of mariage to be had betwixt king Alexander and a daughter of king Henries.

The translation of quéene Margarets bones.

They were affianced in the daies of king Alexander the faire, as in the English chronicle it may appeare.

Shortlie after, vpon this motion, both the kings met at Yorke with a great number of lords, as well spirituall as temporall of both the realmes, where king Alexander (according to the promise before that time made) maried the ladie Margaret daughter to the forenamed king Henrie, on saint Stephans day

1250. in Christmasse, with all solemnitie and ioifull mirth that might be deuised. The charges whereof were borne partlie by king Henrie, & partlie by the archbishop, who in feasting those princes spent right liberallie. At length, king Alexander after he had solaced himselfe in the companie of his father in law king Henrie a certeine time, returned into Scotland with his new maried wife. During the minoritie of K. Alexander, the realme of Scotland was gouerned in great prosperitie by the nobles: but after his comming to ripe age, he was informed of certeine extortions done by some of the peeres of his realme against the poore people, and thereupon determined to see redresse therein. Amongst other there were accused of such trangression, the earles of Menteith, Atholl, and Buchquhane, with the lord of Strabogie, which were of one surname, that is to saie, of the Cumins. These being summoned to appeare before the iustices, with one Hugh Aberneth, and other of their complices, vpon their contempt so to do, were proclamed traitors, and as the Scotish men tearme it, put to the horne.

The foresaid lords moued with this displeasure, purposed to reuenge the same, and assembling their powers in secret wise, toke the king at Kinrosse, and brought him vnto Striueling, where they kept him as captiue in ward a long time after. Through which aduenture much harme insued, by reason of misruled persons, that wrought manie oppressions against the people, in hope to escape the due punishment for their mischiefous acts prouided, sith the king who should haue seene iustice ministred, was holden in captiuitie by his presumptuous aduersaries. But of this matter ye maie see more in the English chronicles, about the 39 yeere of Henrie the third. The house of the Cumins was in those daies of great power within the realme, both in multitude of offring, riches, lands, possessions, and maine rent. There were at the same time to the number of 32 knights of that surname within the realme, all men of faire possessions and reuenues. But as it often happeneth, that men of great possessions and dominion are had in suspicion with the prince, whereby the same is for the more part the cause of their ruine and fall, specially when they presume too farre vpon their high power: so it chanced here. For within a short time after that the king was thus taken (as before is shewed) the chiefe author of the whole conspiracie, that is to saie, the lord Walter earle of Menteith, who was highest in authoritie among all those Cumins, was poisoned (as was thought) by his owne wife, through which mischance the residue of the Cumins were so eranimated, that obteining their pardon, for all offenses passed of the king, they did set him againe at libertie.

This woman did thus make awaie hir husband the erle of Menteith through instigation of an Englishman called John Russell, as by coniectures it was suspected; namelie, for that refusing to marrie with anie of the Scotish nobilitie, she toke the said Russell to husband, though in estate to be compared with hirs, he was iudged a match farre vnmeet, and thereupon constreined to flie with him into England, she died there in great miserie. About this time pope Vrbane the fourth of that name instituted the feast of Corpus Christi, to be celebrated each yeere on the thursday after Trinitie sundaie. The Carmelite friers came at this time into Scotland, and erected a chappell of our ladie without the walles of saint Johns towne, which the bishop of Donkeld appointed them, therein to celebrate their seruice. It was also said, that in this season a monke of Melrosse was admonished in a dreame, where he should find a part of the holie crosse, not far from Peplis in Louthian, inclosed in a case ingrauen with the title of S. Nicholas. And not farre from the same was likewise found a stone chest, right cunninglie wrought and ingrauen, wherein were found certeine bones wraped in silke, but whose bones the same were it was not knowne. As soone as the case was opened, within the which the crosse was included, manie miracles were wrought (as it was then beleeued.) King Alexander for deuotion hereof, builded an abbeie in honor of the holie crosse, in the same place where that peece of the crosse was so found. In this abbeie afterwards there were monks inhabiting of the order of the Trinitie.

Not long after, the two kings of England and Scotland met togither at Warke castell, accompanied with a great number of the nobles and gentlemen of both their realmes, for the redresse of certeine misorders committed betwixt the borderers. Such reformation also was here deuised, and recompense made on either side, that both the realms continued afterwards in more perfect tranquillitie for a certeine space, than euer was seene in anie kings daies before that time. In this season was the church of Glasco finished in that perfection as it stands to be seene at this day, right sumptuouslie builded, for the most part at the charges of William bishop of that see, who liued not long after the finishing of the said worke. In the yeere following, which was the yeere after the birth of our Sauiour 1263, there fell a great dearth through both the realmes of England and Scotland, by reason of the wet haruest preceding, so that the corne and graine was quite marred and corrupted before it could be got beside the ground.

In interuiew Matth. Paris writeth that in the yeare 1256, both K. Alexander & his wife came into England to visit king Henrie, whom they found at Woodstoke, as in the English chronicles further appeareth.

A great derth

Acho king of Norwaie, being informed how the Scots were thus oppressed with famine and other miseries, by report of them that made the same more than it was in deed, supposed to find time and occasion fit for his purpose, to subdue them wholie to his dominion. Hereupon, preparing an armie and a fleet of ships conuenient for such an enterprise, he landed with the same in the westerne Iles, on Lammas day otherwise called Petri ad Vincula. Those Iles continued vnder subiection of the Norwegians and Danes, from king Edgars time vnto the daies of this Acho. From thence the said Acho with a mightie power of his Danes and Norwegians came ouer into Aran and Bute, which are two Iles, and onelie at that time amongst all the residue were vnder the dominion of Scots. But Acho hauing quicklie subdued them at his pleasure, in hope of more prosperous successe, transported his whole armie ouer into Albion, and landed with the same on the nert coasts, where after he had besieged the castell of Aire a certeine time, hee toke the same, and began to waste and spoile all the countrie thereabouts.

King Alexander being sore astonied with these newes, for that he was yong, and not able (as it was doubted) to resist the force of his enimies, imboldened vpon such frequent victories as they had atchiued, thought best to prolong the time by colour of some treatie for a peace, that waie to diminish the enimies force, by long soiorning in campe without triall of anie battell. Hereupon were ambassadors sent vnto Acho, of the which one amongst them appointed thereto, being well languaged and wise, at their first comming before him spake in this manner.

nance of battell comming towards you to giue the onset. We are of that opinion, that we neuer get so much gaines by victorie of the enimies, no though they haue robbed and spoiled our confines, but that we account it much better to haue peace, if we may haue restitution of wrongs done to vs, by some maner of honest meanes. For what greater follie may be, than to seeke for that by fier and sword, which may be purchased with faire and quiet words? Neuertheless, when our iust desires and reasonable motions are refused of the enimies, when we find them not willing to haue peace (for the obteining whereof all warres ought to be taken in hand) but rather that their onelie seeking is to haue warres, not respecting the quarrell: we are readie to rise wholie togither in reuenge of such contempts with all possible speed and violence against our aduersaries. We are sent therefore from our king and souereigne, to inquire what occasion you haue thus to inuade his realme and subiects, in violating that peace and league, which hath béene obserued and kept betwixt vs and your nation, the space of this hundred yéeres, and not onelie to take from him his two Iles of Bute and Aran, but also to inuade the maine land of his dominions, with such crueltie, as neither consideration of age or person séemeth to be had; but that women, children, and feeble old persons haue passed by the sword, as well as those that haue stood at resistance with weapon in hand against you. What heinous offense haue the Scotishmen at anie time committed either against you or anie other (whose reuengers ye may séeme to be) that they should deserue to haue such crueltie shewed against them? What furious ire hath moued you to burne the churches of God and his saints, with the murther of his people that flee into the same for safegard of their liues? But if you dread not God that gouerneth all things (by his diuine prouidence) which heere in this world we sée; if ye dread not the saints nor vengeance to come on you by the punishment of the righteous God: ye ought yet to dread the two most puissant kings of Albion, alied togither in bond of amitie and mariage, which shall come against you with such puissance, that ye shall not be able to resist the same. Therefore sith ye may depart with honor, we on the behalfe of him from whome we are sent, do admonish you, that better it is for you to redresse such iniuries as ye haue alreadie done, and therewith to repaire home, than to aduenture to be brought vnto such desperate ends, that when ye shall be constreined to séeke for mercie, the same in no wise will be granted vnto you. ¶ These words were spoken by the ambassadors, vpon purpose to put some terror into the hart of this hardie king Acho.

Peace to be preferred before warres.

Wherefore warres ought to be moued.

The cause of their message.

Neuertheles he was abashed so little therwith, that he answered them in this manner. Your beliefe is (I perceiue) ye ambassadors, to abash vs with your fierce and awfull words, supposing vs so weake harted, that we should leaue off our enterprise through your menacing threats: but ye are farre deceiued suerlie if your imagination be such. And where ye exaggerate our iniuries done to you in taking from you certeine Iles, we perceiue you are not met nor indifferent persons to be chosen for iudges in that cause, neither do we mind to learne of you, what we ought to estéeme right or wrong in such behalfe. If ye desire further to know and vnderstand the cause why we haue inuaded Aran and Bute, we saie and affirme, that not onelie those two Iles perteine to vs and our people by good title and ancient right of inheritance, but also all the other Iles of Scotland, as we are able by firme euidences sufficiently to proue. And therfore are we now come to take presentlie so much in value out of Scotland, as ye haue taken in issues and profits out of those Iles in times past from vs. Shew then to your king, that we feare neither his menacing words, nor yet anie other violence that he can shew against vs. Notwithstanding, if he be more desirous of peace than of battell, and lusteth to auoid the spoiling and burning of his townes, and slaughter of his people; or if he desired not to sée the vtter extermination of his realme afore his eies, command him to send vnto vs forthwith ten thousand marks sterling for the fruits of our lands taken vp and receiued by him and his elders in times past, and further that he make a cleare resignation of all claime or title that he may séeme to pretend vnto the said Iles, in such sort that the same may passe vnder our dominion in perpetuitie without anie contradiction.

When king Alexander had heard what the answer of his enimie was, he was therewith sore moued, & perceiuing no waie to eschue the battell, but that he should be constreined to trie fortunes chance, he assembled togither an armie of fortie thousand men, that though he were not able to match his enimies in prowesse, he might yet passe them in number. He diuided his host into three battels. In the right wing was Alexander Steward, a verie valiant knight, nephue to that Alexander which indowed the abbeie of Paslie. He had with him all the men that came forth of Argile, Leuenor, Atholl, and Galloway. In the left wing was Patrike Dunbar, hauing with him the men of Louthian, Fife, Mers, Berwike, and Striueling shire. In the middle ward was the king himselfe, with all the remnant people of the other parts of Scotland, to succour the wings when danger appéered. These battels were ordered in such arraie, that euerie band had a capteine assigned to them of their owne language, to exhort them to manhod, thereby to win praise and honor.

At his entring into the confines of Conningham, where he came first within sight of his enimies, he called his people togither, and exhorted them to do their dutifull indeuors like hardie and valiant men, against those enimies that inuaded their countrie without anie iust cause or title of warre, and to put their trust in almightie God, desiring him to grant victorie vnto that part, which had most right and iustest cause of battell. He further shewed how necessarie it was for them to behaue themselues valiantlie, and how much it stood them in hand to fight with manlie courages, in defense of their wiues, children, liberties, and lands, hauing no hope of suertie of life but in the valiant vsing of their able hands, so that their whole safegard rested in this point, either to vanquish their enimies with manhod, or else to liue in seruile bondage as their slaues and miserable thrals, and to suffer their wiues and daughters to be abused at their lust and pleasure. He willed them therefore to consider, that not onelie he, but all Scotland should sée them fight that day, noting both their manhod & cowardise. But sith their cause was iust, and moued onlie in defense of their native countrie and ancient liberties, he trusted they would shew the more hardinesse and courage, namelie against them that sought onelie bloud and spoile. These with other the like words king Alexander vttered with bold spirit, to incourage his people. And on the other part king Acho likewise thought it expedient to vse some exhortation vnto his armie, that they should not be afraid of the great number and huge multitude of the Scots.

The chiefest point to incourage them to do valiantlie, he supposed was the hope of spoile, and therefore he put them in remembrance, how by victorie not onelie all such riches as the Scots had brought thither with them (which could not be small) but also all the whole substance and treasure of the realme to be at their commandement, yea and the realme it selfe, if they minded to inioy it: so that this was the day which they had so much desired, wherein sufficient opportunitie was offered to shew what reward should follow to ech man for his good and valiant seruice. But for that high enterprises and famous exploits might neuer be atchiued without extreme ieopardie, it behoued them to atteine to these so great commodities by persing thorough, and ouerthrowing by dint of sword the arrated battels of their enimies, which how easie a matter it should be for them to bring to passe, such as well considered the circumstances, might some coniecture. For through dearth and famine which so long hath reigned amongst the Scotish people, their bodies and forces (saith he) are so wonderfullie infeebled, that they appeare to represent rather shadowes than full personages of men able to make resistance.

High enterprises atchiued with extreme perill.

Againe, in consideration how necessarie it was for euerie man to fight without fainting, sith they were inuironed on ech part without meane to escape, he desired them, that if it so fell out, that they should chance to be ouercome (which as he trusted should not come to passe) that in such misaduenture they would yet sell their liues derelie, and not to die vnreuenged. Thus hauing opened vnto them what prosperous hap followed by victorie, and what danger by the ouerthrow, he thought to haue sufficientlie instructed them to put all feare aside, and to do what lay in their vttermost forces to vanquish the enimies.

The ordering of the battels.

The kings on either side, hauing thus exhorted their people to do their indeuors, they arraie their battels. Acho disposed all his best souldiers and whole force of his armie in the middle ward, for that he had knowledge how the Scotish king was placed in the middle battell of his people: wherefore he supposed, that if he might ouerthrow and vanquish that part where the king stood, he should easilie then put the residue to flight. His wings (bicause he had not number sufficient to furnish them fullie) were arraied more weakelie in slender and thin ranks: but yet at the first incounter there was a terrible fight betwixt them, especiallie where the two kings fought: for they preassed still with great violence on that part where they saw anie danger, not ceassing to exhort & incourage their men to stand to the bargaine with manlie stomachs, so that on either side these two kings plaied the parts of verie valiant capteins.

The battels ioine.

The valiancie of the kings.

Acho with a band of verie hardie souldiers assaied sundrie times to perse and disorder the battell where king Alexander fought: notwithstanding he had so great number of people there with him, that he stuffed euen the ranks with fresh men where he saw it needfull. Also betwixt the wings, there was no lesse crueltie shewed on either side in the beginning of the battell, till at length the Norwegians, perceiuing themselues ouerpressed with multitude, and compassed in on euerie side, did somewhat begin to shrinke, and first those in the left wing, constreined to breake their order, fell to running awaie. Alexander Steward therfore, that had the leading of the right wing of the Scots, hauing pursued the enimies a certeine space, and slaine Achos nephue, a man of high reputation and authoritie amongst the Norwegians, caused the retreat to be sounded, and gathering his men againe into araie, brought them against the enimies of the middle ward, where was hard hold betwixt the two kings, the battell continuing with great slaughter on both parts, and vncerteine a long while to whether part the victorie would incline: but the Norwegians being now assailed on the backs by a new power of their enimies, at length they began to flee amaine.

The maine battell of the Norwegians fleeth.

In the meane time, the left wing of the Scots, whereof one Patrike had the leading, was in great danger, by reason the capteine himselfe was sore wounded, and thereby all the companies in the same wing sore discomforted: but after they once beheld how the middle ward of their enimies was put to flight, they recouered new courages, and with great force caused their aduersaries, with whom they were matched, to giue backe also: and so were the Danes and Norwegians chased by the Scots, with verie cruell slaughter through all Cunningham, not ceassing from the pursute of the enimies, till night made an end of that daies worke. King Acho with a few other escaped out of danger, and comming to the castell of Aire, which (as ye haue heard) he had wone before, he was there informed of an other losse which he had susteined: for his fleet conteining the number of an hundred and fiftie ships, were so beaten with an outragious tempest, that there were not past foure of all that number saued, the residue being drowned and broken against the rocks and cliffes. The mariners also, being constreined to come on land for safegard of their liues, were slaine by the people of the countrie, so that few of them or none at all escaped.

Acho being thus abashed with these two infortunate mischances, aswell for the losse and discomfiture of his armie by land, as for the perishing of his nauie on the seas, got him vnto those foure ships that were saued, and sailed with them about the coast, till he arriued in Orkneie. In this battell, which was fought at Largis on the third day of August, in the yere 1263, there were slaine of Danes and Norwegians 24 thousand, and of Scots about fiue thousand. Thus saith Hector Boetius. But Fourdon seemeth not to agree altogither herewith, who writing of this inuasion made by the Norwegians into Scotland, saith, that they were but twentie thousand men of warre in all, imbarked in foure score ships, which comming to the new castell of Aran, besieged as well the said castell of Aran, as the castell of Bute, and tooke them both, spoiling also the churches alongst the sea coast, and after arriuing at Largis in Cunningham, on the feast of the natiuitie of our ladie, lost the most part of their vessels, which were drowned togither with thousands of men in the same. The residue that got to land, incountring with the Scots led by Alexander Steward of Dondonald, were discomfited, put to flight, chased & drowned in the sea, into the which they were driuen. Amongest other that were slaine, a nephue of king Acho was one, a yong gentleman of great valiancie, and sore lamented of his vncle. Acho had much adw to escape himselfe, he was so egerlie pursued of his enimies.

Thus haue I thought good to shew the diuersitie of writers in this behalfe, that it may appeere how things are sometimes amplified by Boetius, to aduance the glorie of his countriemen, further perhaps than by the simple veritie of those that did write before him, may in some points be well auerred. But now to proceed. King Acho at his comming into Orkneie, sent into Norwaie and Denmarke for a new armie, prouiding ships & all other things necessarie, to haue made a new inuasion into Scotland against the nert spring: but for that he himselfe departed out of this life in the beginning of the yere nert following, all that purueiance and great preparation was dashed, and came to none effect. The same day that Acho deceassed, that is to saie, the 21 day of Januarie, Alexander prince of Scotland, the eldest son of king Alexander, whome he begot on his wife queene Margaret, the sister of Henrie king of England, was borne, to the great reioising of the people. Ambaſſadors ſent from Magnus K. of Norwaie to king Alexander.

In the ſecond yeare of his reigne, he ſent his ambaſſadors (of whome the chiefe was the chancellor of Norwaie) vnto king Alexander, whome they found at ſaint Johns towne, and there ſignified vnto him, that king Magnus their maiſter would willinglie giue ouer all his title, right, and claime vnto Aran and Bute, ſo that the reſidue of the Iles might remaine in quiet poſſeſſion of him and his ſucceſſors in time comming. Herevnto was anſwer made by king Alexander, that the Iles by right of old inheritance perteined vnto him and his progenitors kings of Scotland, and therefore he might not make anie agreement with the Danes or Norwegians, till he had recouered the full poſſeſſion of the ſame Iles. The ambaſſadors being diſpatched and ſent awaie with this anſwer, incontinentlie Alexander Steward of Paſleie, and John Cumin were ſent with an armie ouer into Man, which Ile they then recouered (though not without bloud) forth of the hands of the Danes and Norwegians, who had kept the ſame in poſſeſſion now for the ſpace of 167 yeares paſſed, but not without ſome alteration and trouble, as may appeare by the annales of Richard Southwell, a writer (as ſhould ſeeme) well inſtructed in matters as well touching Scotland, and the north parts, as alſo concerning the ſtate of the out Iles. And therefore that the ſame may the better appeare to the readers, I haue thought it not impertinent to ſet downe what I haue read in the ſame Southwell, touching the kings, or rather viceroies of Man, and thoſe Iles which for a ſeaſon (as ſhould ſeeme in deed) were ſubſtituted by the kings of Norwaie, though it may alſo appeare, that ſometime there was a certeine ſucceſſion in them, as from the father to the ſonne, & from the brother to the brother, &c: in manner as if it had beene by waie of inheritance.

In the daies of king John therefore (as ſaith the foreſaid Southwell) one Gothred reigned as king in Man. And in the yeare 1228, one Reginald being king of thoſe Iles, was murthered by wicked perſons, & then his brother Olaue reigned in his place. In the yeare 1230, the king of Norwaie appointed one Huſbac, the ſonne of Osmund (ſurnamed Hacon) to gouerne the ſaid Iles called Sodorenſes, that is to ſay, the Ile of Man, & the other Iles there abouts the coaſts of Scotland; the which Huſbac, together with two other captains Olaue and Godred, ſurnamed Don, came by ſea, and arriued at Bute, where they wan the caſtell: but Huſbac was ſlaine with a ſtone that was throwne downe vpon him. And then after this, the foreſaid Olaue and Godred came vnto the Ile of Man, where they diuided the kingdome of the Iles betwixt them, ſo as Olaue had Man alotted to him for his part, and Godred the other Iles. But after that Godred was alſo ſlaine, Olaue gouerned both in Man, and in all the other Iles (thoſe excepted which the ſonnes of Somerled held in poſſeſſion.) In the yeare 1237, in the moneth of Maie, Alane king of Man, the ſonne of Godred, & brother to Reginald, departed this life, after whoſe deceaſſe his ſonne Harold ſucceeded him, and reigned 12 yeares, being but 14 yeares of age when he began his reigne.

In the yeare 1247, Haco king of Norwaie ſent for Harold king of Man to come vnto his coronation, who comming thither, was honorablie receiued, and obteined king Hacos daughter in mariage: but as he returned from thence, in the yeare 1249, together with his wife, they periſhed in the ſeas by a tempeſt on the coaſts of Ireland. Then ſucceeded his brother Reginald, who reigned but 27 daies, for he was ſlaine the firſt of June the ſame yeare, by the ſeruants of a knight called Yuarus. Then Harold the ſonne of Godred Don gouerned Man one yeare, being remoued by the king of Norwaie: & after him Magnus the ſonne of Olaue began his reigne ouer Man & the other Iles, by conſent of the Manſkemen themſelues. But in the yeare 1254, one Yuarus was ordeined king, or rather viceroy of thoſe Iles, & gouerned the ſame, till the foreſaid Magnus king of Norwaie reſigned his title to all the ſaid Iles vnto king Alexander (as ye haue heard) who placed his lieutenants there, of whome the firſt was called Godred mac Mares, the ſecond Alane. And after him Maurice Okarfaire ſucceeded; and then followed one that was the kings chaplaine.

For the time of the reſignation made, I follow Hector Boetius, by reaſon of ſome contrarietie which appeareth in Southwell in the account of the yeares aſſigned to the reignes of thoſe Iland kings, if you confer the ſame with the time of the foreſaid reſignation. But now to the matter. The lieutenant appointed to haue the rule of thoſe Iles, now that they were thus come into the hands of the Scots, was bound by his office to be readie with thirtene ſhips, and fiue hundred mariners to come to the aid of the Scots, at all times when he ſhould thereto be required. After this, were the earles of Atholl, Carrike, and March, Alexander Steward, with the thanes of Argile, and Lennos, ſent with a puiſſant armie vnto the other of the weſterne Iles, the which thoſe that were greateſt, they brought with much a do vnder the obeiſance of the crowne of Scotland, the reſidue ſubmitted themſelues.

The weſterne Iles recouered out of the hands of the Norwegians

Magnus king of Norwaie informed hereof, ſent eftſoones his chancellor in ambaſſage vnto king Alexander, to trie if he might by treatie recouer againe thoſe Iles: and if he might not bring that to paſſe, yet to compound with him for a yearelie tribute. The firſt motion of the chancellor would in no wiſe be heard, therefore ſurceaſſing to ſpend anie longer time about it, they fell in communication touching the ſecond, which toke effect at length in this wiſe. King Magnus by his letters vnder his great ſeale, renounced and gaue ouer his right or claime that he had or might haue, both for him and his ſucceſſors to all the Iles of Scotland. And king Alexander for this reſignation was agreed to paie the ſaid king of Norway, foure thouſand marks ſterling, together with a penſion or tribute of an hundred marks by yeare. And for the more confirmation of loue and amitie betwixt the two kings and their people, Margaret the daughter of king Alexander, being not paſt one yeares of age, was promiſed in mariage vnto Hanigo, the ſonne of king Magnus, the ſame mariage to be conſummat when ſhe came to yeares mariable. Further, in place where the greateſt ſlaughter of Danes and Norwegians had beene made, it was couenanted that an hoſpitall ſhould be erected & founded there, for the ſuſtentation of poore folks.

About this ſeaſon, there were great warres in England betwixt king Henrie and his barons, of whome the chiefe was Simon Mountfort earle of Leiceſter, and diuerſe other. K. Henrie being not well able to withſtand his aduerſaries attempts, requeſted K. Alexander to ſend him ſome aid of Scots to ſubdue the rebels of his realme, that had arreared warres againſt him. Hereupon ſhortlie after, was Alexander Cumin, with fiue thouſand choſen men, ſent by king Alexander into England, who right valiantlie bare themſelues in that war which king king Henrie held against his barons, whereof in the English chronicle ye may read more at large. In these dates (as the translator of Hector Boetius hath written) that notable and most famous outlaw Robin Hood liued, with his fellow little John, of whome are manie fables and merie iests deuised and song amongst the vulgar people. But Iohn Maior writeth that they liued (as he doth gesse) in the daies of king Richard the first king of England, 1198.

Robin Hood and little John his companion.

In the yeare next and immediatlie following, after that Henrie king of England had subdued his domesticall enimies, there came a legat from pope Clement the fourth, requiring him to haue a collection of monie in Scotland towards the charges of leuieng an armie against the Saracens. But this legat was not receiued into the realme, but commanded to shew his message vpon the borders. He demanded therfore of euerie parish-church in Scotland foure marks sterling, and of euerie abbeie foure score marks. And to the end he might the soner purchase fauor to the furtherance of his purpose, he deuised by the way certeine statutes and ordinances right profitable to be vsed in the realme of Scotland, as he iudged. But king Alexander for answer hereunto alledged, that the Scots minded not to receiue anie statutes or decrees, other than such as were ordeined by the pope, or some generall councell: for by a generall rule; The more precepts, the more offendors are alwaies found. And as touching the request made for the collection of so great summes of monie, it was not thought necessarie, that so much coine should go forth of the realme: neuertheless if it were thought expedient, he would be contented to send forth at his owne proper costs and charges, a number of armed men to go with the christian armie against the Turks: but for monie otherwise forth, the realme would not depart with anie, least it should be wastfullie spent, or taken by the way of theeues, as it had beene aforetime.

King Alexanders wisedome praised by king Henrie.

Henrie king of England praised much the wisedome of king Alexander for this his answer, as he declared shortlie after by his sonne prince Edward, who came to visit his sister the quæne, and his brother in law king Alexander at Rorsburgh, where they met him; for ye must vnderstand that K. Henrie had also learned by experience to be wise in that behalfe, as well as others. King Alexander yet after this sent vnto the pope a thousand marks in siluer: and vnto Lewes the French king, that required his aid in that iournie which he made into Affrike against the Saracens there, a thousand souldiers, vnder the leading of the earles of Carrike & Atholl, John Steward brother of Alexander Steward, Alexander Cumin, Robert Keth, George Durward, John Quincie, & William Gordon. All these going ouer with K. Lewes into Affrike, died there, either vpon the enimies sword, or by the intemperat heat of that countrie (whereto they had not beene accustomed) in the yeare after the incarnation 1270. The earle of Carrike, whose name was Thomas, perishing thus amongst the residue in Affrike, left no inheritor behind him to inioy his lands, sauing a daughter named Martha, being then about fifteene yeares of age. This yong ladie, chancing to ride on hunting in the woods for passtime and solace, as the vse is, fortuned by aduenture to meet with a noble yong man one Robert Bruse the sonne and heire to Robert Bruse the lord of Anandale in Scotland, and Cleueland in England, begot of Isabell the second daughter of Dauid earle of Huntingtor. The ladie immediatlie became so inamored of this yong gentleman, that she led him with hir home vnto Carrike, where (without making hir friends priuie to the matter) she maried him in all hast, least anie man should be about to hinder hir determined purpose. Of this mariage was borne that Robert Bruse which afterwards (through want of heires of the linage of king Alexander) atteined the crowne of Scotland. As soone as Alexander was aduertised hereof, he tooke such indignation that she should bestow hir selfe so lightlie vpon one whom she neuer saw before, that he seized hir castell of Turneberie into his hands, with all hir other lands and possessions, as it were by eschеat, for that she had maried without his consent. Notwithstanding, within short while after he tooke pitie on hir case, and for an easie composition of monie which she paied for hir marriage, restored to hir againe all hir lands and liuings, suffering hir to inioy hir husband without anie more trouble or veration. In the third yeare after, the said ladie was deliuered of the afore-remembred Robert Bruse that was after king of Scotland. And the same yeare, which was the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour 1274, Dauid the second son of king Alexander deceassed; and the third yeare after, the brethren of Edward king of England came into Scotland to visit the quæne their sister, & their brother in law the K. & after did attend them in their iournie to London, whither they went to be present at the coronation of the foresaid Edward, as then returned forth of Affrike after the decease of his father king Henrie, to take vpon him the gouernement of the kingdome descended vnto him by right of inheritance. He was crowned the same yeare on the day of the assumption of our ladie in August, with great solemnitie and triumph.

At the same time there was a Norman in king Edwards court, of such passing strength of bodie, that he ouerthrew all men with whome he wrestled, till at length one Ferquhard a Scotishman borne, of the countrie of Rosse, descended of noble parentage, vanquished him to his great praise & aduancement in honor: for king Alexander in guerdon of so worthie a deed there done in the presence of so honorable an assemblie, gaue vnto him the earledome of Rosse for euermore. Of this Ferquhard succeeded fiue earles all of his surname, but the first earle was named William Rosse, otherwise Leslie, in whose sonne the seuenth earle failed the dignitie of that house for fault of succession. At the same time prince Alexander king Alexanders sonne did homage vnto king Edward for the earledome of Huntington, as the Scotish writers do testifie. Shortlie after that king Alexander was returned forth of England at that time into Scotland, his wife quæne Margaret deceassed, and was buried in Dunfirmling. She bare by him two sonnes, Alexander and Dauid, and one daughter named Margaret, the which (according to the assurance before made) was maried about three yeares after hir mothers decease, vnto Hanigo, or rather Aquine king of Norwaie, and deceassed in the second yeare after the solemnization of the mariage, leauing behind hir a daughter named also Margaret.

The death of quæne Margaret.

The mariage of Margaret king Alexanders daughter.

But before this hap fell so out, euen immediatlie after the death of quæne Margaret the mother, hir yonger sonne Dauid deceassed: by reason whereof, king Alexander being carefull of his succession, procured a mariage for his elder sonne prince Alexander, with the earle of Flanders his daughter, the which being brought into Scotland, was maried vnto the said prince in Jedworth, on the sunday after the feast of saint Martine in winter, in the yeare of our Lord 1279. The feast of this mariage was holden with great triumph and solemnitie continuallie for the space of fifteene daies togither. ¶ This yeare a number of the Scotish nobilitie, which had attended the ladie Margaret into Norwaie, were lost loſt by ſhipwracke, as they would haue returned backe againe to Scotland after the conſummation of hir mariage there with king Hanigo or Aquine. Shortlie after, by the force of deaths dreadfull dint, two greeuous loſſes chanced vnto king Alexander, the one following in the necke of another. For firſt his eldeſt ſonne prince Alexander, being not paſt twentie yeares of age, departed out of this world, without leauing anie iſſue behind him; and not long after, his daughter Margaret quæne of Norwaie deceaſſed alſo, leauing behind hir one onelie daughter (as before is mentioned) being as yet but an infant.

In the ſame yéere was a generall councell holden at Lions, the pope and a great multitude of the prelats of chriſtendome being there aſſembled. To this councell were ſummoned to appeare all the prouincials, wardens, and miniſters of the begging friers. And for that there were ſo manie ſundrie orders of them, each man deuiſing of his owne braine ſome new alteration; all thoſe orders were reduced into the foure orders, which after by the church of Rome were approued and allowed. A generall commandement was alſo giuen, that no man ſhould go about to begin anie new forme of ſuch vaine ſuperſtitious orders, which appoint themſelues to eſchue labor, to the end they may liue in pleaſure, luſt & idleneſs, vpon the trauell of other mens browes. In this mean time, after that the chriſtian armie was returned home out of Affrike, by reaſon of a truce concluded with the Soldan, the ſame Soldan (that truce notwithſtanding) ceaſſed not to make great ſlaughters and inuaſions vpon thoſe chriſtian men that remained behind. The chriſtian princes ſore moued herewith, made their appreſts for a new expedition into the holie land. The Scots gaue the tenth penie of all their lands, or rather (as ſome bookes ſay) the tenth part of all tithes belonging to churches, to the furtherance of this iornie: notwithſtanding through ſuch enuie and contentions as roſe amongſt the ſaid princes, that iornie brake, to the great damage and preiudice of the chriſtian faith.

King Alexander hauing loſt his wife and children, in maner as is before expreſſed, not onelie hée himſelfe, but alſo all Scotland was in great penſiueneſſe and ſorrow, each man by a certeine foreiudgement and miſgiuing in mind, doubting the miſhap that might thereof inſue. But yet did king Alexander, by the aduiſe of his nobles, in hope of new iſſue, marie the daughter of the earle of Champaigne in France, named Iolant. The mariage was celebrated at Jedburgh with great feaſting and triumph: but that ioy and blithneſſe indured not long after. For the ſame yéere on the 18 day of Aprill, as he was galloping vpon a fierce horſſe at Kingorne, forcing him in his race ſomewhat raſhlie, he was throwne ouer the weſt cliffe towards the ſea by a wonderfull miſfortune, ſo rudelie, that he brake his necke, and ſo therewith immediatlie died in the 42 yéere of his reigne. He was buried at Dunfirmling, in the yéere after the incarnation 1290. It is ſaid, that the daie before the kings death, the earle of March a little before night, demanded of one Thomas Leirmont, otherwiſe named Thomas the rimer, or (as the tranſlator of Hector Boetius ſaith) Thomas Erſilton (who in thoſe daies was reputed for a noble prophetier) or (as we may call him) a ſoothſaier, what weather they ſhould haue on the morow? To whome the ſaid Thomas anſwered, that on the morrow [before none] ſhould blow the forreſt wind and tempeſt that euer was heard of in Scotland at anie time before.

A prophecie of a tempeſt.

On the morrow when the ſkie appeared cleare and bright, without cloud or anie other ſigne of foule weather, and that it drew néere vnto the midſt of the daie, and no wind heard from anie ſide, but all calme and quiet, the earle of March ſent for the forenamed Thomas, and told him that he had miſtaken his marks, in propheſieng of anie ſuch notable tempeſt as he had ſpoken of the night before, conſidering it prooued ſo lithe a daie, without appearance of anie tempeſt to inſue. This Thomas ſaid little thereto, ſauing that he ſaid it was not yet paſt none. And incontinentlie herevpon came a poſt to the caſtell gate of Dunbar, where this earle of March as then laie, bringing word of the kings ſudden death, as before is recited. Then ſaid the propheſier: That is the ſcathfull wind and dreadfull tempeſt, which ſhall blow ſuch calamitie and trouble to the whole ſtate of the whole realme of Scotland. This Thomas was a man in great admiration of the people, ſhewing ſundrie things, as they afterward chanced: howbeit they were euer hid and inuolued vnder the veile of darke and obſcure ſpéeches.

Manie ſtrange wonders and vnketh ſights were ſéene in the daies of this Alexander the third. In the 17 yéere of his reigne, there was ſuch an infinit number of wormes through all the parties of Albion, that not onelie the leaues and fruits of trées, but alſo flowres & herbs in gardens were eaten vp and conſumed with them. And in the ſame yéere, the waters of Forth and Taie roſe with ſuch high tides in flowing ouer the banks, that manie townes and villages were drowned, to the great deſtruction both of men and beaſts. In the 20 yere of his reigne, there was a comet or blaſing ſtarre ſéene of a meruellous quantitie, ſhining euerie day toward the ſouth, euen about none daies. On the Epiphanie day next after, roſe ſo great winds, with ſtormes of ſuch vnmeaſurable great haileſtones, that manie townes were throwne downe by violence thereof. In the meane time, roſe through the vehement rage of winds, a ſudden fire, in manie bounds within the realme of Scotland, that did much hurt to buildings and edifices, burning vp ſteeples with ſuch force of fire, that the belles were in diuerſe places melted, as though it had béene in a fornace. Amongeſt other, thoſe of the abbeie of Abirbrothoke were moſt pretious, which were as then conſumed togither with the ſteeple wherein they hong. The townes of Aberden and Perth were burned the ſame time: alſo part of Lamrike, with the temple, and all the townes and villages in Clow, a part of Angus: and likewiſe manie townes and other buildings in Louthian, and in diuers other parts of the realme, to long here to rehearſe.

In the 31 yéere of his reigne, was the firſt comming of the peſtilence into Scotland, with great mortalitie of the people, where it had not bene heard that euer this ſickneſſe had come within that realme before that time. In the ſolemnization of the ſecond mariage of king Alexander, as the bridegrome (according to the manner) led the bride in a danſe, a great number of lords and ladies following them in the ſame danſe, there appeared to their ſight as it were cloſing vp the hindermoſt of the danſers, a creature reſembling death, all naked of fleſh & lire, with bare bones right dreadfull to behold. Through which ſpectacle, the king and the reſidue of all the companie were ſo aſtonied, and put in ſuch fright & feare, that they had quicklie made an end of their danſe for that time. In the daies of this Alexander the third, liued ſundrie great clearkes. Amongſt other, Michaell Scot was reputed for an excellent phyſician, and for his ſingular practiſe & knowledge in that profeſſion was no leſſe eſtéemed and had in high fauour with Edward king of England, than with king Alexander, during his life time.

The lawes of Alexander the third.

✻ This Alexander made manie healthfull and good lawes, whereof moſt by the negligence of men, and longneſſe of time are woꝛne away; ſo that things ſo profitablie by him deuiſed, ſéeme rather by repoꝛt to haue béene oꝛdeined, than that they are by cuſtome pꝛactiſed. He diuided the kingdome into foure parts, thꝛough which he made his pꝛogreſſe almoſt euerie yéere, remaining about thꝛée moneths in euerie place, there to ſit in iudgement, and to heare the complaints of the poꝛe, at what time the meaneſt perſon might haue fꝛée acceſſe vnto him. As often as he went into anie pꝛouince to giue ſentence of law, he commanded the gouernoꝛ of that place to receiue him with a choſen companie; and when he departed thence, to bꝛing him to the boꝛders of his iuriſdiction, where he was honoꝛablie receiued of the next gouernoꝛs. The which trauelling about his realme he vſed, to the end that he might know all his nobilitie, and that he might alſo be knowne of all others. During which time of his pꝛogreſſe, no great traine oꝛ multitude of courtiers did follow him; bicauſe he would not charge his people in receiuing of them; and foꝛ that cauſe alſo abated and reſtreined the troope of hoꝛſſemen which followed the nobilitie, and bꝛought them into a certeine & meane number, bicauſe he ſuppoſed that the multitude of hoꝛſſes (whereof in warre there was no vſe) were néedleſſe deuourers of meat. Further, he foꝛbad his people to trauell by ſea foꝛ gaine oꝛ merchandize, when he conſidered that thꝛough the vnſkilfulnes of ſailing, the rathneſſe that men vſed in committing themſelues to the ſeas, and the rapine of pirats, manie men were loſt, and their goods ſpoiled: whereby the merchants were dꝛiuen to extreame pouertie. Which pꝛecept when it had continued almoſt a whole yéere, and by manie mens ſpéeches was repꝛehended as dangerous and hurtfull to the weale publike, at the length there arriued ſuch plentie of ſtrange merchandize in Scotland, that the abundance and cheapeneſſe thereof did excéed the memoꝛie of anie foꝛmer age. But yet to take oꝛder with and foꝛ the benefit of the merchants, he foꝛbad his people to buie anie thing bꝛought in by ſtrangers, but ſuch as were merchants of his land, and that all the other people ſhould buie of them ſuch things as they néeded.)

Scotland without a K. and gouernoꝛ.

Miſchiefes inſuing foꝛ lacke of a king.

Six gouernoꝛs choſen to haue the rule of Scotland.

King Alexander the third, being in ſuch miſerable wiſe deceaſſed, as befoꝛe is ſpecified, the realme remained in great diſcomfoꝛt, by reſon he had neither left anie iſſue behind him to ſucceéd in the gouernement thereof, neither taken oꝛder in his life time by teſtament, oꝛ otherwiſe, foꝛ anie other to ſupplie the rome of a gouernoꝛ, ſo that hereof inſued ſuch infinit miſoꝛders, by the pꝛeſumption of wicked and vngratious perſons, the which vpon hope to eſcape vnpuniſhed (bicauſe iuſtice was like to want due pꝛoceſſe) ceaſſed not to attempt manie vnlawfull acts, to the grieuous oppꝛeſſion of the people: which miſruled demeanoꝛs and diſoꝛdered enterpꝛiſes of thoſe outragious perſons, when ſuch as had anie zeale to the wealth of their countrie vnderſtood dailie to multiplie and increaſe, they thought it apperteined to their duties to pꝛouide ſome remedie in due time, and thereꝛpon called a councell togither, wherein after ſundꝛie conſultations had, and manie matters debated touching the rule of the realme, it was finallie agreéd, that ſix gouernoꝛs ſhould be elected and choſen, of the which thꝛée ſhould haue the adminiſtration and rule of the noꝛth parts, and theſe were William Fraſer biſhop of ſaint Andꝛews, Duncane earle of Fife, & John Cumin earle of Buchquane. The other thꝛée were appointed to the gouernance of the ſouth countries, that is to ſay, Robert biſhop of Glaſcow, ſir John Cumin (a man of high eſtimation foꝛ his wiſdome and experience as well in matters concerning peace as warre) and James high ſteward of Scotland.

But in the meane time Edward king of England, ſurnamed Longſhanks, caſt in his mind, how he might make ſome conqueſt of Scotland, now the ſame was thus deſtitute of an head to gouerne it. And foꝛ that he well vnderſtood that the daughter of Noꝛwaie (of whom beforе ye haue heard) was right inheritoꝛ to the crowne of Scotland, though ſhe were but verie yong in yéres, & not able foꝛ mariage: yet to compaſſe his purpoſe that waies foꝛth, he ſent his ambaſſadoꝛs vnto the loꝛds of Scotland, requiring to haue hir to wife, and the realme withall, as due vnto hir by good title and right of inheritance. The loꝛds, after long deliberation herein had, conſented to his deſire, vnder theſe conditions, that the realme ſhould remaine in all fꝛeedoms and liberties, without anie kind of ſeruile ſubiection, in the ſame maner and ſtate as it was vſed in the daies of king Alexander laſt deceaſſed, and other his noble pꝛogenitoꝛs: and if it chanced, that no iſſue came of this mariage to ſucceéd them, then ſhuld the crowne returne by remainder ouer to the next heirs of king Alexander, without anie claime oꝛ pꝛetext of title to be made by king Edward, oꝛ anie of his ſucceſſoꝛs in time to come.

How can this be true, when K. Edward had a wife at that time? but verelie the Scotiſh writers ſhew themſelues ouercome with too much malice in moſt things which they write in the defamatiõ of K. Edward.

Immediatlie herewith, two noble knights, ſir John Scot of Albanoꝛe, and ſir James Wemis, were ſent into Noꝛwaie to fetch the bꝛide ouer into Scotland: but beforе their comming thither, ſhee was deceaſſed, & ſo they returned backe into Scotland againe without effect of their errand. And thus by means of hir death, all amitie betwixt Engliſhmen and Scots ceaſſed. Then began to inſue great trouble and buſineſſe in Scotland, by reaſon of the contention which ſpꝛang betwixt the kinſmen of king Alexander, foꝛ the title and claime which they ſeuerallie made and pꝛetended to the crowne. There were thꝛée chiefliе that ſéemed by néereneſſe of blood to haue moſt right, and therefoꝛe made moſt earneſt ſute in their claime: John Baliol, Robert Bꝛuſe, and John Haſtings. This Robert Bꝛuſe was ſonne to the ſon of that Robert Bꝛuſe, which maried Iſabell the yongeſt daughter to Dauid earle of Huntington, on whom he got a ſon named alſo Robert, that maried the inheritoꝛ of Carrike, as we haue ſhewed beforе, whoſe ſonne this Robert Bꝛuſe was, that now claimed the crowne. John Baliol came of Margaret, eldeſt daughter to the foꝛeſaid Dauid earle of Huntington: foꝛ Alane loꝛd of Galloway, which maried the ſaid Margaret, begot on hir two daughters, of the which the eldeſt named Dernogill, was giuen in mariage vnto ſir John Baliol, father vnto this John Baliol, that thus made claime to the crowne: alledging that foꝛſomuch that he was come of the eldeſt daughter of earle Dauid, the bꝛother of king William, he ought by reaſon to be reputed as next heire to the ſame king William, ſith none other perſon aliue appꝛoched ſo néere vnto him in bloud.

✻ Here I thinke it conuenient beforе any moꝛe be ſpoken of this hiſtoꝛie, to interlace ſomewhat (beſides that which is alredie ſpoken, being here in part repeated) of the deſcent of this Dernogill, the daughter of Alane loꝛd of Galloway, beginning the ſame ſomewhat higher, in this ſoꝛt. In the reigne of William K. of Scots, which began in the yere of Chꝛiſt 1160, as ſaith Leſleus, lib. 6. pag. 226, Ferguſius gouernoꝛ of Galloway left two ſons, Gilbert, and Ethꝛed, who after the death of their father, fell at variance foꝛ the lands of Galloway, to be diuided betwixt them in equall poꝛtions. This bꝛall comming to the eares of king William, he was deſirous to quench quench thoſe flames of vnkindneſſe betweene the ſaid brethren, and for that cauſe with indifferencie (as he ſuppoſed) he ment to pacifie and ſatisfie each part, by diuiding the inheritance equallie betweene them. But Gilbert highlie taking this partition in grudge (becauſe he was eldeſt, & that the whole inheritance belonged to him) did with like hatred purſue both the king and his brother, the one as enuious againſt him, and the other as an vnequall iudge, in giuing his right from him. Wherfore when king William was taken priſoner of the Engliſhmen, this Gilbert being of bold ſpirit (and now by the kings miſhap out of all danger, being deliuered from the feare of anie law) began to vtter his conceiued hatred till this time couertlie concealed. For vpon the ſudden, he toke his brother priſoner, put out his eies, cut out his tong, and not contented with a ſimple death (to be giuen vnto him at one inſtant) did moſt miſerablie a long time togither put him to paine, by diſmembring the ſeuerall parts of his bodie, before he ſhould die. After which wretched fact againſt his owne brother, he ioined himſelfe to the Engliſh nation, and taking preies on the borders, he did vnnaturallie and traitorouſlie (as it were an vtter enimie to his countrie) rage againſt his owne citizens, with all kind of murther and ſlaughter of battell. In which he did ſuch harme, and ſo great oppreſſion, as if he had not bene reſiſted by his nephue Rowland (gathering a ſtrong power to him of ſuch common people as remained ſtedfaſt in dutifull obedience to the impriſoned king) he had vtterlie ſpoiled all the countries adioining to England, or elſe would wholie haue brought them into his ſubiection. For this Rowland a luſtie young gentleman, bold of ſpirit, indued with noble ſtrength of mind and bodie, did not onelie beat downe the force of his vncle, but did manie times (and that ſometimes moſt happilie) fight with the Engliſh, when they ſpoiled his natiue ſoile, or that he made anie inuaſion into their borders.

Of this matter though not ſo fullie is somewhat intreated before, pag. 275. The crueltie of one brother to another.

At length when king William was deliuered of reſtreint, and returned into Scotland, this Gilbert (notwithſtanding all his former euils) by the mediation of his friends, found fauor in the king, and was pardoned of all his offenſes, but yet ſo as he promiſed to make recompenſe of all ſuch damages as he had committed; for the ſure performance whereof, he found ſufficient pledges to the king. But Gilbert ſhortlie after departing this life, they which had ſerued vnder him, giuen by continuall vſe vnto theft and blod, did yeeld themſelues to the fauourable protection of the king of England, either for inconſtancie of mind, or feare of puniſhment, being touched with remorſe of conſcience for the euill which they had before committed. Theſe men thus ſhadowed vnder the wings of England, did againe take armes againſt their countrie, vnder the conduct of Gilpatrike, Henrie Kennedie, and Samuell, who before had beene authors and executors to Gilbert, of all ſuch euils as were by him performed. Againſt whom was Rowland ſent with an armie, who in a ſet battell ſlue the capteine, and a multitude of both kinds of the common people. They which eſcaped the conflict, did flie to the refuge of one Gilcombe, capteine of ſuch perſons as liued vpon ſpoile and pilfering, who by continuance of followers, & increaſe of people, were now growne to ſome number, & did wander ouer all Louthian, robbing & ſpoiling in euerie place where they ſet foot: and not ſo content, did from thence paſſe into Galloway, where this Gilcombe toke in hand the defenſe of Gilberts cauſe (now vtterlie forſaken of all men) vnder colour whereof, he not onelie challenged the inheritance belonging to Gilbert, but alſo behaued himſelfe as chiefe lord of all Galloway. At length incountering with this Rowland in the kalends of October (the third moneth after the companie of this Gilbert was before diſperſed) this Gilcombe was valiantlie ſlaine, with the greateſt number of his followers, by the ſaid Rowland, on whoſe part there was verie few miſſing.

The king of England highlie offended therwith (becauſe the yere before they had ſworne themſelues to ſerue faithfullie vnder him againſt their owne bloud) came in haſte with a maine armie to Carleill to ſeeke reuenge thereof. Which when William king of Scots vnderſtood, he laboured by all the meanes he could, to appeaſe the king of Englands diſpleaſure, and to reconcile this Rowland vnto him. In the end the king of Scots wrought ſo with the Engliſh, that Rowland was admitted to come to Carleill to the preſence of the king of England; the which Rowland did accordinglie. At what time before the king of England, refelling the ſlanderous accuſations of his aduerſaries (and further declaring that he had done nothing either raſhlie, or vniuſtlie againſt his and the common wealths enimie) he was honorablie by the Engliſh king ſuffered to depart from Carleill. Theſe things thus done, & king William returned into Scotland, he called to remembrance the continuall conſtancie and good ſeruice, which Ethred the father of Rowland had manie times done to him and to the realme; therewithall not forgetting the worthie erploits which this Rowland had of late performed for the common wealth: for which conſiderations he worthilie recompenſed the ſaid Rowland, in beſtowing on him the whole countrie of Galloway. And further (although he did not merit the ſame by reaſon of his fathers euils) yet the king mildlie conſidering, that the ſonne was not to beare the offenſe of the father (but hoping by this vndeſerued liberalitie, to bind him faithfullie to ſerue him) did giue the lands of Catrike vnto the ſonne of the ſaid Gilbert. All which William Paruus reporteth to haue happened in the yeere of Chriſt 1183.

Rowland being thus made lord of Galloway, maried the ſiſter of William Hommill conſtable of Scotland, who dieng without iſſue, obteined the ſame office by inheritance in right of his wife, from whome did iſſue Alane lord of Galloway, and conſtable of Scotland, by inheritance from his mother, a valiant gentleman, and ſuch a perſon as for his notable ſeruice (imploied in Ireland on the behalfe of John king of England) was rewarded by the ſaid king with honorable and rich reuenues: for which by the permiſſion of William king of Scotland, he profeſſed himſelfe the liege man of John king of England, and ſware fealtie vnto him. This Alane (as is before ſaid) maried Margaret the elder daughter of Dauid earle of Huntington, of whome he raiſed three daughters, whereof the eldeſt being Dornagill, was maried to Balioll, the ſecond to Bruſe: in right of which Dornagill, the ſonne of this Balioll challenged the crowne of Scotland, as deſcended from the elder ſiſter.) On the other ſide Robert Bruſe, albeit he was deſcended of the yongeſt daughter to earle Dauid, yet was he come of the firſt iſſue male, for his father was firſt borne, and therefore if king William had deceaſſed without iſſue, the crowne had deſcended to him: for which conſideration he mainteined that he ought now to be preferred. Haſtings alſo for his part, becauſe he was come of the yongeſt daughter of king Dauid, maried to his father Henrie Haſtings, wanted not allegations to propone, why he ought to be admitted. Beſide theſe, there were other alſo, that made claime to the crowne of Scotland, and had matter ſufficient to mainteine their ſute. This controuerſie being brought before the gouernors, was at ſundrie times argued with much contention, not without the assistance of the nobles fauoring the parties, as occasion of friendship or kinred mooued them, namelie Baliol and Bruse had no small number that leaned vnto their parts, by reason whereof, the gouernors were in doubt to proceed to anie definite sentence in the matter, least if they declared one of them king, an other would attempt to vsurpe the crowne by force.

The doubt of the gouernors

Hereupon they iudged it best to referre the decision of all this whole matter to some mightie king, which was of puissance able to constreine the parties repugnant to obeie his sentence. Hereunto was none thought so meet as Edward king of England, and therfore they chose him [Of whose faith and loue towards them, they did not anie whit mistrust, bicause Alexander the last king of Scots had found the father of this Edward, both a louing father in law to himselfe, and vpright vntor to his realme. Whereunto also they ioined this cause of hope in king Edward, for that the said Edward had of late before tried the fauor of the Scots towards him, by a singular testimonie, in that they so easilie consented to ioine the heire of Scotland with the son of the said Edward.]

Fr. Thin. Buchanan.

Whereupon king Edward toke this charge vpon him, as competent iudge, & promised by a certein day to come vnto Berwike, willing that their councell might be assembled there against that time. At his comming thither, at the day assigned, and hauing heard what could be said on eth part, and throughlie considering at length their allegations, he perceiued the same doubtfull, and required a longer time to discusse the truth by good aduise of counsell: and therefore required to haue twelue Scotishmen, the best learned and most skilfull lawiers of all the realme to be associat with twelue Englishmen, which he promised to chose forth of the most perfect and wisest clerks that might be found within all his dominions, to the intent that by their ripe and aduised debating of the matter, the truth might appeere, according to the which he minded to giue sentence, without fauor either of one part or other. [Before which he toke a solemne oth of the ambassadors of Scotland, and such nobles as were there to stand to his definitiue sentence, further thereupon requiring a writing to be made, sealed with the seales of the same nobles.]

The title doubtfull.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan.

The nobles sweare to stand to the order of king Edward.

After when all such matters and proues as were proponed by the parties, alledged by them for furtherance of their titles were put in writing, as matter of record, he returned backe againe into England.

This report of the Scotish writers smelleth altogither of malice conceiued against him, for that he scourged them so sore for their vntruths.

¶ Here the Scotish writers report, that king Edward vsed himselfe nothing vprightlie in this matter, but accordinglie (as it often happeneth) had the eies of his conscience blinded, vpon hope to gaine somewhat by this credit thus to him committed. But how vniustlie he is slandered in this behalfe, I leaue to the indifferent readers to consider, by conferring that which the Scots do write thereof, with that which is to be found in our English historie. But to proceed as we find it in the Scotish writers. King Edward to be satisfied in knowledge of the truth, sent into France for men learned and of great experience in the lawes, that he might haue their opinions in the demands of the parties for their doubtfull rights. But (saith Hector Boetius) he first commanded them in no wise to agree vpon anie resolute point, but rather to varie in opinions, that when the plee should seeme doubtfull by reason of their contrarietie in deciding thereof, he might the better vnder that colour, giue iudgement with which partie he thought most expedient to serue his purpose.

Respect of persons in deciding controuersies is not to be considered.

Howbeit the most part of the lawiers iudged with Robert Bruse, both for the worthines of his person, and also for that he was come of the first issue male. But some there were that gaue sentence with John Baliol, for that he was descended of the eldest sister. King Edward supposing this to be the time most conuenient for his purposed intention to conquer the realme of Scotland, returned to Berwike, where he had appointed the 24 learned men before specified, to be present, that finall sentence might be giuen, according as he had before promised. When he was come thus vnto Berwike, and the foresaid 24 learned lawiers assembled as assistants with him, and the parties appearing before him in a chamber prouided for the purpose, he caused the dores to be suerlie kept, and the entries stronglie warded, that no man might come in or out, but by his appointment and licence. His purpose was to make him king, that would be sworne to hold the crowne of Scotland of him, as superior lord thereof. And bicause he knew that Robert Bruse was a man of singular manhod and wisedome, he thought best to assaie him first, and if he found him not conformable to his purpose, then he minded to trie what the Baliol would do.

K. Edward commeth to Berwike.

The purpose of king Edward, as the Scots do vntrulie report.

When Robert Bruse had throughlie heard king Edwards motion, he answered that he weied the libertie of his countrie, more than his priuate preferment, and therefore minded not to deliuer his countrie (which euen to that day had beene free) into the bondage and seruitude of the Englishmen. King Edward perceiuing his stoutnesse of stomach, brake off with him, and fell in talke with the Baliol, who had such blind desire to atteine the crowne, that he passed not whether he intoied the same in libertie or seruitude, so he might haue it. Hereupon when this Baliol had giuen his faith by assured oth vnto king Edward, that he would do homage vnto him for the realme of Scotland, and acknowledge to hold the same of him as superior lord, king Edward gaue sentence with him, to haue most right to the crowne and realme of Scotland, now thus in controuersie.

The answer of Robert Bruse.

The Baliol promiseth to do homage to king Edward

It is said, that the earle of Glocester, a man of great prudence and authoritie in England (seeing the Baliol thus made king, and Robert Bruse without reason put backe) spake in this sort to king Edward: Oh king, remember what is done by thee this day, sparing to giue righteous sentence in this matter; for though the same be now couered and hid, it shall be reuealed, when the great iudge that searcheth consciences, and the secrets of euerie mans mind, shall cause thee to answer for it at the dreadfull day of that vniuersall iudgement: thou hast now giuen sentence on a king, but then shall iudgement be giuen on thee. Shortlie after, John Baliol went in great arraie vnto Scone, where he was crowned king of Scotland on saint Andrewes day, in the yeere from the incarnation 1292. In the yeere next insuing, on saint Stephans day in Christmasse, he came to Newcastell vpon Tine, and there did homage vnto king Edward for the realme of Scotland, contrarie to the mind and consent of all his nobles, for that by this meanes, he seemed to submit his realme (which had remained in freedome vnto those daies) into the seruitude of the Englishmen: but small felicitie succeeded therof. * And heere it appeereth by Buchanan, that the nobilitie of Scotland, which held with Baliol, did also their homage: for being farre from home, they durst not contend against the power of two kings. Whereof some taking it greeuouslie in their hart, dissembled with the present time, and couered their anger vnder the cinders of a faire countenance, which yet in the end burst out, notwithstanding this painted shew. For the declaration and proffe whereof, there was shortlie after occasion offered to Makduffe, by the death of the earle of Fife, being (in the time when there was no king) made one of the six gouernors of the realme: for this earle was not onelie killed by those of Abirnethie (which (which familie did then greatlie flourish in riches and authoritie within Scotland) but the brother alſo of the ſaid earle was called into law by the Abirnethians, for whome the king in aſſemblie of the ſtates did giue ſentence againſt the other. This Makduffe after the land whereof the contention grew was ſo adiudged, ſuppoſing therein the king to be more vniuſt againſt him than was cauſe, and that the king was not ſo ſeuere a reuenger of his brothers death, as he hoped that he would be; forſoke the Balioll, and appealed to the king of England; before whom he commenſed his ſute againſt Balioll. The deciding whereof was appointed to be holden at London, where was an aſſemblie or parlement of the nobilitie, after the Engliſh manner, amongſt whome this Balioll had his place alſo.

John Balioll king of Scots anſwered a ſute cõmenſed againſt him in the parlement of England as an inferior perſon ſhould.

The parlement begun and Balioll there ſummoned or cited, would haue anſwered by his procutor or attornie: but this (not being allowed) Balioll was compelled to riſe out of his ſeat, and to defend his cauſe himſelfe in an inferior place. Which contumelie when he durſt not at anie time reueſſe, ſecretlie he ſtill bare in mind, vntill fit opportunitie might anſwer the reuenge thereof. But when he would, and then could not deliuer himſelfe of ſuch diſgrace; he returned home with a mind of deadlie anger, rolling mounteins of choler therein, who ſtill bending himſelfe on euerie ſide to ſatiſfie his anger, dwelled on this point; how he might reconcile the hearts of his ſubiects: and offend the ſtate of the Engliſh. Whileſt Balioll with this meditation was feeding his hot ſtomach, a fit means was now offered to performe his deſire, by reaſon of the wars newlie growen betweene England and France, as after ſhall appeare. For vpon this occaſion of wars, king Edward of England commanded this Balioll by tenure of his land, & tenure of his homage, to come with all the power he could prepare to aid him in his warres againſt the king of France.)

John Balioll repenteth him

King John Balioll incontinentlie herewith became repentant, in that he had indangered himſelfe thus by doing his homage; and therevpon ſent his ambaſſadors to king Edward, as then ſoiourning at London, to renounce his act touching the ſame homage, alledging that for ſomuch as it was done without the aduiſe of the three eſtates of Scotland, it was of no ſtrength in it ſelfe, and not meete to be obſerued being done by force; for which cauſe he would renounce his friendſhip and aliance, aſwell for manie other iniuries done vnto him and his; as for that he would ſeeke to reſtore his countrie to his former libertie. Which meſſage when none of the better ſort durſt take in hand to execute, a certeine monke (or as other haue the abbat of Alberbrethie) caried theſe letters into England, vpon the receit whereof, king Edward anſwered the ambaſſadors (whom he tawnted with innumerable contumelies) that ſince we perceiue (ſaith he) your king will not come vnto vs, we intend ſhortlie to come vnto him, wherewith the ambaſſadors departed. Butus (ſaith Buchanan) could ſcarſelie returne home in ſafetie: being at his returne into Scotland rather had in contempt of his owne people, than anie iot reuerenced for ſuch an ambaſſage.

Ambaſſadors into England

The league renewed betwixt France and Scotland.

After this, king Edward the better to accompliſh his purpoſe againſt the Scots, found meanes to conclude a peace with the king of France, and for the more confirmation of the ſame peace, the French kings daughter was giuen in mariage vnto king Edward his ſonne. Nuertheleſſe (as ſaith the Scotiſh chronicle) he purpoſed (when he had wrought his will once againſt the Scots) to inuade France as fiercelie as before, notwithſtanding anie bond of amitie or mariage by him contracted. After this, he procured the friendſhip of Robert Bruſe, and vpon promiſe (as it is to be thought) to make him king, the ſame Robert deliuered into king Edward his hands all ſuch caſtels as he held in Scotland. John Balioll the Scotiſh king, vnderſtanding that king Edward minded to make a conqueſt vpon him, ſent William biſhop of ſaint Andrews, and Matthew biſhop of Dunkeld, with ſir John Sowlis, and ſir Ingram Umfraiuile into France, to renew the ancient league betwixt him and Philip the fourth, as then king of France; which accordinglie was done: and for the more corroboration thereof, the eldeſt daughter of Charles earle of Vallois and Anjou, brother to king Philip, was promiſed in mariage vnto Edward Balioll, the ſonne of king John, which Edward ſhould inioy lands of yearelie rents & reuenues to the ſumme of fiftéene hundred pounds ſterling, in places not of the demeſnes belonging to the crowne, as Ballieuille, Dampiere, Harecourt, and Horneie, which his father held in France with Lanarke, Kidion, Paldeleie, Cuningham, and the caſtell of Dundee, with the apurtenances in Scotland: and hereto was annexed a prouiſo, that if thoſe ſeignories and places exceeded the value of fiftéene hundred pounds of yearelie reuenues, then ſhould the ſurpluſage remaine to the K. of Scotland: but if the ſame amounted not to that ſumme, then ſhould the ſaid king make them good, and ſupplie the ſame with other rents in Scotland, or otherwiſe, as ſhould be thought meet. And further, the ſaid ſumme of fiftéene hundred pounds in yearlie rent was aſſigned as it were the dower of the ſaid ladie, to inioy to hir ſelfe during hir life after hir husbands deceaſſe, if hir hap were to ſuruiue him.

Ex chron. Abindon, as I take it.

In conſideration whereof, king Philip couenanted to content and pay vnto king John in name of the mariage monie, the ſumme of 40000 crownes, or (as other write) 25000 pounds Turnois. The charter conteining the articles, couenants, and agréements of this mariage and league aboue mentioned, beareth date at Paris, the 23 day of October, in the yeare of our Lord 1295. And the letters procuratorie made by king John to the ſaid biſhop of ſaint Andrewes, & the other his aſſociats, bare date at Striueling, the third nones of Julie the ſame yeare. Shortlie herevpon, king John was aduertiſed that king Edward purpoſed to come and beſiege Berwike; wherefore by aduiſe of his nobles he ſent the moſt part of all the lords and gentlemen of Fife and Louthian vnto Berwike, to defend the towne againſt the enimie, if he came to beſiege it. The Engliſhmen came not onelie with a mightie power by land, but alſo with a great nauie by ſea towards the ſaid towne of Berwike. Of whoſe comming the Scots being aduertiſed, came forth againſt thoſe that approched by ſea, toke 17 of their ſhips, and chaſed awaie the reſidue.

King Edward rather prouoked than feared with this miſaduenture, came with a farre greater puiſſance than before, to renew the ſiege: but when he perceiued his purpoſe toke not ſo ſpeedie effect as he hoped it ſhould haue done, he deuiſed how to take this towne by ſome ſlightfull policie. Herevpon he feined as though he would haue broken vp his ſiege, and ſo raiſing his campe, withdrew a little from the towne, and then hauing prouided banners and enſignes, reſembling altogither ſuch as diuerſe noblemen in Scotland vſed, he ſuddenlie returned toward the towne, euerie one of his ſouldiers wearing a a croſſe of ſaint Andrewes aboue on their harneſſe, after the manner of the Scotiſhmen. There were alſo ſent before vnto the towne, certeine Scots that ſerued the king of England, which gaue knowledge to the capteins within the towne, that their lord king

John was comming with his armie to their succors. The Scots that were within the towne, beleeuing it had beene most true, set open the gates, and came forth against their king (as they supposed) to haue receiued him with all ioy and gladnesse.

The Scots deceiued and intrapped.

But when they came nere vnto the Englishmen, they perceiued both by their language and habit what they were: but this was not before the Englishmen were hard at the gates, so that when the Scotishmen would haue fled backe to haue got into the towne againe, the Englishmen pursued them so fast at the heeles, that they entered the gates with them, and so toke the towne with great slaughter, as well of the souldiers and men of warre, as also of women, children, and aged persons, without all ruth or compassion, so that they left not one creature aliue of the Scotish bloud within all that towne. Thus was Berwike wone the 30 day of March, in the yere 1296. Such abundance of bloud was spilled thorough all parts of the towne (as the Scotish chronicles testifie) that where at the falling tide the water was not able to driue about the mils, some of the same mils yet, were now at a low water set on gate, by reason the streames were so hugelie augmented with bloud. There were slaine aboue seuen thousand persons that day, with the greatest part of all the nobles and gentlemen of Fife and Louthian.

King John hearing of this slaughter of his people at Berwike, in great desire to be auenged, gathered his power, and sent the same forth against king Edward, with whome they met not farre from Dunbar, and there incountring with him in battell, the Scotish host was discomfited, the most part of the Scots being either slaine or taken. The earles of March and Menteth, with 70 knights, fled to the castell of Dunbar; but they were besieged so streictlie by the Englishpower, inuironing the castell on ech side, that in the end they were constreined for lacke of vittels to yeeld themselues to king Edward, on condition to haue their liues saued, which couenant was not obserued; as the Scotish writers affirme: for king Edward hauing got them into his hands, caused them forthwith to be put to death. It was reported that Robert Bruse vpon secret conference had with king Edward before this battell at Dunbar, solicited all his friends in the Scotish armie, to flee vpon the first ioining, which the residue perceiuing, were so discomforted, that incontinentlie they threw awaie both armor and weapon, and so were vanquished without resistance.

Truth it is, that after this victorie, Robert Bruse submitted himselfe vnto king Edward, requiring him to performe his promise touching the right which he had to the crowne of Scotland: howbeit he receiued no answer to his liking touching that request; for K. Edward had no lesse desire to inioy the kingdome of Scotland, than Bruse, as the Scotish writers affirme. Therefore to cast off Robert Bruse concerning his demand, he answered thus, as is said; Beleeuest thou that we haue nothing else a do but to conquere realmes, and to deliuer them ouer againe vnto thee? Robert Bruse hereby perceiuing the subtile meaning of K. Edward, returned right sorrowfull vnto his lands in England, hauing great indignation in his mind, that he had obeied king Edwards requests: but yet considered with himselfe that he must suffer for the time, till occasion serued to reuenge the iniuries received, which he minded to do, and that in most cruell maner, as afterwards it will appeare. King Edward after he had thus wone the castell of Dunbar, got likewise both the castels of Edenburgh and Striueling, and pursued king John till he had constreined him to take for his refuge the castell of Forfaire. John Cumin lord of Strabogie came to king Edward, and was sworne his liege man.

Shortlie after, by a politike practise of the same John Cumin, king John with his sonne Edward came to Mountros, where perceiuing himselfe vnwiselie to be fallen into the hands of king Edward, through feare of death which he doubted by reason of the menacing words of king Edward, he suffered himselfe to be spoiled of all his kinglie abilliments, and with a white wand in his hand (as the maner is) presented himselfe before king Edward, resigning there vnto him all his right and title which he had to the crowne of Scotland, vtterlie renouncing the same both for him and his heires for euer. Hereof was a charter made in most sufficient wise, confirmed with the hand and seale of king John, and other the nobles of Scotland substantiallie as might be deuised, bearing date the fourth yeare of his reigne. After this, king Edward assembled all the lords and barons of Scotland at Berwike, where he caused them to be sworne his liege men, and to do homage vnto him as to their souereigne lord and supreme gouernor. Which William Dowglasse (a man of noble birth and famous for his deeds) refused to do, and for his obstinacie was cast into prison, where after a few yeares he ended his life. And for the more suertie of their allegiance, he constreined them to surrender into his hands all the strengths & holds of the realme, both as well those that stood on the sea coasts, as also such other as were situat in the inner parts of the countrie.

These things done, and order taken in each behalfe as was thought requisit for the quiet keeping of the countrie, he sent king John and his sonne Edward Baliol vnto London, where they were kept in strong ward; till at length he suffered the said king John to returne into Scotland: but leauing still his sonne in pledge behind him, least he should attempt anie new rebellion after his departure; which after was deliuered at the request of the pope. King John vpon his returne into Scotland, perceiuing that he was in the hatred both of his lords and commons, he withdrew againe of his owne accord into England, forsaking wholie the administration of the Scotish dominion, and finallie went ouer into Normandie to his ancient inheritance and lands there, where at length falling blind, and waxing away by long age, he departed out of this world in the castell Galliard, leauing those lands which he possessed on that side the sea, vnto his sonne Edward Baliol, who being released out of captiuitie, was come ouer to his father before his decease.

In the meane time, king Edward hauing well in remembrance the warres which he had intended to make against France, had he not bin staied through the businesse of Scotland, purposed now to pursue the same with all diligence; & therefore garnishing all the strengths & forts in Scotland to withstand the Scots, if they attempted anie rebellion against him in his absence, he appointed Hugh Cressingham regent there, whilest he should be occupied in France, which Cressingham before was treasuror. Then hauing prouided a great nauie of ships, he passed ouer into France, trusting that the Scots would not stur, sith they had of late sustained so manie ouerthrows and sore losses one after an other by the last wars: but tyrannie is of such a nature, that by no kind of prouision it may anie long time be suerlie defended. For those people that be oppressed by anie tyrannicall seruitude, will not faile to seeke to deliuer themselues from the yoke of that intolerable burden when soeuer opportunitie of time and occasion serueth. Therefore the lords of Scotland hauing hauing knowledge that king Edward was passed ouer the seas, they got them all togither straightwaies, and assembled in councell at Striueling, where by generall agreement, twelue noble men were chosen to be gouernors of Scotland, euerie one in their limits appointed, that they might the better prouide to resist the enimie. Amongest these gouernors, John Cumin earle of Buchquhan was principall, a man of great wisedome and singular knowlege in all affaires, as well of peace as of war.

Twelue gouernors elected in Scotland.

John Cumin.

This earle of Buchquhan raised a mightie armie, and with the same entered into Northumberland, where he wasted with fier and sword all that countrie. After this, he lay in siege to Carleill, but he wan nothing there, the towne was so well defended. In that season also, the fame of William Wallace began to spring, a young gentleman of so huge stature and notable strength of bodie, with such skill and knowledge in warlike enterprises, and hereto of such hardinesse of stomach in attempting all maner of dangerous exploits, that his match was not anie where lightlie to be found. He was sonne to one sir Andrew Wallace of Cragie, knight, and from his youth bare euer an inward hatred against the English nation. Sundrie notable feats also he wrought against the Englishmen in defense of the Scots, and was of such incredible force at his coming to perfect age, that of himselfe alone, without all helpe, he would not feare to set vpon three or foure Englishmen at once, and vanquish them.

William Wallace beginneth to wax famous.

When the fame therefore of his worthie acts was notified throughout the realme, manie were put in good hope, that by his means the realme should be deliuered from the seruitude of the Englishmen within short time after. And herevpon a great number of the Scotish nation as well of the nobilitie as other, were readie to assist him in all his enterprises. By reason whereof he might not easilie be intrapped nor taken of the Englishmen, that went about to haue got him into their hands. At length, when occasion serued to vse the helpe of such a notable chieftaine, he was chosen by generall consent of the Scotishmen as gouernour vnder John Wallioll, to deliuer his countrie from bondage of the English nation. At the same time manie abbeies & spirituall benefices in Scotland were in Englishmens hands. Neuertheless, this William Wallace by commission had of William Fraser bishop of saint Andrews, auoided and put them forth of all parts of Scotland, leauing neither temporall nor spirituall person of their bloud within that realme. For shortlie after, by publike authoritie, he receiued the armie that John Cumin earle of Buchquhan had led before, and constreined those Scots that fauored king Edward, to obeie his commandements, in renouncing all such faith and promise as they had giuen or made vnto him.

Castels won by William Wallace.

This done, he passed forth with great puissance against the Englishmen, that held sundrie castels within Scotland, and with great hardinesse & manhood he wan the castels of Forfair, Dundée, Brechen and Mountros, sleaing all such souldiers as he found within them. Wallace now ioifull of this his prosperous successe, and hearing that certeine of the chiefest captains and officers of those Englishmen that kept the castell of Dunoter, were gone forth to consult with other Englishmen of the forts next to them adioining, came sudenlie to the said castell, & tooke it, not leauing a man aliue of all those whome he found as then within it. Then after he had furnished that hold with his owne soldiers in most defensible wise, he went to Aberden. The towne he found in maner void of all the inhabitants, but the castell was so stronglie garnished with men and munition, that considering it might not be wonne without great murder, he raised from thence, and returned into Angus. King Edward as then being in France, hearing of those exploits atchiued by this Wallace his aduersarie, sent diuerse noble captains vnto his lieutenant Hugh Cressingham, with an armie into Scotland to redresse the matter.

Hugh Cressingham sent into Scotland

Wallace in the meane time had laid siege vnto the castell of Couper, but now being aduertised of the comming of this armie against him, he raised his siege, & went to Striueling to defend the bridge there, that Hugh Cressingham with his armie should not passe the same, according as the report went his intent was to do. Here incountring with the enimies, the third daie of September, he obteined a verie worthie victorie, for he slue not onelie the foresaid Cressingham with a great part of his armie being passed the riuer, but also forced the residue to flee, in such sort, that a great number of them were drowned, and few escaped awaie with life. Thus hauing gotten the vpper hand of his enimies here at Striueling, he returned againe to the siege of Couper, which shortlie after vpon his returne thither, was rendred vnto him by those that were within in garrison. There were manie of the Scotish nobilitie the same time, that sent vnto him, offering to leaue the king of Englands part, and to aid him with monie and vittels, if he would onelie receiue them into fauour, whereunto he granted. By which meanes, sundrie other castels were yelded vnto him, the which after he had garnished with men, munition, and vittels (according as was thought requisit) he brake vp his campe, and went with sundrie of his most faithfull friends vnto the castell of Striueling.

The castell of Couper rendred to Wallace.

Afterwards perceiuing that through scarsitie of corne, great dearth arose on each side within the realme of Scotland, he deuised which way he might best relieue the peoples necessitie and lacke in that behalfe, and herevpon he determined to passe with a mightie armie into England, and to sojourne there the most part of the winter, in susteining the whole number of his men of warre on such prouision as they might find within the bounds of their enimies countrie. He commanded therefore that all the Scots, appointed to go with him in that iournie, should be readie at a certeine day and place prefired. But diuers of the northerne Scots (as they of Aberden and other) for that they disobeied his commandements set forth by letters and proclamations, were hanged as rebels and traitors to their countrie. By whose example, other being put in feare, his commandements were the better obeied, so that hauing got togither an huge host of men, he entered with the same into Northumberland, wasting and spoiling the countrie euen vnto Newcastell. Thus putting the enimies in great feare and terror of his awfull name, he brought his armie backe againe into Scotland, laden with spoile and glorie of their prosperous atchiued iournie. They entred into England (as Io. Maior writeth) about the feast of All saints, and remained there till Candlemas after, liuing still vpon the spoile of the Englishmens goods.

Wallace inuadeth Northumberland.

Fr. Thin.

Edward king of England, being informed of the great slaughter of his people, and what damage the Scots had done in Northumberland, returned in great displeasure out of France into England, and sent his ambassadors vnto Wallace, sore menacing him, for that he had inuaded his realme in such cruell wise in his absence, which he durst (as he sent him word) full little haue done, if he had beene at home himselfe. Wallace hereunto answered, that he had taken the aduantage for the atchiuing of his enterprise, touching the inuasion of England, in like sort as king Edward had done for the conquest of Scotland, at such time as he was chosen by the nobles of the realme as indifferent iudge in decision of the right and lawfull title of the parties that stroue and were at contention for the crowne. And further, to the end it might apeare vnto king Edward, that he inuaded England in defense of his owne natiue countrie, and that he was fullie bent to imploie his whole indeuor to deliuer the same from all maner of subiection to any forreine power, and to reuenge the iniuries done to them by the Englishmen in times past; he willed the English ambassadors to declare from him vnto king Edward, that he purposed to hold his Easter in England (if God afforded him life) and that in despite of king Edward, and all such as would beare armor against him.

Wallase entred England with an armie of 30000 men.

And vndoubtedlie according to his promise he kept his day: for assembling togither an armie of 30000 men, he entred into England at the time before appointed, where king Edward was readie with an armie vpon Stanesmore, double in number to the Scots, to giue them battell: but when the time came that both parties were readie to haue ioined, the Englishmen withdrew, hauing no lust (as should seeme) to fight with the Scots at that time) who perceiuing them to giue backe, incontinentlie would haue rushed forth of their rankes to haue pursued in chase after them: but Wallase (doubting least the Englishmen had ment some policie, and saieng (as writeth Io. Ma. lib. 4. cap. 14.) that it was honor inough for him that he had inforced so mightie a prince in his owne countrie to forsake the field) caused the Scots to keepe togither in order of battell, and so preseruing them from the deceitfull malice of their enimies, brought them backe into Scotland with liues and honors saued, besides the infinit spoiles and booties which they got in this iornie.

But as in the beginning all men were glad to support Wallase in all exploits and enterprises which he tooke in hand, so afterward when his fame began to wax great, to the derogation of other mens renowmes, such as were farre his superiors in birth and linage, that fauor which manie bare him at the first, was now turned into enuie, hauing no small indignation, that a man of so base parentage should so surmount them in all honor and dignitie. Those that enuied him most, were of the Cumins bloud, and Robert Bruse. King Edward being aduertised of this enuious grudge, and new sedition amongst the nobles of Scotland, had secret conference by his agents with the chiefest amongst those that thus enuied the high glorie of Wallase, and vpon trust of such practise as was concluded by reson of the same conference, he came with a mightie armie into Scotland, and at Falkirke met with this Wallase, who mistrusting no guile, had raised a power to resist him: but now being come in sight of the Englishmen, there rose a right odious contention betwixt the head captains, who should haue the leading of the vantgard, which is reputed a most high honor among the Scotishmen. And among other, Iohn Steward, and Iohn Cumin, thought scorne, that Wallase a man of so low beginning, should be preferred before them in that honour: but on the other part, Wallase considering that the charge of the whole was giuen vnto him by agreement and consent of the three estates, thought it no reason that he should giue place to anie of them, though vnto his face, as saith Iohn Maior, the lord Steward had before vpbraided him with his pride, comparing him to an owle, which from his originall had begged a feather of euerie bird, and being now inriched with abundance of feathers, did aduance himselfe aboue all other birds.

Wallase is enuied.

In the meane time came the Englishmen vpon them right fiercelie, before the Scotish chieftains (hauing their brests filled with more malice one against another, than with desire to defend their countrie against their enimies) could bring their men into anie perfect arate. Herewith at the comming to the point of ioining, the Cumins with their retinues fled out of the field, and left the residue of the Scots in all the danger. Robert Bruse seruing that day among the Englishmen, fetched a compasse about an hill, and came on the backs of the Scots, so that they were in maner compassed in, and beaten downe on each side: yet Wallase left nothing vndone that might perteine to the dutie of a valiant capteine. But at length, all his indeuors notwithstanding, the Scots (ouerset with multitude of enimies, as the Scotish writers affirme) were slaine in such huge numbers, that he was constreined to draw out of the field, which such small remnants as were left aliue. The Englishmen pursued fiercelie after him, & namelie one valiant capteine named Frere Brian Iate, a templer, whome Wallase perceiuing to be within his danger, stepped forth vnto him, and slue him there in sight (as it is said) of all the English armie. Which valiant act of Wallase caused the Englishmen somewhat to state, for doubt of further perill by their vnwise pursute likelie to befall them. In this infortunate battell, were slaine on the Scotish side, Iohn Steward of Bute, with his Brandans (for so they name them that are taken vp to serue in the warres forth of the Stewards lands) Makduffe earle of Fife, with sir Iohn Graham, whose death was much lamented by Wallase, as one whome he highlie esteemed for his great experience in warlike knowledge. Manie other noble and valiant men died in this conflict, whose names would be too long to rehearse. This battell was striken on Marie Magdalens date, in the yere of our Lord 1298, and therefore the Englishmen haue holden it euer since an happie day for to fight against the Scots.

Marie Magdalens day prosperous to the Englishmen to fight against Scots

✻ When William Wallase was passed the riuer Carran, where he might defend himselfe, and gather his dispersed people, Bruse desired to speake vnto him, which Wallase did not denie. Whereupon each of them (drawing alone by themselues without any arbitrers to the bankes of the riuer, in such place as it was narowest, and they might without anie companie best heare one another; Bruse began to say as followeth. I do much muse, thou most valiant of all men, what came into thy mind to be caried away by the vncerteine fauor of the common people, and to stand against the mightiest king of our age, supported with the greatest forces of the Scots: and dailie to offer thy selfe to euerie danger, and that for no reward assured to thee for all thy labors. For if thou shouldest ouercome king Edward, the Scots will neuer aduance thee to the kingdome, and if thou be ouercome, there resteth no refuge for thee, but onelie the mercie of thine enimie. And dost thou not see the Cumins, and mee, and the most of the nobilitie, to follow the English faction? Neither dost thou consider the malice of the princes conceiued against thee? Looke vnto thy selfe, and thou hast but a few of the nobles thy partakers, and a small number of the commons (which are more vncerteine than the wind) to follow thee, whose fortune is now almost ouerthrowne. All these words Iohn Maior supposeth that Robert Bruse did speake, to serch the mind of Wallase, whether he ment to aspire to the crowne or no: being in deed rather contented that Wallase had left the field, than otherwise to reduce him to the part of king Edward.

Conference betweene Wallase & Bruse.

To whome Wallase answered in this sort. The end of all my trauell was not to atteine the kingdome;

cc dome; for my birth and fortune neither did or could deſerue it, and my mind did neuer deſire it: but the cc negligent ſlouth of thée (to whome the right of that diademe doth apperteine, and who doth grædilie hunt cc therafter) made my citizens (perceiuing themſelues deſtitute of faithfull gouernors) to follow me, and cc cauſed me (when I ſaw them in that miſerie, rather cc butcherlie borne, than in honeſt ſeruitude to be oppreſſed) to ſéeke for libertie. Which ſuerlie I had obcc teined for them and you, if the nobilitie had not ſo cc uillie ſtriued againſt me, reſtrained themſelues for comming into the field, and had but ſent their hinds cc (which till their land) forth to the battell, at which time I had ſcarſe 10000 men, & thoſe of cómon ſort. cc Trulie if the princes had not béene impediment thereto, I could haue brought forth to fight a hun- cc dred thouſand bold and chérefull ſouldiers. But now cc in truth I perceiue the hatred of the nobles againſt me this day. Wherefore if thou pretend to poſſeſſe the cc kingdome, I giue thée faithfull warning, eſpecially to beware of the Cumins: who if they had more re- cc garded the glorie of their countrie, than of ſecret ma- cc lice to others, would not ſo wickedlie haue forſaken cc the field, what hate ſoeuer they had conceiued againſt cc me. If they haue giuen their faith to the king of England, they are not bound to kéepe it: in a wic- cc ked promiſe no oth is to be performed. I am now cc wearie of my life, and rather deſire to die, than to liue in this ſort, to ſee the miſerie of my beloued coun- cc trie. Wherefore imbrace you this thraldome (which is ſo much eſtéemed of you) to whome filthie ſeruitude cc with eaſe ſéemeth more pleaſant, than honeſt libertie cc with danger: for I had rather chooſe willing death cc with frédome (in which I meane to ſpend my blood) cc than to do as you haue done, becauſe the loue of my countrie ſhall not depart from my hart, before the cc life of my bodie depart from his office. Which being ſaid, Bruſe burſt forth in teares, conſidering the no- bilitie of the mind of Wallaſe, although perhaps he nothing miſliked the miſfortune of the man, as doubting the end of all his pretenſe to be, to atteine to the crowne. This being thus done, they both depart to their companies. By which conference (ſaith Leſlee biſhop of Roſſe) this good was wrought to Scotland (to recompenſe the ouerthrow of Falkirke) that Wallaſe partlie by the bitternelle of his words, and partlie for the loue of his countrie, did now draw Bruſe from the Engliſh, to take part with the Scots.)

1298. But notwithſtanding all theſe valiant ſpéeches of Wallaſe, when he conſidered the infortunat diſcomfiture by him ſo treacherouſlie receiued, he came to Perth, and there vttering by complaint the iniurious enuie of the nobles againſt him, he renounced and diſcharged himſelfe of all the authoritie which had béene committed to his hands, touching the gouernance of the realme, and went into France, as ſaith Leſleus. But Iohannes Maior ſaith, that he neuer came there, although he will not flatlie denie it. The ſame time, Philip king of France, the fourth of that name, and ſurnamed le Beau, hauing great ruth in his hart for the miſerable calamities thus chanced to his ancient confederat friends the Scots, and that chieflie for the quarrell of France, ſent his ambaſſadors vnto Edward king of England, who had latelie before maried his daughter, requiring that there might be ſome peace or abſtinence of warre granted. At his requeſt therefore a truce was taken betwixt the Scots and Engliſhmen, to indure from the feaſt of All ſaints, till the feaſt of Pentecoſt next following.

The Scots in the meane time ſore oppreſſed by reaſon of long warres, ſent ambaſſadors to pope Boniface, in preſenting a verie grieuous complaint vnto him, for the great affliction done to them by king Edward, who was fullie bent by iniurious meanes (as they alledged) to conquer their realme, and therefore they beſought him to conſtreine king Edward by vertue of his prerogatiue, which he pretended to haue ouer the realme of England, to ſtand to his order in deciding the right concerning the liberties of Scotland, which might no other waies be determined, but by intollerable damage falling to the people through blind deſire and couetous ambition of the nobles, contending for the crowne. The pope (as is ſaid) after he had by good and deliberat aduiſe heard the matter, gaue ſentence with the Scots, that they had iuſt cauſe of warres in defenſe of the liberties of their countrie, againſt K. Edward and his fautors. ¶ But for this matter, looke in the Engliſh chronicles, where it ſhall well appéere, that the pope by theſe letters of king Edward, was fullie ſatiſfied of his ſuperioritie ouer Scotland.

The Scots ſomewhat recomforted hérewith, ſhortlie hérevpon choſe John Cumin to their gouernor, in purpoſe to trie with the Engliſhmen for their liberties. Whereof king Edward being aduertiſed, ſent forthwith an armie into Scotland, which paſſed through the countrie to ſaint Johns towne, with great damage of thoſe that were adiudged rebels to king Edwards empire. All the countrie in manner vnto Forthrie, at this ſeaſon was ſubiect to the Engliſhmen, ſauing ſuch few of the inhabitants, as liued within the woods, hauing more regard to the ancient liberties of their countrie, than to anie deſire of preſeruing their goods or liues. John Cumin therefore, deſirous to redreſſe this beaute miſerie and lamentable caſe of his countrie, admitted Simon Fraſer fellow with him in the adminiſtration of the warres againſt the Engliſhmen, and therewith gathering an armie of eight thouſand hardie men of warre, ſetteth in hand to reuenge the iniurious doings of the enimies, chaſing out of the realme all ſuch officers with their ſeruants, as king Edward had placed in anie romes within the bounds of Scotland; and ſuch as reſiſted, he purſued in moſt cruell wiſe, not ſparing to put them vnto the ſword in all places, where he might find them.

King Edward ſore kindled in diſpleaſure with theſe attempts of ſuch deſperat perſons, raiſed an armie of thirtie thouſand men, and ſent the ſame into Scotland, vnder the leading of a verie ſtout and valiant captein, named Radulph or Rafe Confraie. This Radulph at his comming into Scotland, tooke ſmall regard to the ordering of his field, but diuided his armie into three parts, euerie part conteining ten thouſand men, and appointed them to paſſe forth to forraie the countrie, and to meet altogither at Roſlin, in ſuch ſort and time as he preſcribed. John Cumin and Simon Fraſer being aduertiſed hereof, gathered their powers togither, to the number of ſeuen or eight thouſand men, and determined to trie the chance of battell with one part of the Engliſh armie firſt, truſting that if they happened to haue the vpper hand of one of the three parts, the other two would be the more eaſie to deale with. The Scotiſh captains reſolued thus vpon that point, exhorted their people to remember how they were to fight in defenſe of their wiues, their children, their goods, and liberties of their countrie, againſt ſuch as ſought to bring them into thraldome and vile ſeruitude.

With which words the Scots were ſo imboldened, that minding either to die or to win the victorie, they gaue the onſet ſo fiercelie on their enimies, that the firſt battell of the Engliſhmen was quicklie ouerthrowen and vanquiſhed. But ſcarſelie had they gathered the ſpoile, when an other part of the Engliſhmen came vpon them with more fiercenelle than the other other before: neuertheleſſe, the Scots incouraged with their freſh wonne victorie, got themſelues ſpéedilie into arraie, & receiued their enimies with ſuch incredible manhood, that they had quickly got the vpper hand of theſe alſo. But ſcarſe had they made an end with this ſecond battell, when the third part was at hand readie to charge them, being now ſore infeebled, what thorough wearineſſe and wounds receiued in the two former incounters, beſides the want of ſuch of their numbers as were ſlaine: yet by exhortation of their capteins, and the valiant preſence of the officers of bands beſide, they ruſhed forth on their enimies with ſuch earneſt forwardneſſe to receiue them, that after a verie ſharpe bickering, they put the whole number of them to flight. Few of the Engliſhmen had eſcaped the Scotiſhmens hands, had they not béene ſo wearied with continuall fight, that they were not able to follow anie great waie in the chaſe.

The third battell of the Engliſhmen vanquiſhed at Roſlin. 1302.

This victorie fell to the Scots in manner as is before rehearſed, vpon ſaint Matthewes day, in the yære after the birth of our Sauiour 1302. The glorie of this victorie was great, conſidering that thirtie thouſand Engliſhmen well furniſhed, & thoroughlie appointed for warre, ſhould be thus in one day vanquiſhed with an handfull of Scotiſhmen. For as their hiſtories make mention, they paſſed not eight thouſand at the moſt: and therefore all men ſuppoſed that it came to paſſe by the ſingular fauour and grace of almightie God. But yet the Scots did not long inioy the benefits of ſo notable a victorie. For king Edward hearing of this diſcomfiture of his people at Roſlin, gathered a mightie armie of Engliſhmen, Gaſcoigns, Iriſhmen, and ſuch Scots as toke his part, and hauing all his furniture and puruetiance readie both by ſea and land, he ſet forward with the ſame to inuade the Scots on ech ſide. The Scots perceiuing they were not of puiſſance able to reſiſt his inuaſion, withdrew to their ſtrengths: by meanes whereof the Engliſh armie paſſed through all Scotland, euen from the ſouth parts to the north, & found few or none to make reſiſtance, except Wallaſe, and ſuch as followed his opinion, which were fled to the mounteins and woods, to eſchue the malice of the Engliſhmen.

It is ſaid, that king Edward required by a meſſenger ſent vnto this Wallaſe, that if he would come in and be ſworne his liege man and true ſubiect, he ſhould haue at his hands great lordſhips and poſſeſſions within England, to mainteine his port as was requiſit to a man of verie honorable eſtate. But Wallaſe refuſed theſe offers, ſaieng that he preferred libertie with ſmall reuenues in Scotland, before anie poſſeſſion of lands in England, were the ſame neuer ſo great; conſidering he might not inioy them, but vnder the yoke of bondage. The caſtell of Sterling at the ſame time was in the kéeping of one ſir William Athred knight, who would not render it to king Edward by anie ſummons or other meanes, till after three moneths ſiege he was conſtreined to giue it ouer vnder theſe conditions; That all perſons being within the caſtell, ſhould depart by ſafe conduct with bagge and baggage at their pleaſure. Neuertheleſſe king Edward cauſed the ſaid ſir William Athred to be conueied to London, where he remained as priſoner manie yeares after.

Sundrie other caſtels were taken by force the ſame time by king Edward, and all ſuch as reſiſted, being found within anie of them, ſlaine without mercie or ranſome. Amongeſt other, the caſtell of Urquhard in Murrey land was taken by force, and not one left aliue that was found in the ſame (one gentlewoman onelie excepted) who being great with child, was in that reſpect preſerued. She was the wife of Alexander Boyis, lord of that houſe, though by reaſon ſhe was got into poore apparell, the Engliſhmen toke hir but for ſome other woman of meaner eſtate. She therefore with hir life ſaued, being ſuffered to depart, got hir ouer into Ireland, where ſhe was deliuered of a ſon, that was named at the font-ſtone Alexander, who when Scotland was recouered out of the Engliſhmens hands, came to king Robert le Bruſe, requiring him to be reſtored vnto his fathers heritage, being as then in the occupation of other poſſeſſors. King Robert doubtfull what to doo héerein, for he thought it neither conuenient that a prince ſhould take lands or poſſeſſions from noblimen, which had béene giuen to them in reward of their manhood, ſhewed in defenſe of the realme: neither iudged he it reaſon to kéepe him from his rightfull inheritance that had loſt his father, his friends, and all his whole ſubſtance in the like cauſe and quarell by iniurie of the common enimies.

The Urquhard taken by force.

Wherefore to qualifie the matter, he deuiſed this meane: he gaue vnto this Alexander Boyis certeine other lands in Mar, nothing leſſe in value (conſidering the largeneſſe and fertilitie) than the other of Urquhard were: and willed him to content himſelfe with thoſe, in recompenſe of ſuch as belonged to his father: to the intent that all parties might be ſatiſfied, and no man ſhould ſéeme to haue wrong in being depriued of his rightfull poſſeſſions. This Alexander Boyis had afterwards his name changed, and was called Forbeſſe, for that he ſlue a beare in thoſe parties, by great and ſingular manhood. And ſo the ſurname of the Forbeſſes had beginning, as deſcended from him. Scotland being ſubdued by the mightie puiſſance of king Edward, he went about to aboliſh all the old ſtatutes and ancient conſtitutions of the realme, truſting by that meanes, that Scots liuing togither with Engliſhmen, vnder one vniforme maner of lawes, they ſhould finallie ſort themſelues to be of one mind and opinion, as well touching the ſupreme gouernement of their publike weale, as alſo in all other things, touching the friendlie ſocietie of life.

The beginning of the name of the Forbeſſes.

Chronicles and other bookes burnt.

He burnt all the chronicles of the Scotiſh nation, with all manner of bookes, as well thoſe conteining diuine ſeruice, as anie other treatiſes of prophane matters, to the end that the memorie of the Scots ſhould periſh: and thereto appointed greeuous puniſhments for them that ſhould diſobeie his commandements héerein, in kéeping anie of the ſaid bookes vndefaced. And he ordeined alſo, that the Scots ſhould occupie church bookes after the vſe of Sarum, and none other. Moreouer, he compelled all ſuch Scotiſhmen as were of anie ſingular knowledge in learning or literature, to be reſident in Oxford, doubting leaſt the Scotiſh nobilitie increaſing in politike prudence by their inſtructions, ſhould ſeeke to throw off the yoke of bondage. Thus king Edward going about (as the Scotiſh writers doo report) to extinguiſh the name of Scots, togither with their rule and empire, paſſed through the moſt part of all the bounds of Scotland. And vpon verie hate which he had to the Scotiſh antiquities, at his coming to Camelon, he commanded the round temple ſtanding ouer againſt the ſame, to be throwen downe, which was builded (as before is ſhewed) in the honor of Claudius the emperor, and the goddeſſe Victoria. But for that his commandement was not immediatlie put in execution, he changed his purpoſe, and appointed onelie that the monuments of Claudius, with the ſuperſcription of his name, ſhould be taken awaie; and in place thereof, the armes of king Arthur, with his name to be ſet vp; commanding the place to be called Arthurs hoif (as ye would ſay) Arthurs

The marble chaire is conueied into England, and placed in weſtminſter.

Moreouer king Edward at his returning into England, toke the chaire of marble with him, and cauſing it to be conueied vp to London, did place it at Weſtminſter, where it remaineth yet vnto this day. Furthermore, before his departure out of Scotland, he appointed all the Scotiſh lords to aſſemble at Scone, where he cauſed them to take a new oth, that from thenceforth they ſhould take him for their ſouereigne lord, and to obeie him in all things as lotall ſubiects. All the nobilitie of Scotland was ſworne to him that day (Wallaſe onelie excepted) who eſchued more than the companie of a ſerpent, to haue anie thing to do with the Engliſhmen, touching anie agreement to be made with them, agreeable to their deſires. Moreouer, to keepe the Scots from rebellion, king Edward ordeined Odomare de Valence to be gouernour there, as his generall lieutenant ouer the whole realme of Scotland in his abſence. And hauing thus ſet all things in good and quiet order (as he ſuppoſed) he returned into England with great ioy and triumph.

Odomare or Pimer de Valence gouernour of Scotland vnder king Edward

In the meane time, Iohn Cumin ſurnamed the red, and Robert Bruſe hauing conference togither, complained the one to the other of the miſerable ſeruitude wherein the realme of Scotland as then ſtood by the oppreſſion of king Edward. And at length vpon offers made betwixt them, it was agreed, that if by anie meanes they might deliuer the realme out of the Engliſhmens hands, the one of them ſhould be king, that is to ſay, the Bruſe, and the other, that is to ſay, the Cumin, ſhould inioy all the Bruſes lands and poſſeſſions, with manie other preferments of honors and dignities, as nert vnto him in all authoritie touching the gouernement of the realme. There were indentures made betweene them, ſubſcribed with their names, and ſealed with their ſeales interchangeablie, for the full ratifieng of couenants agreed in this confederacie betwixt them. Shortlie after, vpon deliuerie of thoſe writings, Bruſe went into England, for he might not remaine long in Scotland, for doubt of ſuſpicion which king Edward had in him, becauſe of the title which he had to the crowne of Scotland (as before is ſpecified) ſo that (as was thought) king Edward would haue put both him and his brethren vnto death long before, if he might haue once got them all into his hands.

Conference betwixt Cumin and Bruſe.

Indentures of agreement betwixt Cumin & Bruſe, touching the conſpiracie.

John Cumin (after that he and Bruſe were thus agreed vpon articles, and departed the one from the other) began to doubt, leaſt this conſpiracie deuiſed betwixt them, would not ſort to anie luckie concluſion for his purpoſe, either for that he feared the great puiſſance of king Edward, either elſe for that his authoritie and power (as he miſtruſted) would not be great, if the Bruſe once atteined the crowne: and hereupon he ſent one of his ſeruants to king Edward, with his counterpane of the indenture, conteining the couenants of the conſpiracie, ſigned and ſealed with Bruſes owne hand and ſeale. The meſſenger deliuered this writing in ſecret wiſe to king Edward, declaring vnto him the whole matter, as it was paſſed and concluded betwixt the Bruſe and his maiſter, according to inſtructions giuen him in that behalfe. But king Edward at the firſt gaue light credit either to the writings or words of the Cumin, ſuppoſing that the ſame proceeded onelie through enuie, which he bare towards the Bruſe, euer dreading leſt he ſhould beare no rule in Scotland, if the Bruſe once atteined anie authoritie within the ſame. Yet at length, king Edward pondering with himſelfe the whole circumſtance, and being in ſome doubt of the matter, he ſhewed the counterpane of the indenture vnto Bruſe himſelfe, queſtioning with him, if he knew his owne hand? Bruſe ſtoutlie denied that he was priuie to anie ſuch deuiſe or writing, and therefore deſired of king Edward to haue the ſame for one night, to peruſe and ſcan ouer at leaſure, & then if he were not able to proue that it was forged, and maliciouſlie deuiſed vpon an enuious purpoſe, to put him in danger of life, he would forfait all his lands and liuings that he held either within the realme of England, or elſe where. King Edward, becauſe he coniectured at the firſt how this accuſation of Cumin was nothing like to be true, granted his requeſt, wherein manie iudged he did vnwiſelie: but ſuch was the ordinance of almightie God, that Bruſe ſhould eſcape that danger, to accompliſh that whereunto he was appointed. The earle of Glocester immediatlie after that Robert Bruſe was departed from the kings preſence, ſent vnto him twelue ſterling pence, with two sharpe ſpurs, whereby he coniectured his meaning to be, that the beſt ſhift for him was to auoid out of the waie in moſt ſpeedie wiſe, whereupon he cauſing a ſmith to ſhoo three horſſes for him, contrarlie with the calkins forward, that it ſhould not be perceiued which waie he had taken by the tract of the horſſes, for that the ground at that time (being in the winter ſeaſon) was couered with ſnow: he departed out of London about midnight, accompanied onelie with two truſtie ſeruants.

It chanced alſo, that there fell on the ſame night more ſnow aloft vpon the other ſnow that was fallen before, by reaſon whereof it could not eaſilie be iudged in the morning which way he was gone, though king Edward vpon knowledge had that he was fled, ſent out a great manie of horſſmen after, to haue brought him againe, if they might anie where haue found him. But Bruſe haſted forth with ſuch ſpeed in his iournie, that the ſeuenth day of his departure from London, he came to Louchmaben in Annandale, and there found Dauid, or (as ſome bookes haue) Edward his brother, with Robert Fleming, a worthie yong gentleman, vnto whome (they muſing what he meant by his ſudden comming) he declared into what perill of life he had fallen by means of Cumin, and how narowlie he had eſcaped out of king Edwards hands. His brother hearing the matter, conſented to go with him, and to be partaker of all haps that might fortune to fall out in his flight; and by the way they chanced to light vpon one of Cumins ſeruants, that was going with letters vnto king Edward from his maiſter the ſaid Cumin, ſignifieng by the ſame, that if Bruſe were not the ſooner put to death, there would inſue ſhortlie ſuch trouble and ruffling in Scotland againſt K. Edward, that it would be much adoo to appeaſe it.

He commeth to Louchmaben.

A ſeruant of Cumins taken with letters on him.

These letters being found about Cumins ſeruant, through means of yong Fleming, the Bruſe after he had apoſed the bearer throughlie in each behalfe, and learned of him that his maiſter the ſaid Cumin was in the friers at Dunfriſe, he firſt ſlue this fellow that was thus ſent with the letters, & after in all haſt poſſible came to Dunfriſe, by the guiding of the ſame Fleming, where in the quier of the friers church there he found Cumin. And reaſoning the matter there with him, for that he had vſed him ſo euill, and withall ſhewing him the indenture which king Edward had deliuered to him, as before is mentioned, in the end (after ſome multiplieng of words togither) Robert Bruſe plucked forth his ſword, and ſtroke the foreſaid Cumin a ſore blow in the bellie, and thereupon fleeing out of the church, met with two of his deareſt friends, James Lindſeie, and Roger Kirkpatrike, who beholding his countenance altered, and comming forth of the church in ſuch haſt, demanded of him what was the matter: I trow (ſaid he) that Cumin is ſlaine. an enterprise, and left it doubtfull: And immediatlie herewith they went to the place where Cumin lay wounded (as before is mentioned) and asked of him whether he thought he had anie deaths wound, or hoped to recouer if he might haue a good surgian. And for that he answered how he trusted to do well inough if he might haue a good surgian in time; they gaue him three or foure other wounds so grieuous and deadlie, that forthwith vpon the same he yeelded vp the ghost. This chanced in the yeare of our Lord 1305, the fourth Ides of Februarie. About the same time was William Wallase taken at Glaskow by the means of sir John Menteth and others, in whome he had euer put a most speciall trust; but they being corrupted with the offers of large rewards promised by king Edward to such as could helpe to take him, wrought such fetches that he was apprehended at length by Odomare de Valence earle of Penbroke, who with a great power of men brought him to London, where he was put to death, and his quarters sent into Scotland, and set vp in sundrie great townes there for a spectacle, as it were to giue example to other. This was the end of that puissant champion William Wallase, praised amongst the Scotishmen aboue all other in that age, for so much as he would neuer yeeld or consent to acknowledge anie superioritie in the Englishmen ouer his countrie, no not when all other had submitted themselues to king Edward as his liege subiects and most obedient vassals. It is said, that when he was yong and went to schole, he learned by heart two verses of his schoolemaister, which euer after he bare in mind, and vsuallie would rehearse them, (when a toy toke him in the head) as followeth.

Of this William Wallase one Henrie, who was blind from his birth, in the time of my natiuitie (saith Iohn Maior) composed a whole booke in vulgar verse, in which he mitred all those things vulgarlie spoken of this Wallase. But I do not in all points saith the same author, giue credit to the writings of such as he was, who onelie get their food and clothing (whereof this man was most worthie) by reciting of histories before the nobilitie of Scotland.

BVt now touching Bruse; after he had slaine Cumin (as before is mentioned) he purchased an absolution from Rome for that act: and to the end he might then through authoritie obteine some aid to resist the puissance of his aduersarie king Edward, he went by support of friends vnto Scone, & there caused himselfe to be crowned king, on the 27 day of March, though he had no great number that toke his part in the beginning, as shortlie after well appeared. For when he should assemble an armie against a power of Englishmen that were sent against him by king Edward, immediatlie vpon knowledge had of his attempts, he was not able to get togither anie sufficient number to resist his aduersaries, though with those few which came vnto him, he thought to trie the chance of battell, and so incountring with Odomare de Valence lieutenant of the English armie at Mefken the 19 day of June 1306, he was there put to flight; and though the slaughter was not great, yet for that it was iudged to be an euill signe to haue such infortunat lucke vpon his entering into the estate, the peoples fauor shranke greatlie from him.

Iohn Maior.

King Robert is discomfited at Mefken.

Odomare de Valence after he had obteined this victorie against king Robert, banished the wiues of all those that supported the same Robert, by means thereof, manie ladies and gentlewomen were constreined to flee into woods, and other desert places, to eschew the crueltie of their aduersaries. King Robert also after this ouerthrow, fled into Atholl, and from thence to Streill, where the third Ides of August at a place called Dalreie, he fought againe with the Cumins and other such Scots & Englishmen as were assembled in those parties readie to pursue him, and had the like lucke here that had chanced to him before at Mefken; for he was put to flight after the same maner, though he lost here but few of his men, neither in the fight nor chase. This place Dalreie is as much to say, as the kings field: Buchan lib. 8, which is also called Dawkie by I. Maior. lib. 4. cap. 19, who supposeth that Bruse had so hard a beginning for a punishment of the death of Cumin, slaine in the church by him and his friends. Wherevpon finding fortune thus contrarie vnto him in these two seuerall battels, he was left so desolat and vnprouided of all friendship, that he was constreined for his refuge to withdraw into the woods and mounteins, with a few other in his companie, and there liued on herbs and roots oftentimes for want of other food.

The miserable state of K. Robert in the beginning of his reigne.

WHilest he remained in this estate of aduerse fortune, there were two that shewed themselues right trustie and faithfull seruants vnto him aboue all the rest, the earle of Leuenor, and Gilbert Haie: for though either inforced by persecution of enimies, or constreined through some other necessitie, they departed sometimes from his presence; yet did they euer acknowledge him for their souereigne lord and onelie king, readie at all seasons to serue and obey him in each behalfe. The most part of all other his friends yea and seruants, in that present miserie, did clearelie forsake him; so that sometimes he was left with onelie one or two in his companie, & glad to keepe himselfe secret in desert places, where no person lightlie vsed to resort. His wife & queene fled to saint Dutho, and chanced to be taken by William Cumin earle of Rosse, who deliuered hir to king Edward, by whose commandement she was committed to safe keeping at London, where she remained till after the battell of Bannockburne. His brother Nigell was also taken, and so afterwards were his two other brethren, Thomas and Alexander, with manie other nobles and gentlemen of Scotland, of whome some were executed at Carleill, and some at Berwike. Nigell was taken at the castell of Kildrome whither he fled, and came to Berwike. Thomas and Alexander were taken at Locreis, and carried to Carleill, and so beheaded. Io. Maior. lib. 4. cap. 19. Finallie the most part of all such as had aided him before, and were now shronke from him, were within one yeare after, either slaine or kept as prisoners in England.

Yet though he was thus left desolat of all aid and succor, hauing his brethren and other of his friends murthered and slaine to his vtter discomfort and ruine (as was to be supposed) he neuertheless liued euer in hope of some better fortune, whereby in time to come he might recouer the realme out of the enimies hands, and restore the ancient libertie thereof to the former estate. As for the paines which he toke in liuing barelie for the most part by water & roots, & lodging oftimes on the bare earth, without house or other harborough, he was so accustomed thereto by haunting the warres in his youth, that the same greeued him little or nothing at all. But to conclude, such was his valiancie and most excellent fortitude of mind and courage, that no iniurious mischance of froward aduersitie could abash his inuincible heart and manlike stomach. At length, after he had wandered from place to place in sundrie parts of Scotland,

Here when he had remained a certeine ſpace, hee got ſupport of men, armor and weapons, by meanes whereof taking new courage, he paſſed ouer vnto Carrike, & winning the caſtell there that belonged to his fathers inheritance, he ſlue all the Engliſhmen, which he found within it, and beſtowed all the ſpoile of monie and goods gotten there amongſt his ſouldiers and men of warre. His friends that laie hid in couert and ſecret corners, hearing of theſe his doings, began from each ſide to reſort vnto him, by whoſe aſſiſtance ſhortlie after he wan the caſtell of Inuerneſſe, and ſlue all them that were within it in garriſon. With the like felicitie he got the moſt part of all the caſtels in the north, racing & burning vp the ſame till he came to Glenneſke, where being aduertiſed that John Cumin with ſundrie Engliſhmen and Scots were gathered againſt him, becauſe he was vpon a ſtrong ground, he determined there to abide them: but they being thereof informed, and wondering at his manlie courage, durſt not approch to giue him battell, but ſent ambaſſadors vnto him to haue truce for a time, vnder colour of ſome communication for a peace, till they might increaſe their power more ſtrongly againſt him: which being done, they purſued him more fiercelie than before. Neuertheleſſe K. Robert receiued them at all times in ſuch warlike order, that they might neuer take him at anie aduantage, but were ſtill driuen backe with ſlaughter and loſſe, though the ſame was of no great importance to make account of, but ſuch like as happeneth oftentimes in ſkirmiſhes & light incounters, where the battels come not to ioine puiſſance againſt puiſſance. The ſame whereof yet procured him the fauour of ſundrie great barons in Scotland.

* About this time, Simon Fraſer, and Walter Logan (moſt valiant knights, and greatlie fauouring their countrie) were taken (by ſuch as followed the faction of Cumin) deliuered to the Engliſh, ſent to London, and there executed. Almoſt about which time, James Dowglaſſe ioined himſelfe to the part of king Robert. This James being the ſonne of William Dowglaſſe, was a yong gentleman very actiue and forward in all thoſe exerciſes and arts. Who when he gaue himſelfe to ſtudie at Paris (hearing that his father was by the king of England caſt in priſon, in which he ſhortlie after died, as is before noted) returned home to diſpoſe the reſt of his life after the aduiſe of his friends. But being without liuing, & all his other friends by miſfortune diſperſed: he committed himſelfe to the ſeruice of W. Lambert biſhop of ſaint Andrews, of whome hee was gentlie receiued into his familie, and well interteined: vntill king Edward comming to Sterling (after that he had almoſt pacified all the reſt of Scotland) to beſiege Striueling: at what time Lambert going to Sterling to ſalute the king, caried Dowglaſſe to attend vpon him, to the end to prefer him to his liuing and inheritance. Whereupon the biſhop finding the king at conuenient leiſure, beſought him to be fauourable to this Dowglaſſe; to reſtore him vnto his fathers patrimonie: and that (receiuing the yong man into his fealtie and defenſe) it would pleaſe him to imploie him in his faithfull and warlike ſeruice: adding further ſuch commendations in the behalfe of James, as for that time he thought moſt conuenient. But the king vnderſtanding his name and kinred, ſpake bitterlie of the diſobedience and ſtubbornneſſe of his father William Dowglaſſe; further anſwering, that he would neither vſe the ſame James, nor his trauell in anie thing, neither that he could (if ſo he would) reſtore him to his patrimonie, becauſe he had with the ſame gratified other that well deſerued it. For which cauſe being by the king ſo repelled, he remained ſtill in the biſhops ſeruice, vntill Bruſe came into Yerne, at what time (leaſt he might loſe the opportunitie to offend king Edward, whome he ſecretlie in heart diſdeined) this Dowglaſſe departed from Lambert his maiſter, taking with him all the biſhops gold, and certeine of his beſt horſſes, with the which, hauing in his companie diuerſe other hardie yong gentlemen, priuie to his doings, he fled with all ſpeed vnto king Robert, offering him his ſeruice, and to ſpend his life in his quarell and defenſe.) The biſhop was priuie to his couſins going awaie, yea and counſelled him thereunto, though he would by no means it ſhould outwardlie ſo appeare, for doubt leaſt if things had not come to paſſe as he wiſhed, he might haue run in danger for his cloked diſſimulation. The Dowglaſſe was ioifullie receiued of king Robert, in whoſe ſeruice he faithfullie continued both in peace and warre to his liues end.

A craftie diſſembling prelate.

Though the ſurname and familie of the Dowglaſſes was in ſome eſtimation of nobilitie before thoſe daies, yet the riſing thereof to honor chanced through this James Dowglaſſe: for by meanes of his aduancement, other of the ſame linage toke occaſion by their ſingular manhood and noble prowes ſhewed at ſundrie times in defenſe of the realme, to grow to ſuch height in authoritie & eſtimation, that their mightie puiſſance in maintenance, lands, & great poſſeſſions, at length was (through ſuſpicion conceiued by the kings that ſucceeded) the cauſe in part of their ruinous decay. Edward king of England hearing of the doings of his aduerſarie king Robert, doubted (if ſome redreſſe were not found in time) leſt the Scots reioiſing in the proſperous ſucceſſe of his ſaid aduerſarie, would reuolt wholie from the Engliſh obeiſance: and hereupon purpoſing with all ſpeed to ſubdue the whole realme of Scotland from end to end, he came (with a far greater armie than euer he had raiſed before) to the borders; but before his entring into Scotland, he fell ſicke of a right ſore and grieuous maladie, whereof he died ſhortlie after at Burgh vpon ſands, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie more plainlie doth appeare, though Buchanan ſay he died at Lancaſter.

The riſing of the Dowglaſſes to honor.

The death of king Edward Longſhanks.

The Scotiſh writers make mention, that a litle before he departed out of this world, there were brought vnto him 55 yong ſtriplings, which were taken in the caſtell of Kilbrunmie, after it was wone by the Engliſhmen, and being aſked what ſhould be done with them, he commanded they ſhould be hanged incontinentlie, without reſpect to their yong yeres, or conſideration of their innocencies that might haue moued him to pitie. After his deceaſſe, his ſonne Edward of Carnaruan ſucceeded in the gouernement of England, who following his fathers enterpriſe, called a councell at Dunfreis, ſummoning the lords of Scotland to appeare at the ſame, and cauſed a great number of them at their comming thither to do their homage vnto him, as to their ſuperior lord and gouernor: but yet diuers diſobeied his commandements, and would not come at his ſummoning, vpon truſt of ſome change of fortune by the death of his father, for that the ſon was much giuen (as was reported) to incline his eare to lewd counſell, not without the great griefe of his people, and namelie of the lords and chiefe nobles of his realme.

The cruelitie of king Edward as is noted by the Scotiſh writers.

Homage to king Edward of Carnaruan

Shortlie

Shortlie after this, the said Edward of Carnaruan returned into England, and in the meane time John Cumin erle of Buchquhane gathered a mightie armie, both of Scots and Englishmen to resist against king Robert, that he might thereby declare his faithfull affection toward the new English king. He trusted onelie with multitude of people to cause his enimies to giue place: but king Robert though he was holden with a sore sickenesse at that time, yet he assembled a power, and caused himselfe in a horse-litter to be caried forth with the same against his enimies, who abiding him at a streight, supposed it had bin an easie matter for them to be put to slight: but it chanced quite contrarie to their expectation, for in the end the Cumin with his whole armie was discomfited, and a great number of king Roberts aduersaries slaine or taken. This victorie was gotten at a village called Enuerrour, ten miles distant from Aberden, on the Ascension daie, wherewith king Robert was so much refreshed in contentation of mind, that he was suddenlie thervpon restored to his former health, hauing at that time also taken the castell of Aberden, which he vtterlie destroied, and caused to be leuelled with the ground, to the end his enimies might haue no more refuge thereby.

John Cumin discomfited by king Robert at Enuerrour 1308. Fr. Thin.

In the same yere Donald of the Iles came with a great armie of Englishmen and Scots against K. Robert, and was on the feast day of the apostles Peter and Paule discomfited by Edward Bruse the kings brother, at the water of Deir. At this battell was a right valiant knight named Rowland, slaine of the English part, with a great number of other about him, and Donald himselfe was taken prisoner.

Donald of the Iles discomfited by Edward Bruse.

Thus king Robert through fauour of prosperous fortune, obteining the victorie in sundrie conflicts, came with an armie into Argile, and not onelie subdued the countrie to his obeisance, but also toke Alexander lord of Argile out of a strong castell in that countrie, and banished him with all his friends into England, where shortlie after he deceassed. In the yere next following, king Edward came with an armie into Scotland, where ioining with an other armie of Scots that were assembled readie to aid him, he passed through the countrie vnto Ranfrew, and at length without atchiuing anie notable enterprise worthie the mentioning, he returned againe into England.

Argile subdued by king Robert. This was in 1309, as Iohn Ma. saith.

K. Edward commeth into Scotland. Anno 1310 as should seeme by Io. Maior.

In the same yeere, through continuall warres, there rose such dearth & scarsitie of things in Scotland, that neither corne nor other vittels could be had for monie: for the ground in manner generallie through the countrie laie vntilled, and beasts with all kind of cattell were driuen awaie, as booties taken by the enimies. By reason wherof the famine so increased on each side, that the people were constreined to eat horsses, and other lothsome flesh & meats, thereby to sustaine their liues. In the yere following which was after the incarnation 1311, king Robert chased the Englishmen out of all parts of Scotland, winning manie castels out of their hands, diuerse of the which he raced and consumed with fire. After this entring at sundrie times into England with his fierce armie, he brought from thence innumerable booties of cattell and other riches, afflicting the Englishmen with like slaughter and calamities, as the Scots had suffered in the yeares before, by the outragious force and puissance of king Edward.

Castels recouered by king Robert.

King Robert inuadeth England.

1312. Io. Ma.

The towne of Perth recouered, otherwise called S. Johns towne.

On the eight day of Januarie next insuing, King Robert wan by fine force the strong towne of Perth, sleaing and hanging all the people both English and Scottish, which were found in the same. He threw also the walles of that towne to the ground, and filled the ditch with the rampire. The same yere the castels of Dunfreis, Aire, Lanarke, with manie other strengths and castels were rendered vnto him, and cast to the ground.

Castels won.

The castell of Rokesburgh was taken by sir James Dowglasse on Fealkings euen, in the yeare 1313, when they of the garison were ouercome with immoderate surfetting by meats and drinks excessiuelie taken, according as on that day the accustomed vse is. In that yeare also Thomas Randall, afterwards created earle of Murrey, wan the castell of Edenburgh. In which yeare also, Bruse wan the Ile of Man; Iohn Maior lib. 5. cap. 1. And the same yeare Edward Bruse besieged the castell of Striueling: but the strength of the house was such, what by nature of the high crag whereon it stood, and what by fortification of mans hand beside, all his trauell and inforcement diligentlie imploied to win it, proued vaine for the time. Within this castell as capteine thereof, was a right valiant knight named sir Philip Mowbray, a Scotish man borne, but taking part with the English men, who feared nothing the siege, for he had sufficient store of men, vittels, munition, and all maner of purueiance sufficient to defend the hold for a long season: so that finallie Edward Bruse, perceiuing no meanes whereby to atchiue the enterprise, which he had rashlie taken in hand, was abashed thereof: for by force he saw well inough it could not be brought to passe, and by large offers made to the capteine, if he would render the place, and become seruant to the king his brother, he could not once moue him to giue anie eare thereto, insomuch as at length he sought to trie him another way forth, which in the end toke better effect than was likelie it would haue done, considering the lacke of circumspection vsed in the bargaine making: as thus.

Sir Philip Mowbray.

After long siege, and (as before is said) no good done, there was a motion made betwixt him and the capteine within for a truce, which was accorded on this wise: that if the fortresse were not succoured within twelue moneths next insuing, it should then be rendered vnto king Robert, and in the meane time no force should be vsed against it. This composition was vnwiselie made, as most men iudged: for euerie man of anie wisedome might easilie coniecture, that king Edward hauing so long day to make his prouision, would come in support of them within the castell, and that so stronglie, as would be hard for the Scots to resist him. King Robert himselfe also was sore offended with his brother for his follie shewed in this behalfe: but yet hee would not go about to breake the couenant accorded, for doubt to lose his brother, whose aid hee might not well want.

In vnwise composition

In the meane time king Edward sent forth messengers with letters, not onelie vnto all his subiects, but also vnto all his confederats and alies, to haue men of warre taken vp and retained to serue him in his warres against the Scots, which he intended to follow to the vtter destruction of the whole nation. There came therefore in hope of spoile, not onlie such as were appointed by commissioners of the musters, but also a great number of other that offered themselues of their owne accord to go in that iournie, namelie such as had little to liue vpon at home, and trusted to amend the matter by some good fortune in the warres abroad. The countries out of the which it is reported by the Scotish writers, that such aid came to the English, were these; Holand, Zeland, Brabant, Flanders, Picardie, Bolognois, Gascoigne, Normandie, Guian, and Burdelois. For all these at that time were either subiect to the king of England, or else in confederate league with him. There were also manie Scots that were English by deuotion, and aided king Edward at this time.

But

But the number of naturall Engliſhmen exceéded anie one nation beſide, inſomuch that the whole armie what of one and other, conteined (as the fame went) one hundred and fiftie thouſand footmen, and almoſt as manie horſſemen, beſide cartage-men, coſtrels, women, and lackies, but the fame herein belike (as often happeneth) did farre exceéd the truth. For it is not to be thought (as Iohn Maior himſelfe writeth) that he ſhould get ſuch a number togither, not for that England it ſelfe is not able to ſet forth ſuch a power: for as the ſame Maior ſaith, as manie men as are to be found in England of lawfull age, ſo manie able perſonages may be found there to paſſe for able ſouldiers. But either kings are not of abilitie to find ſo great a multitude with vittels and ſufficient proviſion, or elſe they will not ſtreine themſelues thereto. Neuertheleſſe, the whole number by all likelihood was great, for many as well ſtrangers as Engliſhmen, brought their wiues, their children, and whole houſhold-meinie with them, in hope after the countrie were once ſubdued, to haue dwelling places appointed them in the ſame, there to inhabit: for ſo had king Edward promiſed them. By reaſon whereof the diſorder was ſuch, that no warlike diſcipline might be obſerued amongſt them; for men, women, and children, were all mixt togither, with ſuch clamor and noiſe, through the huge number of people, and diuerſitie of languages, that it was a thing right ſtrange to behold a campe ſo confuſedlie ordered.

Fame oftentimes exceédeth the truth.

K. Edwards promiſe.

King Edward himſelfe moſt proud and inſolent of ſuch incredible number, toke no héed at all to the gouerning of them, ſuppoſing victorie to be alreadie in his hands; inſomuch that at his comming to the borders, he toke aduiſe with his councell to what kind of torment and death he might put king Robert, for he had no doubt of catching him at all. He alſo brought with him a religious man ſomwhat learned belike, of the order of the Carmelites, to deſcribe the whole maner of his conqueſt and victorie ouer the Scots: ſo ſure he thought himſelfe that all things would come to paſſe as he could wiſh or deuiſe. This Carmelite, as may appeare in Iohn Bales booke, intituled A ſummarie of the writers of great Britaine, was named Robert Baſton, and had the gouernance of an houſe in Scarburgh, of the Carmelites order, he being (as before is ſaid) of that cote himſelfe.

K. Edward thinketh himſelfe ſure of victorie.

Robert Baſton a Carmelite.

On the contrarie part, king Robert ordered all his doings by good & prudent aduiſe, and with 30000 men, right hardie and throughlie exerciſed in wars, came forth againſt his enimies, ſhewing no token of feare in the world, but boldlie pitched downe his tents in good order and warlike arate, vpon a plaine a little aboue Bannockſborne. Whether he did this for the great confidence he had in the hardineſſe of his people, or for that he would ſhew how little hée doubted the puiſſance of his enimies, leaſt they ſhuld haue him in contempt, it is vncerteine. Indéed there were diuerſe expert warriours amongeſt the Engliſhmen, that ſaid (when they heard how the Scots were thus aſſembled to fight) that the victorie would not be had, except it were dearelie bought: the wiſedome and manhood of king Robert was knowne ſo well amongſt them, that they were aſſured he would not leopard himſelfe in ſuch a caſe, but that he knew he had ſuch fellowes about him, as would sticke to their tackle.

Iohn Ma. hath in his booke 35 thouſand. King Robert his comming toward the battell.

The opinion of expert warriors of king Edwards.

Moreouer the Scots by appointment of their king, to the furtherance of his hardie enterpriſe, had caſt déepe pits and ditches in the place where it was iudged the battels ſhould ioine, and pitched ſharpe ſtakes within the ſame, and after couered them ouer ſlightlie with gréene turfes or ſods, in ſuch wiſe that a few footmen might paſſe ouer well inough; but if anie great number ſhould come preaſſing togither, or that anie horſſemen came thereupon, the ſods would ſhrinke and fall to the bottome of the trenches, with extreme perill of the men and horſſes, that were ſure to fall vpon the ſtakes ſet there for that purpoſe; or elſe to be ſo incloſed, that they ſhould not be able to get out of thoſe pitfals. By the place where king Robert was thus incamped, there runneth a great brooke or water called Bannockſborne, ſo named of oten-cakes called bannocks, which were vſed to bée made commonlie at the mils ſtanding on the banks of the ſaid water. It falleth into the Forth right famous afterwards by reaſon of this battell fought nére to the ſame.

Bannockſborne.

When both the armies were approched within a mile togither, king Edward ſent eight hundred horſmen by a ſecret waie, vnto the caſtell of Striueling, to giue notice to ſir Philip Mowbrate the capteine, that he was come with his armie to ſuccour him. K. Robert being aduertiſed of their gate, & beholding them which way they tooke, he ſent Thomas Randall with fiue hundred Scotiſh horſmen to ſaue the countrie from ſpoile, who with ſingular manhood incountering with thoſe Engliſhmen in ſight of both the armies, there inſued a cruell fight betwixt them for ſo ſmall a number, continuing a long ſpace with vncerteine victorie. In the meane time ſir James Dowglaſſe, dreading that his ſpeciall friend the ſaid Thomas Randall ſhould be ouerſet with multitude of the Engliſhmen, came to K. Robert, and falling on his knées before him, required licence to go forth to the ſupport of them that were thus fighting with their enimies: which bicauſe the king would not grant at the firſt, he ruſhed forth of the campe without licence, hauing in his companie a ſmall band of men, but yet choſen out for the purpoſe, that if it were but by ſhewing himſelfe, hée might put the enimies in ſome feare.

The fight of Th. Randall with 500 Scotiſhmen in his companie againſt 800 Engliſhmen.

Notwithſtanding, when he was come nére to the place where they fought, and ſaw how the Scots had got the victorie with great murther of the Engliſhmen, he ſtaied and went no further; leaſt he ſhould by his comming ſéeme to beréeue them the glorie of the victorie, which had woone it with ſo great proweſſe & ſingular valiancie. All thoſe in the Scotiſh campe were relieued, in good hope of greater ſucceſſe to follow in the whole enterpriſe by ſo happie a beginning. The Engliſhmen paſſed little thereof, but yet for that the Scots ſhould not ware proud, and take ouermuch courage thereby, they determined to giue them battell the next morow. King Robert with great diligence cauſed his people to prepare themſelues readie to receiue the enimies, though he was nothing able to match them in number, deuiſing which waie he might traine them into the ditches before prepared. He commanded through the armie that euerie man ſhould on the next morow receiue the ſacrament of the Lords bodie, through the which they might haue the better hope of victorie againſt the vniuſt inuaders of their realme and countrie.

The Engliſh men determine to giue battell.

King Robert prepareth to receiue the enimies by battell.

On the other ſide, the Engliſhmen truſted that all things would proſper with them, euen as they could beſt deuiſe: for by one ſmall daies labour they hoped to be lords of all Scotland, and to diſpoſe of the lands and goods of their enimies, as ſhould ſéeme to them good, and moſt for their owne auaile. But king Robert all the night before the battell toke litle reſt, hauing great care in his mind for the ſuertie of his armie, one while reuoluing in his conſideration this chance, and an other while that; yea and ſometimes he fell to deuout contemplation, making his praier to God and ſaint Phillane, whoſe arme as it was ſet and incloſed in a ſiluer caſe, he ſuppoſed had beene the same time within his tent, trusting the better fortune to follow by presence thereof. In the meane time, as he was thus making his praiers, the case suddenlie opened, and clapped to againe. The kings chapleine being present, astonied therewith, went to the altar where the case stood, and finding the arme within it, he cried to the king & other that were present, how there was a great miracle wrought, confessing that he brought the emptie case to the field, and left the arme at home, least that relike should haue beene lost in the field, if anie thing chanced to the armie otherwise than well.

The exhortation of king Robert to his people.

Fr.Thin.

The king verie ioifull of this miracle, passed the remnant of the night in praier and thankesgiuing. On the morow he caused all his folks to heare diuine seruice, and to receiue the sacrament, as ouer night he had appointed. The abbat of Inchchaffraie did celebrate before the king that day, and ministred vnto him and other of the nobles, the communion, other priests being appointed to minister the same vnto the residue of the armie. After this, when seruice was ended, the king called the people to his standard, and first declared vnto them from point to point, how necessarie it was for them to shew their wonted manhood, considering that such an huge multitude of people was brought thither against them by king Edward, not of one nation or dominion, but of sundrie languages and parties, as well subiects as alies to the Englishmen, with full purpose vtterlie to extinguish the Scotish name and memorie, and to plant themselues in their seates and romes, as in possessions vtterlie voided of all the ancient and former inhabitants. To increase the fierce stomachs of the Scotishmen against the enimies, he recounted vnto them what he heard by credible report touching the menacing words and insolent brags of the same enimies, able to moue verie quiet minds vnto full indignation. Againe, to auoid feare out of their harts, which they might conceiue by reason of the multitude of their aduersaries, he rehearsed what a number of rascals were amongest them, without anie skill of warrelike affaires, not taken vp by choise and election in appointed musters, but resorting without difference togither, in hope of spoile and booties, hauing not else wherevpon to liue at home in their countries.

Moreouer, if nothing else might raise their harts in hope of victorie, their iust cause sith they came in defense of their countrie against iniurious inuaders, was matter sufficient to aduance their manlie stomachs, in trust of Gods aid in that quarell, hauing partlie assured them thereof, by notable miracles shewed in the night last passed. Hereto he added, that the greater multitude there was of the enimies, the more spoile and riches was to be got, if they atteined the victorie. Finallie, the more to stirre their harts to doo valiantlie, he required them of one thing, which he trusted (their manhood being such) they would not thinke hard for them to atchiue, and this was, that euerie of them would but dispatch one of the enimies, which if they performed, he promised them assured victorie. As for ten thousand, he knew to be amongst them of such approued souldiers, and old men of war, as he durst safelie vndertake for them that they would slea two of the enimies apeece, at the least. Such manner of persuasions king Robert vsed to incourage his people.

✲ But Iohannes Maior, lib. 5. cap. 2. putteth speech much different from this, in the mouth of Bruse, further saieng, that when this oration was ended, that the king came downe the hill, on which he stood, when he vttered these words, and bareheaded imbraced all the nobilitie in his armes, and after turning himselfe to the whole armie, he reached to euerie man his hand, in signe of amitie: but I suppose he was ouerwearied before he had shaken 35000 men by the hands.) On the other part, king Edward caused the coronels of ech nation within his campe, to exhort their retinues to remember, that if they fought valiantlie for one houre or two, they should purchase infinit riches with the whole realme of Scotland, in reward of their labour: for he desired nothing for himselfe, but the superioritie. Againe, he willed they should haue in remembrance what irrecouerable shame would follow (sith they had departed out of their countries in hope of gaine) to returne home with emptie hands, and void of victorie, not without some reproch and note of cowardise.

The exhortation of king Edward.

✲ Besides which (as seemeth by Iohannes Maior) king Edward clothed in his kinglie robes, is said to haue vsed these speeches to the armie. If I did not behold the open victorie, I would this day (most valiant men) make an other beginning of speech vnto you. We are in preparation & number of souldiors farre beyond these miserable Scots. Besides which, we haue abundance of brasse peeces, catapultes, bowes, and other such engins of warre, which on the contrarie part the Scots doo want. They are onelie couered with leather pilches made of bucks skins, and with clokes like vnto the wild mounteine people, for which cause our archers, before the strength of the maine battell shall ioine, will soone subdue them. Maruell not that they haue before time subdued some of my subiects, because they did it by their accustomed deceits, and not by strength of battell. And though by chance they haue ouercome (in fight) some weake companie of equall number vnto them, yet are they not able to resist vs; being farre more excellent in number, preparation, and order of battell. The Scot hath a weake nation fighting on his owne charge, not hauing anie chosen souldier. God hath in this field inclosed that for Bruse (nourished by my good father) to the end that he might receiue worthie punishment for his wickednesse. His three brethren were consumed by my father: therefore it now remaineth that we apprehend (aliue) these other two wicked and wauering men, to lead them to London, there to receiue their due punishment. You had great reuenues (noble princes) giuen to you by my father, in that kingdome. Therefore now shew your selues valiant persons, that you may againe reconer the same, at this day possessed by the vniust and vnrightfull owners. Besides which, I will further by line geometricallie measure forth all the land of Scotland, to be diuided vnto those that deserue the same, according to the merits of the men. Thus much Maior.)

But yet when they should march forward in arraie of battell towards the Scots, they might scarse be seuered from their wiues and children, which they had there in campe with them: neuertheless, at length by the sharpe calling vpon of their capteins, they were brought into order of battell, not without much adoo, by reason of the vnrulie multitude. The archers were placed in wings, mingled amongst the horsemen on the sides of the wards and battels, which stood inclosed in the middest of the same wings. King Robert appointing all his battels on foot, diuided the same into three parts: the fore ward he committed to Thomas Randolfe, & James Dowglasse, capteins of verie approued valiancie, vnder whome went seuen thousand of the borderers, and three thousand of the Irish Scots, otherwise called Baterans or Redshanks. These no lesse fierce and forward, than the other practised and skilfull. The second ward was gouerned by Edward the kings brother, wherein were ten thousand men: but for that he was suspected of too much rashnesse, there was ioined with him

The third.

The abbat of Inchchaffrate aforeſaid (who as before is mentioned, did celebrate that morning afore the king) came forth before the battels, with the crucifix in his hands, bearing it aloft like a ſtandard, admoniſhing them valiantlie to take in hand the defenſe of their countrie, and the libertie of their poſteritie: for (ſaith he) you muſt not euerie man fight as it were for his owne priuat defenſe, his owne houſe and children, but euerie man for all men, and all men for euerie man muſt fight for the libertie, life, patrimonie, children, and wiues of all the realme: for ſuch and ſo great is the dignitie of our countrie, as they which deface or ſpoile it, are to be puniſhed with perpetuall fier, and they which doo preſerue it, are to be recompenſed with an eternall crowne of glorie. And herewithall this abbat inſtructed them of manie things touching the loue of their countrie, which nature hath ſo planted in all men, that for the preſeruation and libertie therof, none ſhould refuſe anie danger, no not the loſſe of life, yea though (if it were poſſible) that it might be manie times loſt therefore. Which done, he feared not to admoniſh them to worſhip the image of Chriſt, which he ſhewed them on the croſſe. Incontinentlie whervpon, the Scotiſh armie fell on knées before it, deuoutlie commending themſelues to almightie God.

The Engliſh armie beholding the Scots fall on knées, thought verelie they had yélded without ſtroke ſtriken. But when they ſaw them riſe againe, and to come forward, they began to be ſomewhat doubtfull. And herevpon ruſhing togither, at the firſt ioining a great number of people on either ſide were beaten downe & ſlaine. The archers which were arraied on the vtter ſkirts of the Engliſh wings, ſore annoied the Scots, till finallie Edward Bruſe came on their backs with a thouſand ſpeares, and brake them aſunder, in ſuch wiſe that they did but little more hurt that day. Albeit incontinentlie herewith a battell of horſſemen to the number of thirtie thouſand, came ruſhing togither all at once in ſhocke, to haue borne downe and ouerridden the Scots; but being ſo in their full race galloping with moſt violence towards them, they tumbled into the foſſes and pits before mentioned, in ſuch wiſe one vpon another, that the moſt part of them was ſlaine, without all recouerie. Neuertheleſſe the Scots in maner oppreſſed through the huge multitude of the enimies, were néere at the point to haue bæne vanquiſhed. [During which conflict ſaith Buch. this happened (which though it be a ſmall thing to put in writing, yet was ſuch as oftentimes it chanceth in battell, and as brought no ſmall benefit to the perfection of their buſineſſe) that king Robert (who continuallie rode before the battell appointed to his gouernement) holding a mace of warre in his hand (and kéeping the firſt order in the arraie) was eſpied of an Engliſhman that knew him verie well: and forthwith rode full againſt Bruſe with his ſpeare. But the king beating the ſtroke aſide, came to his Engliſh aduerſarie, ouerthrew him by the force of his horſſe, in the end killed him with his mace & ſo left him dead. Whervpon, the common people beholding the valure of their king and capteine, did with great force by the inſtigation of their fierce and fierie minds (and not by the kings perſuaſion) fall vpon their enimies in ſuch ſort, that they ſéemed to haue had the victorie of the aduerſe battell of their enimies: had it not bæne for the Engliſh archers, which were placed in the wings of the battell; whom Bruſe (ſending out certeine light horſſemen) did ſone repreſſe: whereby the Scots incouraged, made their partie good, rather by hidden policie, than prepared force. For a ſtratagem by the Scots deuiſed, and an error by the Engliſh therof conceiued, did far more hurt to the enimie, than the power aſſembled in the field. For that deuiſe in the end was the cauſe that the Engliſh loſt the victorie, being in this ſort.]

And herevpon they began to turne their backs, and fell to running away as people clearelie vanquiſhed: on whome the Scots followed with inſatiable ire, and ſlue them down on all ſides where they might ouertake them. Sir James Dowglas with foure hundred choſen horſſemen, was commanded by king Robert to purſue the king of England with all ſpéed, to trie if he might ouertake him.

Dowglas (according to his charge) followed him in chaſe to Dunbar, & calling betwixt that and the borders, laie in wait to haue taken him, if he had returned by land; but he being receiued into the caſtell of Dunbar by Patrike Dunbar erle of March, with fiftéene earles in his companie, was by the ſame earle of March conueied into certeine veſſels, lieng there at anchor, with the which he paſſed alongſt by the ſhore into England, to ſhew an example of the vnſtable ſtate of princes: for though this Edward was that day in the morning right proud of the great puiſſance and number of people which he had about him, not vnlike ſometime to the great armie of king Xerxes, yet he was conſtreined before the euening of the ſame day, to ſaue his life in a poore fiſhers boat. In this battell were ſlaine fiftie thouſand Engliſhmen (as the Scotiſh writers affirme) amongſt whome was the earle of Glocester, with two hundred knights. On the Scotiſh part were ſlaine about foure thouſand, and amongſt other two valiant knights, ſir William Wepount, and ſir Walter Roſſe. The ſpoile was ſo great of gold, ſiluer, and other iewels gotten in the field, that the whole number of the Scotiſh armie was made rich thereby: and beſides this, they got little leſſe monie and riches by ranſoming of priſoners taken at this battell, than of ſpoile gotten in the fight, campe, and field. But the death of ſir Giles Argentine, that died amongſt other in this mortall battell, was ſo diſpleaſant to king Robert, for the familiaritie which he had ſometimes with him in England, that he reioiſed little of all the gaine got by ſo famous a victorie. in captiuitie the space of 8 yeares, was in England now deliuered by exchange for one of the nobles of England, which was taken at this battell. The rich clothes of silke, veluet, and gold, which were found in the English campe, were distributed to the abbeies and monasteries of the realme, to make thereof vestments, copes, and frontals for altars. The Carmelite frier, of whome ye heard before, brought thither by king Edward to describe the victorie of the Englishmen, was taken prisoner amongst other, and commanded by king Robert to write contrarilie the victorie of the Scots, according as he had séene: who thereupon gathered his rudde wits together, & made certeine rude verses beginning thus.

Verses made by Robert Baston the Carmelite.

De planctu cudo metrum cum carmine nudo,
Risum retrudo cum tali themate ludo.
With barren verse this rime I make,
Bewailing whilest such theame I take.

There be some that haue iudged, how this victorie was atteined by the singular fauor of almightie God, by reason of miracles which they rehearse to happen at the same time. The night before the day of the battell, there came to the abbeie of Glastenburie two men in complet armour, desiring to lodge there all night: the abbat kéeping an house of great hospitalitie, receiued them right gladlie, and making them good cheare, demanded what they were, and whither they were going: who answered that they were the seruants of God, and going to helpe the Scots at Bannorsborne. On the morrow the chamberlaine found them departed before anie of the gates were opened, & the beds faire made, and not stirred otherwise than as they left them ouer night. The same day that the battell was foughten, a knight clad in faire bright armour, declared to the people at Aberden, how the Scots had gotten a famous victorie against the Englishmen, and was séene shortlie after to passe ouer Pictland Firth on horssebacke. It was supposed by the people that this was saint Magnus, sometime prince of Orkenie, and for that cause king Robert endowed the church of Orkenie with fiue poundes sterling of the customes of Aberden, to furnish the same church, with bread, wine, and wax.

Miracles if ye list to beléeue them.

Manie noble men for their approued manhood shewed in this conflict, were highlie rewarded at the hands of king Robert. One Robert Fleming, by whose means he reuenged the treason wrought against him by John Cumin, with slaughter of the same John, had the lands of Cumnernald giuen him, which were of the inheritance belonging to the said Cumin. It is reported by writers, that two knights of Brabant that serued amongest the Englishmen, chanced to heare manie reprochfull words spoken in the English campe against king Robert, who being somewhat moued therewith, and misliking such dismeasured talke, wished in words that the victorie might chance vnto him. For the which with K. Edward informed thereof, caused them by a trumpet to be conueied vnto the Scotish campe, with commandement to aid king Robert to the vttermost of their powers, purposing to punish them according to his mind, if he atteined the victorie, as he had no doubt but he should. Herevpon, before the ioining of the battels, he caused proclamation to be made, that whosoeuer brought their heads vnto him, should haue an hundred marks in reward.

Robert Fleming rewarded for his faithfull seruice.

A proclamation.

King Robert hearing in what danger they had run for his sake, rewarded them with great riches of the spoile got in the field, with the which they returning into Brabant, built a goodlie house in Antuerpe, naming the same Scotland, and causing the Scotish armes, and the picture of Bruse to be set vp in the same, appointed it for a lodging to receiue them of the Scotish nation that should resort vnto that towne, as may appeare euen vnto this day. And this was done for a memoriall, to shew what loue and hartie beneuolence these two knights bare towards king Robert and his people, for the great liberalitie receiued at his hands. This glorious victorie chanced to the Scots on the day of the natiuitie of saint John Baptist, in the yeare 1314.

✠ About this time for the varietie of fortune (in so small a course of yeares) happened a thing not vnworthie the reporting. For John Wentith, which before betraied his déere friend Wallase to the English, being therefore (as of right he ought) extremelie hated of the Scots, was (in recompense thereof beside manie other rewards) benefited with the gardianship of the castle of Dunbriton: which fort (after all the other castles before said were recouered to the Scots) was almost the onlie thing (except some few others) that remained in the hands of the English: and because this fort was by nature inexpugnable, king Robert dealt with the capteine (by such as were friends and of kinred vnto him) to betraie the castle into his hands, promising great recompense therefore. Whereunto this Wentith by no means would agrée, vnles K. Robert would giue to him the earledome of Lennox for his reward. Wherevpon the king being greatlie in doubt what to say therein; (though in deed he vehementlie longed for the said castle) because he did not thinke the obteining thereof to be of such good vnto him, as that he would therefore offend or lose the earle of Lennox; who had in all his calamities béene the most certeine, and almost the onelie friend of the king: which doubt, when the earle vnderstood; he forthwith came vnto him, willing him in no wise to refuse the condition; wherevpon the bargaine was concluded betweene John Wentith and the king, and that in such sort, as it was most solemnelie confirmed.

John Wentith made capteine of Dunbriton castle.

Now, when the king should come to receiue this castle (according to compositions) as he was in the wood Colchon, a mile distant from the same, a certeine carpentar called Rowland came thither secretlie vnto him, & desired licence that he might speake to the king, for he would discouer a great matter touching a treason that was deuised and prepared against him, by the capteine of Dunbriton. Which pardon obteined, he opened vnto Bruse, that below in the wine-cellar of the castle, were a number of English inclosed, which at dinner should either take or kill the king (being then safe) after that he had obteined the castle. Wherevpon the king nothing abashed, but kéeping on his former determination, & being (according to appointment) receiued by the said John Wentith in the castle of Dunbriton: after that he had searched all other places, and was courteoulie inuited to sit downe to dinner; answered that he would not eate, vntill he had looked into the cellar below. Whereunto for excuse, and to defer the time, the capteine answered that the smith was absent and caried the key away with him. But the king not waiting for the comming of the smith, did incontinentlie breake open the cellar doore, whereby all the deceit appeared. After which, the armed men were brought forth before the king, who being seuerallie examined, confessed the whole matter; and further, that there was a ship readie in the hauen to haue caried the K. prisoner into England, if they had taken him aliue. Wherevpon the rest being punished, John Wentith was onelie cast into prison, & reserued from further paine: because the king would not offend his friends & kinred in so dangerous a time as that was. For this Wentith had manie beautifull daughters, maried to men of great power & riches. After which imprisonment of this 1314. The crowne of Scotland intailed. Margerie the daughter of of king Robert by his firſt wife.

Immediatlie after, king Robert called a parlement at Aire, where, by conſent of the three ſtates he was confirmed king, and the crowne intailed to the heires male of his bodie lawfullie begotten, and for want of ſuch heires, to remaine vnto his brother Edward Bruſe, and to the heires male of his bodie; and if he chanced to die without ſuch heires, then ſhould the crowne deſcend to Margerie the daughter of king Robert, and to the heires generall of hir bodie by lawfull ſucceſſion. In which parlement it was further decreed, that if the king were in his minoritie, he ſhould then be gouerned by Thomas Randolph, and if anie miſfortune chanced vnto the ſaid Randolph, that then the gouernement of the kings perſon and kingdome ſhould be committed to James Dowglaſſe.

This Margerie was gotten by king Robert on the earle of Mar his ſiſter, his firſt wife, and was maried by the aduiſe of his nobles vnto Walter great Steward of Scotland. Alſo king Robert, for that his firſt wife aforeſaid was deceaſſed, maried ſhortlie after Elizabeth the daughter of the earle of Ulſter, on whome he got a ſonne named Dauid, and two daughters, the one named Margaret, and the other Mauld. The firſt was maried to the earle of Sutherland, and bare him a ſonne named John: the ſecond departed this world in hir infancie. After the mariage ſolemnized betwixt his daughter Margerie, and the foreſaid Walter Steward, king Robert went through all the bounds of his realme, and did not onelie confirme the ancient liberties and priuileges of the burrowes and townes in all places where he came, but alſo augmented the ſame, and granted vnto diuerſe, aſwell townes as baronies, ſundrie new prerogatiues and franchiſes, as may appeare by his charters made vnto them of the ſame, ſpeciallie to the townes of Perth, Dundee, and Aberden.

1315. In the yeare following, which was in the yeare 1315, the princes of Ireland oppreſſed (as they tooke it) with long and inſufferable tyrannie of the Engliſhmen, and truſting by ſupport of Scots to recouer their libertie, now after ſo notable an ouerthrow of the whole Engliſh puiſſance, ſent ambaſſadors vnto king Robert, requiring that it might pleaſe him to ſend his brother Edward Bruſe, to receiue the crowne and gouernement of their countrie of Ireland. This requeſt being granted, Edward prepared to take that iournie in hand, and ſo with a ſmall power of Scotiſhmen tranſporting ouer into Ireland, and ioining with an armie of ſuch as were readie to aſſiſt him there, he tooke the towne of Vlſter, and ſlue a great number of Engliſhmen which were found in the ſame. Then afterwards, by the generall conſent of all the eſtates of Ireland, Edward Bruſe was proclaimed king of that realme, and certeine of the Iriſh nobilitie ſent ambaſſadors vnto the pope, to ſue for a ratification of their act and proceedings, for the ſuertie and weale of their countrie, ſith they were not able longer to ſuſteine the greeuous yoke of the Engliſh thraldome. Theſe ambaſſadors, through their earneſt diligence, got ſuch fauor in their ſute, that the pope ſundrie times charged the Engliſhmen to auoid out of Ireland: howbeit, they ſeemed to paſſe little of his commandements in that behalfe, for they dailie ſought how to make themſelues ſtrong in that part, leaſt they ſhould loſe the poſſeſſion of that countrie, which their enimies were about to get forth of their hands.

At length being approched within a daies iournie of his brother, in purpoſe to haue ſupported him with thoſe people which he had left, his brother not abiding his comming, fought vnwiſelie with the Engliſhmen at a place called Dundach, and receiuing the ouerthrow, was ſlaine himſelfe with a great number of other. It is vncerteine whether he had anie knowledge of the comming of his brother king Robert, or that through deſire of fame he feared leaſt if he ſtaied till his brother came, a great part of the praiſe (if they got the victorie) ſhould remaine to him: and therefore he made ſuch haſt to fight. Edward king of England, hearing that king Robert was paſſed ouer into Ireland, thought the time to ſerue well for his purpoſe, eftſoones to inuade Scotland: and hereupon comming with a great power to the borders, he purpoſed to haue done ſome great feat. But ſir James Dowglas the gouernor, hauing likewiſe gathered an armie, gaue him battell, and put both him & his people to flight. recouered the towne of Berwike out of the Englishmens hands, which they had held for the space of twentie yeares before. It was taken now by practise, through meanes of one Spaldein an Englishman, who for his labour had certeine lands giuen him in Angus, which his posteritie inioieth to these daies.

Fr. Thin. Scala chron.

¶ Trulie it were a wonderfull processe to declare what mischiefes came through hunger and other misfortunes, by the space of 11 yeares in Northumberland; for the Scots became so proud after they had gotten Berwike, that they nothing esteemed the English nation. But (amongst other things by the Scots attempted) much about this time, Adam de Gardonne came with 160 men, to driue awaie the cattell pasturing by Norham, which the people of the towne perceiuing, ran forth and incountered with the Scots, who had gotten the victorie of them, had not Thomas Grey capteine of the castell, seeing them in some ieopardie, issued forth with 60 of his souldiers, & slaine most part of the Scots, and their horsses. The which Grey had beene twise before besieged in the castell of Norham, once almost by the space of a whole yeare, and another time by the terme of seuen moneths, in which he behaued himselfe like a worthie gentleman, in that his enimies got none aduantage of him, although that during the siege, they had erected manie fortresses before the castell, to annoie such as were within: of which forts they made one at Upsitlington, and one in the church of Norham, the castell whereof had beene twise teinted and in danger of losse, had not the lord Persie and Neuill (being great succourers of the marches) rescued the same. For at one time the vtter ward of Norham castell was taken in the time of this Grey on saint Katharins eeuen, which the Scots kept not but three daies, and their purpose in winning the same did vtterlie faile them.)

Ri. Southwell.

The Scots enter further into England thã they were accustomed, euen vnto Wetherbie (as Fourd. saith.)

After that the earle of Murrey had recouered Berwike, he and the lord James Dowglasse in the moneth of Maie inuaded England with a puissant armie, passing further into the countrie than the Scots had beene accustomed to do before time, burning as they went forward the townes of Northallerton and Burrowbridge; and comming to Ripon, they spoiled the towne of all the goods found therein; but compounding with them that kept the church against them for a thousand marks, they forbare to burne anie of the buildings. After they had taried here three daies, they departed thence, and went to Knaresburgh, which towne they burnt, and beating the woods (into the which the people were withdrawne with their goods and cattell) they got a great bootie, and returning homewards by Scipton in Crauen, they first spoiled the towne, and after burnt it, and so marching thorough the countrie, came backe into Scotland with their spoiles and prisoners without anie resistance. [This castell of Knaresburgh was taken by John Lilleborne, which after rendered himselfe to the king vpon certeine conditions.]

Berwike besieged.

Ri. Southwell.

In the yeare following, king Edward came and laid siege vnto Berwike but the towne was so well defended, that he was constreined with small honor to returne home, and leaue it as he found it. For in the meane time, while king Edward lay at the siege before Berwike, Thomas Randall earle of Murrey, and the lord James Dowglasse assembled their forces togither; but perceiuing themselues too weake to remoue the siege by force, they passed by, and entring into England, wasted and spoiled all before them, keeping on their way vnto Burrowbridge: whereof when the citizens of Yorke were aduertised, with their capteins William Melton their archbishop, and the bishop of Elie, not making them of the countrie once priuie to their purpose, but hauing in their companie a great number of priests and men of religion, they gaue battell to the Scots one day in the after none, not farre from the towne of Mitton vpon Swale, twelue miles distant from Yorke northwards.

But forsomuch as the most part of the Englishmen were not expert in the feates of warre, and came not in anie orderlie arraie of battell, they were easilie vanquished & put to flight by the Scots, who were readie to receiue them in good order, close togither in one entier squadrone, and after their accustomed maner, at their first ioining they gaue a great shout, wherewith the Englishmen out of hand began to giue backe: which when the Scots perceiued, they got them to their horsses, and followed the chase most egerlie, beating downe and sleaing the Englishmen, neither sparing religious person nor other, so that their died to the number of foure thousand Englishmen that day, and amongst the rest was the maior of Yorke one. In the water of Swale (as was said) there were drowned to the number of a thousand. To be short, if night had not come the sooner vpon, it was thought scarse there should anie of the English part haue escaped.

When king Edward lieng as yet at the siege of Berwike, vnderstood what mischiefe the Scots did within his realme, he raised his siege, in purpose to haue incountered with his enimies: but the Scots aduertised of his purpose, returned with all their prisoners and spoile by Stanemore, and so through Gilland, and the west marches, withdrew home into their countrie. About the feast of All saints, when the inhabitants of the north parts had got in their haruest, so that their barnes were now stuffed with corne, of the which prouision they were to liue all the yeare after, the Scots vnder the conduct of the said two capteins, the earle of Murrey, and the lord Dowglasse, entered into England, and burnt the countrie of Gilland, taking away both such people as they tooke prisoners, and also all the cattell which they might meet with, and so kept vpon their iournie till they came to Burgh vnder Stanemore, destroieng all afore them, & then returning through Westmerland, practised the like mischiefe there, in burning vp houses and corne in all places where they came, as they had done before in Gilland. And finallie passing through Cumberland with the like hauocke, at length they drew home into their owne countrie, with no small number of prisoners, and plentie of great riches which they had got in that iournie. [And the souldiers going backe againe toward Scotland, fought with the commons of Newcastell at the bridge end, for certeine displeasures done vnto them, in which conflict sir John Perith knight was slaine, and manie other squires belonging to the constable and marshall. About which time also, king Edward (lieng at Lieth to go vnto Edenburgh) was constreined to returne for lacke of vittels.]

About the same time died Margerie Bruse king Roberts daughter. Shortlie after also was a truce taken betwixt the two realmes of England & Scotland for a certeine time. Then king Robert hauing no trouble, neither within his realme nor without, caused a parlement to be holden at Perth, where he required the lords to shew their deeds and charters whereby they held their lands. The lords after long aduisement taken herein, at length pulled out their swords all at once, declaring that they had none other euidence nor charter to shew for the tenure of their lands. King Robert was somewhat amazed at this sight, and woke no small indignation therewith, but but yet he diſſembled for the time, and commended them for their noble hearts and valiant ſtomachs: neuertheleſſe, he purpoſed to be reuenged of their proud preſumptions, when more opportunitie of time ſerued thereto. Sundrie of the nobles perceiuing that the king bare an inward grudge towards them for this matter, deuiſed amongſt themſelues how to deliuer him into king Edwards hands, ſo to auoid all danger that might follow of his diſpleaſure conceiued thus againſt them. For the accompliſhment of this their treaſonable practiſe, they made a bond in writing, confirmed with their hands and ſeales betwixt them, & minded to ſend the ſame into England vnto king Edward. But king Robert hauing ſome inkeling of this their purpoſe, cauſed diligent watch to be laid by the way for ſuch as ſhould paſſe into England from them with the ſaid bond, inſomuch that in the end a palmer or pilgrime was apprehended which had the bond, and other writings incloſed within his pilgrims ſtaffe.

A palmer taken with writings on him.

King Robert vnderſtanding by theſe writings all the manner of the treaſon, and what they were that had conſented to the ſame, haſtilie ſent for the whole number of them, as though there had beene ſome matter in hand wherein he wiſhed to haue their aduiſe. They were no ſooner come, but ſtreightwaies calling them before him, he queſtioned with them whether they knew their owne hands and ſeales, and immediatlie therewith ſhewed the writings, which were found in the palmers ſtaffe: and becauſe they could not denie their owne act, they were committed to ward within ſundrie caſtels, till he had taken further aduiſe in the matter. Incontinentlie after, he went to Berwike, and there arreſted the capteine of the towne, named ſir William Soulis, and cauſed him to be conueied to Perth (committing the ſaid William Soulis (as ſaith Io. Maior) with the counteſſe of Straherne, to perpetuall priſon) where ſhortlie after he called an aſſemblie of all the eſtates of the realme. This was called the blacke parlement, kept in the yeere after the incarnation of our Sauiour 1320. In this parlement, at the beginning thereof, was Dauid Abernethie, the ſiſters ſonne of king Robert, accuſed as partie to the treaſon aforeſaid, though being laboured vnto by the reſt of the conſpirators to ioine with them therein, he refuſed ſo to do, but yet for that he did not vtter the thing, but concealed it with them, he was condemned & loſt his head, the people ſore lamenting his miſhap, for the great valiancie which was knowne to be in him, hauing ſerued honorablie manie yeeres before againſt the Saracens, and other miſcreants in the parties of beyond the ſeas, where he was called the flower of chiualrie.

In deed the king himſelfe would gladlie haue ſaued his life, but for that he minded to do iuſtice on the reſidue, and finding no man to make ſute for him, he permitted the execution to proceed againſt him. On the morrow after, he cauſed all the reſidue of the traitors to be brought forth to iudgement, and ſentence being giuen againſt them, he commanded without delaie that they ſhould be executed. Then came diuerſe and ſundrie perſons in moſt humble wiſe to make ſute for pardon to the king for their friends and kinſmen: but he made them plaine anſwer, that there was none to be found that would make interceſſion for the ſauing of his kinſmans life the day before, when he was led to execution, that had offended nothing ſo grieuouſlie, in compariſon of them for whome they now made ſute, and therfore he bad them be contented, for they ſhould aſſuredlie haue according to that which they had deſerued. And therewith were the officers commanded to make haſt with the execution, which was done incontinentlie without anie further reſpit.

Among other were theſe, Gilbert de Malet, Iohn Cogi knights and Richard Bron a notable warriour. Iohn Maior.

Execution without reſpit

There were ſome that were accuſed to be partakers in this treaſon, but yet for that no euident proofes could be produced againſt them, they were diſmiſſed, as Walter Harwell, with Walter Berclaie ſhiriffe of Aberdene, Patrike Graint, Hameline Neidzinton, and Euſtace Rathze, knights; beſides eight others. But yet the counteſſe of Straherne & William de Soulis were condemned to perpetuall priſon. The earle of Buchquhanes lands, who ſuffered at that preſent, were diuided into two parts, the one being giuen to William Haie that was made conſtable of the realme in place of Iohn Quincie, who likewiſe ſuffered at the ſame time; and the other part was giuen vnto William Reth, togither with the office of the ſtewardſhip of the realme. About the ſame time the king of England by complaint made to the pope, purchaſed that a legat was ſent from the ſee apoſtolike into Scotland, to admoniſh king Robert to ceaſſe from further diſquieting the realme of England, by ſuch cruell inuaſions, as were ſurmiſed that he wrongfullie exerciſed againſt the ſame realme. But anſwer was made herevnto by the king, and other the nobles of the realme of Scotland, that all the world might well vnderſtand that the whole occaſion of all the trouble which had chanced betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, did onelie proceed of the couetous deſire in the Engliſhmen, ſeeking to conquer that realme without anie iuſt claime or title: and therefore they thought it reaſon firſt to ſuppreſſe the loftie ſtomachs of the Engliſhmen; and then if there were anie thing worthie to be reformed on their behalfes, they would be contented to ſtand vnto the order of the popes authoritie therein. Thus was the legat diſpatched home, without other effect of his errand [ſauing (as ſaith Buchanan) he curſſed and interdicted the Scots and Scotland.]

Shortlie after, king Robert entered with an armie into England, and waſted the countrie before him, till he came to the recroſſe, which ſtandeth vpon Stanemore. Howbeit it ſhould ſeeme by that which Richard Southwell writeth hereof, that king Robert was not preſent himſelfe in perſon in this iournie, but that he appointed the earle of Murrey to be his lieutenant, who with an armie, after the feaſt of the Epiphanie entered into England, and comming to Darington, ſtaied there for a ſeaſon, whileſt the lord James Dowglaſſe, and the lord Steward of Scotland went abroad to harrie and ſpoile the countrie on ech ſide, the one of them paſſing forth towards Hartlpole and Cliueland, and the other towards Richmond. The inhabitants of Richmondſhire, hauing no capteine amongeſt them to defend their countrie from that grieuous inuaſion of the enimie, gaue a great ſumme of monie in like manner, as at other times they had done, to haue their countrie ſpared from fier and ſpoile.

The Scots taried at this time about 15 daies within England, and in the end returned without battell. For when the knights of the north countries repaired vnto the duke of Lancaſter then lieng at Pomfret, and offered to go into the field with him againſt the Scots, he would not once ſtirre his foot, by reaſon of the diſcord that was depending betwixt him and king Edward: but howſoeuer the matter went, king Edward ſore grieued in his mind with ſuch inuaſion made by his enimies the Scots, he gaue order to leauie an armie of an hundred thouſand men, what on horſſebacke and on foot (as the report went) appointing them to be readie to enter into Scotland at Lammas next: whereof king Robert being aduertiſed, ment to preuent him, and thervpon in the octaues of the Natiuitie of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt,

The abbeie of Holme burnt.

From thence he marched forward, deſtroieng and ſpoiling the countrie of Copland, and ſo keeping vpon his iournie, paſſed Dooden ſands, towards the abbeie of Fourneis: but the abbat meeting him on the waie, redeemed his lands from ſpoile, and brought king Robert to his houſe, and made to him great cheere: but yet the Scots could not hold their hands from burning and ſpoiling diuerſe places; and marching forward vnto Cartmele beyond Leuin ſands, burnt and ſpoiled all the countrie about, except a priorie of blacke canons which ſtood there. Paſſing from thence they came to Lancaſter, which towne they alſo burnt, ſaue onelie the priorie of blacke monks, and a houſe of preaching friers. Heere came to them the earle of Murrey, and the lord James Dowglaſſe with an other armie, whereupon marching further ſouthwards, they came to Preſton in Anderneis, and burnt that towne alſo, the houſe of friers minors onelie excepted.

And thus being foure ſcore miles within England from their owne borders, they returned homewards with all their priſoners, cattell, and other bowties which they had got in that iournie, comming to Carleill on the eeue of ſaint Margaret, and lodging about that towne the ſpace of fiue daies, they waſted and deſtroied the corne, & all other things that came within their reach. Which done, on ſaint James euen they entred into Scotland againe, hauing beene within England at this time three weekes and three daies. Immediatlie hereupon, to wit, about the feaſt of Lammas, king Edward with his armie came to Newcaſtell, and deſirous to be reuenged of ſuch iniuries done to his ſubiects, entered into Scotland, and paſſing forth till he came to Edenburgh, through want of vittels and other neceſſarie prouiſion, he was conſtreined to returne home within the ſpace of 15 daies. For king Robert aduertiſed of his comming, had cauſed all the corne and cattell in the countrie to be conueied out of the waie into certeine forts, wherevnto the Engliſhmen might not come to get it into their hands, & ſo to relieue themſelues therewith. But in their returning homeward, ſomewhat to reuenge their diſpleaſures, they ſpoiled and burnt the abbeies of Melroſe, and Driburgh, with diuerſe other religious houſes and places, not ſparing anie kind of crueltie againſt all thoſe of the inhabitants that fell into their hands.

In reuenge hereof, king Robert ſhortlie after entred with a puiſſant armie into England, ſpoiling & waſting the countrie, till he came almoſt to Yorke. At length, hearing that king Edward was comming towards him with an armie, he choſe a plot of ground betwixt the abbeie of Biland and ſaint Sauiour, there to abide battell; which king Edward refuſed not to giue, though in the end he was put to flight with his whole power, and chaſed with great ſlaughter both of Engliſhmen and Normans, which were there in his aid. Diuerſe alſo of the nobilitie were taken priſoners, as John de Britaine earle of Richmond, and Henrie Sowlie, with others. This battell was fought in the yeere of our Sauiour 1323, 15 daies after the feaſt of ſaint Michaell the archangell. King Edward lieng the ſame time at the abbeie of Riuale, aduertiſed of this ouerthrow, fled and got him into Yorke, leauing his plate and much other ſtuffe behind him for want of cariage in that his ſudden departure, which the Scots comming thither found, and tooke awaie with them. And from thence they paſſed forth into Yorkeſwold, ſpoiling and waſting the countriemen vnto Weuerleie, which towne for a ſumme of monie they were contented to ſpare, and ſo then they returned homewards, entering againe into Scotland on All ſoules day, which is the ſecond of November, after they had remained within England at that time the ſpace of a moneth and foure daies.

Shortlie after, king Robert ſent an ambaſſador to the French king [to pacifie him offended with them for the Engliſh] and to renew the ancient bond of amitie betwixt the two realmes of Scotland and France, which was accompliſhed with this new condition added to the former articles, that if it chanced that ſucceſſion failed touching the inheritance of the crowne of either realme, ſo that a doubt ſhould riſe, who ought by right to inioy the ſame, the claime and title thereof ſhould be tried and decided by the nobles of both the realmes; and further, that they ſhould not onelie remoue and exclude all ſuch as went about wrongfullie to vſurpe the crowne, but alſo to defend and mainteine the true inheritor to the vttermoſt of their powers. In confirmation of this couenant, both the kings receiued the ſacrament. And for further ratifieng of it, they made a prouiſo, that whereas (then) they had the popes conſent hereto, neither he, nor anie of his ſucceſſors hereafter ſhould diſpenſe with them for the breaking of that bond; and if they did, euerie ſuch diſpenſation ſhould be reputed vaid and of none effect.

A prouiſo.

In this yeere 1323 (as Richard Southwell reporteth) about the Aſcenſion day, came commiſſioners from the two kings of England and Scotland, vnto Newcaſtell, there to treate of ſome agreement of peace. For the king of England came Amerie de Valence earle of Penbroke, the lord Hugh Spenſer the yonger, and foure other perſons ſufficientlie authoriſed. And for the king of Scots came the biſhop of ſaint Andrewes, Thomas Randall earle of Murrey, and foure other perſons likewiſe of good calling. After much talke, in the end they agreed vpon a truce to indure for 13 yeeres, which was proclamed in both realmes about the feaſt of ſaint Barnabie next inſuing. About this time alſo, or not long before, an Engliſhman deſcended of noble linage, called Hamton, chanced for ſpeaking certeine words in commendation of king Robert, to fall at variance with one of king Edwards priuie chamber, named John Spenſer; inſomuch that fighting togither about the ſame words, Hamtons hap was to ſlea this Spenſer, & thereupon knowing there was no waie but death, if he ſhould hap to be caught, he fled with all ſpeed into Scotland, where he was receiued of the king in moſt friendlie wiſe, and had giuen to him for the maintenance of his eſtate like a gentleman, the lands of Cadzow [which (as ſaith Buchanan) he called by the name of Hamilton.]

His son Edward the third crowned. 1326.

His sonne Edward the third was placed in his rome, and crowned the 26 day of Januarie, in the yéere 1326. In the night of the same day in which he receiued the crowne, the Scots ment to haue stolne the castell of Norham by scaling, and they went so cunninglie about their purpose, that they were to the number of 16 of them got aloft on the wals: but the capteine of this castle Robert Maners being warned aforehand of their comming by one of his souldiers that was a Scotishman borne, suddenlie assailed them, slue nine or ten of them, and take fiue prisoners aliue, but sore wounded, so as this misfortune falling to them in the beginning of king Edward the third his reigne, might haue beene a forwarning of their losses to follow in the dates of his gouernement.

Ri. Southwell. The castell of Norham.

Whilest these things were a doing in England, king Robert though he might séeme to haue title inough to the crowne of Scotland, which he had possessed now not onlie by rightfull conquest, but also by lawfull interest of inheritance for a certeine number of yéeres, by consent of all the estates of the realme; yet to the end to put awaie all doubts, and to conclude the succession of the Balioll from all claime, which hereafter they might pretend to the crowne of Scotland, he sent sir James Dowglasse into France vnto the lord John Balioll, to require him to transpose and resigne all the challenge of right and interest which he might séeme to haue to the crowne of Scotland, as well for himselfe as his heires & successors for euer, to king Robert le Bruse, and his heires. In consideration of which resignation, he offered faire lands and rents to him to be appointed forth in Scotland.

James Dowglasse sent into France to the Balioll.

The Balioll being now sore worne with age, and thereto blind of bodilie sight, lightlie consented vnto this motion, considering (as he said) he tooke it to be the ordinance of almightie God, that king Robert should inioy the gouernement of the Scotish kingdome, as most worthie and able thereto, hauing deliuered the same, and defended it most valiantlie from the hands of most cruell enimies. He called therefore his friends and kinsmen togither, in the presence of whome he wholie resigned vnto king Robert and his heires, all the right and title which he or anie other for him either had, or hereafter might haue to the crowne of Scotland, concerning anie interest or claime which might be auouched for anie cause or consideration, from the beginning of the world vnto that present day. After the returne of sir James Dowglasse forth of France, with so good expedition and dispatch of that businesse wherabout he was sent, king Robert verie joifull thereof, assembled a parlement of the nobles and other estates of the realme at Cambuskenneth, where he procured a new act to be established touching the succession of the crowne, which was, that if his sonne Dauid deceassed without heires of his bodie lawfullie begotten, that then Robert Steward begotten on Margerie Bruse his daughter, should succéed in possession of the crowne. All the lords at the same time were sworne to maintaine this ordinance.

In the meane while king Edward the third sent vnto king Robert for peace, but forsomuch as it was perceiued to be but a coloured pretense, no conclusion thereof insued, but preparation made on either part for wars. King Robert shortlie after fell sicke, by reason whereof, being not able to ride abroad, nor to trauell himselfe, he committed the administration of all things touching the common-wealth, and other the affaires of the realme vnto Thomas Randall, earle of Murrey, and to the lord James Dowglasse, two capteins, for their high prowesse and noble valiancie in those dales greatlie renowned. These two hardie chieftens assembling an armie of twentie thousand men, or (as some writers haue) 25 thousand, entered with the same into Northumberland, wasting & spoiling the countrie on each side. [And incountring with an assemblie of the English at Darlington, there slue manie of them, and put the rest to flight.] Against whome came king Edward with an armie of an hundred thousand men: of the which number there were (as Froissard saith) eight thousand horsemen, and 24 thousand archers. At their comming into Northumberland, they might well perceiue by the smoke of the fires, which the Scots made in burning of villages, houses, and townes, where the enimies were: but yet because they tarried not long in a place, but passed on without soiorning here or there, the Englishmen might not come neere to fight with them.

King Edward the third commeth with an armie against them.

King Edward therefore was counselled to draw towards Scotland, that lieng betwixt them and home, he might haue them at some aduantage as they should returne, which was thought should be shortlie, as well for lacke of vittels, as also to defend their owne borders, when they heard once that the English armie drew that waies forth. But comming to the riuer of Tine, through abundance of raine (latelie fallen) the streame was so risen, that neither horsse nor man might passe, so that the armie was constreined to incampe there for the space of three daies, in great scarsitie of vittels, till they were faine to send vnto Newcastell (which was distant from thence 16 miles) and to Carleill (which was about 22. miles thence) for prouision, which was sent them from those places in great plentie.

In the meane time were thus certeine light horsemen sent abroad into the countrie, to vnderstand where the Scots were, and to view their doings. [Vpon proclamation before made by the king (that who so could bring him word where the Scots were harbored, should haue a hundred pounds of yéerlie reuenues in recompense for the same; Thomas Rokesbie after diligent search, brought word to the king thereof:] for those which were sent, finding where the Scots were incamped, vpon the top of a mounteine, not past fiue miles from the English campe, returned backe to king Edward, and declared what they had séene and learned of the enimies doings. Fr. Thin.

King Edward right joifull of the news, causeth his armie to be diuided into three battels, and forthwith marcheth on towards the place where his enimies late. And comming about none dales within sight of the Scots, he perceiued at length that the place which they kept was so strong, what with the heigth of the ground, & thereto defended on the one side with the course of a riuer, that by no means they might be assailed without great and manifest danger. The Englishmen in the end thought it best to chose forth a place to incampe in for that night, and so doing, sent an herald at armes vnto the Scots, requiring them to come downe vnto some euen ground where battell might be giuen; but the Scots refused so to do, alledging that sith the Englishmen were three to one in number, it was no reason to will them to forsake their ground of aduantage which they had taken and chosen forth for their owne defense.

and fell in ſkirmiſh, ſo that ſometimes a man might haue ſæne good emptieng of ſaddles betwixt them. On the fourth day in the morning, when the Engliſhmen beheld the hill where the Scots had lien the night before, they perceiued how they were gone, and thereupon ſending forth light horſſemen to trie out which way they had taken, word was brought how they were but remoued to an other hill a little off, lieng faſt by the ſame riuer, and there lay incamped more ſtronglie than before. Incontinentlie herevpon, king Edward raiſeth his campe, and remoueth to an other hill lieng ouer againſt that hill where the Scots with their power were now lodged. At length, after that both the armies had lien thus a good ſpace the one ouer againſt the other, James Dowglaſſe tooke aduiſe with himſelfe to exploit a right hardie enterpriſe.

The Scots diſlodge.

The Engliſh armie raiſed.

He choſe forth two hundred of perfect good horſſemen, mounted vpon verie ſwift and readie geldings, with the which in the night ſeaſon he paſſed ſtilie by the Engliſh watch, that he was not once deſcried by anie of them, till he was entered into their campe, where by the noiſe of the mouing of the horſſe fæt, ſome chanced to awake that lay aſleepe. But yet per the alarme were raiſed to anie purpoſe, the Scots thus led by Dowglas had perſed through, euen vnto the kings tent, and cut two cords of the ſame in ſunder, ſo that the king was in no ſmall danger to haue bæne ſlaine, had not the Scots withdrawen the ſoner for doubt of being incloſed with their enimies as now raiſed on each ſide to come to his ſuccors, but Dowglaſſe yet returned in ſafetie with his number backe againe to the Scotiſh campe, hauing ſlaine (as ſome bookes report) three hundred Engliſhmen at this brunt. The Engliſhmen warned hereby, tooke better heed after to their watch.

An enterpriſe exploited by ſir James Dowglaſſe.

These armies lay thus one againſt an other for the ſpace of eighténe daies, till at length the Scots priuilie in the night conueied themſelues away, and returned home in moſt ſpéedie wiſe, ſuppoſing they had done ſufficientlie inough for that time. It chanced that in the euening, before the Scots went thus their waies, there was a Scot taken by the Engliſh watch, who being brought before the king, confeſſed that there was commandement giuen through the Scotiſh campe, that euerie man ſhould be readie with his armor and weapon to follow the ſtandard of Dowglaſſe at a certeine houre the ſame night, but whither they intended to go, it was vnknowne, ſaue onelie amongeſt the capteins. Herevpon the Engliſh doubting leaſt the Scots minded to giue them a camiſado that night, placed themſelues in order of battell, and ſo ſtood till the nert morning readie to haue receiued them, if they had come. The Scots alſo made great fires within their campe, that they might ſée about them. In the breake of the day, there were two Scotiſh trumpeters taken by the Engliſh ſcouts, the which being brought before the king, declared that the Scotiſh armie was broken vp and returned, and further ſhewed how they were appointed thus to declare vnto him, hauing ſuffered themſelues to be taken for the ſame intent. As ſoone as the Engliſhmen were aduertiſed that the Scots were thus departed, they haſted to the place where they had lien incamped, in hope to haue found ſome riches, which for haſt they had left behind them: but at their comming thither, they found nothing, but 20000 paires of hieland ſhoes, which are made of the gréene hides of beaſts vntanned. Alſo they found thrée hundred hides of ſauage beaſts ſet vpon ſtakes in ſtead of caldrons, therein to ſeeth their meat. Moreouer, they had left behind them fiue hundred dead carcaſſes of beaſts: ſhéepe, which for that they could not driue them away, they killed, to the end the Engliſhmen ſhould haue no gaine by them. There were likewiſe found fiue Engliſhmen with their legs broken, & bound naked vnto trées, which were quicklie loſed and committed to the cure of ſurgians. The enimies being thus departed, king Edward by aduiſe of his councell brake vp his campe, and returned to London, ſuppoſing it but loſt labour to trauell his people anie further at that time.

The Scots ſecretlie returne home to their countrie.

King Edward breaketh vp his campe.

In this yeare died Walter Steward, father to Robert Steward, that was after king of Scotland. And in this yeare following, or rather the ſame yeare, Q. Elizabeth mother to Dauid Bruſe the prince deceaſſed, and was buried in Dunfirmling in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour 1328. In the ſame yeare, king Robert wan the caſtell of Norham, and ſhortlie after beſieged the caſtell of Alnwike, where were ſlaine William de Mowhtalte knight, John Clapauen, and Maliſius de Dunbar, with diuerſe other of the Scotiſh nobilitie. In the end of the ſame yeare, there were ambaſſadors ſent from king Edward into Scotland for the concluſion of a peace, which was accorded in this wiſe: that K. Edward ſhould renounce all his right & claime which he had or might haue to the crowne of Scotland, in declaring it frée as it was in time of king Alexander the third, vnder theſe conditions, that Northumberland ſhould be admitted for the marches of Scotland on the eaſt part, and Cumberland on the weſt. For the which renuntiation thus to be made, and for the damages done to England by the Scots, it was couenanted that king Robert ſhould pay to king Edward thirtie thouſand marks ſterling. And for the more ſuertie and ratification of this finall agrément and peace betwixt the two nations, it was concluded that Jane the ſiſter of king Edward ſhould be coupled in mariage with Dauid Bruſe the prince of Scotland.

Imbaſſadors ſent from K. Edward for a peace.

A peace concluded with England in the yeare 1328, after the account of them that begin the yeare at Chriſtmaſſe.

Jane, or rather Jone, the ſiſter of king Edward, maried to Dauid Bruſe prince of Scotland.

All which articles were put in writing, wherevnto all the ſeals of the great lords within both the realms were ſet in moſt ſubſtantiall wiſe. The ſolemnization of the mariage before remembred was kept at Berwike within a while after, on the eightéenth day of Julie, in the preſence of a great number of the nobilitie, both of England and Scotland. King Robert liued not paſt twelue moneths after this mariage, departing out of this life at Cardros the ſeuenth day of Julie, in the yeare of our Lord 1329. In the latter end of his daies, he was grieuouſlie vered with a leproſie, which thus finallie made an end of him, in the twentie fourth yeare of his reigne, being one of the moſt valiant princes knowen in anie part of the whole world in thoſe his daies, hauing felt in his time the force of either fortune: for in the beginning of his reigne, ſuch ſtorms of aduerſitie ſurrounded him on each ſide, that if his conſtant manhood had not bæne the greater, it might haue brought him in deſpaire of all recouerie: for beſide ſundrie diſcomfitures, which he receiued at the hands of the enimies, with loſſe of all his brethren (his brother Edward onlie excepted) the moſt part of all the lords of Scotland were againſt him, and aided his aduerſaries to the vttermoſt of his power: yet he nothing diſcouraged herewith, ceaſſed not to imploy all induſtrious means to deliuer his countrie from the yoke of ſeruile bondage (which he beléeued would ſucceed by the gouernment of the Engliſh kings) till at length (as it were in deſpite of all former chances) he atteined the effect of his whole indeuors, ſo much the more to his praiſe, as he had found the hinderance and difficultie great in bringing the ſame fullie to paſſe.

His fame therefore did ſpread hugelie, not onelie amongſt amongst his owne people, but also amongst strangers, insomuch that his due praise was not wanting, no not euen amongst and in the midst of his verie enimies. For (as it is said) on a time it chanced that king Edward the third, sitting at a banket amongst his nobles, fell in talke with them of warlike enterprises, and of such notable capteins as had excelled in knowledge in that behalfe. At length, after much reasoning to and fro, he proponed this question to the king of heralds, that as then stood by, commanding him to declare which were the three most worthie & valiant capteins that he had knowne in all his daies. The herald aduising with himselfe of this matter, staied a space, in which meane while all the companie were quiet, longing to heare his answere therein, both for that they knew his skill was such as was able best to giue sentence in such a matter; and againe, for that manie of them thought hée would haue numbred some of those that were there present amongst those three. But the herald did not onelie know all the noble men within the realme of England, but also all such strangers as had in anie wise excelled in Martiall prowesse, hauing all their acts and valiant doings in fresh memorie, and thereupon boldlie vttered his mind as followeth.

His praise amongst the enimies.

A question proponed to an English herald by king Edward the third.

The first, most worthie and valiant chiefteine (said he) that hath liued in these our daies, was Henrie the emperour: for he subdued three kings and three realmes, and maintained his imperiall estate and prosperous felicitie to his liues end. The second, was sir Giles of Argentine, who in three sundrie battels against the Saracens got the victorie, & slue two of their principall capteins with his owne hands. The third (if vnder your graces correction I may praise the enimie) I must iudge to be Robert Bruse king of Scotland: whom the herald had no sooner named, but all those that were present, with scornfull laughter began to iest at the heralds presumption, for that he durst so malapertlie in the kings presence honor the enimie with so high praise. At length, at the heralds request, the king commanded them to be still. The herald then began againe thus: I beséech your highnesse (said he) if I haue ought offended, to take my words in good part: for I haue béene euer of this opinion, that the truth should in euerie case be vttered, received, and allowed in your presence; namelie, where your highnesse commandeth anie man to declare the same. This one thing therefore I shall desire you to consider, that if a man must néeds be vanquished, it is lesse dishonor to be vanquished of him that is knowne for a right valiant personage, than of him that is but a coward. Moreouer, to shew plainelie vnto your grace, how much I estéeme the valiancie of king Robert (whome I perceiue some here may not abide to haue numbred with the two former most valiant capteins) if truth might appeare, I durst be bold to preferre him with good cause before them both: for the valiant acts atchiued by Henrie the emperour may be ascribed rather to the wisedome of his councellors, than to his owne valiantnesse and prudence: but contrarilie, king Robert being confined out of his countrie, and destitute of friends and all conuenient aid, recouered the realme of Scotland, by his singular manhood, out of the hands of your noble father, and established it with such tranquillitie, that he appeared more terrible to his enimies of England, than euer they had béene afore to his subiects of Scotland. ¶ These or the like words vttered by the herald, were well allowed of the king, and stopped the mouths of them that take the matter so strangelie at the first.

The opinion of the herald concerning king Roberts valiancie.

But now to returne to the purpose. King Robert a little before the time of his death, called togither into the chamber where he laie, the chiefest péeres of his realme, and there in presence of them all, committed vnto them the gouernment of his sonne Dauid, a child as then not past seuen yéeres of age. He also aduised them of sundrie things touching the rule of the realme after his decease, which he perceiued was at hand. And first he counselled them, that in no wise they should at anie time make an absolute lord ouer the Iles, bicause the people of the same are of nature vnstedfast, and soone seduced and brought to moue rebellion against the king, into the which being once fallen, they are not easilie reduced to their due obedience againe, by reason their countries are of such strength, that they cannot be approched but by sea, as inuironed with the same. Secondarilie, he aduised them neuer to appoint anie set battell with the Englishmen, nor to ieopard the realme vpon the chance of one field: but rather to resist and kéepe them off from indamaging their countrie, by often skirmishing, & cutting them off at streicts & places of aduantage, to the intent that if the Scots be discomfited, they may haue some power yet reserued to make new resistance. Thirdlie, he forbad them in anie wise to make any long peace with England; for naturallie men wax dull and slouthfull by long rest and quietnes, so that after long peace, through lacke of vse and exercise of armes, men are not able to susteine anie great paines or trauell.

Moreouer, he alledged, how the Englishmen would continue in peace no longer than there wanted opportunitie and conuenient occasion for them to attempt the warres: and therefore he iudged it best, that the Scots should neuer conclude anie perpetuall peace with them, nor take anie truce longer than for three or foure yéeres at the most. He willed them further, to consider one thing, that when their appeared least occasion of warres with England, then they ought to be most circumspect, least peraduenture their enimies should come at vnwares, and find them vnprouided for timelie resistance. Hereunto he desired them, that after his decease, they would chose some one of the most worthie capteins within the whole realme, to beare his heart vnto Jerusalem, and there to see it buried within the temple, before the holie sepulchre of our Lord. For if he had not béene for a long space hindered by vrgent busines of warres at home, and lastlie preuented by death, he had vowed to haue passed with an armie into the holie land, in defense of the christian faith, against the Turkes and Saracens.

His desire to haue his heart borne to the holy sepulchre.

Here vpon when he was dead, the lords by one assent, appointed sir James Dowglasse to take this enterprise in hand, who willinglie obeied their order, as he that had euer during the life of king Robert, serued most faithfullie the bodie wherein the same heart was inclosed, & for this cause the Dowglasses beare the bloudie heart in their armes. ✻ The commendations of which king Robert, Buchanan setteth forth (to comprehend manie things in few words) to be: that he was euerie way a most worthie person, and that there were few to be found (from the former heroicall daies) equall vnto him in all kinds of vertue. For as he was in battell most valiant, so was he in peace most temperate & iust. And though his vndiuided good successe and perpetuall course of victories (after that fortune was once satisfied or rather wearied with his misfortunes) were verie great, yet he séemeth to Buchanan to be farre more wonderfull in his aduerse fortune: whose valure of mind was such, that it could not be broken (no not so much as weakened) by so manie euils as happened vnto him at one time: whose singular constancie appeared by the captiuitie of his wife, and the death of his valiant brethren. And besides that, his friends were at one time vered with all kind of calamities, and they which escaped death, were banished with the losse of their substance: he himselfe was not onelie spoiled of all his patrimonie, but of the kingdome also, by the mightiest king of that age Edward the first, king of England, a man most readie in counsell, and of dispatch of his affaires as well in warre as peace. Yea, so farre was this Bruse oppressed at one time with all these kinds of euils, that he was driuen into extreame pouertie. In all which misfortunes he neuer doubted of the recouerie of the kingdome, neither did or said anie thing vnbeseeming the noble mind of a king, for he offered no violent hands to himselfe, as did the late Cato and Marcus Brutus, neither with Marius did he pursue his enimies with continuall hatred. For when he had recouered his former estate, he so liued with them that most occasioned his labour and trouble, that he rather remembred himselfe to be a king ouer them, and not an enimie vnto them. To conclude, he did not so forsake himselfe towards his end (when a grieuous disease added troubles to age) but that he confirmed and established the present estate of the kingdome, and prouided for the quiet of posteritie, whereby his subiects did not so much lament his death, as that they were depriued of so iust a king and godlie father.)

Hyperbolicall commendations.

Sir James Dowglasse then chosen as most worthie to passe with king Roberts heart vnto the holie land, closed the same in a case of gold, imbalmed with sweet spices, & right pretious ointments. And herewith hauing in his companie a number of nobles, and gentlemen, amongst whom sir William Sinclare and sir Robert Logan were chiefe, he passed forth till he came to the citie of Jerusalem, where he buried the heart aforesaid, with all reuerence and solemnitie that he might deuise. This done, he resorted with such number as he had brought thither with him, vnto such other christian princes as at the same time were gathered with great puissance, from sundrie parts of christendome to war with the Turks, and there in companie with them, he did so noble seruice against the common enimies of our religion, that by his often victories he wan great honor to the christian name. At length, hauing accomplished his charge in those parties, with no lesse fame and glorie than princelie magnificence, he toke the seas to haue returned home into Scotland: but by force of contrarie winds he was driuen on the coast of Spaine, landing there vpon the borders of Granado, where at the same time he found the king of Aragon, readie to make warres against the Saracens that inhabited in those parties.

The Dowglasse, to make his manhod and prowesse the more knowne in all parts where he came, offered the king of Aragon to serue vnder him in those warres against the infidels, and so fought at sundrie times in his support against the enimies, with prosperous successe, till at length hauing too much confidence in fortunes fauour (which hath brought so manie noble men to their deaths) hee wared negligent, and toke small regard of dangers that might insue, so that in the end he was inclosed by an ambush laid for him by the enimies, and there slaine amongst them, with all such as he had about him. This was the end of that noble Dowglasse, one of the most valiant knights that liued in his daies. He had gotten the victorie 57 sundrie times in fight against the Englishmen, and 13 times against the Turkes, at it is written at length (saith Bellenden) in Scotichronicon. He might haue bene right necessarie for the defense of Scotland, if his chance had bene to haue returned home in safetie. He ended his life in maner (as is before mentioned) on the 26 day of August, in the yere of Grace 1330.

Dauid.

But now to proceed in order with the historie, yee shall note, that after the decease of king Robert, his sonne Dauid, a child scarse seuen yeres of age, was proclamed king, and afterwards crowned at Scone, the 23 day of Nouember, in the yere of our Lord 1331. During the time of his minoritie, earle Thomas Randall was ordeined gouernor of the realme, who for the space of foure yeres in the latter end of K. Roberts reigne, had the whole administration of things committed to his charge by the same king, for that by reason of sickneslie he was not able to attend the same himselfe. This earle Thomas then being elected gouernor by the generall consent of all the nobles of the realme, considered with himselfe, how necessarie it was for the people to continue in peace, till they had somewhat recouered their hinderance & losses chanced to them by the former wars. He addressed therefore certeine ambassadors immediatlie after the death of king Robert, vnto the king of England, to require a new confirmation of the peace betwixt both the realmes for a season. These ambassadours found the king of England easie inough to be intreated for the grant of their suit, so that a generall truce was taken for the space of three yeres.

A truce for three yeres.

In that meane time, earle Thomas applied his whole studie for the maintenance of iustice and equitie through the whole realme, not omitting yet to appoint order, that men should be prouided of armor and weapon for defense of the countrie, if necessitie so required. [Wherefore when he was going to Victone (a towne in Galloway) word was brought to him, that there was a strong assemblie of theeues in that countrie, besetting the high waies, and spoiling the passengers: whervpon sending forth a companie of his followers, he apprehended and hanged them all, not fauouring anie vnder pretext of deuotion or religion. For one of them latelie come from Rome (and safe as he supposed by the charter of the popes pardon) was also apprehended and executed by appointment of this Randall, saieng, that the pardon of the fault belonged to the pope, but the punishment thereof belonged to the king.]

Fr. Thin. Buchanan.

Moreouer, for the better prosse of exercising iustice amongst them that coueted to liue by truth, and to haue more readie occasion to punish others that ment the contrarie, he commanded the saddles and bridles, with all other such instruments and stuffe as pertained to husbandrie, should be left abroad both day and night without the doores: and if it chanced that anie of them were stollen or taken awaie, the shiriffe of the shire should either cause the same to be restored againe, or else to paie for it on his owne purse. Finallie, such punishment was exercised against theeues in all places, that both theft and pilfering were quite suppressed, and the realme brought to more tranquillitie than euer it was in anie kings daies before. Manie insolent and misruled persons were tamed by his seuere chastisement and iustice. Also that vertue might bee cherished within the realme, he commanded that no vagabund nor idle person should be receiued into anie towne or place, except they had some craft or science wherewith to get their liuings. By this meanes he purged the realme of Scotland of manie idle & slouthfull roges and vagabunds.

A meane to haue iustice executed.

Punishment of theeues.

A laudable ordinance against vagarant persons.

It is said, that during the time whilest such strict punishment was exercised against offendors, by the ministers of the lawes thereto by him authorised and assigned: it fortuned that a carle of the countrie, because he durst not steale other mens goods, stole his owne plow irons, that he might haue the value of them recompensed to him by the shiriffe: nenertheless, such earnest diligence was vsed in the search and

and triall who had the plow irons; that finallie the truth came to light, whereupon for his craftie falſehood the partie giltie was hanged, as he had well deſerued. The gouernor himſelfe, for that he ſaw how hard it was to reduce them that had bæne brought vp in ſlouthfull loitering, vnto honeſt exerciſe, held euer about him a gard of warlike perſons, that hee might the more eaſilie oppreſſe all ſtubborne offendors, which would not ſubmit themſelues to his commandements. Thoſe that appeared before him vpon ſummons giuen, had fauourable iuſtice, tempered with much mercie miniſtred vnto them.

Upright iuſtice.

Iuſtice tempered with mercie.

Others that refuſed to obeie, were purſued with his gard, and hanged euer as they were taken: as it happened on a time at Haddington, where threeſcore euill and naughtie diſpoſed perſons being gathered togither, robbed and ſpoiled the people on each ſide: and for that they regarded not, but rather miſuſed a purſeuant, whom he ſent vnto them, they were all taken incontinentlie by his foreſaid gard, which followed the ſaid purſeuant at the hæles, and without reſpit hanged them vp on gibbets to giue example to others. Thorough ſuch rigorous iuſtice, no rebellion was heard of within the realme of Scotland manie yeres after, ſo that ſuch tranquillitie folowed, that not onelie thæues and loitering lubbers were daunted, but the realme alſo aduanced in wealth and riches, to the great terror of all the foes and enimies thereof. King Edward aduertiſed of this great felicitie chanced to the Scots by this meanes, began to enuie the ſame, and imagined with himſelfe, that if earle Thomas, the author of the ſame felicitie were diſpatched out of the way, it ſhould not onelie impeach the proceeding of ſo great wealth to the Scots, but alſo make for the ſuertie of the realme of England: for the ſingular manhood and high proweſſe of this earle was by him and other his nobles ſore ſuſpected.

Stubborne rebels ſharpelie puniſhed.

K. Edward enuieth the felicitie of the Scots.

He thought good therefore to attempt the thing by ſleight, which might not be done by force, that afterwards the realme of Scotland might be the more infeebled, and as it were made open to receiue diſpleaſure at his hands. For king Dauid was yong, and manie of his nobles bare ſmall good will either towards him, or his houſe, for the ſlaughter of their fathers and friends in the blacke parlement. Herevpon he deuiſed, which way he might beſt deſtroie earle Thomas, the onlie confounder of all his imagined hope, as to atchiue anie luckie enterpriſe againſt the Scots. At length he deuiſed to diſpatch him by poiſon: and after he had long debated by whome he might worke that feat: finallie he found none ſo fit for his purpoſe, as a monke of the order and facultie of thoſe, that wandering from place to place, can with diſſembling viſage ſay that thing with mouth, which they neuer thought in heart: for oftentimes men of that order, put no difference betwixt ſhame and honeſtie, cloking their execrable wickednelſe vnder the feined ſhadow of their hypocriticall cowles.

K. Edwards purpoſe to deſtroie earle Thomas (as the Scots do write.) But this is a kind of practiſe amongſt men to forge ſlanderous reports to bring princes in contempt.

This monke, fullie inſtructed in that wherabout he was ſent, came into Scotland, and feining himſelfe to be a phyſician, got credit within a while amongſt the people, to be a man of moſt excellent knowledge, for he had a companion with him, that being made priuie to the matter, ſet forth his cunning and practiſe to the vttermoſt, declaring what notable and moſt deſperat cures he had taken in hand, and made the patients perfectlie whole of the ſame, where all other had quite giuen them ouer: namelie he bruted it abroad, that for healing of the ſtone and grauell, his like was not to be found in all chriſtendome, as euidentlie had appeared by cures which he had ſhewed vpon ſundrie noble men, both in England and France. This he ſpake, for that it was knowne, how the lord gouernor was ſore vexed with that diſeaſe, hoping by this meanes to haue him in cure, that he might thereby the more eaſilie worke his diueliſh enterpriſe.

A monke ſent into Scotlād to poiſon the gouernor. The fitteſt inſtrument to bring ſuch a thing to paſſe.

And euen according to his deſire it came to paſſe: for being taken for ſuch a man as he was named to be, he was ſent for to the gouernour, and comming before him, he handeled the matter ſo with words, that the gouernour was contented he ſhould take him in hand, which he did with ſuch wicked intention, that perſuading him to keepe ſuch diet as he preſcribed, and herewith to take ſuch ſirrups & other things as he would giue him, at length he moſt traitorouſlie poiſoned him in deed. The venem was of ſuch mixture, as would not ſlea him out of hand, but by little and little waſte his entrails, that the monke might haue leaſure to eſcape home into England, yer it were perceiued what he had done. He therefore after he had miniſtred his wicked poiſon, found meanes to conueie himſelfe out of the waie, and returned moſt ſpeedilie into England, informing king Edward how he had delt. The gouernor feeling himſelfe tormented dailie worſe and worſe in his ſtomach and wombe, and hearing that the monke was gone, and minded not to returne to him againe, he began to doubt the matter, and ſhortlie after learned by phyſicians that he was poiſoned, and that the venem had taken ſuch hold within his bowels, that it was not poſſible to remoue it.

The gouernor is poiſoned.

The monke fleeth.

In the meane time was king Edward come with an armie to the borders, purpoſing to inuade Scotland, for that he thought how the gouernour was either dead, or at the verie point of death, and therefore he was in hope, that comming in time of the trouble vpon his death into Scotland, he ſhould find occaſion to atchiue ſome enterpriſe, highlie to his aduantage. But the gouernour aduertiſed hereof, raiſed a power, and though he were not able either to ride or go, yet he cauſed himſelfe to be caried forth in an horſe litter. King Edward hearing that the gouernour was comming towards him with an armie, & that himſelfe in perſon quite contrarie to his expectation, he ſent an herald vnto him for meane of communication of ſome peace, as was outwardlie pretended, though nothing elſe was ment but that he ſhould eſpie how all things in the Scotiſh campe ſtood. The gouernour hearing of this heralds comming, arraied himſelfe in his beſt apparell, that it might appeare he was rather recouered of his infirmitie, than otherwiſe weake and feeble thorough his diſeaſe, and then cauſing the herald to be brought before him, where he was ſet in a chaire, to heare what his meſſage was, which conſiſting in certeine demands not greatlie agreeable to reaſon, the gouernour with bold countenance anſwered, that he truſted within ſhort time to make it knowne, what right the Engliſhmen had to moue ſuch vnreaſonable requeſts, and thus diſpatching the herald, he gaue him all ſuch gorgeous and rich apparell as he ware at the ſame time when he thus talked with him.

King Edward at the returne of the herald, not perceiuing otherwiſe by his report, but that the gouernor was in health, he returned immediatlie with his armie into England, and licencing euerie man to depart to his home, laid hands on the monke, and as one that had diſſembled with his prince (for ſo he tooke it) cauſed him to be burnt for his vntruth. Thus was the wretch righteouſlie recompenſed, as he had moſt iuſtlie deſerued. In the meane time, the gouernour returning homewards, through force of the venem ſtill increaſing, deceaſſed at Muſcleburgh, and was buried at Dunfirmling, in the yeere of our redemption 1331. M.ſ. Thomas

Thomas and John, worthie such a father, they being persons of great valure, and friends to their native countrie.]

Two gouernours chosen to rule Scotland.

After his decease, by common consent of the three estates of the realme in councell assembled, Patrike earle of March, and Dauid earle of Mar were chosen gouernors, the first (that is to say, the earle of March) had the charge of that part of the realme which lieth on the south side of the Forth, and the other (that is to say, the earle of Mar) was appointed to gouerne all that on the north side. Shortlie after rose great trouble in Scotland by meanes of Edward Balioll, the son of John Balioll before remembred, as thus:

Twinam Lorison.

It chanced there was one Twinam Lorison, a gentleman borne, but spotted with vile conditions, as adulterie, and diuerse other, for the which being put vnder censures of the church by the officiall of Glascow: he tooke at length the same officiall as he was going towards the towne of Aire, and held him in captiuitie, till he had paied two hundred pounds for his deliuerance. But this iniurie remained not long vnpunished: for sir James Dowglasse, before his passage to the holie land, would not suffer him to rest, till he had constreined him to flee into England for his more safegard.

Scotish lords banished into England.

At his comming into England, he met with Dauid Cumin earle of Atholl, and manie other Scotishmen, which were banished in times past by king Robert, for that they assisted the king of England against him. These persons being driuen out of the realme, and confederat altogither in one band, remained in England long time after, euer trusting to see some occasion offered, whereby they might one day returne againe into their owne native countrie. And now, hearing that earle Thomas Randall the gouernour was deceassed, this Twinam Lorison sent vnto Edward Balioll.

Twinam Lorison in name of them all was sent ouer into France to persuade Edward Balioll to attempt the recouerie of the crowne and realme of Scotland, as the rightfull heritage of his father, and descended vnto him as lawfull and rightfull heire. Though the Balioll had no regard to make anie claime at all to the crowne of Scotland before this time, yet through the pithie persuasions of the earnest messenger, declaring how easie a matter it were for him to atchiue, considering the aid which he should haue in England, both at the kings hands, and also by the Scotishmen which remained there in exile, by whose meanes he might assure himselfe of support inough within Scotland it selfe, after he was once entered: finallie he concluded to passe ouer into England, to proue what purchase he might make there.

Edward Balioll commeth into England

At his comming thither, he made suit to the king, to aid him in his righteous quarell towards the atteining of the crowne of Scotland, which if he might bring to passe with prosperous successe, he promised to hold the same of him and his successors as superiors lords thereof. King Edward gladlie vpon that condition, condescended to his request, notwithstanding the aliance contracted with king Dauid, by the marriage of him with his sister. Herewith he appointed forth six thousand men well apparelled and araied for the warre, to passe by sea with the Balioll, and other the confederats into Scotland, trusting that vpon their arriuall there, they should find no small number of friends to assist them. For beside the Balioll, there was the lord Henrie Beaumount a Frenchman, who had maried the earle of Buchquhanes daughter and heire: also the earles of Atholl & Angus [the lords Persie and Wake, Richard Talbot, Henrie Ferres, John Mowbraie] & other Scotish lords such as were banished Scotland, when K. Robert le Bruse recouered it out of the Englishmens hands. These were appointed to go with the Balioll to assist him in that enterprise: and likewise the lord Stafford, and diuerse other English capteins, whereupon when all their prouision was once readie, with the number appointed them by king Edward, and a few others, they got them a shipboord, and sailing forth by the coast till they entered into the Forth, at length they came on land neere the towne of Kingorne, and shortlie after, incountring with Alexander Seiton, they slue him, and put his folkes to flight.

The earles of Mar and March gather their people.

Balioll verie ioifull of this happie successe, came with his people to Perth, otherwise called S. Johns towne, whereof the earles of Mar and March being aduertised, they raised two mightie armies, and hasted toward the enimies, not as though they should haue to do with men of warre, but to chastise a number of theeues and robbers that were come out of England. Yet at length they concluded to ioine both togither in Stratherne, that they might iointlie set vpon their enimies both at once. The Balioll seeing the matter brought so farforth, that no feare of death nor starting-hole by flight might auaile him, boldlie came forward, and pitched downe his tents at Duplin neere to the water of Erne, trusting that if his armie would stand to it, and fight with manlike constancie, he should weild his enimies well inough, notwithstanding their huge number. The same night came the earle of Mar with his power, and incamped with the same within sight of the English armie, but the earle of March lodged about fiue miles from thence, at Othirardour.

The negligence of the Scots.

The Scots that were with the earle of Mar, hauing knowledge of the small number of their enimies, made no accounts of them, so that they neither tooke heed to their watch, nor to anie other order for defense of themselues, but fell to singing, dansing, reuelling, and drinking, in most dissolute manner. The Balioll taking occasion hereof, determined to assaile them the same night in their campe; and thereupon causing his people to make them readie to accomplish that enterprise, in the dead of the night he issued forth of his campe, and comming vnto the water of Erne, passeth the same by the ford, where one Andrew Murrey of Tullibard had pight a stake of set purpose, in midst of the streame, to shew them the waie. Thus hauing got all his armie ouer the water, without anie noise or din, so secretlie as might be deuised, he entered the campe of his enimies, and brake through till he came to the tent of the earle of Mar, the Scots generall, before he was once descried. Heere at the first was the earle himselfe slaine, lieng fast asleepe in his bed, & after with huge noise they set vpon the whole campe, murdering the Scots as then buried in sleepe without all defense. And thereupon followed so cruell slaughter, that nothing was heard but grunting and groning of people, as they lay on heapes readie to die, weltering togither in their owne bloud. And if it had not beene that Edward Balioll had caused ech of his men to wrap a white cloth about his arme, no man might haue knowne (by reason of the darknesse of the night) his friend from his fo.

The Englishmen were so earnestlie bent to the slaughter of Scots, that they might not be filled with the bloud and murder of them, so that they saued none whome they might ouertake. There were slaine of nobles and gentlemen, to the number of three hundred, beside innumerable of the commons. A certeine number of the Scots that escaped out of the place, closed themselues togither, and in purpose to be reuenged on the Englishmen for the death of their fellowes, returned vpon them againe, and were slaine themselues euerie mothers sonne. The chiefest nobles that were slaine at this battell, were these,

The earle of Fife & a few other were taken. This battell was fought on the thirteenth day of Auguſt, in the yeare 1332. After that Edward Baliol had atchiued this victorie thus at Duplin, he went ſtraightwaies vnto Perth (otherwiſe called ſaint Johns towne) and giuing aſſalt thereto, quickelie entered it by force, without anie great reſiſtance. The earle of March that lodged (as is ſaid) the ſame night that the battell was fought, not paſt fiue miles off, hearing what had chanced both in the battell and towne, came with his people arraied in good and perfect order vnto Perth aforeſaid, to beſiege the Engliſhmen with Edward Baliol and other as then within it. But hauing lien there a certeine ſpace, and filled the ditches in the meane time to ſuch aduantage, that it was thought if he had giuen the aſſalt, he muſt needs haue entered, he ſuddenlie raiſed from thence, and departed, to the vnſpeakeable damage (as was thought) of the whole Scotiſh nation. The ſiege being thus raiſed, there came dailie great numbers of nobles and commons to the Baliol, offering him their aid and ſeruice as his loiall ſubiects, towards the atteining of his right to the crowne.

HEreupon, perceiuing his power ſufficientlie increaſed, and receiuing the othes of the earle of Fife, and William de Seintclere biſhop of Dunkeld, he went accompanied with them and a great number of other, vnto Scone, where he was crowned the 24 day of September, in the yeare laſt before remembred, and receiued there the ſame time the homages and fealties of a great companie of nobles & gentlemen, at that ſolemne feaſt there aſſembled. King Dauid being not paſt nine yeares of age, to auoid all dangers in that troubleſome time, as deſtitute of ſuccors, by aduiſe of his councell, was conueied ouer into France with quéene Jane his wife, ſiſter to Edward king of England, and was moſt friendlie receiued by Philip king of France the ſixt of that name, ſo that they remained there with him for the ſpace of nine yeares. And in the meane time diuers noble men that yet remained at the deuotion of king Dauid, vnderſtanding that K. Edward le Baliol ſoiourned within the towne of Perth, otherwiſe called ſaint Johns towne, which ſtandeth almoſt in the middle part of the realme, and was at that preſent not cloſed with anie wall, or rampire, they raiſed their powers, and beſieged him within the ſame towne, he hauing as then no great companie about him.

Whereof when they of Galloway had aduertiſement, becauſe the king was their ſpeciall lord and chiefe gouernor, they aſſembled togither vnder the conduct of the lord Euſtace de Makeſwell, and inuaded the lands of thoſe Scotiſhmen that had thus beſieged their lord king Edward Baliol, and by that means conſtreined the aduerſaries to leuie their ſiege. Wherevpon earle Patrike and the new earle of Murrey, with the lord Andrew de Murrey, and the lord Archembald Dowglaſſe, with an armie aſſembled in all ſpéd, entered into Galloway, doing all the miſchiefe they could deuiſe, with fire & ſword, taking & bringing away from thence a great number of cattell and other goods; but they ſlue no great number of people, for they found them not at home, being withdrawen out of the way for feare of this terrible inuaſion. Thus did the Scots in that part of the realme ſpoile & harrie each others countries.

Galloway inuaded.

In the meane time, king Edward le Baliol fortified the towne of Perth, appointing the earle of Fife to the kéeping thereof, whileſt he with an armie paſſed into the countrie; but before he returned, his aduerſaries (that is to ſay) the ſonnes of them that had bæne ſlaine at the battell of Duplin, Robert Keith, Alexander Lindſeie, James and Simon Fraſer wan S. Johns towne in the third moneth, after they had laid ſiege thereto, as Hector Boetius ſaith. But whither that is to be intended after the firſt beſieging thereof, or now after their laſt comming thither, I can not affirme; but as the ſame Boetius writeth, now when the towne was woone, the earle of Fife, and Andrew Murrey of Tullibard, were taken, with other of their complices. The earle with his wife and children were ſent to the caſtell of Kildrummie, there to remaine vnder ſafe kéeping; but Andrew Murrey for his treaſon afore committed, was beheadded. The towne being thus woone, was deliuered to the kéeping of John Lindſeie. But Buchan. out of an other author ſuppoſeth that it was not committed to the cuſtodie of anie; but that the walls were pulled downe to the ground. The gaining of this towne put the Scots in hope of more proſperitie to ſuccéd.

And therevpon John Randoll the earle of Murrey, ſonne to earle Thomas late of famous memorie, and Archembald Dowglaſſe lord of Galloway, the brother of James Dowglaſſe latelie ſlaine (as before is mentioned) in Spaine with Simon Fraſer and others, gathered a great armie, and came with the ſame [and William Dowglaſſe lord of Liddeſdale to Maufet] againſt the Baliol, who being aduertiſed thereof, met them in Annandale, where incountring togither, after cruell fight & great ſlaughter on both parts, at length Baliols part was put to the worſt, ſo that he himſelfe was glad to flee, hauing got an horſſe without a bridle, and reſted not till he came to Roxburgh, or rather to Carleill, as Richard Southwell ſaith. In this battell were ſlaine ſir Henrie Baliol, a man of great valiancie, ſir John Mowbraie, Walter Cumin, and Richard Kirkbie; but Alexander Bruſe earle of Carrike, and the lord of Galloway were taken priſoners, and ſaued by the helpe of the earle of Murrey, for that they had ſubmitted themſelues to the Baliol but latelie before. Shortlie after the atchiuing of this victorie, Andrew Murrey a man of great puiſſance and poſſeſſions was choſen to be gouernor, as colleage and aſſociat with the earle of March. Theſe two gouernors, hearing that the king of England was minded to inuade Scotland with a maine armie, ſent ſir Alexander Seiton with manie other gentlemen vnto Berwike for defenſe of that towne and caſtell; [Alexander (as ſaith Buchan.) being capteine of the towne, and Patrike Dunbar capteine of the caſtle and borders adioining.] Shortlie after, the new gouernor Andrew Murrey was taken priſoner at Roxburgh, by reaſon that hauing put his enimies to flight in a ſkirmiſh which he made with them at the bridge without the caſtell, he purſued ouer raſhlie in the chaſe, and was incloſed amongſt them, and ſo taken yet he might be reſcued. was also taken beside the gouernor, a notable pirat named Crab, who before that time had done manie displeasures to the Englishmen both by sea and land: and now because his countriemen would not ransome him, but to his further griefe had slaine his sonne within Berwike, he became the king of Englands man, and did the Scots more damage afterwards, than euer he had done to the Englishmen before. The gouernor at length was ransomed for a great summe of gold.

William Dowglasse of Liddesdale taken prisoner.

About the same time William Dowglasse of Liddesdale named for his singular manhod, the flower of chiualrie, fought with the Englishmen in Annandale, where himselfe was taken, and his people discomfited. Both these noble men thus taken prisoners, were deteined in captiuitie more than a twelue moneths space, & then ransomed for a great summe of gold. This William Dowglasse was sonne to sir James Dowglasse, of whom so often mention is made heretofore. The realme of Scotland being thus diuided in two parts, the one assisting the Baliol, and the other continuing in their allegiance sworne and promised to king Dauid: Edward king of England iudged the time to serue well for his purpose to make conquest on the Scots, and herevpon gathering a mightie armie both of Englishmen and strangers, as well such as were subiects to him as other, whome he reteined out of Normandie, Anieu, and Flanders, he came with the same to subdue (as he outwardlie pretended) onelie such Scots as would not yéeld themselues to the Baliol. The Scots perceiuing themselues thus ouerset with enimies on each side, sent John Randoll earle of Murrey into France vnto king Dauid, that by his means they might purchase some aid of the French king to defend the realme from the force of the enimies. In the meane time the king of England besieged Berwike both by sea and land, notwithstanding such as were within it defended the towne so manfullie that he got but small gaines by assaults; by reason whereof the siege continued for the space of foure moneths: during which time manie issues and skirmishes were made betwixt the Scots and Englishmen, whereat manie proper feats of armes were atchiued with variable fortune.

William Seiton bastard sonne to the capteine of the towne was taken prisoner, and his bastard brother, as he assailed the English ships one night ouerfiercelie, was drowned by mischance in the sea. At length, when they within the towne began to want vittels, the capteine sir Alexander Seiton sent vnto king Edward, promising that if he would grant a truce for the space of 6 daies, if no succour came in the meane time to resist his siege, the towne should be deliuered into his hands at the end of that terme; and for the assurance thereof, he was contented that his eldest sonne and heire Thomas Seiton should remaine with the said king in hostage. Whilest things passed thus at Berwike, the nobles of Scotland by common consent chose Archembald Dowglasse to be gouernor in place of Andrew Murrey. This Archembald Dowglasse raising a mightie armie of Scotishmen entered with the same into the borders of England, so to withdraw king Edward from the siege of Berwike to defend his owne lands from burning and spoiling. But king Edward aduertised hereof, deuised an other shift; for immediatlie sending a messenger to sir Alexander Seiton capteine of the towne, he certified him plainelie, that vnlesse he rendered the towne forthwith into his hands, both his sonnes which he had with him, the one as hostage, and the other as prisoner, should be without further delay hanged on a gibbet there in sight afore his owne face.

Sir Alexander Seiton capteine of Berwike.

Archembald Dowglasse chosen gouernor in place of Andrew Murrey.

Sir Alexander Seiton hereto answered, that as yet the terme of the truce was not expired, & therefore desired the king either to obserue the couenants, or else to deliuer the pledges, that he might be at his aduantage: but king Edward (as saith the Scotish chronicle) immediatlie caused a paire of gallows to be raised before the towne, and both the sonnes of sir Alexander to be led thither, to suffer on the same without further respit. Sir Alexander Seiton beholding that pitifull sight, and weieng with himselfe, that he might saue the liues of those innocent creatures, if he would, was brought into great perplexitie of mind: the naturall affection and compassion which he bare towards his sonnes moving him to haue rendered the towne on the one side, and the dutie with faith promised to his king and countrie restraining him from all such resolution on the other. But in the end, the tender regard he had to saue the liues of his sonnes, had ouercome him, and caused him to haue rendered the towne into his enimies hand, had not his wife and mother to his said sonnes, exhorted him most earnestlie to the contrarie, alleging that such reproch and dishonor should redound vnto them, and their posteritie, if through their fault the towne were traitorouslie deliuered into the enimies hand, that from thencefoorth they should be infamed for euer: and as for the death of their sonnes, it was not to be counted a losse, for by this kind of death, they should win immortall name, & leaue to their parents the high honor and renowme of faithfull & loiall subiects. Againe they were yoong inough to beget and bring forth new children, where they should be neuer able to recouer honor once lost; if by deliuering the towne into the enimies hands, they should séeme to betraie their countrie, & falsifie their faith to their naturall prince and souereigne.

Sir Alexander Seiton in doubt what to do.

The manlie stomach of Alexander Seitons wife.

With such & manie other the like words, this noble & worthie ladie persuaded hir husband to restraine his inward griefe, and brought him with right sorrowfull and heauie chére vnto his chamber, that through commiseration had of his sonnes, he should commit nothing either against his honor or weale of the towne. In the meane time, his two sonnes were put to death, ending their liues (saith Hector Boetius) with most honor, for the righteous quarell of their countrie: [at what time K. Edward remoued his campe to Halidon hill.] Archembald Dowglasse the gouernor, being at that present entered into Northumberland with his armie, hearing that king Edward had thus cruellie put to death those two yoong gentlemen, came the third day after with all his power, and pitched downe his tents not far from K. Edwards armie, fullie resolued to giue him battell, as well to reuenge the displeasure for the death of the said gentlemen, as to deliuer the towne of Berwike from further danger of the enimies force.

Archembald Dowglas purposeth to giue battell.

Yet were there sundrie prudent councellors in the Scotish armie, that for diuers respects aduised him in no wise to fight with the enimies at that present, considering the huge number of practised souldiers which they had amongest them, and the want of skilfull warriours on his side, hauing few with him saue yoongmen, and such as lacked experience in the wars, for that they had béene but little trained therein. Notwithstanding, he himselfe was of contrarie opinion, iudging that the good willes and desire which his people had to fight with the Englishmen, should supplie their lacke of skill: and thereupon determining to trie the chance of battell with them, commanded his armie to refresh themselues with meat, drinke, and slépe for that night, and to prouide themselues readie for battell on the nert morning. The second battell was committed to the gouernance of Alexander Lindseie, with whome were ioined Alexander Gordon, Reinold Graham, and Robert Kenneth. In the third battell was the gouernor himselfe, accompanied with James, John, and Alane Stewards, the sons of Walter great Steward of Scotland.

On the other part, the Englishmen were nothing slow to come forward to incounter the Scots, but at the first to take the vantage of the ground, they gaue somewhat backe, withdrawing to the side of an hill, which they hauing once got, boldlie turned themselues to the Scots that pursued them ouer rashlie, in hope that the victorie had beene alreadie theirs: but being here fiercelie receiued by the Englishmen, and beaten downe in heaps on each side, though they inforced themselues with all their might to be reuenged both for old and new iniuries which they had receiued, and so slue no small number of the enimies; yet in the end was the Scotish armie put to flight, and more slaughter made in the chase, than was afore in the battell: for one wing of the Englishmen making forwards to get before the Scots, so stopped their passage, that they were slaine miserablie on each side, as they had beene inclosed within a toile or deere-stall. There were but few in number that were taken prisoners, those on the next day were beheaded by commandement of king Edward, except a small number which were kept secret by some of the Englishmen for profit of their ransome. There were slaine on that day of the battell, to the number of fourteene thousand men, amongest whome were these as principall: Archembald Dowglas the gouernour, John Steward, James Steward, and Alane Steward, the sonnes of Walter Steward; the earle of Rosse, the earle of Southerland, Alexander Bruse earle of Carrike, Andrew, James, and Simon Fraseir. Immediatlie vpon this ouerthrow of the Scotish power, Alexander Seiton and Patrike Dunbar captens of Berwike, despairing of all support, yelded the towne to king Edward, with condition to haue their liues and goods saued, and to become subiects to king Edward. Herevpon, when they had receiued their oths, Patrike Dunbar was commanded by king Edward, to build vp againe the castell of Dunbar vpon his owne costs and charges, for that he had throwen it downe, when he saw he was not able to defend it against the English power comming toward him. K. Edward accomplishing his desire, returned backe into England, leauing behind him with the Balioll, manie great lords of England (amongst whome for chiefe was Richard Talbot) that vsing the aduise and counsell of them he might rule the realme of Scotland as should be thought expedient. Edward Balioll hereupon went thorough all the bounds of Scotland, placing garrisons of Englishmen in most part of all the strengths and castels of the realme, for he had them all at his commandement, fiue of them onelie excepted, which were kept by such Scotishmen, as would not renounce their allegiance promised to king Dauid. For Dunbreton was kept by Malcolme Fleming of Cumirnald, Lochleuin by Alane of Vepont, the castell of Kildrummie by Christine Bruse, and Arquhart by Robert Lauder, the pile of Loudopin, a strong thing of so small a compasse, was in the keeping of one John Thomson [who were supported with monie by Philip the French king] These captens would by no means neither yeeld themselues nor their fortresses to Edward Balioll, but defend them to the vttermost for the behoofe of their souereigne lord and maister king Dauid.

The popes ambassadors not regarded.

In the meane time, Philip king of France laboured to the pope, that he might by his authoritie cause the Englishmen to surceasse from further vexing the Scots, by their cruell inuasions made into their countrie: but when the popes ambassadors came about this matter into England, they were so little regarded, that they could not get licence to declare that message, and so were they glad to returne without doing anie thing in the matter whereabout they were sent. Shortlie after was a parlement called at Perth, where Edward Balioll was confirmed king of Scotland, a great number of the nobles promising there by solemne oths, neuer to remooue anie rebellion against him in times to come. In the meane time rose great altercation betwixt Henrie Beaumont, and Alexander Mowbray for certeine lands in Buchquhane [which Edward the first had giuen John Mowbray, brother of this Alexander.] Henrie Beaumont claimed those lands by the right of his wife, that was daughter to the said Alexander, but the Mowbray claimed them as heire to his brother.

A parlement at Perth.

Strife betwixt Mowbray & Beaumont. Fr. Thin.

After long contention, Mowbray had the lands adiudged to him by sentence of the Balioll, by reason whereof, Dauid Cumin earle of Atholl, and Richard Talbot, fauouring the cause of Henrie Beaumont, began to practise such conspiracies against the Balioll, that to auoid further danger, he was glad to repeale the former sentence by him giuen on the behalfe of Alexander Mowbray, and by new sentence adiudged the lands vnto Henrie Beaumont, for that (as was alledged) he had maried the inheritor thereof, which sentence he was constreined to change (saith Buchanan) by this means. * Balioll (fauouring Alexander) and hauing adiudged the matter on his side, so offended the minds of the aduersaries, that they feared not openly to complaine of the iniurie. But when they perceiued that they nothing profited therein by their speeches, they all departed from the court to their owne possessions. of which faction Talbot, whilest he goeth into England, was taken and carried to Dunbreton: Beaumont doth strengthen Dungard a strong castell of Buchquhan, and not onelie maketh the land whereof the contention was, but also the whole countrie adioining, to be subiect to his gouernement. Cumin (returning to the part of Dauid Bruse) goeth into Atholl (whereof he was earle) and fensing the places of strength thereabouts, armeth himselfe to withstand all force, tic anie be prepared against him. Balioll fearing the conspiracie of these great men, changeth his iudgement, and awardeth the lands (wherof the contention grew) to Beaumont, and reconciled Cumin vnto him, by the gift of many rich possessions, that then belonged to Robert Steward, which shortlie after was king of Scotland.

Thus through puissance of the parties, the truth in deciding the controuersie, might not onlie not haue place, but Balioll was also driuen to that extremitie, that he must haue one of them (with his faction) to be his enimies. For now Alexander, stroken with this iniurie (to haue the iudgement giuen before for him thus to be reuoked) forsaking the Balioll ioined himselfe with Andrew Murrey gouernor of Scotland (for Dauid Bruse) hauing a little before ransomed himselfe, with a great masse of monie out of the Englishmens hands. These things (although done at seuerall times) we haue ioined togither, least by often repeating of them in other places, the course of the historie might be broken: for (vpon this) Andrew Murrey besieged Beaumont in the castell of Dongard, the inheritance of his wife, where he surrendered the same, vpon condition that he might freelie repaire into England: at what time also Richard Talbot (being beyond the mounteins, in the inheritance of his wife the daughter of John Cumin of Scotland (for now manie English nobles possessed great reuenues in Scotland by mariages) hearing of these newes, that Balioll was forsaken by the earle of Atholl and Beaumont, would haue gone into England, but was taken in Lownes. ¶ This yeere the earle of March holding on the part of the king of England, came to him to Newcastell vpon Tine, who returning homeward, was grieuouslie wounded of the people of Northumberland, for courtousnes, to haue robbed him of such monie as K. Edward had liberallie bestowed vpon him.)

Not long after this, Edward Balioll came to Rainfrew, and there receiuing the people into his obeisance, had the keies of the castell of Rothsaie and Dunnone, brought vnto him by sir Alane Lile shiriffe of Bute [at what time the king gaue to him the keeping of the castell of Rothsaie, hauing before made him shiriffe.] Thus did the Balioll increase in puissance, by such confluence of people as dailie submitted themselues vnto him, & he inriched them liberallie with lands and goods still as they came to him, thereby to win there good wils. He sought by all meanes possible to haue gotten Robert Steward into his hands, as the person whome he knew to haue most right, next vnto king Dauid to the crowne of Scotland: but through the diligent foresight of his friends, this Robert Steward being about the age of fiftéene yéeres, was conueied [with bote and horsse, by the helpe of William Hariot and John Gilbert] to the castell of Dunbreton, where he was ioifullie receiued by Malcolme Fleming the capteine.

The castels of Rothsaie and Dunnone deliuered to the Balioll. Fr.Thin. Robert Steward. Fr.Thin.

The Balioll being sore offended, that such castels as were kept by his enimies, were so great an impediment to his interprises, by succouring and relieuing his aduersaries to make warres against him, he got togither an armie, and the next yéere laid siege to the castell of Lochleuin: but perceiuing that this castell might not be woone without long siege, he appointed sir John Striueling to continue the siege with a great power of men, vntill the castell were yéelded. There were left also with him, Michaell Hariot, Dauid Wemis, and Richard Maleuill, with diuerse other. These capteins aduising the place and site of the castell, lodged themselues within the churchyard of saint Serfe, beside Kinrosse, making bastiles and other defenses within the same, for their more safegard. Within the castell were two valiant capteins to defend it, the one named Alane Uepont and James Lambie, citizens of saint Andrews.

Alane Uepõ and James Lambie capteins of Lochleuin.

The enimies assaied all the meanes that might be deuised to haue woone this castell, but all was in vaine. At length, they deuised a subtill sleight, whereby to compasse their intent, on this wise. They went about to dam vp the mouth of the riuer where it issueth out of the Loch, with earth, trées, & stones, that the water being so kept in, might rise to such an height, that it should ouerflow the castell, and so drowne all the people within it. And to cause the Loch to swell more spéedilie, they turned the course of diuerse riuers and brookes in the countrie thereabouts, and brought them into the same Loch. It chanced at the same time, that sir John Striueling capteine of the siege, with a great part of the armie, went vnto Dunfirmling for deuotion sake, to visit the shrine of saint Margaret, sometime quéene of Scotland. Whereof Alane Uepont then capteine of the castell, hauing vnderstanding, about midnight prepared three botes, and taking certeine souldiers with him, rowed forth to the head of the dam or water, and there, with such engins as he had deuised for the purpose, assaied to boare through and make a hole in the banke or rampire that kept vp the water, which when they had brought to passe, they returned quickelie againe to the castell.

A deuise to drowne the castell.

The water hauing once gotten an issue, within a while ware the hole so large, that entering with more violence, it finallie brake downe the banke, and rushed forth with such an huge streame, that it bare downe all afore it, drowning vp the bastils and tents of them that lay at siege there, and caried the same with men and all downe into the déepe sea, they were so suddenlie taken, yer they could make anie shift to escape. Alane Uepont, when the water was fallen to the old marke, issued forth of the castell, & setting vpon those that had escaped the danger of the water, slue part of them, and put the remnant to flight. John Striueling hearing the mischiefe that had happened to his folks, returned to the siege, and made a vow neuer to depart from thence, till he had taken the castell, and slaine all them within it. But yet, after he had laine there a long time, and saw it was not possible to win that fortresse, he was constreined to raise his siege, and to go his waies, after he had lost thereat no small number of his people. This siege of Lochleuin chanced in the Lent season, in the yéere 1335.

1335.

In the yéere following, king Edward prepared an armie both by sea and land, to enter into Scotland. He sent by sea 70 ships well and sufficientlie decked for the warres, to enter by the Forth: but by a sore tempest manie of those vessels perished betwixt Inchketh and the North land. He himselfe hauing the Balioll in his companie, with fiftie thousand men, came by land vnto Glascow, and perceiuing there was little for him to do, for that no rebellion greatlie anie where appeared, he returned backe againe into England with the Balioll, and left Dauid Cumin earle of Atholl gouernor in his roome, to subdue the residue of the rebels, and to win those strengths, which as yet were defended against him. Dauid Cumin left thus to be gouernor in Scotland, toke vpon him the rule in name both of the king of England, and also of the Balioll, and seized into his hands all those lands in Murrey and Buchquhane, which perteined to Robert Steward, confiscating all the goods of such the inhabitants, as would not be sworne vnto him. [Who notwithstanding that hee was of such great authoritie in Scotland, of credit with both kings, Edward of England, & Edward of Scotland, and of exceeding great possessions of his his owne, would yet neuer vsurpe anie superioritie to him himselfe in stile, but passed all the grants and writings in the name of Edward king of England, and of Baliol king of Scots. At what time none would publikelie professe him a subiect to Dauid Bruse, but boies, who in their plaies & games would alwaies call their king, Dauid Bruse.]

Incontinentlie hereupon, Robert Steward assembled his friends by the helpe of Dungall Campbell of Lochquhow, and suddenlie tooke the castell of Dunnone, sleaing all the Englishmen and other, which were found therein. [Which Campbell (as saith Iohn Maior) came with 400 men, and by the testimonie of Buch. was a man of great power in Argile.] The commons of Bute and Arrane, glad of this prosperous beginning, assembled togither to the number of foure hundred persons, and set forward, that they might come to support Robert Steward in such his late begun enterprises: and being incountered by the waie by Alane Lile shiriffe of Bute, they laid so lustilie about them, that they slue the shiriffe, [with John Gilbert capteine of the castle of Bute] there in the field, & discomfited all his people [which they did after this manner. These people of Bute, (called the seruants of Bawdanus) seeing such stirs to be made by Alane Lile, ran to a heape of stones not farre from them, and with great force pelting the shiriffe, they in the end killed him with stones, and put the rest to flight.] Diuerse of them taken prisoners, were brought awaie, and presented vnto Robert Steward, who in recompense of this seruice, granted sundrie priuileges vnto the inhabitants of Bute and Arrane: as among other things, to be free from pateng tribute for their corne and graine. Such felicities succeeding one another, caused manie of the Scots to ioine themselues with Robert Steward, in hope to recouer the realme out of the Englishmens hands. Amongst other, Thomas Bruse earle of Carrike, and William Cunther [whome Iohn Maior calleth Carucher, & Buchanan Carruder of Annandale] with a number of the commons came vnto him.

About the same time, the earle of Murrey returned forth of France, and landed at Donbriton, where he was most ioifullie receiued by the said Robert Steward. Shortlie after the said Steward, and the said earle, hauing with them a great power of their friends and alies [as Godfrie Rosse, and others] came into Clidesdale, Ranfrew, Kile, Cunningham and Aire, which togither with Ros and Murrey, they reduced to the obeisance of king Dauid. [At which time (as saith Buchanan) did Ranfraie come to his old lords the Stewards.] The earle of Murrey also, to reuenge the iniuries done by the earle of Atholl, went vnto Aberden, and there learning where he soiorned, made thither with all speed: but the earle of Atholl vnderstanding how all the countrie tooke part with his aduersaries, fled into the mounteins, where he sustained his life with hearbs and rots for a time, and durst not come forth to shew his head. At length, when he saw no waie to escape, he came forth and in most humble wise submitted himselfe to the lords that defended the part of king Dauid. They receiuing him vpon his submission, sware him to be true vnto king Dauid, and exhorting him to be as diligent in reconciling the people vnto king Dauid, as he had béene afore to subdue them to the obedience of the Baliol, they suffered him to depart.

About the same time, sir William Dowglasse of Liddesdale, and Andrew Murrey, were ransomed home out of England, for a great summe of monie, after they had béene kept there by the space of three yéeres in captiuitie. At their comming to Edenburgh, they found the lords assembled in councell, at the which John Randolph earle of Murrey, and Robert Steward, with generall voices were elected gouernours. Manie Scotishmen at this time reuolted from the king of England, submitting themselues to king Dauid, as Alexander Ramsay, a verie skilfull warrior, Laurence Preston, John Herring, and John Haliburton knights, with diuerse other.

The earle of Murrey and Robert Steward elected gouernours.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan.

* After this, John Randolph, and Robert Steward, were sent into the north parts with a strong armie, gathered of such as were wearied by the English gouernement, whereat Dauid Cumin (being feared with the sudden assemblie) fled for his safetie, whome they egerlie pursued, and taking him (being then beset in a narrow streict, and oppressed with penurie of all things) they compelled him to yéeld (without anie more circumstances) to their faction, who then swearing fealtie to Dauid Bruse, was permitted to depart vpon his promise: whereunto they gaue such faith, that they left him deputie for them. At what time he did not faintlie dissemble the fauouring & defending of the part of Bruse. In the meane time, Randolph returned into Louthian, and ioined himselfe with his old friend William Dowglasse latelie returned out of England, & now with great slaughters of his enimies egerlie reuenged the long lothsomnesse of his imprisonment: to whome also to make their partie the stronger, came Andrew Murrey, which was taken at Bokesborowe. Wherefore these gouernours sufficientlie garded with the nobilitie, appointed a parlement at Perth, in the kalends of April. Whither when the nobles came, there could not be anie thing performed, by reason of the secret hartburning harbored in the bosoms of William Dowglasse, and Dauid Cumin earle of Atholl: the cause whereof was pretended to be, in that Dowglasse did obiect vnto Cumin, that it was by his meanes, that he was no soner deliuered out of prison from the English: amongst which nobilitie, Steward fauored Cumin, and almost all the other tooke part with Dowglasse. Which dissention amongst the nobilitie, was occasioned for suspect which they had of the Cumins comming to that place with so great a traine: for he brought thither such number of his friends and followers, that he was a terror to all the rest of the assemblie, to the increase of which suspicion, they further ioined a conceit they had of Cumins great and changeable wit, his aspiring mind, and certeine rumors spred abroad of the comming of the English, with whome no man did doubt, but that the earle of Atholl would ioine for his defense.)

Hector Boet. saith it was holden at Darlé.

Edward king of England vnderstanding the rebellion of the Scots, determined to assaile them both by sea and land: and so prouiding a nauie of an hundred and foure score ships, sent the same well vittelled and manned to saile into the Forth, the which being there arriued, burnt and spoiled the townes on both sides that riuer, but returning backe into England, they lost manie of their vessels by a tempest. King Edward himselfe, togither with Edward the Baliol entered by land, with an armie of fiftie thousand men, leading the same to the towne of Perth, otherwise called saint Johns towne, and there lodged in campe, abiding for the comming of the earle of Atholl, who as then being solicited thereto by the king of Englands agents, was readie to turne againe incontinentlie to his side [who after accordinglie, with Godfrie of Rosse, & Alexander Mowbraie, with other, came to the king of England.]

comfited on the Burrowmoore, beside Edenburgh, by the power of the gouernours, and others, which were there assembled against him. There died manie on both parts in the fight (as Iohn Fourdon writeth) for the strangers fought verie valiantlie: insomuch that if William Dowglasse, with diuerse other, had not come downe from Pictland hils to the aid of the Scots, whilest they were thus fighting, the strangers that day had wone the victorie. But now discouraged with the sudden comming of this fresh aid to their aduersaries, they began to giue place, and drew towards Edenburgh: neuertheless keeping themselues in order of battell, they fought still: and at length comming to Edenburgh, they were driuen vp thorough the friers street, and so by an other street, called saint Marie Wind, where one sir Dauid de Anand, a verie valiant knight chanced to be wounded by one of the enimies, by reason whereof he was so kindled in wrathfull desire to be reuenged, that with an axe which he had in his hand, he gaue his aduersarie (that had hurt him) such a blow on the shoulder, that he claue him downe togither with his horsse, that the axe staied not till it light vpon the verie hard pauement, so as the print of that violent stroke remained to be seene a long time after in one of the stones of the same pauement.

The strangers still retiring, and manfullie defending themselues, at length got to the hill where Edenburgh castle standeth, and there slue their horsses, making as it were a rampier of their carcasses, to defend themselues from the force of their enimies: but being inuironed by the Scots on ech side all that night, and hauing neither meate nor drinke wherewith to sustaine their languishing bodies, the which beside hunger and thirst, were sore tormented with cold also, and want of conuenient lodging, they yelded themselues the next day, with condition to haue their liues saued. When the spoile of the field (where they first ioined) was gathered, amongst the dead bodies there was found a woman of an huge stature, who in the beginning of the battell stept forth before hir companie, and incountering in singular fight with an esquire of Scotland, named Richard Shaw, she ouerthrew him, and afterwards beating downe hir enimies on ech side, long it was yer she might be ouerthrowne, which chanced not before she was inuironed about on ech side with hir enimies.

The earle of Namure hauing yelded himselfe into the hands of the gouernours, was verie courteoustie vsed, the earle of Murrey not onelie rendering vnto him all his goods, but also granting him licence to depart: and for his more suertie, he went himselfe in person with him to the borders, to see him safe deliuered out of all dangers. But by an ambush that lay in wait for the earle of Murrey, he was taken prisoner, and brought to king Edward. Dauid Cumin earle of Atholl, hearing that the earle of Murrey one of the gouernours was thus taken, supposing king Edwards part to be much aduanced thereby, came streightwaies vnto Perth, and gaue his faith eftsones vnto Edward Balioll, and was againe established by him gouernour of the realme of Scotland, as he was before. The king of England, hauing in the meane time gotten the towne of Perth, returned into England, and toke the Balioll with him, for doubt least when he had recouered the whole gouernement of the realme, he should shrinke awaie from him. The earle of Atholl hauing now regained his former authoritie, began to exercise great crueltie against all those that were enimies to the Balioll.

The nobles of the contrarie faction (as Patrike Dunbar earle of March, Andrew Murrey, & William Dowglasse, with other) toke great despite thereat, and raising an armie to restreine his insolent doings, came towards him, whereof he being aduertised (as then lieng at siege before the castle of Kildrummie) rose and met them in the fields within the forrest of Kilblaine, where he gaue them a sore battell, and had gone awaie with the victorie, had not Iohn Crag capteine of Kildrummie sallied forth of the castle with three hundred fresh men, and comming to the succour of his friends, renewed the battell in such earnest wise, that the aduersaries thereby were discomfited, earle Dauid their chiefteine being slaine in the field, with Walter Bride, Robert Cumin, and a great number of other, both gentlemen and commons. Sir Thomas Cumin was taken prisoner, & beheaded the next day, being Newyeres day. For the battell before mentioned was fought the last day of December (as Fourdon noteth.) Who further saith, that the earle of Atholl had with him three thousand men against his aduersaries, which were not past eleuen hundred.

The earle of Atholl is slaine.

Fourdon.

✠ This Dauid earle of Atholl was verie inconstant & greedie of gouernment, who if he had brought all the Scots to haue taken king Edwards part, would out of doubt, haue afterward contended with king Edward, and inuaded the kingdome of Scotland by violence; he did most grieuouslie oppresse the giltlesse and poore people, and wickedlie ordered all things after his own fansie, without reason.) Cumin earle of Atholl was slaine on this wise: Andrew Murrey was chosen gouernour in place of the earle of Murrey, taken (as before is said) by the Englishmen. This Andrew Murrey in the beginning of his new office, laid siege to the castle of Couper, with a mightie power of men, but hearing that the Cumins made foule worke in the north parts of the realme, against such as fauoured not the English part, he left that siege, and went against them, with whome incountering in battell, he ouerthrew their armie, and put them all to flight.

Fr. Thin. Iohn Maior li. 5. cap. 14.

Andrew Murrey chosen gouernor.

The Cumins put to flight.

At this bickering were slaine two of the Cumins, Robert and William, Thomas Caldar, and diuerse other valiant men, though enimies for the time vnto the gouernour. This victorie reduced all the north parts of Scotland vnto the obeisance of king Dauid. Few Englishmen after the same abode within the north bounds of Scotland, except those that were within the castle of Dungard in Buchquhane. At length this castle was wone, & all that kept it slaine, except Henrie Beaumont the capteine, who being sworne neuer to returne againe into Scotland, was licenced by the gouernour to depart into England without anie interruption. After this, the gouernour came to the castle of Lochindorris, and laid siege to it, where within was the countesse of Atholl, the wife of the late slaine earle Dauid. This woman hauing knowledge aforehand, that hir house should be besieged, had sent vnto the king of England and to Edward Balioll for succours.

The north parts of Scotland reduced to the obeisance of king Dauid.

The castle of Dungard wone.

The castle of Lochindorris besieged.

The king of England hauing now doubting least all the strengths in Scotland, kept by such as were his friends, would be lost without recouerie, if the same were not the soner rescued, he raised an armie of fortie thousand men, and entering therewith into Scotland, came to the castle of Lochindorris aforsaid. The Scots that lay there at siege, vpon knowledge had of his comming towards them, brake vp, and departed from thence. Herevpon, when he had refreshed the hold with new men, munition, and vittels, he toke the countesse forth with him, and passed with bloudie sword thorough Murrey, euen to Elghine, and returning by Mar, burnt the towne of Aberden. [Then he went to Striueling, where he stronglie repared the castle: from whence he toke his iournie to Bothuill, and there also in winter he made the castle stle stronger, in which he placed a valiant garrison: to this fort the lord Berkeleie conueied vittels from Edenburgh, and in one night discomfited William Dowglasse that lay in wait to intercept him. After which, king Edward did shortlie lose all the said castels, which he had before with so great care fortified. His nauie being on the sea at the same time, entered into the Forth, and spoiling (as other had done afore time) the church of saint Colme, felt reuenge thereof shortlie after: for that ship (as they tell the tale) wherein saint Colmes goods (for so they call them) were laden, sonke to the bottome of the sea, without force of anie tempest, or other apparant occasion.

The towne of Perth newlie fortified.

The king of England at his comming to Perth, forth of the north parts of Scotland, and finding the towne vnfortified, caused the same to be newlie fensed with wals and bulworks, at the charges and onelie expenses of these six abbeies, Aberbrothoke, Couper, Lundoris, Balmerinoch, Dunfirmling, & saint Andrewes. Henrie Beaumont also, who contrarie to his oth before taken, was now returned with king Edward into Scotland, was made capteine of saint Andrewes. Also Henrie Ferrar was made capteine of the castle of Lucres, William Montacute of Striueling, William Felton of Rockesburgh, and the keeping of the towne of Perth was committed vnto one Thomas Vthred. Whilest king Edward ordered things in Scotland after this maner, his brother (surnamed by the Scotish writers Eltham) came vnto him at Perth, who in the west parts of Scotland had exercised much crueltie, as well against the enimies of the Englishmen, as against those that were fauourers and friends vnto them, insomuch that passing through Galloway, Carike, Kile, and Cunningham, he put all to the fier and sword that came in his waies. He burned the church of saint Bute, and a thousand persons within it, which were fled thither for safegard of their liues. At his comming to Perth, he found the king his brother within the church there, who being sore offended with him for his misordered doings, verie sharplie reproued him for the same: and forsomuch as he answered him somewhat frowardlie, he plucked forth his sword, and there thrust him through the bodie, euen before the altar of saint John, wishing that all such might perish on the same wise, as put no difference betwixt friend and foe, place hallowed and vnhallowed; as being no reason, that the church should be anie more refuge for him, than he had made it for other.

His crueltie.

K. Edward sleieth his brother Eltham.

It may be, that king Edward slue some other man in this sort, as the Scots heere do write: but for the earle of Cornewall that was brother to king Edward, and surnamed John of Eltham, because he was borne at Eltham, it is nothing true that he was so made awaie, for he died of a naturall infirmitie, as by our English writers it manifestlie appeareth. But now to proceed with the historie, as we find it written. Such things accomplished in Scotland (as before ye haue heard) king Edward returned into England, & left the Baliol behind him with a great power of men at Perth. About the same time, Henrie Beaumont slue all such Scots as he might lay hands on, that had borne at the battell of Kilbleine, where his cosine Dauid Cumin was slaine. Moreouer now, after that king Edward was returned into England, Andrew Murrey came forth of the mountens, into the which he was before withdrawen to eschue the furie of the Englishmen, and by the assistance of sundrie of the nobles of Scotland, he wan the castle of Kincleuin, and raced it to the earth. Shortlie after he came into Mernes, and there toke the castle of Kilnesse, and likewise raced the same. Then passing forward, he burned Dunnoter.

He died of a naturall infirmitie, as by the English writers it appeareth.

On the other part, the Englishmen made no lesse spoile and destruction on ech side where they came, so that the Mernes, Angus, Stermond, and Gowrie through spoile, murther, & other disgraces, chancing by continuall warre, were left in manner waste and desolat. At length, this Andrew Murrey assembling a great power, with support of them of Murrey, Mar, and Buchquhan, fought with his enimies at Panmore in Angus, where he obteined the victorie with huge slaughter of Englishmen, and other his aduersaries. In this battell was slaine Henrie Mountfort, who latelie before had beene sent by king Edward into Scotland to support the Baliol, beside foure thousand others, the most part gentlemen: so that this ouerthrow was verie displeasant to the king of England, hauing his side sore weakened thereby. After the gaine of this victorie, Andrew Murrey passed through Fife & Angus, ouerthrowing the castle of Lucres, with all the other strengths of Fife, the castle of Couper onelie excepted.

*Andrew Murrise gardian of the Scots (and sir Dauid Bruse) did much harme in the countrie of Carleill, from whence he went to besiege the castle of Edenburgh (as yet in the hands of the English) whose intent coming to the knowledge of the marchers of England, they hasted to repaire to raise the same siege of Edenburgh, and to rescue their countriemen within the towne. By meanes whereof, the Scots remoued and came to Clerkington, and the English came to Krethtowne not farre distant; betweene whome there was a great fight, and manie slaine on both sides. But the victorie inclining (without anie great conquest) to neither partie, both armies parted: for the English went ouer Tweed, and the Scots feining that they would go into England, lodged themselues at Galuschell. So that king Edward hearing of such prosperous successe chancing to his aduersaries, sent incontinentlie two capteins with two armies into Scotland, to the support of the Baliol.

Two armies sent into Scotland.

William Talbois a man of notable prowes, hauing the conduct of the one of these armies, was incountred by William Keith, and after the discomfiture of his people, being taken prisoner, was kept in captiuitie till he paid two thousand marks for his ransome. The other was led by Richard Mountfort with whome Laurence Preston and Robert Gordon met, and giuing him battell, slue the same Richard with the most part of all his companie. About the same time sir William Montacute earle of Salisburie, togither with the earle of Arundell came into Scotland with a great power of men, and besieged the castell of Dunbar, lieng at the same for the space of 22 weeks. [At which battell also was king Edward, the earle of Glocester, the lords Persie and Neuill, being in the yeare 1337, as saith Scala chron.] Within the said castell was the countesse hir selfe, surnamed blacke Agnes of Dunbar, who shewed such manlie defense, that no gaine was to be got anie waies forth at hir hands, so that in the end they were constreined to raise their siege, and to depart without speed of their purpose. It is said, that this countesse vsed manie pleasant words in iesting and tawnting at the enimies doings, thereby the more to incourage hir souldiers.

The cause of which mortalitie proceeded (as was thought) for that the ground lay vntilled and not occupied, by reason of the continuall warres before passed. The castell of Louthian in the hands of the Englishmen.

The towne of Edenburgh was stuffed with a great number of souldiers, both Englishmen and Scots. Amongest whome there was a Scot of a right stout stomach named Robert Pendergest; he, for that it was perceiued he loued but little the Englishnation, was euill intreated and vsed amongst them, in so much that on a day, hauing his head broken by the marshall named Thomas Knatoun, he ceassed not to seeke some meane to be reuenged, till he brought his purpose to passe, so that shortlie after he slue the said marshall, and afterward to auoid the danger of death due for that fact, he got away, and came to William Dowglas, whome he persuaded with all diligence to passe vnto Edenburgh, where he might find his enimies at some great aduantage, by reason of the slothfull negligence as then growne amongest them. William Dowglas following this aduertisement, came secretlie on a night vnto the foresaid towne, and slue foure hundred Englishmen snorting in sleepe and dronkennesse, before they were able to make anie resistance.

Not long after, Andrew Murrey the gouernor of Scotland deceassed, to the great damage of the common-wealth, and was buried in Kolmarkie, in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour 1338.

The death of Andrew Murrey the gouernor. 1338.

It came well to passe for Scotland, that about the same time the king of England entring into wars against France, was constreined to ceasse his pursute of the conquest which he minded to make in Scotland, the which must needs haue come to full effect, if he had followed his former purpose and intent. But to proceed, after the decease of Andrew Murrey the gouernor, Robert Steward toke all the charge on him for the gouernment of the realme, till king Dauid returned home out of France, and began to rule all things himselfe. Tiuidall also was recouered out of the Englishmens hands, with diuers other places, about this time, by the high prowes and manlie valiancie of William Dowglas and other Scotish capteins; and therefore in the reward of the good seruice shewed by the same William in conquest of that countrie, he inioied the same afterward as his rightfull inheritance. [Henrie earle of Lancaster and Derbie, hearing of the valure of these two worthie capteins, William Dowglas, and Alexander Ramseie, earnestlie desired to see them, and to trie their strengths in iusting. Whereupon, there was a day appointed therefore at Berwike by all the said parties, where they met with their complices prouided accordinglie. At what time a certeine Englishman asked Peter Grame, if he would not refuse to iust with him, to whome he answered, that he accepted the chalenge, but willed him first to dine well, because he should that night sup in paradise. Which fell out accordinglie, for in running togither the Englishman was slain.] The king of England moued with high displeasure at these doings, sent a right valiant knight named sir Thomas Berkleie with a great power of men into Scotland. Against whome came William Dowglas, and Robert Steward the gouernor, and gaue him battell at Blackeborne, where the Scots were discomfited and so beaten downe, that few of them escaped, which were not either slaine or taken. Notwithstanding the two capteins saued themselues by flight.

Not long after, William Dowlas fought with his enimies at the Cragings, where hauing not past fortie men in his companie, he discomfited sir John Strueling, who had with him neere hand fiue hundred Englishmen and Scots, that toke his part in the king of Englands quarell. In the yeare following, the same William Dowglas wan the castell of Hermitage, & slue all them that were found within it. In the yeare next after, he fought fiue times in one day with sir Laurence Abernethie, principall capteine vnder the Baliol, and being put to the worse at foure of those times, at the fift he vanquished his enimies, and toke prisoner their capteine the said sir Laurence, who was sent to the castell of Dunbreton, there to remaine in safe keeping for a time. For these and such worthie enterprises hardlie atchiued, this Will. Dowglas was much commended, and within a few daies after the taking of the said sir Laurence Abernethie, he was sent by the gouernor the said Robert Steward into France, as ambassador to king Dauid, for the dispatch of certeine weightie matters touching the state of the realme.

In the meane time, Robert Steward the gouernor raised a mightie armie, and came with the same vnto the towne of Perth, planting a strong siege round about it; for diuiding his host into foure parts, he lodged them with their capteins in foure seuerall places. The first consisting for the most part of westerne Scots, he gouerned himselfe; the second he committed to Patrike Dunbar earle of March; the third to William earle of Rosse, and the fourth, to Maurice of Powbray lord of Clidesdale. These lay thus at siege of this towne for the space of ten weekes. And though sundrie times they gaue alarmes and assaults to it, yet was it so stoutlie defended by Englishmen and other within, that the Scots for a long time lost more than they wan. At length when they were in maner past all hope to get the towne, & readie to haue departed from it, William Dowglas arriued in the Taie, bringing with him out of France in fiue ships, both men of war, and also munition of armour, artillerie, and weapons, which serued the Scotishmen in that season greatlie to purpose.

Amongest other, there were two knights of the familie of Castelgaliard, and two esquiers, Giles de la Vois, and John de Breise; also a noble pirat, named Hugh Handpile, who had the charge ouer the foresaid fiue ships. [While Edward the third was at the siege of Turneie, the earls of March and Southerland made a rode into Scotland, and were discomfited by Thomas Greie the elder, Robert Maners, & John Copeland, with the garrison of Roksborow, then in the hands of the Englih, but after wone by the Scots, on Easter day, at the verie houre of the resurrection; the gouernement whereof seemed to be fatall, because all the capteins of this towne died of euill deaths, amongst whome was Alexander Ramseie the capteine hereof that died with hunger, being put in prison for verie enuie that William Dowglas bare vnto him.] About the same time, one William Bullocke had taken essones

Those Scots that had serued vnder him likewise, were content to forsake the king of Englands wages, and to serue William Dowglas, who led them forthwith to the siege of Perth, the which towne shortlie after his comming was rendered into the gouernors hands, by Thomas Athzed the capteine, in the third moneth after it was first besieged, & in the yeare after our redemption 1341.

Among other exploits attempted at this siege after the comming of the lord William Dowglas, the Frenchman Hugh Handpile, taking vpon him on a day to approch the towne with his ships, and to giue an assault thereto, he lost the chiefest vessell he had, although afterwards when the towne was now rendered, the lord William Dowglas caused the same ship to be to him againe restored, and with great thanks and liberall rewards giuen as well to him as to the other of the Frenchmen, he sent them backe into France, greatlie to their pleasure and contentation; although in their returne, as they passed out of Drumlie Firth, they escaped verie hardlie from the shore. [The winter after the siege of Turneie, king Edward went to Melrosse, but from thence riding through part of the forrest of Etrike, in a tempestuous time, he came backe againe to Melrosse, where Henrie earle of Lancaster iusted with William Dowglasse (by couenant) in the kings sight. King Edward taking a truce, departed from Melrosse, halfe ouercome with melancholie against those that first moued him to this tournie, not succeeding as they hoped and desired that it should haue done.]

In the same yeare (as some do write) or (according vnto other) in the yeare following, there was such a miserable dearth, both through England and Scotland, that the people were driuen to eat the flesh of horsses, dogs, cats, and such like vnused kinds of meats, to sustaine their languishing liues withall, yea, insomuch that (as is said) there was a Scotishman, an vplandish felow named Tristicloke, spared not to steale children, and to kill women, on whose flesh he fed, as if he had beene a woolfe. Perth being once deliuered (as before is said) to the gouernor, he went with his armie to Striueling, and besieging the castell, had it rendered vnto him the eight day after his comming thither, on these conditions, that Thomas Foulkie the capteine, with his wife and children might safelie passe into England, without fraud or guile of anie impeachment [of which castell (as saith Buchanan) Maurice the sonne of Andrew Murrey was made capteine.] Edward Baliol, by such good and prosperous successe, as did thus dailie fall vnto his enimies, to auoid further danger, after oft remouing from place to place, at length he was constreined to flie into England, lest he should haue fallen into his aduersaries hands.

Not long after, the castell of Edenburgh was wonne by policie on this wise. William Dowglas hauing acquaintance with one Walter Towers, [whom Buchanan called William Cur a merchant] caused him to prouide a ship, and to arriue therewith in the Forth, feining as though he were a merchant, and to offer wines to sell vnto the garison that kept Edenburgh castell. This Towers according to instructions thus giuen him, prouided him of all things necessarie for the purpose, & so comming into the Forth with his ship, came on land himselfe, and brought with him into Edenburgh two punchions of wine, which he offered to sell vnto the steward of houshold to the capteine of the castell, who falling at a price with him, appointed that he should bring them earlie in the morning vp to the castell, that they might be receiued in. Towers hiring a cart ouer night, came with the punchions vp to the castell gate, earlie vpon the breake of the day in the nert morning, and hauing the gates opened, entred with his cart, and being come within the gates with it, he plucked forth a wedge or pin deuised of purpose, and immediatlie therewith the cart with the punchions fell downe, so stopping the entrie of the gates, that in no wise they might be shut or closed againe.

A policie.

The Dowglasse hauing in his companie William Bullocke, Walter Fraser, and John Sandlands, right valiant knights, with diuerse other hardie and bold personages, laie in couert not far from the castell, & hauing knowledge giuen him by sound of horne, or otherwise, when to come forth, he hasted therevpon with all diligence vnto the gates, and finding them thus open, first slue the porters, and after into the castell, within a while had dispatched all them within, and so became maisters of that fortres, within the which for capteine they left one William Dowglas, the bastard brother of the other William Dowglas, by whose conduct chiefle, both this enterprise and diuers other were luckilie atchiued. Thus was the realme of Scotland clearelie recouered out of the enimies hands, the Englishmen, and all other that toke part with the Baliol, constreined to auoid out of all the parts and bounds thereof. The castell of Edenburgh was thus recouered by the Scots in the yeare last before remembred, to wit, 1341.

1341. H.B.

The same yeare, or in the next insuing, the second of June, king Dauid with his wife quéene Jane, and sundrie nobles both French and Scotish, came safelie through the seas, and arriued in Innerbernie, from whence with no small triumph they were conueied vnto Perth. About the same time, Alexander Ramsey of Dalehouse, one of the most valiant capteins knowne in those daies, gathering a great power of men, entered into England, and hauing knowledge that the Englishmen were assembled, in purpose to giue him battell, laid an ambush for them, and training them within danger thereof, by such a fierce and new onset as he gaue vpon them, he put them out of order, and chased them most egerlie, killing and slaieng a great number of them at his pleasure. Amongest the prisoners that were taken, the earle of Salisburie (as the Scotish historie saieth) was one, and the capteine of Rokesburgh another.

King Dauid returneth into Scotland.

This Ramsey was so renowmed, that euerie noble man was glad to haue his sonne and kinsman to serue vnder him.

Sir Alexander Ramsey, perceiuing that the most part of the garrison of Rokesburgh were either slaine, or taken in this last conflict, togither with their capteine, came hastilie thither, and giuing a right fierce assault thereto, by fine force toke it. Wherefore king Dauid in recompense of his valiancie thus declared in his seruice, gaue vnto him the keeping of this castell, togither with the shirifwike of Tiuidale. Whereat William Dowglasse toke such displeasure, that seeking to be reuenged, he found meanes to apprehend this Alexander Ramsey within the church of Hawike, and put him in prison within the castell of Hermitage, where he remained in great miserie and lacke of food till he died. [About which time by the said kind of death (as saith Buchanan) was William Bullocke slaine, by Dauid Berkelie. The death of which two did draw Scotland into manie factions, and filled it with seditions.]

Fr. Thin.

King Dauid was sore moued herewith, purposing to see such punishment done vpon William Dowglasse for that rebellious attempt, as might serue for an example to all other how they went about anie the like offense. Neuertheless, the Dowglasse kept him out of the way amongst the mountains teins and other desert places, till finallie Robert Steward and other nobles purchased his pardon, so that at length he came into fauor againe, and had all his lands and liuings restored vnto him, as well in Tiuidale as elsewhere.

The earle of Salisburie exchanged for the earle of Murrey.

Some after the earle of Salisburie was taken by sir Alexander Ramsey (as is said) he was exchanged for the earle of Murrey, that had beene holden manie yéeres before as prisoner in England. But it should appeare by other writers, that the earle of Salisburie was not taken at that time in the borders of Scotland (as before is supposed) but in the borders of France, where he was in the wars which king Edward the same time made against the Frenchmen, & now was exchanged for the earle of Murrey. But howsoeuer it was, king Dauid after the realme of Scotland was once brought into a quiet estate from the former trouble of war, he called a parlement at the towne of Perth, where he rewarded verie liberallie all such as had either done any notable seruice themselues, or had lost any of their friends or parents in defense & recouerie of the realme out of his aduersaries hands. Among other, Hugh Boece had in recompense of his fathers slaughter at Duplin, the inheritor & ladie of the baronie of Balwid giuen him in mariage; which baronie is yet possessed by the heires of the said Hugh.

This Hugh was grandfather to Hector Boetius.

Shortlie after vpon the breaking vp of this parlement, king Dauid raised a mightie armie, and entered with the same into Northumberland; but committing the whole charge to John Randolph erle of Murrey as lieutenant generall, he wold not that anie of his owne banners should be spred and borne in all that voiage [although himselfe were there in person, seruing secretlie, and would not be knowne in this iournie.] The most part of all Northumberland was burnt and spoiled, for they remained there a moneth before they returned, conueieng awaie with them great riches, which they got abroad in all places where they came. Shortlie after, he came with a new armie into England, causing his owne standard to be caried afore him at that time, as he that toke vpon him the whole gouernance of that enterprise himselfe. The Englishmen withdrawing all their goods into strengths, minded not to giue the Scots any set batell, but to take them euer at some aduantage, if they straied abroad any where vnwarilie to fetch in booties. Neither were they altogither disappointed of their hoped prey, for 5 Scotish knights, whose names were Steward, Eglinton, Craggie, Boid, and Fullarton, pursuing their enimies on a time ouer fiercelie, were taken prisoners, and after redeemed for great summes of monie. At length, king Dauid perceiuing that he wasted but time, returned into Scotland. But not long after he went againe into England, in which iournie his people were so beaten with vehement stormes of raine and haile, that they had much adoo to saue themselues from perishing through the vnmeasurable force of that so rigorous weather.

On the other side, the Englishmen that were gathered to resist against him, were in semblable maner neere hand destroied with the like rage of tempest. Herevpon king Dauid, to the end that his enterprise should not seeme altogither to want effect, ouerthrew sundrie strong houses on the English borders, and so returned home without other damage either done or receiued. About the same time did Edward king of England besiege the towne of Calis. The French king therfore deuising all waies possible whereby to saue that towne, and to cause his aduersarie to raise his siege, sent ambassadors into Scotland, to require king Dauid, that with an armie he would enter into England, and do what damage he might vnto the Englishmen, to trie if by that meanes king Edward could be constreined to leaue his siege, and to returne home for defense of his owne countrie and subiects. In the meane time also (as I find in the Scotish chronicles) king Edward addressed his orators into Scotland, offering vnto king Dauid, vpon condition that peace might be had, to deliuer into his hands not onelie the towne of Berwike, but also Edward Baliol his old aduersarie, for whose cause the warre had so long continued betwixt them.

Ambassadors frō ỳ French king into Scotland.

These offers being propouned in councell, though some of the wiser sort gaue aduise that in no condition they ought to be refused; yet the king himselfe (for loue that he had to the French king with whome he had beene brought vp) and other of the nobles hauing yong heads, vpon desire to be reuenged of the Englishmen by practise of warres (wherevnto they were inclined) wold néeds condescend to the French kings chargeable requeſt, & refuse the king of Englands beneficiall offers. Whereupon an armie was leuied, and solemne proclamation made, that all such as were able and fit to beare armour, should meet the king at a certeine day and place, which was to them in the same proclamation assigned. The earle of Rosse therefore came with his people vnto Perth, and there made his musters before the king: but in the night following he slue the lord of the Iles, with seuen of his kinsmen as they were in their beds, and therevpon fled, and got him with all speed againe into Rosse [whereby the armie was greatlie diminished, when the friends of both parts fearing ciuill warres amongst the families departed home.]

King Dauid, though he was sore displeased herewith, and desired most earnestlie to haue punished that heinous act; yet bicause he would not hinder his iournie, he let passe the punishment therof, till more conuenient opportunitie might serue thereto. [Notwithstanding that William Dowglasse of Liddesdale did earnestlie persuade him, at that time to leaue the iournie, and first to punish these turmoils at home, whereby all things might be quieted in his absence.] At his comming to the borders, and before he entered into England, he made manie knights, to stirre them the rather to do valiantlie; but first he created William Dowglasse an earle, which William was sonne to Archembald Dowglasse, slaine before at Halidon hill. There was vndoubtedlie a mightie power of the Scots assembled at that present; insomuch as there was of earles, lords, knights, and gentlemen, to the number of two thousand men of armes; and of such armed men as they called hoblers, set forth by the burrowes and good townes twentie thousand; beside the archers and other footmen; so that they were at the least fortie thousand men in all, or (as some writers affirme) three score thousand.

King Dauid with that his puissant armie, the first of October entered Northumberland, and coming to a fortresse not farre off from the borders called Lidell, they laie round about that place for the space of three daies, without giuing thereto anie assault: but the fourth day they assailed it right fiercelie, and in the end entered by fine force, sleaing the more part of all those which they found within the house. The capteine sir Walter Selbie was taken aliue, but immediatlie by king Dauid his commandement, had his head striken off, and was not permitted to haue so much time as to make his confession, which he instantlie desired to haue done, but it would not be granted. From thence the armie remoued, and went vnto the abbie of Lauercost, which they spoiled; and that done they departed, and passing by Naward castell, and the towne of Redpeth, kept on on till they came vnto the priorie of Yerham, which they ſacked; but the towne was ſaued from fire by commandement of king Dauid, who in this iournie appointed to preſerue foure townes onelie from burning; to wit, Yerham aforeſaid, Corbridge, Darington, and Durham, to the end he might in them lay vp ſuch ſtore of vittels, as he ſhould prouide abroad in the countrie, wherewith to ſuſteine his armie during the time of his abiding in thoſe parties.

King Dauid lodged in the manor of Beaurepaire.

From Yerham, where he laie three daies, he marched to Ebcheſter, waſting and ſpoiling the countrie on each hand, and after turned towards the wood of Beaurepaire; and comming thither, lodged himſelfe in the manour, and ſet his people abroad into the countrie to fetch in booties, & to burne vp the townes and houſes in all places where they came. The ſpoile, waſte, deſtruction, and ſlaughter which the Scots practiſed with fire and ſword, was wonderfull to heare, and incredible almoſt to be told, they ſpared neither yong nor old, church nor chappell: religious houſes as well as other were conſumed to aſhes.

The abbeie of Durham ſpoiled.

The abbeie of Durham, and all places thereabout (as the Scotiſh writers affirme) were ſpoiled and miſerablie ſacked, although it was ſaid king Dauid was admoniſhed in a dreame, that he ſhould in anie wiſe abſteine from violating the goods and lands perteining to ſaint Cuthbert.

The earle of Northumberland lieutenant of the North.

The earle of Northumberland lieutenant of the North vnder king Edward, to reſiſt theſe iniuries, raiſed a great power of men, and ioining the ſame with ſuch bands of old ſouldiers as king Edward had latelie ſent ouer out of France for that purpoſe, firſt diſpatched an herald at armes vnto king Dauid, requiring him to ſtaie from further inuading the countrie, and to returne into Scotland, till ſome reaſonable order for a finall peace might be agreed vpon betwixt him and the king his maiſter: otherwiſe he ſhould be ſure to haue battell to the vtterance within three daies after. King Dauid contemning this meſſage, required his folks to make them readie to receiue their enimies if they came to aſſaile them, and on the nert morrow, he diuided his armie into three battels. In the firſt was Robert Steward prince of Scotland, and Patrike Dunbar earle of March: in the ſecond were apointed John earle of Murrey, and William earle of Dowglaſſe: in the third was the king himſelfe, with all the reſidue of the nobles. In the morning earlie before the battell, the earle of Dowglaſſe departed from the armie to deſcrie the Engliſh hoſt, and to vnderſtand their force and order (if it were poſſible:) but entring ſomwhat vnwarilie within danger of his enimies, he was chaſed, and that to ſuch diſaduantage, that he loſt fiftie, or rather fiue hundred (as ſome bookes haue) of yong gentlemen, and ſuch other light horſſemen as he tooke forth with him, eſcaping verie narrowlie himſelfe alſo from being taken at the chaſe. In the meane ſeaſon, the Engliſh hoſt diuided likewiſe into three battels, approched forward, and came within ſight of the Scotiſh armie. Whereupon Dauid Graham with a wing of fiue hundred horſſemen, well apointed gaue a full charge on the ſkirts of the Engliſh archers, thinking to haue diſtreſſed them: but he was ſo charpelie receiued and beaten with arrowes, that loſing a great number of his men, he was conſtreined to flee backe to the maine battell, and that not without great danger of being taken in his flight by ſuch as followed him.

The earle of Dowglas chaſed.

Theſe two diſcomfitures notwithſtanding, the Scots ruſhed fiercelie vpon their enimies, & fought with great manhood a long ſeaſon; but in the end, Robert Steward, and the earle of March, perceiuing their people partlie to ſhrinke backe, cauſed the retreat to be ſounded, in hope to ſaue their men by withdrawing into ſome ſafer place: but this flieng backe of the earle of March and Robert Steward, brought the diſcomfiture vpon all the reſidue of the Scots. For that battell of Engliſhmen that was firſt matched with them, came now with ſuch violence vpon the maine battell where king Dauid fought, that within a ſhort while after, the ſame was vtterlie diſcomfited and put to flight. In this buſineſſe king Dauid himſelfe did in euerie point plaie the part of a moſt valiant chieftaine, incouraging his people as well with words as notable examples to do their indeuours. Neither would he flie after hee ſaw himſelfe deſtitute of all conuenient aid, but ſtill continued in earneſt fight, deſiring nothing ſo much (as ſhould appeare) as death, for that he thought nothing more diſpleaſant than life, after the ſlaughter of ſo manie of his nobles and liege people.

Which Copland is miſnamed by Iohn Maior, and not onelie called Couptaunt, but alſo reported by him to be a Gaſcoigne, whereas it is euident by our hiſtories, that he was named Copland, and a meere Engliſhman. But to our purpoſe. The Scots that fought in the rereward had no better ſucceſſe than the other: for that battell was alſo broken & put to flight, with great ſlaughter as well of the nobles, as other commons, beſides thoſe that were taken. There were ſlaine in this dolorous conflict, the earle of Murrey, the earle of Stratherne, the conſtable, the marſhall, the chamberleine and chancellor of Scotland, with a great number of other nobles and commons [with Maurice Murriſe.] There were taken with the king fiue earles, that is to ſay, Dowglaſſe, Fife, Sutherland, Wigtoun, and Menteith [the earle of March & the Seneſcall fled, but after the earle of Mench being taken, was with the earle of Menteith (as ſaith Scala chron.) drawne and hanged at London.] And beſides other great riches loſt in this field, the holie croſſe (as they call it) of holie rood houſe, was found vpon king Dauid, who bare it about him, in truſt that by vertue thereof he ſhould be inuincible: but he was ſpoiled both of that and all other his iewels which were found vpon him at the ſame time. In the yeere following, the Baliol, with the earle of Northumberland made a road into Louthian, and Cliddeſdale, bringing a great bootie of goods and cattell out of thoſe countries into Galloway, in which countrie the Baliol abode a long time after. At length, the Scots recouering themſelues with much paine, after the ſlaughter of ſo manie of their nobles and commons, beſide the diſcomfort for the taking of their king, choſe and apointed Robert Steward as gouernour to haue the rule of the realme. About the ſame time, William Dowglaſſe the ſonne of Archembald Dowglaſſe, that was brother vnto good ſir James Dowglaſſe, who (as before is ſaid) was ſlaine in Spaine, returned forth of France, and by ſupport of his friends chaſed the Engliſhmen out of Dowglaſdale, Tiuidale, Twidale, Etrike foreſt, & Twedale. Sir Dauid Berklie slaine 1353. I. Ma.

In the yéere following, was the same sir William Dowglasse, being latelie before ransomed out of England, slaine, as he was hunting in Strike forest, by his cosine and godsonne William earle of Dowglasse, in reuenge of the slaughter of Alexander Ramsey, and other old grudges. Thus was the house of the Dowglasses diuided amongest themselues, pursuing ech other manie yéeres togither with great vnkindnesse, vnnaturall enimitie and slaughter.

In the yéere next following, which was 1355, shortlie after Easter, there arriued in Scotland a noble knight named sir Eugenie de Garenteris, with a companie of Frenchmen, though few in number, yet valiant and verie skilfull warriors, which were sent thither by John king of France, that succéeded his father king Philip of Valois, latelie before deceassed, and deliuered vnto the gouernor and other nobles of the realme of Scotland, fortie thousand crownes of the sunne, to be imploied about the leuieng of an armie against the Englishmen, that they might be constreined the sooner to withdraw their powers out of France.

Fortie thousand crownes.

This monie was receiued, though a small part thereof came to the hands of the souldiers or men of warre of Scotland, for the lords and nobles kept it safe inough to their owne vse. Yet neuertheless, the earle of March, and William Dowglasse, gather their people, and passe forth with the same to the borders, and entering into England, appoint William Ramsey of the Dalehouse, to ride before with a number of light horssemen, to the end, that if the Englishmen did assemble and come forth too strong against him, he might retire backe to the maine battell, where they lay in couert, at a place called Nisbet more. This Ramsey doing as he was commanded, made a great forraie thorough the countrie, and hauing got togither a great bootie of cattell, withdrew with the same homewards: but being sharplie pursued by the Englishmen, in hope to recouer their goods, he fled amaine, and they following egerlie in the chase, were vpon the Scotish armie before they were aware. The Scotishmen, and those few Frenchmen that were there, set vpon the Englishmen fiercelie, and finallie put them to flight, though not without some slaughter on their part: for there were slaine of Scots sir John Holieburton, and sir James Turnebull knights. These were taken prisoners of Englishmen, sir Thomas Greie, and his sonne, with John Darcas, and manie other Englishmen.

✻ The taking of which Greie is reported by others to haue béene after this manner. The lords Persie and Neuill, gardians of the English marches, tooke truce with the lord William Dowglasse, at the time that he conquered the lands which the Englishmen had woone of the Scots. But Patrike earle of March (being in confederacie with Garanteris) would not by anie persuasion consent to that leage: wherevpon (with a number of others) he made a road to the castle of Norham, ambushing themselues vpon the Scotish side of the riuer of Twéed, sending ouer a banneret with his ensigne, and 400 men to forage & spoile the countrie, who gathering the preies, draue them in despite alongst the castle: wherevpon Thomas Greie, capteine of Norham (sonne to Thomas Greie, that had béene three times by the Scots besieged in the said castle of Norham, in the reigne of king Edward the second) séeing the commons of England thus robbed (and déeming it his part to defend his countrie, friends, and their substance) issued forth of Norham with few men more than fiftie of the garrison of the castle, and a few of the common people vnexpert in matters of war; who (not knowing of the secret ambush of the band which Patrike had laied in wait behind Twéed) issued forth to follow and recouer the preie: but being so farre gone in chase of the enimie, as that he could not returne in safetie (because he was beset before and behind with the 400 on the one side, & the ambush laied by Twéed on the other side) the said Greie and his compane (finding none other remedie but to hazard the succesle) forsoke their horsles, and on fot (standing to the extremitie) with a wonderfull courage set vpon the Scots, whereof more were killed than of the English, but the Scots comming so sore on the English (not able to resist) they began to flie, at what time Thomas Greie (as before is declared) was taken prisoner.)

The earle of March, and Dowglasse, after the obteining of this victorie, came sudenlie in the night season vnto the towne of Berwike, and raising vp ladders to the wals, wan the towne, but not without losse of diuerse Scotish gentlemen, as Thomas Haus, Andrew Scot of Balwerie, John Gordon, William Sinclare, Thomas Preston, and Alexander Nowbrate knights. Of English were slaine Alexander Ogill capteine of the towne, Thomas Persie brother to the earle of Northumberland, and Edward Greie, with others. Eugenie de Garenteris with his Frenchmen did verie valiantlie beare himselfe in this enterprise, whome Robert Steward the gouernour rewarding with great gifts, sent backe into France, commending him by letters vnto the French king, as he that had done his dutie in euerie behalfe verie thoroughlie. The castle of Berwike, notwithstanding that the towne was thus woone, held forth the Scots and Frenchmen, by reason whereof when an armie of Englishmen came to the succours thereof, they raced the wals, and burnt the houses of the towne, and so departed.

✻ The tidings wherof were brought to king Edward at the verie instant of his landing from Calis into England, for which cause he taried at his parlement appointed at London but three daies, and with all speed came to Berwike, where he entered the castle; wherat the burgesses amazed, treated with him, and thervpon the towne of Berwike was redelliuered (against the minds of the Scots) to king Edward.) K. Edward himselfe being come to the rescue and recouerie of Berwike, and hauing receiued the towne, and finding it so defaced, tooke order for the reparing thereof againe, went to Roxburgh, and there receiued of the Balioll a full resignation of all his pretended right to the crowne of Scotland. [For there the 26 of Januarie, the said Balioll hauing resigned (as before) all his title to king Edward, alledged these causes: first, in consideration that the Scots were full of rebellion; also, because he had no heire, nor anie verie néere of his linage: and for that he

he was of K. Edwards blod of England, he knew not where to beſtow it better than vpon him. This Baliol is by no author (as Leſleus ſaith) placed in the catalog of the kings, as well for that he bound himſelfe (by homage) to the gouernement of England with an oth, againſt the gouernement & maieſtie of Scotland: as for that being a tyrant, & by force inuading the crowne, he continued not long in the ſame. In truth, I ſuppoſe he held it not verie long, and that in continuall warre. But yet for that which I can ſee, he was crowned king at Scone, 1332, as Leſleus himſelfe, Buchanan, and all other authors do agrée. Beſide, he gouerned by him & his agents vntill the yéere of 1342, at what time he yéelded his crowne to king Edward of England; which was the full part of ten yeares, after which againe he recouered a good part of Endgland. Wherefore it ſéemeth ſtrange to me, that Roſſe will not allow him a place in the catalog of kings, ſince Buchan. maketh him the nintie fourth king, and ſo placeth him vnder that title, and maketh Dauid Bruſe (who was crowned before Baliol, and gouerned after Baliols departing Scotland) the 98 king, naming alſo Robert (who ſucceéded after Bruſe) the hundred king in order of gouernement; in ſuch ſort, that both theſe writing at one time (but with diuers affections) cannot agrée on the number of their kings: one receiuing, & the other reiecting him to be placed in the catalog of their kings.] After this, king Edward paſſing forth to Hadington, ſpoiled and waſted the countrie by the way on each hand as he marched forward; and for diſpleaſure that his nauie on the ſea (after the ſouldiers and mariners had béene on land, and burned the church of our ladie in thoſe parts called Whitekirke) had with force of a rigorous tempeſt béene ſore ſhaken, and manie of the ſhips loſt and drowned togither with men and all, he fell into ſuch a rage, that he cauſed all the buildings in thoſe parts to be burnt and ſpoiled, as well abbeis as all other churches and religious houſes, as though he minded (ſay the Scotiſh writers) to make warre both againſt God and all his ſaints. Theſe things chanced in the yeare 1355, after our common account, about the feaſt of the Purification of our ladie, & by reaſon the Engliſhmen did ſo much hurt at that time in thoſe parts by fire, they called it euer after; The burnt Candlemas.

Shortlie after that king Edward was returned into England, William Dowglas of Niddeſdale recouered out of the Engliſhmens poſſeſſion the lands of Galloway, & the lands of Dritſdale were in like maner recouered by one Kirpatrike. In the ſame yéere on the 20 day of October, was the battell of Poitiers fought, where Edward prince of Wales, otherwiſe named the Blacke prince, ouerthrew the armie of France, and tooke king John priſoner, with his yongeſt ſonne Philip, and a great number of other of the French nobilitie beſides. There was at this battell with king John, the earle William Dowglas, & to the number of thrée thouſand Scots, hauing diuers knights and gentlemen to their capteins, of whome there died in the ſame battell Andrew Steward, Robert Gordon, Andrew Holiburton, and Andrew Haus, knights. The earle of Dowglas eſcaped with life and vntaken, but Archembald Dowglas, ſon to ſir James Dowglas ſlaine in Spaine, was taken priſoner; albeit his taker ſuffered him to depart for a ſmall ranſome, by reaſon that William Ramſey of Colluthis, who was alſo taken with him, made ſemblance as though the ſame Archembald Dowglas had béen ſome poore ſlaue, cauſing him to pull off his boots, and to do other ſuch drudging ſeruice, as fell not for the eſtate of a man of any eſtimation or honeſtie, to the end it ſhould not be knowne that he was.

Thus the king of England at one time hauing two kings vnder his captiuitie, ſat crowned betwixt them at meate in the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe, making (as the vſe is) amongſt the Engliſhmen in that ſeaſon) a great banket. And this he did (as is reported) to the intent that the maner thereof might be bruted abroad to his high praiſe & glorious fame. King Dauid within certeine yeares after was conueied by the earle of Northampton vnto Berwike, where the moſt part of all the nobles of Scotland aſſembled togither to conſult with him touching ſome agrément to be had for his ranſome: but becauſe they could grow to no certeine point therein, he was brought backe againe to London, and there remained in priſon as before. In the meane time, Roger Kirkpatrike ſlaine by James Lindſeie, in a caſtell where the ſaid James dwelled, and receiued the ſaid Roger as his gheſt. Shortlie after, that is to wit at Michaelmaſſe next inſuing, after king Dauid had béene at Berwike, there was an agrément made for his ranſome, whereupon being deliuered, he returned into Scotland, in the eleuenth yeare after his taking at Durham field. It was agréed that there ſhould be paied for his ranſome one hundred thouſand marks ſterling, at ſundrie daies of paiment, as was accorded betwixt them. * After he had béene 11 yeares in England, in which place alſo Froiſſard ſetteth downe that he paied but 50000 marks Engliſh. Dauid was alſo bound by couenant of agréement to race certeine caſtels within Scotland, which ſéemed moſt noiſome to the Engliſh borders: which couenant he performed. For vpon his returne into Scotland, he caſt downe the caſtels of Dalſwinton, Dunfreis, Portowne, and Duriſdere. He alſo called a parlement, wherein he enacted ſundrie things for the puniſhment of them that fled from him at Durham field: and firſt for that his coſine Robert Steward was one of them, being through means thereof a great cauſe of the ouerthrow, he procured that the act (by which the crowne was appointed for want of iſſue of his bodie lawfullie begotten, to deſcend vnto the ſaid Robert Steward) was vtterlie reuoked and diſanulled, and John Southerland the ſonne of Jane his yongeſt ſiſter, appointed heire aparant in place of the ſaid Robert. Not long after, king Dauid called an other councell, wherein (according to his promise made to the king of England before his deliuerance) he mooued the lords and barons of Scotland in a matter whereof he wished not to haue of them anie towardlie answer, and that was this: Whether they could be contented, that after his decease, the crowne of Scotland should be transferred vnto the king of Englands sonne, and to his lawfull heires: [Which thing Iohn Maior assigneth to the yeare 1363, who also saith, that it was this parlement (as he hath red) and done by the persuasion of Jane the queene, forgetting that he said before, that she died in the yeare 1357.]

The lords hearing what was proponed vnto them, answered without anie long studie, that so long as anie of them were able to beare armour or weapon, they would neuer consent thereto. King Dauid right ioifull to heare them at this point, thought himselfe discharged, for that he was not bound to labor further in this sute, because his promise made to the king of England touching this point, onelie was, that if the Scotish lords would agree, then he should intaile the crowne to his sonne. In the yeare next following, which was from the incarnation 1357, queene Jane the wife of K. K. Dauid, after hir decease, maried a yong ladie gentlewoman named Margaret Logie, daughter to sir Iohn Logie knight, but within three moneths after he repented him, for that he had matched himselfe with one of so meane parentage, to the disparagement of his blood. Herevpon he banished both hir, and all other that had counselled him to marie hir, confining them for euer out of all the parts of his dominions. ✻ Charles the first surnamed the wise, being king of France (supported by the aids of Scots) prepared an expedition into the holie land, in which iornie, when a greeuous contention fell among the French and English, the last were ouercome by the first through the singular manhod of the Scots. Which benefit Charles not forgetting, erected an order of an hundred archers to be about his person, and by office to keepe watch and ward for him (in the night) within his court gates: which (vpon this originall) is obserued with great solemnitie, euen in this our age.] K. Dauid in the meane time repared sundrie places and strengths of his realme, & built a tower in Edenburgh castell, bearing the name after him euen vnto this day, called Dauids tower. ✻ About this time (or rather more trulie as others haue before this written in the yeare of Christ 1356; or shortlie after the deliuerie of Dauid Bruse from captiuitie as the third sort do say) William Dowglasse being about to go on pilgrimage beyond the seas (at such time as king John was preparing his host against the Blacke prince) went with K. John vnto the foresaid battell, being honored by his hands with the title of knighthod: but after, hauing manie of his men slaine, and being inforced to forsake the field, he returned home into Scotland. William Dowglasse shortlie after, vpon the deliuerie of Dauid Bruse from the captiuitie of England, was created earle of Dowglasse. Much about which or at the selfe same time, the said king of Scots aduanced William Ramseie to the earldome of Fife, by the means of the wife of the said Ramseie, whom the king intirelie loued (as the report went.) The right of which countie king Dauid affirmed to be iustlie in him (so that he might liberallie giue it) as truelie vested in his possession by the forfeiture which Duncan sometime countie of Fife had done in K. Robert Bruses daies; in murthering of an esquier called Michaell Beton, whome he miserablie slue in a riuer for extreame displeasure. Wherefore this William Ramseie surmized that Duncan (to obteine pardon for his offense) did by indenture make Robert Bruse K. of Scots his heire in reuersion, if he died without issue male. Yet had this Duncan a daughter (by his wife the countesse of Glocester, and daughter to the king of England) which was enterteined in England, and should haue beene sold to Robert the seneschall of Scotland. But she (rather respecting the satisfieng of hir loue, than the honor of hir estate, rather chosing to be a kings wife, than an earles ladie) toke to husband one William Felton, a knight in Northumberland, which (at the said time when William Ramseie was made earle of Fife) challenged that earldome in the right of his wife, daughter and heire to the said Duncan earle of Fife. But for anie thing that I can yet see, the said Ramseie went away with the honor thereof.] After this appeasing of certeine rebels that sought to trouble the quiet state of the realme, he purposed to haue gone to Jerusalem: but hauing prouided all things necessarie for such a iournie, he fell sicke of a burning feauer, and died within the castell of Edenburgh in the thirtie ninth yeare of his reigne, and fortie seuenth of his age, which was from the incarnation 1370, his bodie lieth in Holie rod house, where it was buried in the yeare aforesaid.

✻ During the time that this Dauid Bruse was prisoner in England, he did so earnestlie set his louing affection vpon Katharine Mortimer, a damsell of London (by reason of familiar acquaintance with hir) that he could not forbeare hir companie, but (as it seemeth) brought hir also into Scotland with him; whereat the lords disdeining, and highlie offended with the king therefore, procured one Richard de Hull, Wherevpon, the king conceiuing great dolor (not daring to ſæke reuenge thereof, for doubt of the nobilitie) cauſed hir to be honorablie buried at Newbotle, not ceaſſing (as farre as in him lay) after hir death, to manifeſt the ſingular loue he bare vnto hir in hir life.)

Strange wonders.

Sundrie maruellous things were ſæne in the daies of this king Dauid, within the bounds of Albion. In the 16 yære of his reigne, crowes, rauens, and pies, in the winter ſeaſon brought forth their brood, and ceaſſed in the ſummer and ſpringtime, contrarie to their kind. All the yewes in the countrie the ſame yære were barren, and brought no lambes. There was ſuch plentie of mice and rats both in houſes, and abroad in the fields, that they might not be deſtroied. In the 27 yære of his reigne, the riuers and other waters roſe on ſuch heigth through abundance of raine that fell in the latter end of harueſt, that breaking forth of their common chanels, with their violent ſtreame manie houſes & townes were borne downe and deſtroied. King Dauid being thus dead and buried, the nobles aſſembled at Lithquo, about the election of him that ſhould ſucceed in his place. The greater part of the nobilitie, and ſuch as were of the ſounder iudgement, agreed vpon Robert Steward; but William earle of Dowglas being come thither with a great power, clamed to be preferred by right of Edward Balioll, and of the Cumin, which right he pretended to haue receiued of them both, and there ought to be no doubt (as he alledged) but that the crowne apertained by iuſt title vnto them, as all the world knew, and therefore ſith he had both their rights, he maintained that he was true and vndoubted inheritor to the crowne. It appæred that the ſaid earle Dowglas purpoſed to vſurpe the crowne by force, if he might not haue it by friendlie and quiet meanes: but neuertheleſſe he was diſappointed of his purpoſe, by reaſon that George earle of March, and John Dunbar earle of Murrey, with the lord Erſkine [which thræ were capteins of Dunbreton, Sterling, and Edenburgh] and others (of whoſe friendlie furtherance he thought himſelfe aſſured) gaue their voices with the Steward, aſſiſting his ſide to their vttermoſt powers. The Dowglas perceiuing hereby that he ſhould not be able to mainteine his quarell, reſigned therevpon his pretenſed title, which in effect was of no importance, nor worth the diſcuſſing.

THen was Robert Steward conueid to Scone, and there crowned with great ſolemnitie, and was called Robert the ſecond. This came to paſſe in the 47 yære of his age, on our ladie day in Lent, called the Annuntiation, being the yære of Chriſt 1370. Moreouer, that the firmer amitie & friendſhip might continue and be nouriſhed betwixt this king Robert and his ſubiect the earle of Dowglaſſe aforeſaid, it was accorded that Eufemie eldeſt daughter to king Robert, ſhould be giuen in mariage to James ſonne to the earle of Dowglaſſe aforeſaid. ¶ Thus ye may perceiue how the Stewards came to the crowne, whoſe ſucceſſion haue inioied the ſame to our time: quæne Marie mother to Charles James that now that now reigneth, being the eight perſon from this Robert, that thus firſt atteined vnto it [of whoſe firſt originall and deſcent you ſhall ſæ before in the life of Duncan.

He had to wife at the time of his atteining to the crowne, Eufemie daughter to Hugh earle of Roſſe, by whome he had two ſonnes, Walter and Dauid. But before he was maried to hir, he kept one Elizabeth Mure in place of his wife, and had by hir thræ ſonnes, John, Robert, and Alexander, with diuerſe daughters, of the which one was maried to John Dunbar erle of Murrey, and another to John Leon lord of Glames. The earledome of Murrey continued in poſſeſſion of the Dunbars onelie during the life of this earle John & his ſonne, in whom the ſucceſſion failed touching the name of the Dunbars, in the inioieng of that earledome: for leauing a daughter behind him that was married to the Dowglas, the ſame Dowglas came by that means to the ſaid earledome of Murrey. King Robert after his coronation made ſundrie earles, lords, barons, and knights. Amongſt other, James Lindſey of Glenneſke was made earle of Crawford. His wife quæne Eufemie deceaſſed the third yeare after hir huſband atteined the crowne, and then incontinentlie he maried Elizabeth Mure [or Moore, daughter to ſir Adam Mure knight] his old lemman, to the end the children which he had by hir might be made legitimate by vertue of the matrimonie ſubſequent. The ſaid Walter procured the ſlaughter of James the firſt, for that he pretended a right to the crowne, as after ſhall appeare. Shortlie after, he called an other parlement at Perth, where it was ordeined, that after the death of king Robert, the crowne ſhould deſcend vnto John his eldeſt ſonne, and to his iſſue male; and for default thereof, vnto Robert his ſecond ſonne, and to his heires male; and for default of ſuch heires, to Alexander his third ſonne, and to his heires male, and in default of them, to remaine to his ſonne Walter, begotten on Eufemie his wife, & to the heires male of his bodie begotten: and if ſuch ſucceſſion failed, then it ſhould deſcend vnto his yongeſt ſonne Dauid the earle of Stratherne, and to his heires generall either male or female. In the yere following, against the next faire to be holden at Roxburgh aforesaid, the said earle of March, with his brother the earle of Murrey gathered a power of men secretlie togither, and comming to the said towne, tooke it, slue all the Englishmen found within it, put their goods to the sacke, and after set the towne on fire, and so departed.

Herevpon the Englishmen shortlie after enter with an armie into Scotland, burning and doing much hurt vpon the lands of sir John Gordon, for that they ioined to the earle of Marches lands. Sir John Gordon verie desirous to reuenge this iniurie, came into England with an armie, and getting togither a great bootie of cattell, returned therewith homewards, but being incountered by the way at a place called Carran or Carram, by John Lilborne and other Englishmen, there was a sore fight betwixt them, the victorie for a time shewing it selfe so variable and vncerteine, that sir John Gordon was sore wounded, and the Scots were fiue times that day had in chase, and as oft got the like aduantage of their enimies. In the end the Englishmen were clearelie discomfited, and their capteine sir John Lilborne, with his brother and diuerse other brought prisoners into Scotland [the maner whereof Iohn Maior condemneth and laieth the fault of breach in earle Dowglasse.]

To reuenge these displeasures, Henrie Persie earle of Northumberland entered into Scotland with seuen thousand men, & comming vnto Duns, there pitched downe his tents; but the night following came the herds and other people of the countrie, hauing prepared certeine bagges made and sowed togither, of drie leather like to bladders, into the which they had put small peble stones, & running vp & downe about the place where the Englishmen were incamped, made such a noise with those bags full of stones, that the Englishmens horsses breaking their halters and bridles wherewith they were tied, ran from their maisters and keepers, and were scattered so abroad in the countrie, that the Scotishmen got hold of them, and so in the morning the Englishmen that had watched all night (for doubt to haue bene assailed by their enimies) perceiuing themselues set on fot, returned home without anie further attempt.

In the meane time, Thomas Mulgraue capteine of Berwike, comming to the succours of the earle of Northumberland, chanced to meet with sir John Gordon vpon the way, by whom he was taken, and lead into Scotland as his prisoner. Neither had the Scots the better thus onelie on the east marches, but also on the west, where sir Io. Johnston had sundrie skirmishes with the Englishmen, and went euer awaie with the vpper hand. [All which before (vntill the death of Eufemie the quéne) Buchanan appointeth to the first two yéres of the king, before the death of the quéne.] About this time, pope Gregorie the 11 sent a legat from Auignion to king Robert, forbidding him in any wise to meddle with the goods perteining to the church, after the decease of anie bishop, person, or vicar. [About this time happened the death of Edward the third, king of England. And Charles the fift king of France sent ambassadors into Scotland, to renew the old leage betwene the two nations, and to persuade him to warre vpon England, to the end the warres might thereby be withdrawne out of France: which was performed accordinglie.

On the 22 day of October, in the yére 1378, Dauid Steward was borne, which afterwards was made duke of Rothsaie, and on saint Andrews day next following, towne of Berwike was taken by sir John Gordon, and sir or seuen other knights, but it was not long kept: for a number of English men entring by a posterne of the castell, recouered the towne easilie againe out of the Scotishmens hands. After this, William earle of Dowglas came with twentie thousand men to the faire of Pennire within England, and spoiled all the goods found as then in the same faire, and so returned with great riches into Scotland: but the Scotishmen smallie reioised at this gains, for with such cloth & other wares as they brought awaie with them from the foresaid faire, they drew into the countrie such a violent and sore pestilence, that the third part of all the people (where it came) died thereof. This was the third time that the pestilence was knowne to haue done anie great hurt in Scotland, being in the yére after the incarnation 1380.

The Englishmen [with the number of 1500, vnder the conduct (as saith Buchanan) of Talbot] to reuenge the displeasure done by the erle of Dowglas at Pennire, raised a great armie, and came with the same ouer Sulway, and inuading the Scotish borders on that side most cruellie, spared neither fire nor sword. In the meane time, the Scots gathered to the number of fiue hundred men, & stood in a streict till the Englishmen should come and passe by them, and then with such huge noise and clamor they set on the Englishmen, that in giuing backe there was foure hundred of them slaine, and a great number of the residue for hast drowned in the water of Sulway, and hereby was all the bootie of cattell & goods recouered againe by the Scots, and the most part of it restored to the owners. Charles the first as then French king, hearing of such prosperous aduentures dailie chancing to the Scots, sent ouer his ambassadors vnto king Robert, exhorting him to follow his good fortune, and occasion thus offered to reuenge old iniuries against the Englishmen, now that their hearts seemed to faile them through losses susteined diuerse waies of late at the Scotish mens hands. An other cause of their message was also (as the Scots do write) to renew the old league & band betwixt Scotland and France, which being done in solemne wise according to the maner, they returned into France, & with them went ambassadors from king Robert vnto their master the said K. Charles, Walter Wardlaw, cardinall & bishop of Glascow, with manie other noble men, who in like maner there renewed the same leage & bond of friendship, to the high contentation of both the princes. In which yére John Lion chancellor of Scotland was slaine by James Lindesay, earle of Crawford. This John Lion grew into so high fauour with king Robert, that he gaue to him his daughter the ladie Elizabeth in mariage, with diuerse possessions and lands, called Glammis. Of him the surname of the Lions is descended: and in memorie thereof, they beare in their armes the lion & lillies, with the tresse in forme and fashion as the king of Scotland beareth his, saue that their lions are placed in a blacke field. The cause why the earle of Crawford thus slue the chancellor, was onelie vpon enuie and spite, for that after he had maried the kings daughter, he atteined to such estimation and authoritie, that he might do all things with the king, according to his owne will and pleasure. For this offense the earle of Crawford remained in exile certeine yeres after, and durst not returne home, till finallie through earnest sute made

In the meane time, Edward king of England, the third of that name, departed this life, and Richard of Burdeaur, sonne to the blacke prince Edward, that was sonne to the said king Edward, succeeded, in the fourth yeere of whose reigne, being after the birth of our Sauiour 1381, John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, with other English lords, came into Scotland in ambassage [to whome were appointed James earle of Dowglasse, and John Dunbar earle of Murrey] to treat for the appeasing of the discord as then continuing betwixt the two realmes: and in the end the matter was so handeled, that a truce was concluded to indure for three yeeres. As the said duke was returning homewards, he was informed of the rebellion and insurrection made by the commons of England against the nobles, hauing one Jacke Straw and others to their capteins, whereupon doubting to passe thorough his owne countrie till things were better appeased, he returned into Scotland, and was conueied by William earle of Dowglasse, and Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, to holie rod house beside Edenburgh, where he remained till he heard that the rebels were suppressed, and their capteins slaine or taken, and put to execution.

As soone as the truce was expired, Archembald Dowglasse lord of Galloway, displeased in his mind that the Englishmen lieng in garison within the castell of Lochmaben, did daillie harrie and rob the villages and countrie townes of Galloway and Annandale, raised a great power by support of the earls James of Dowglasse, and George of March, and therewith laid a strong siege vnto the said castell of Lochmaben, & hauing lien there at the space of nine daies, they fought with a number of Englishmen that came out of Carleill to rescue this castell, whom hauing put to flight, they gaue therwith also a sharpe assalt to the castell, and put them within in such feare, that sir William Fetherston then capteine thereof, and the residue consented to yeeld the house vnto the Scots euen the same day without more adoo, vpon condition they might depart with their goods in safetie into England.

The castell of Lochmaben endered to the Scots.

But Fourdon writing of the winning of this castell, speaketh not of anie ouerthrow giuen to those that should come from Carleill, in maner as other write. For thus he saith. When Archembald Dowglasse had got knowledge that the same castell was vtterlie vnprouided both of men and vittels necessarie for the defense thereof, he assembled an armie together, with the helpe of the earles of Dowglasse and Dunbar, who ioining with him, inuironed the castell about with a strong siege, so that no succour could enter to the releefe of them within at anie hand. Herevpon the capteine sir William Fetherston knight, sent letters vnto the lord wardens of the English marches, requiring aid, and letting them to vnderstand in what danger he stood for lacke of men and vittels. The wardens wrote to him againe, that he should do his best for eight daies to hold out; and if no succour came within that terme, then to do as he should see cause. Herevpon sir William Fetherston requiring a truce of the Scotish lords for the space of those eight daies, within which terme if no succour came to remoue their siege, he would yeeld the castell vnto them, the liues and goods of them within saued. This was granted, and the Scots ceassed further to annoy them within by assalts: and when the ninth day was come, and no aid from England appeered, they receiued the castell into their possession, according to the couenant. And so the Scots hauing thus woone the castell of Lochmaben, raced it quite downe to the earth.

King Richard hearing that the Scots had atchiued this enterprise, appointed the baron of Graistocke with a certeine number of men to go with vittels and munition vnto Roxburgh, for doubt least if the Scots came to lay siege to that fortresse, and finding it vnprouided, they might peraduenture bring it into further danger than would lightlie be remedied. As this baron was come within a mile of Roxburgh, he was taken by the earle of March, and brought to Dunbar with all his prouision. The king of England being informed also of this mishap, appointed two armies, one by sea, and another by land, to inuade the Scots; the duke of Lancaster hauing the generall charge and conduct of them both, who giuing order to them that should passe by sea what they should do, entered himselfe by land, and walking the countries of March and Louthian, came to Edenburgh, and toke the towne. But whereas his souldiors would haue spoiled and burned it, he compounded with the inhabitants for a summe of monie, and so returned without doing anie more damage.

His nauie being as then arriued in the Forth, tarried behind, & first burning the abbeie of saint Colmes Inch, a number of the souldiers with their capteins landed in Fife, and spoiled diuerse townes and villages there: but in the end, Thomas and Nicholas Erskinnes being brethren, Alexander Lindsey, and William Cunningham of Kilmauris, set vpon them, and slue the most part of them, so that few in number escaped againe to their ships, being pursued hard to the water side. The same yeere the earle of Dowglasse recouered all the strengths of Tiuidale out of the Englishmens hands, which they had held euer since the battell of Durham vnto those daies. This earle of Dowglasse, one of the most valiant personages in those his daies, within the whole realme of Scotland, died within his castell of Dowglasse, shortlie after he had atchiued this enterprise, and was buried in the abbeie of Melrosse.

After his decease, his sonne James, or (as saith Buchanan) William succeeded in the earledome of Dowglasse, a verie fierce and hardie knight, the which shortlie after appointed by the king to haue the guiding of an armie, he passed with the same into England, and burnt the countrie so farre as Newcastell. But being countermanded home, he returned and came vnto Perth, where he found the lord John de Vian, admerall of France, and earle of Valentinois, who about the same time was arriued in Scotland with two hundred and fortie ships well and perfectlie furnished for the warres, and in them two thousand and fiue hundred armed men, diuerse of them being lords and barons, besides gentlemen and others. Also there was amongest them 400 hagbutters (as Bellenden saith) and two hundred with crosbowes: the residue bare pikes, halberts, and such like weapons. They were paied their wages for one whole yeere aforehand, and had brought vittels with them to serue them as long. They had brought also with them foure hundred paire of white curets, foure hundred halfe long swords, & fiftie thousand franks, to be giuen among the nobles of Scotland, accordinglie as king Robert should appoint and thinke expedient.

The admerall and other the nobles of France, being thus come into Scotland to make warres on the Englishmen, were highlie feasted by the king and lords of the realme, as then present with him; and when the earle of Dowglasse was once come, by common consent of them all there assembled together in councell, it was ordeined that an armie should be raised with all speed, that ioining with these

The earle of Fife ſonne to king Robert was appointed to be generall of this armie, hauing with him the earles of Dowglaſſe, and March, Archembald Dowglaſſe lord of Galloway, and diuerſe other of the Scotiſh nobilitie. This armie when they were all togither, amounted to the number of fiftie thouſand men, the which entring into England, toke the caſtels of Warke, Fourd, and Cornewall. After this, by robbing and ſpoiling the countrie betwixt Berwike and Newcaſtell, they did much hurt in all parts where they came; but through continuall raine which fell as then in great abundance, they were conſtreined to returne into Scotland, where they pitched downe their field nére to the caſtell of Rockeſburgh, purpoſing to haue aſſaied the winning thereof: but forſomuch as they could not agrée in whoſe name it ſhould be kept if it were wonne, they left that enterpriſe. For the Frenchmen required that if they wan it, that then it might be kept by them, in the name and to the behoſe of the French king, whereunto the Scots would not agrée.

Yet after this, the Frenchmen wiſhing to accompliſh ſome other enterpriſe, went to the weſt borders, where ioining with Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, they paſſed ouer Sulway ſands; and ſo entering into Cumberland, did wonderfull much hurt in that countrie. At length they determined to lay ſiege vnto Carleill, but being called from thence they returned into Scotland, and then (as ſome authors write) and not before, they laid ſiege to Rockſburgh, and raiſed from thence within eight daies after, by reaſon of the variance before alledged. At Allhallowentide next inſuing, the Frenchmen returned into France, hauing indured no ſmall trauell and paines, ſince their firſt comming forth of their countrie. Amongeſt certeine other things, found in rifeling and ranſacking of houſes in this iournie, there was a charter found of certeine lands giuen by king Athelſtane, in this forme: I king Athelſtane gines to Paullane, Odhiam and Rodhiam, als guid aud als faire, als euer yay mine waire, and yarto witneſſe Mauld my wife. ¶ By tenure of which déed it may appeare, that our anceſtors gaue more credit to the true meaning of a few words barelie expreſſed in their writings, than that there needed ſo long proceſſe and circumſtance as is now vſed with long ſtudie of penning, nothing being thought ſufficient to aſſure the parties of their couenanted bargaines, and concluded agreements.

In this laſt iournie againſt the Engliſhmen, William Dowglas baſtard ſonne to Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, wan great fame and honor for his high prowes and noble valiancie, ſhewed as well in certeine approches made vnto Carleill, as in diuerſe other ſkirmiſhes elſewhere. The king alſo herevpon began to fauour him in ſuch wiſe, that he thought him worthie of ſome high aduancement; and therevpon gaue him his daughter in mariage, named Giles, a ladie of ſuch excellent beautie, as hir match in thoſe daies was not to be found: [with whome for hir dowrie, he gaue the lands of Middeſdale.] He begat on hir a daughter, which was after maried to the earle of Orkenie. This William Dowglas (as Iohn Fourdon noteth) was of a blackiſh or ſwart colour, not ouercharged with fleſh; but big of bone, a mightie perſonage, vpright and tall, valiant, courteous, amiable, full of liberalitie, merrie, faithfull, and pleaſant in companie, but herewith he was of ſuch ſtrength, that whome ſoeuer he ſtroke either with mace, ſword, or ſpeare, downe he went were he neuer ſo well armed. At one time (as the ſame Fourdon ſaith) he hauing with him but eight hundred, fought againſt thrée thouſand Engliſhmen, of whome two hundred he ſlue in the field, & brought fiue hundred priſoners with him into Scotland.

In the yéere 1388, Robert earle of Fife, and Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, entered with a proud armie into England, and in the meane time came ſundrie Iriſhmen by ſea to the coaſts of Galloway, and landing in diuerſe places, fetched awaie great booties of cattell, and other goods of the inhabitants: whereof William Dowglas, ſonne of the ſaid Archembald being informed, got a conuenient power of men togither, by ſupport of his brother in law, Robert earle of Fife, and by licence of the king paſſed ouer with the ſame, ſhiped in certeine veſſels into Ireland, where being got on land, he laid ſiege to the towne of Carlingford. The townesmen doubting to be taken by aſſault, purchaſed a truce for certeine daies, promiſing to giue a great ſumme of monie to haue their towne ſaued: but in the meane time, they aſſembled the number of eight hundred men, through helpe of an other towne not farre off, called Doundalke, and ioining with them, they diuided themſelues into two parts. One part ſet vpon Robert Steward of Durisdeir, who hauing the conduct of the earle of Fifes men, was gone abroad into the countrie to fetch in ſome preie: and the other part aſſailed William Dowglas, that lay ſtill afore the towne.

At length both theſe armies met togither about a ten miles from Newcaſtell. Here the earle of Dowglaſſe choſe forth ten thouſand of the moſt able men that could be found amongeſt all the numbers, with the which he went to Newcaſtell, to trie if by anie meanes he might take the towne. There was gathered into Newcaſtell before his comming thither, the moſt part of all the choſen men from Yorke to the borders, with the earle of Northumberland, who by reaſon of extreme age was not able to ſturre abroad (anie thing to purpoſe) himſelfe, but he had with him two of his owne ſonnes, the one named Henrie, and the other Raſe, verie forward and luſtie gentlemen. Henrie Perſie deſirous to ſhew ſome proofe of his ſingular manhood, wherein he greatlie truſted, required to fight with the earle of Dowglaſſe man to man; which requeſt the earle granting, togither they ran, mounted on two great courſers with ſharpe grond ſpeares at the vttерance. The earle of Dowglaſſe in this incounter bare himſelfe ſo well, that in the end he droue the Perſie out of his ſaddle. The Engliſhmen that ſtood without the gates, made to the reſcue, recouered him on foot, and brought him forthwith backe into the towne. Incontinentlie hervpon, the earle of Dowglaſſe cauſed the aſſault to be giuen, and filling the ditches with haie and fagots, came with ladders to the wals: but the Engliſhmen ſo well defended themſelues, that the Scots were beaten backe, not without great loſſe and ſlaughter of their people.

¶ Froiſſard making mention of this enterpriſe thus made by the Scots, varieth ſomewhat from the Scotiſh writers in this place: for he ſpeaketh nothing that the Dowglaſſe and the Perſie ſhould thus run togither on horſſebacke (as before is ſpecified) but that in giuing aſſault to the towne, it chanced, that as the Engliſhmen defended their barriers without the gate, the Dowglas fortuned to be matched hand to hand with Henrie Perſie, and there by force plucked the Perſies ſtaffe from him, and in returning hoiſted it vp on heigth, ſaieng, he would carrie the ſame for his ſake into Scotland: and the next day after, he raiſed his campe and departed homewards towards the borders, & comming to a place called Otterborne, about twelue or fourteene miles from Newcaſtell, pitched downe his tents there, that his ſouldiors might take ſome reſt, & refreſh themſelues after their great trauell, for they had not reſted of all the day nor night before, nor to anie purpoſe, ſince their firſt entering into England.

In the meane time the Engliſh power was highlie increaſed at Newcaſtell, for a great number of the countrie came, and entered into the towne the ſame night that followed the day of the aſſault. Henrie Perſie then perceiuing his number ſufficient to fight with Dowglaſſe, ſet them in order of battell, & determined to iſſue forth vpon the Scots, and to giue them an incounter: but when he vnderſtood that they were gone homewards, he followed them with all ſpeed, for he would by no meanes that they ſhould paſſe into Scotland without battell, truſting to recouer the diſhonor which he had ſuſteined by loſing his ſtaffe at the barriers before the gate of Newcaſtell. Earle Dowglaſſe aduertiſed that the enimies were comming to giue him battell, exhorted his people with few words to remember their wonted manhood, that by gaining the victorie, they might win euerlaſting fame and honor, with ſafegard to themſelues and their countrie. The Perſie likewiſe for his part, incouraged his men, willing them to fight manfullie in reuenge of their iniuries done to them and their friends by the Scots, and herewith commanding the trumpets to ſound, he gaue the onſet fiercelie.

Here both the armies ioining togither, a right terrible incounter inſued: but becauſe the night was at hand, before they began to ſoine, through want of light to ſee what was to do, they were ſeuered in ſunder for that time; but remembring that the moone would ſhortlie riſe, they determined ſo ſone as ſhe began to giue light, to renew the battell againe. As ſone therefore as the moone began to appeare, they ioined againe with more malice than before. The Engliſhmen fought ſo egerlie, that putting the Scots backe, and cauſing them to giue ground, they had woone the Scotiſh ſtandards, and ſo by all likelihood got the vpper hand, had not Patrike Heporne with his ſonne, & ſuch other of his companie as attended him, come to the reſcue, by whome the fight was begun afreſh. Herewith alſo came the earle of Dowglaſſe, and with a great mace in his hand laid ſuch ſore ſtrokes round about him, that none came within his reach, but downe he went.

They were ſeuered by comming on of the night.

The valiancie of the earle of Dowglaſſe.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan.

✻ The ſaid Dowglaſſe the yonger, hauing with him Robert & Simon Glendoure, was (all which notwithſtanding) moſt grieuouſlie wounded, whom his friends (comming about to ſuccor) found then caſt vpon the ground, next vnto whome lay one named Hart moſt miſerablie wounded alſo. At what time a prieſt (which had faithfullie aſſiſted this Dowglaſſe in all diſtreſſe) did (now the bodie being faint and deaied) defend the ſame from other hurt of the aduerſarie. Dowglaſſe lieng in this eſtate, his neare friends (John Lindſeie, John and Walter Seintclere) came vnto him, demanding how he did. To whome he ſtoutlie anſwered (as one whome the preſence of death nothing diſmaied) that he was verie well; for ſaid he, I do not now die in my bed (by ſluggiſh deſtinie) but in the field, as almoſt all my anceſtors haue done. Wherefore, this ſhall be the laſt thing that I will require of you; firſt to keepe my death moſt ſecret, ſecondlie that you ſuffer not my ſtandard to be throwne downe, and laſtlie that you reuenge my death; the which if I may before hand by your promiſe hope to be performed, I ſhall with more patience indure all other things. Whervpon they firſt ſeuered his bodie that it ſhould not be knowen; then they erected his ſtandard, crieng (as the maner is) A Dowglaſſe a Dowglaſſe. At which voice, there was ſo great a concurſe of people, & ſuch a toſſull aſſault vpon the enimie; that forthwith they draue them from the place of the battell. For at the verie

The Engliſh men put to flight.

Finallie, the whole number of the Scotiſhmen bare themſelues ſo manfullie, that the Engliſhmen being broken and put to flight, were ſlaine & borne downe. The chaſe continued till the breake of the day with killing and taking, as in ſuch caſes is euer ſéene, though the more part in déed were taken with their liues ſaued after they once fell in the chaſe.

Raſe and Henrie Perſie taken priſoners.

Amongeſt other, Raſe Perſie and his brother Henrie, were taken by Keith, the marſhall of Scotland, ſomewhat before the Engliſhmen began to turne.

There was alſo taken beſides the two Perſies, diuers other men of name, as Robert Ogill, Thomas Halberke, Iohn Lilborne, William Wauchlut, Robert Heron, the baron of Hilton, Iohn Colwell, and Patrike Louell knights.

The number of priſoners taken.

There were taken in all of Engliſhmen, to the number of a thouſand and fortie, and ſlaine what in the field and chaſe (as Froiſſard recounteth) aboue an eightéene hundred. [But Buchan. ſaith, there were 1840 ſlaine, 1000 wounded, and 1004 taken.)

Fr. Thin. There were ſlaine but fiue hundred Engliſhmen as Hector Boetius ſaith.

But yet the Scotiſh writers themſelues report a leſſe number. Neither did this victorie chance to the Scots without great loſſe and ſlaughter. For amongſt other, the earle of Dowglaſſe himſelfe was thriſe ſtricken through the bodie, and alſo wounded ſo mortallie on the head, that being borne to his tent a little before the end of the battell, he died of thoſe hurts immediatlie after, to the great diſcomfort of all his armie, conceiuing more dolorous griefe for the loſſe of ſo worthie a chieftaine, than ioy for the gaine of a great victorie.

The houſe of the Hepborns (of the which this Patrike Hepborne that fought ſo valiantlie in this battell at Otterborne did deſcend) aroſe in Scotland after this wiſe.

It chanced in the daies of king Dauid the third, there was an Engliſhman of that name taken priſoner in Scotland, who by chance being in place where the earle of March was got vpon a yong gelding vnbroken, the which plaieng the vnrulie iade, in fetching and flinging aloft, put the earle in great danger of his life; and when all other that were preſent there gaue backe, and durſt not ſtep in to make anie ſhift to helpe the earle: this Engliſhman lept to him, and boldlie catching hold on the bridle reine, held the horſſe faſt, till the earle was ſafelie got beſide him.

This battell of Otterborne was fought on ſaint Oſwalds day, which is the fift of Auguſt, in the yeare 1388.

1388. Fr. Thin. Buchan.

¶Amongſt thoſe that fled to the battell, was Mathew Redman gouernor of Berwike, whom Iames Lindſeie (ſuppoſing by the beautie of his armor to be of the nobler ſort) did vehementlie follow by the ſpace of three miles. At the laſt, Redman perceiuing that he was not by flight able to eſcape (and déeming it better to hazzard his life, than otherwiſe to be ſlaine without aduenture) alighted from his horſſe to fight with his enimie on foot, which Lindſeie did accordinglie; in the end after a long conflict betweéne them, the Engliſhman (being as ſaith Buchanan inferior to the Scot in armor & weapon) did yéeld himſelfe to his aduerſarie. By whome (after that he had giuen an oth to returne at a certeine day) he was permitted to go at libertie. Such in thoſe daies was the humanitie amongeſt the borderers, and both nations towards their priſoners, which to this day doth continue betweéne the inhabitants of thoſe places. But if anie do not returne at the day appointed, this puniſhment is ſet vpon him for a perpetuall diſgrace. That in the aſſemblies of true daies (to demand reſtitutions of things and iniuries done by the one nation vnto the other) they vſe that he which complaineth himſelfe to be deceiued by his priſoner (on his promiſe) doth carrie about a hand or gloue painted in a cloth vpon a long ſtaffe or ſpeare to be ſéene of all men; the which is accounted a ſingular infamie to the deſeruers thereof. For they which haue ſo broken their faith, be euer after hated of their friends and acquaintance; for which diſhoneſtie, they will not afford them good report or interteinment. Lindſeie hauing with this condition diſmiſſed his priſoner (and perceiuing a great number of armed men) made directlie towards them, not knowing that they were his enimies, vntill he had ridden ſo néere vnto them, that he could not withdraw himſelfe out of their danger. Theſe men were the bands of the biſhop of Durham, who when he came too late to Newcaſtell (to ioine with Perſie at the battell of Otterborne, becauſe he ſuppoſed that the enimies would not ioine vntill the next day) commanded his armie to reſt there, and to fall to their ſupper. Shortlie after which, he tooke his iournie towards the Scots.

Lindſeie had a halberd, and Redman a ſword with a backler which he caried at his backe. Io. Maior. lib. 6. cap 14.

Io. Ma. ſaith if they breake promiſe, the picture of him is tied to a horſſe taile and drawen about the borders of the countrie.

The biſhop of Durham goeth towards the Scots, accompanied with Thomas Lindſeie and Thomas Clifford.

But (before he was anie great way marched out of the towne) vnderſtanding (by thoſe that fled from Otterborne battell towards Newcaſtell) that Perſie was ouerthrowne, and had loſt the field, he returned with his friends to Newcaſtell, to conſult what he ſhould do againſt the enimie. At which time it was declared, that the next day at the ſunne riſing, they ſhould all be redie in armor to ſéeke the Scots. According wherevnto in the morning of the next day, the inhabitants bordering thereabouts were aſſembled, who (with theſe that the biſhop had brought thither) were of all ſorts gathered togither, to the number of 10000 horſſemen and footmen. Theſe ſtirred the biſhops mind, that (with all ſpéed) hée ſhould lead them toward the Scots, and trie the ſucceſſe of battell, for the Scots (ſaid they) wearied with the former daies fight, and moſt of them wounded, will not be able to abide the ſecond batell. With which ſpéeches they perſuaded themſelues of an eaſie conqueſt. Whereupon the biſhop ſet forward with his armie, whoſe comming being vnderſtood by the ſcouts of the Scots, the erle of Murrey (whom now all men did follow after the death of Dowglas) called the preſent nobilitie togither to conſult what ſhould be done with the priſoners, whom they could not in iuſtice now kill (hauing receiued them vpon ranſome) but it would ſéeme a moſt cruell part: and to reſcue them (being their enimies, and almoſt an equall number to themſelues) it was a thing moſt dangerous. Wherefore it was concluded, that the priſoners ſhould ſweare, that they would not ſtirre whileſt the Scots and Engliſh were in fight; and further, that if the Scots were ouercome, and they (being now their priſoners) recouered from them, that yet they ſhould ſtill remaine priſoners vnto them as before, and ſo returne to them at a certeine day. Theſe things thus done, they left the priſoners in the campe, with a ſmall gard which ſhould execute a preſent reuenge vpon them, if they did at anie time ſeeme to attempt anie thing.

After this the Scots (full of the victories latelie obteined) afreſh deſcended into the battell, defended behind with the marches, and on the left and right ſide with the dead bodies of the former conflict: at what time it was alſo commanded that euerie one (as he did approch the enimie) ſhould blow the horne he caried about his necke (hanging at his backe) as lowd as he could, which ſound being of it ſelfe terrible, was in the eccho (by reflexion of the hilles) ſo multiplied, that it forced the enimie to ſuppoſe the Scots to be of greater number than in truth they were. But before they entred into the battell (as ſaith Iohn Maior) George of Dunbar earle of March incouraged his ſoldiers with theſe words. We haue this night (moſt noble Scots) ſuſteined the chiefe heat and force of the battell, we haue ouerthrowne the youth and ſtrength of Northumberland with their two princes: for which there is no cauſe why we (after ſuch honor obteined againſt thoſe valiant princes) ſhould now feare this ſillie prieſt. Trulie there remaineth nothing now for vs, but that euerie one of vs giue but two ſtrokes, becauſe the leader will flie at the third, and all the flocke will follow, ſince the ſhéepeheard ſtroken, the ſhéepe will be diſperſed. But if they ſhall ſo long contend with vs, that (as God moſt rightlie forbid) we chance to be ouercome, then ſhall we moſt ſhamefully loſe the glorie which we before haue honorablie gained by this nights trauell. But contrarie, if we be men, and put on vs ſuch valiant hearts (as the preſeruation of honor requireth) we ſhall eaſilie teach this mitred prieſt, that it had béene farre more honor to him, ſafetie to his, and moſt commoditie to them all, that he had remained at home, with rods to correct vnbrideled and negligent ſcholers, than with ſword to enter battell againſt growne and bearded ſouldiers.

The maner of the Scots was, that going to battell they carie a horne about their necks like hunters, and in the battell incourage themſelues to fight with that, Io. Ma. li. 6. ca. 4. which I ſuppoſe was alſo the maner of the Engliſh (as may be by manie ſubſtantial reaſons approued.)

This being ſpoken, and the Engliſh now come to the point to ioine with the aduerſarie, the Scots began the alarms with their hornes, whereupon the Engliſh hearing that terrible noiſe (vnaccuſtomed to them in ſuch multitude) remembring that they muſt fight in the middle of dead carcaſſes of their friends and kinred latelie ſlaine (a ſpectacle to diſcourage moſt valiant hearts) and ſomewhat abaſhed at the chéerefulneſſe of the Scots ſtanding againſt them (which they looked not for after the laſt battell) the Engliſh (I ſay) conſidering theſe things, retired towards the place from whence they came, and ſuffered the Scots to returne without anie other purſute againſt them. In the meane time, when Alexander Lindſeie (taken as before, and as yet priſoner in Newcaſtell) chanced to be ſéene and knowne by Redman (his yélded priſoner) he was moſt courteouſlie (after congratulation of amitie betwéene them) ſuffred to depart frō Newcaſtell to Scotland.)

A parlement at Perth.

In the yéere following, a parlement was holden at Perth, in the which demonſtration was made by king Robert, that forſomuch as he was broken by great age, and might not through féebleneſſe occaſioned thereof attend to his office in gouernement of the realme, it was neceſſarie that ſome gouernor ſhould be choſen; wherfore he required that his ſecond ſonne Robert earle of Fife might inioy that office, conſidering his eldeſt ſonne Iohn earle of Carrike (by reaſon of a ſtripe which he had receiued on the leg by an horſſe of ſir James Dowglaſſe of Dalketh) was not able to trauell, but kept his bed, and might ſturre no way forth abroad. The lords conſented to the kings requeſt, and ſo the earle of Fife was conſtituted gouernour of Scotland, by common conſent of all the lords of the realme [before which time (as ſaith Buchanan) they were called wardens and not gouernors.] Alſo the earle marſhall of England was ſent by king Richard to the borders, to remaine there as warden in the place of Henrie Perſie priſoner in Scotland. It is reported by the Scotiſh writers, that this earle ſhould make ſtout brags, that he would fight with the Scots the next time he met with anie power of them, whether he were like in number to them or not. But when it came to paſſe that Robert Steward the Scotiſh gouernor was entered into Northumberland with an armie, hée withdrew into places of ſafegard, and ſuffered the moſt part of the countrie to be harried and burned.

In deed our Engliſh writers affirme, that the ſaid earle, hauing with him but fiue hundred men of armes, was not able to accompliſh anie notable exploit auailable againſt the great multitude of his enimies.

A truce taken

In the ſame yeere was a truce taken betwixt England and France, the Scots (if they would ſo agrée) being comprized therein. Herevpon there came ambaſſadors forth of England, to vnderſtand what the king of Scots would determine in that behalfe. By whom it was anſwered, that he would with good will ſtand to the ſame truce according as it was concluded. Whileſt things paſſed thus in Scotland, Alexander Steward earle of Buchquhane burnt the cathedrall church of Murrey, the lanterne and ornament of all the north part of Scotland, vpon diſpleaſure conceiued againſt the biſhop of the ſame place. Whereat his father the king tooke ſuch indignation, that when his ſonne the ſaid Alexander was brought to his preſence, he commanded him to bée committed vnto ſtreict priſon, wherein he remained till after his fathers deceaſſe. The realme being in this maner brought to good tranquillitie, king Robert falling into great infirmitie and féebleneſſe, by reaſon of extreame age, without any maner of other accidentall ſickneſs, deceaſſed at his caſtell of Dundonald, the 19 day of Aprill, in the yeere after our redemption 1390, being as then aboue 75 yéeres of age, and hauing reigned the ſpace of 19 yéeres, his bodie was buried at Scone before the high altar.

This Robert the ſecond, though by reaſon of his great age, he went not forth into the wars himſelfe, yet was there neuer prince afore him that had more happie ſucceſſe by the conduct of his capteins which he ſent forth as lieutenants vnder him, for they neuer lightlie returned home but with victorie. He was a prince of ſuch conſtancie in promiſe, that he ſeldome ſpake the word which he performed not. Such an obſeruer he was alſo of iuſtice, that whenſoeuer he remoued from anie place, he would cauſe proclamation to be made, that if anie of his men or officers had taken vp anie thing vnpaid for, the partie to whom the debt was due ſhould come in, and immediatlie he ſhould be ſatiſfied. He willinglie heard the complaints of the poore, and was no leſſe diligent to ſée their wrongs redreſſed.

After the deceaſſe of king Robert the ſecond, his ſon Iohn Steward earle of Carrike was admitted to the crowne, which he receiued at Scone on the Aſſumption of our ladie. And forſomuch as Iohn was thought to be an vnfortunate name for kings, they changed the ſame, and called him Robert after his father, being now the third of that name. ❧ But whether the ſame was ſo altered, either for the calamities which happened to the two Johns, the king of England and the king of France, or for the good ſucceſſe of the two former Roberts (Bruſe and Steward) had in the victories and gouernement of the realme: for their vertue in peace and warres: for their vniuerſall happineſſe in what they attempted:

I will leaue vncerteine, hauing no certeintie deliuered thereof vnto me. This Robert the third rather lacked vices, than was beautified with anie extraordinarie vertues, for which cause he being king in name, his brother Robert was king in deed, as one vpon whome the whole gouernement did depend.

William Dowglas of Middesdale chosen admerall by the lords of Prutzen.

About the same time William Dowglasse of Middisdale was chosen by the lords of Prutzen, to be admerall of a nauie, conteining two hundred and fortie ships, which they had rigged, and purposed to set forth against the miscreant people of the northeast parts. But being appealed by the lord Clifford an Englishman (who was there likewise to serue with the foresaid lords in that iournie) to fight with him in a singular combat: before the day came appointed for them to make triall of the battell, the lord Clifford lay in wait for the Dowglasse, and vpon the bridge of Danzke met with him, and there slue him, to the great disturbance and stay of the whole iournie. Moreouer, shortlie after the coronation of king Robert the third, tidings came that Duncane [whom some call Daiech Steward] sonne to Alexander Steward the kings brother afore rehearsed, was entred into Angus with a great number of men, and slue Walter Ogiluie shiriffe of the countrie, that came forth with a power to resist him from spoiling the people, whom he miserablie afflicted; howbeit these his insolent doings were not long vnpunished. For the earle of Crawford being sent against him with an armie, caused him to disperse his companie, and to flée his waies; but being apprehended with the most part of his said companie, they were punished according to their demerits.

He is slaine by the lord Clifford. Duncan Steward inuadeth Angus.

The north parts of Scotland sore disquieted by two clans.

At this time also the most part of the north countrie of Scotland, was sore disquieted by two clans of those Irish Scots, called Laterans, which inhabit the hie-land countries, the one named Clankaies and the other Clanquhattans. These two being at deadlie fude, robbed and wasted the countrie with continuall slaughter and reise. At length it was accorded betwixt the parties, by the aduise of the earls of Murrey and Crawford, that thirtie persons of the one clan, should fight before the king at Perth, against thirtie of the other clans men, with sharpe swords to the vtterance, without anie kind of armor or harnesse, in triall and decision of the quarell, for the which the variance betwixt them first arose. Both these clans right ioifull of this appointment, came to Perth with their number, where, in a place called the North inch, a litle beside the towne, in presence of the king and other iudges assigned thereto, they fought according as it was agréed, and that with such rage and desperate furie, that all those of Clankaies part were slaine (one onelie excepted) who to saue his life, after he saw all his fellowes slaine, lept into the water of Taie, and swam ouer, and so escaped. There were 11 of Clanquhattans side that escaped with life, but not one of them vnwounded and that verie sore. At their entring into the field or lists where they should fight the battell, one of the clans wanted one of his number, by reason that he which should haue supplied it, was priuilie stolen awaie, not willing to be partaker of so deare a bargaine. But there was a countrie-felow among the beholders, who being sorie that so notable a fight should be passed ouer, offered himselfe for a small summe of monie to fill vp the number, though the matter apperteined nothing to him, nor to anie of his friends. [This man (as saith Buchanan) séemed to be a saddle-maker, who for halfe a Frenchcrowne, and his diet during his life (if he were victor) toke the matter in hand, in which none behaued himselfe more valiantlie than he, on whose part the said eleuen did suruiue, himselfe making vp the number.] This battell was fought thus betwéene the two clans, in maner as is before remembred, in the yeere 1396.

In the third, or (as saith Buchanan) the second yéere after, a parlement was holden at Perth, wherin, besides diuerse constitutions and ordinances enacted for the aduancement of the common-wealth, the king made his eldest sonne named Dauid (that was then about eightéene yéres of age) duke of Rothsaie, and his brother Robert (that was earle of Fife and gouernor of the realme, as before ye haue heard) he created duke of Albanie. These were the first dukes that had béene heard of in Scotland, for till those daies there was neuer anie within the realme that bare that title of honor. [Which virgin title (saith Buchanan of that honor) gaue neuer good successe to the maisters]. During the time that the peace continued betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, there were sundrie iusts and combats put in vre, and exercised betwixt Scots and Englishmen, for proofe of their valiant actiuitie in feats of armes, to win thereby fame and honor. But amongst the residue, that was most notable, which chanced betwixt Dauid earle of Crawford Scotish, and the lord Welles English.

Iustes and combats betwixt Scots and Englishmen.

It was agréed betwixt these two noble men, to run certeine courses on horsebacke, with speares sharpe ground for life and death. The place appointed for these iusts was London bridge, and the day the three and twentith of Aprill, being the feast of saint George. At the place & day thus prefixed, they came redie to furnish their enterprise, and being mounted on their mightie coursers, they ran togither right egerlie. At the first course, though they atteinted, yet kept they their saddles without anie perill of falling. The people beholding how stiffelie earle Dauid sat without mouing, cried that the Scotishman was locked in his saddle. He hearing this, leapt beside his horsse, and verie nimblie mounted vp againe into the saddle, armed as he was, to the great wonder of the beholders. This done, he toke another staffe, & so togither they ran againe right fiercelie the second time, and yet without anie great hurt on either part: but the third time, the lord Welles was borne out of the saddle, and sore hurt with the grieuous fall.

The earle of Crawford of Scotland, & the lord Wels of England iusted for life and death.

The lord Wels borne out of his saddle.

And for bicause the earle of Crawford thus vanquished his aduersarie on saint Georges day, hée founded a chanterie of seuen priests to sing in our ladies church of Dundée, in memorie of S. George, which they did vnto our time, not without singular commendation of the said earle. After this, he remained three moneths in England, in sporting and feasting amongst the nobles, before he returned into Scotland, highlie praised of all estates for his noble port and great liberalitie there shewed amongst them. Not long after, one sir Robert Morlaie an Englishman, came into Scotland to trie his manhood in singular battell, with whome soeuer would come against him: he vanquished one Archembald Edmounston, and Hugh Wallase: but at length he was ouercome by one Hugh Traill at Berwike, and died shortlie after vpon displeasure thereof conceiued.

Praise of the erle of Crawford.

In the same yéere, Richard king of England, maried married Iſabell daughter to the French king, and ſone after went into Ireland, to ſubdue ſuch Iriſh rebels, as troubled the quiet ſtate of the countrie. But in the meane time, his lords at home rebelled againſt him, and determined to depoſe him from the crowne, ſo that vpon his returne into England, he was apprehended, put in ward, and ſhortlie after conſtreined to renounce all his right to the crowne, and adiudged therewith to perpetuall priſon: yet at length (as the Scotiſh chronicle telleth) he got forth of priſon diſguiſed in womans apparell, and came into Galloway, where he fell in ſeruice with a Scotiſh man named Makdonald. But at the laſt, being bewrayed and knowen what he was, and therevpon brought to king Robert, he was right honorablie by him interteined: neuertheleſſe, knowing himſelfe depoſed from his roiall eſtate, he gaue himſelfe wholie to contemplation, till finallie he departed this world at Sterling, and was buried in the blacke friers there within the ſame towne, as the ſame Scotiſh chronicles vntrulie do report. But to the matter, Henrie the ſonne of John of Gaunt, ſometime duke of Lancaſter, after that king Richard was depoſed, was crowned king of England at Weſtminſter, the thirtenth day of October, in the yere 1399.

In the yere nert inſuing, that is to ſay, 1400, king Robert, in conſideration of a ſumme of monie to him aforehand paid, contracted couenants of mariage to be had and made betwirt his ſonne the duke of Rothſaie, and the earle of Marches daughter. But Archembald earle of Dowglas, hauing indignation that the earle of March ſhould be preferred before him, by ſupport of the duke of Albanie, procured a councell to be called, in the which he found meanes to aſſure his daughter the ladie Margerie, or Marie (as ſaith Buchanan) vnto the ſaid duke of Rothſaie, & with all ſpeed went about to conſummate the mariage betwirt them, to put the matter out of all doubt. The earle of March perceiuing this dealing, came to the king, and required to know his pleaſure, if he minded to performe the couenants concluded, concerning the mariage betwirt the prince and his daughter, or not; making as it were a great complaint of that which was alreadie done to the breach thereof; and receiuing anſwer nothing agreeable to his mind, he departed in a great fume, not ſticking to ſay, he would be reuenged on ſuch vntruth per it were long. Shortlie after he fled into England, leauing his caſtell of Dunbar well ſtuffed of all things neceſſarie for defenſe, in the keeping of his ſiſters ſonne named Robert Haitland. But when Archembald Dowglaſſe came thither in the kings name, and required to haue the caſtell rendered into his hands, this Robert Haitland obeied the kings commandement, and deliuered the houſe to the ſaid Dowglaſſe.

George earle of March informed hereof, procured all his friends to conueie themſelues into England, and determined with himſelfe to do all the diſpleaſure and miſchiefe he might inuent againſt his owne native countrie. King Robert ſore dreading, leaſt by this earles procurement ſome trouble might hap to follow amongeſt his ſubiects [did (firſt confiſcating his goods) ſend] an herald at armes into England with letters vnto him, promiſing by the tenure of the ſame, not onelie to pardon him of all offenſes committed, but alſo to redreſſe all wrongs or iniuries which he had anie waies forth receiued, if he would returne into Scotland. And forſomuch as the earle of March refuſed this offer, the ſame herald according to inſtructions giuen him at his departure from king Robert, went immediatlie to Henrie king of England with other letters, earneſtlie deſiring him to cauſe the earle of March to depart out of his realme, & not to receiue anie rebels out of Scotland into his bounds, whereby the peace might be violated, which as yet remained betwirt the two kingdomes.

Sent letters alſo vnto the king of England.

King Henrie vpon reaſonable allegations (as he pretended) refuſed to ſatiſfie king Roberts petitions in this behalfe, by reaſon whereof the peace brake betwirt them and their ſubiects, without anie further tracting of time. For ſhortlie after, Henrie Perſie, ſurnamed (as is ſaid) Henrie Hotſpur, and the earle of March entered into Scotland, and got togither a great bootie of goods and cattell [in Louthian about Hadington, at what time they did in vaine beſiege the caſtell of Hais or Halis, who being at Lintone were come vpon by the Scots, for (to haue returne of the booties taken) Archembald earle of Dowglaſſe] hauing aſſembled a power of men, came with the ſame towards the enimies, immediatlie wherevpon they fled to Berwike, and left all their bootie behind them, which being recouered by the ſaid earle of Dowglaſſe and his companie, he returned backe vnto Edenburgh, where he ſhortlie after being taken with an hot feuer, departed out of this life, leauing behind him an honorable memorie of his name, for his high proweſſe and noble valiancie ſhewed in manie and ſundrie enterpriſes, by him luckilie atchiued for the wealth of his countrie. He was named of his terrible countenance and dreadfull looke, The grim Dowglaſſe.

The deceaſſe of Archembald earle of Dowglaſſe.

After his deceaſſe, his ſecond ſonne that was called likewiſe Archembald, was made earle of Dowglaſſe; for his eldeſt ſonne William Dowglaſſe died in the yere before his father. Shortlie after, Henrie king of England came into Scotland with an armie, without doing anie great damage to the people; for he required no more of them that kept anie caſtels or ſtrengths, but onelie to put forth a banner of his armes as he paſſed by. At his comming to Hadington, he was lodged in the nunrie there, & ſhewed much bounteous humanitie toward the nuns, and all other of that houſe, not ſuffering anie manner of thing to be done preiudiciall to the ſame. The like gentleneſſe he vſed towards them of the Holie rood houſe, at his comming to Edenburgh, wherein he likewiſe lodged. It is thought, that in memorie of the friendlie interteinement, which his father the duke of Lancaſter found in theſe abbeies, at the time of his being in Scotland, when the rebellion chanced in England, through Jacke Straw and his complices, he ſhewed ſuch fauour towards them at this preſent. To be briefe, it ſhould appere, that king Henrie came into Scotland, as it were inforced, more thorough counſell of his nobles, than for anie hatred he bare towards the Scots, as he well ſhewed in returning backe againe, without doing them anie further iniurie.

Henrie king of England inuadeth Scotland.

[In the yere after, or thereabout, died Walter Trailie biſhop of ſaint Andrewes, and the] Scotiſh quene Annabell Drommond, after whoſe deceaſſe hir ſonne Dauid the duke of Rothſaie, that vnder hir gouernment had bene well and vertuouſlie brought vp, hauing now got once the reine at libertie, fell to all kind of inſolent outrage, ſeeking to defile wiues, virgins, nuns, and all other kind of women, in all places where he came. At length, his father perceiuing his ſonnes youthfull nature to rage after that manner in vnbridled luſt, beyond the bounds of all meaſure, to the great reproch of them both, wrote to his brother the duke of Albanie, requiring him to take his ſonne, the ſaid duke of Rothſaie into his cuſtodie, and to ſee him ſo chaſtiſed for his wanton behauiour, as he might learne to amend the ſame. ¶ Here is to be noted, that the duke of Albanie had of long time before, desired to see the duke of Rothsaie dispatched out of the way, as the person whome he most doubted; & therefore hauing commission thus from the king to take him, he reioised not a little, trusting thereby to compasse his purpose without danger. And heerevpon taking the duke of Rothsaie betwirt Dundee & saint Andrewes, he brought him to Falkeland, where he shut him vp in streict prison, and kept him without all manner of meat or drinke, so to famish him to death.

The duke of Rothsaie committed to prison.

It is said, that a woman vnderstanding the duke of Albanies intention, and taking ruth of the others pitifull case, found meanes to let meale fall downe thorough a rift of the loft of that tower wherein he was inclosed, by meanes whereof his life was certeine daies susteined; but after this was once knowen, incontinentlie was the woman made awaie. On the same manner, an other woman through a long reed fed him with milke of hir owne breists, and was likewise dispatched as soone as hir doings were perceiued. Then after this, the duke destitute of all worldlie sustenance, thorough verie famine was constreined to eat not onelie all such filth as he could find within the tower, but also in the end he gnawed off his owne fingers, and so finallie in this miserable state of martyrdome (as I may call it) ended his wretched life, and was buried in Lundoris, where (as the fame went) manie faire miracles were done neere to his graue, till time that James the first began to punish the murtherers, for since that time such miracles ceassed.

About the same time, George earle of March did manie displeasures to the Scots, making sundrie rodes into their countrie, greatlie to his profit. The earle of Dowglasse that had the gouernement of Louthian in those daies, tooke order, that certeine capteins of that countrie should euerie one of them for his turne, with a competent number for the time, make a rode into England, to reuenge such displeasures. The first that went, was Thomas Haliburton of Dirlington, who returned in safetie with a great preie taken of Englishmens goods. Next vnto him was Patrike Hepborne of the Halis the yonger, appointed to go forth as capteine generall with a certeine number, who entering into England, got a great bootie togither; but the Englishmen following there vpon to recour it, incountered with him at Nesbet in the Mers, and there not onelie slue him, but also distressed his people. Besides them that were slaine with their capteine, there were also manie that were taken, as John and William Cockborne, Robert Lawder of the Bas, John and Thomas Haliburton, with manie other. Almost all the floure of Louthian (as Iohn Maior writeth) perished in this battell, which was fought the 22 of June, in the yeare 1402.

Archembald Dowglas inuadeth England.

Archembald earle of Dowglasse sore displeased, and wonderfullie wroth in his mind for this ouerthrow, got commission to inuade England with an armie of ten thousand men, and hauing the same once readie with all things necessarie for his voiage, he set forward, and entering into England, burnt and harried the countrie, not staieng till he came as farre as Newcastell. In this armie there was with the Dowglasse, Murdocke eldest sonne to duke Robert earle of Fife, Thomas erle of Murrey, George earle of Angus, with manie other lords and nobles of Scotland. At the last, when they were returning homewards with a preie of infinit goods and riches, Henrie Hotspur, and George earle of March, with a great power of men met them, and assailed them so with such incessant shot of arrowes, that where the earle of Dowglas with his armie had the aduantage of an hill, called Homildon, he was constreined to forsake the same; and comming downe vpon the Englishmen, was neuertheless put to the worsse, the most part of his people being either taken or slaine. It is said, that after the Scots were once put to flight, they gathered againe, and renewed the battell by the exhortation of Adham Gordon, & sir Iohn Swinton, but that did little availe them, for they were still beaten downe and slaine. Among other of those that were slaine, were the same sir John Swinton, and Adham Gordon: also John Leuinston of Kalender, Alexander Ramsaie of Dalhousie, with sundrie other gentlemen & nobles of Scotland.

Archembald earle of Dowglas, Murdocke Steward eldest sonne to duke Robert the gouernour, George erle of Angus, Robert Erskin of Gallowaie, the lord Saulton, James Dowglas maister of Dalkeith, and his two brethren Iohn and William, with the most part of all the barons of Fife and Louthian, were taken prisoners. This battell was fought on the Rod day in haruest, in the yeare 1403, vpon a Tuesday. Henrie Persie verie proud of this victorie, came with the earle of March vnto the castell of Cockclauis in Teuidale, and laied siege to the same, but Iohn Greinelow capteine thereof defended it so manfullie, that they got no great aduantage; yet at length he fell to this composition with them, that if he had no rescue within the space of three moneths [or (as Buchanan saith) fiftie daies] the castell should be then rendered into their hands. When the gouernour of Scotland was informed what agreement the capteine of Cockclauis had made, he assembled the lords in counsell to haue their aduise for the leauieng of an armie against the time appointed. There were manie of this opinion, that it was better to lose the castell, than to leopard the liues of so manie men as were necessarie to furnish that enterprise for the sauing of it. But the gouernour shewed, that he weied the losse of it so much, that if none of the nobles would passe with him to the rescue thereof, yet he would go himselfe to do what in him might lie to saue it. But in the meane time, such trouble rose in England, that there needed no power to be leauied for the defense of Cockclauis. For by a conspiracie practised against king Henrie, certeine of the English nobilitie were alied togither to haue destroied him, but amongest the residue, the Persies were as chiefe.

A conspiracie against king Henrie by the Persies and other.

They fought togither at Shrewesburie a verie bloudie battell, where the king got the victorie, and slue the lord Persie, surnamed (as before ye haue heard) Henrie Hotspur. At this battell was also the earle of Dowglas, with a great companie of Scottishmen on the Persies side, for being taken prisoner at the battell of Homildon (as before is said) it was accorded betwirt him and the said Henrie Hotspur, that aiding him & other his complices against king Henrie, if it chanced the said king Henrie to be vanquished and put from the crowne, according to their intent and purpose, then should the said earle Dowglas be released of his ransome, and haue the towne of Berwike rendered vnto him in reward of his aid and assistance. He fought (as is reported) with singular manhood, and had the fore ward on the Persies side. He slue that day with his owne hands, three gentlemen arraied in the kings cote armour; and finallie when the battell was lost, he was taken in the chase, and saued aliue, where not one more of all his retinue of Scots escaped with life, but were all slaine out of hand. Neither was this victorie gotten by king Henrie, without great slaughter of those that were on his part, for he lost foure verie valiant knights, as Stalwart, Blunt, Massie, and Pottoke, with seuen hundred other souldiers and men of war (as

(as the Scotiſh writers haue) but the Engliſh authors name a farre greater number, as ſixteene hundred at the leaſt.

King Henrie (as the ſame Scotiſh writers do record) vſed the counſell & aduiſe of the earle of March, in the obteining of this victorie, being fled latelie before from the rebels ſide to him. The earle of Dowglas, in reſpect of his noble parentage and high valiancie, was verie tenderlie cheriſhed by king Henrie, who for that he had ſeene him do ſo valiantlie in the day of that battell, reputed him worthie of all honor. The earle of Dowglas yet was verie infortunat in moſt of his enterpriſes, ſo farre forth, that he neuer wan battell wherein he chanced to be, and was therefore named Archembald Tinneman; though there were no default to be found at anie time in his owne perſon, for he euer fought with great manhood. At the battell of Hommildon he loſt one of his eies, and at this battell of Shrewesburie he loſt one of his ſtones. The old earle of Northumberland, hearing that euill ſucceſſe his ſonne and other his kinſmen had found in their rebellious enterpriſe at Shrewesburie, with one of his nephues (that was his ſonnes ſonne) and other of his friends and kinſmen, withdrew into Scotland, where he was receiued by Henrie Wardlow biſhop of ſaint Andrewes, and lodged with him at his eaſe and in good ſuertie within his caſtell of ſaint Andrews aforeſaid.

About the ſame time, king Robert was aduertiſed, that his ſonne the duke of Rothſaie was pined to death in Falkland (in manner as before is expreſſed) which newes were ſo greeuous vnto him, that he grew each day more and more in ſorow and melancholie. The duke of Albanie kept it ſo long as was poſſible from the kings knowledge, and being now ſent for by the king to anſwer him for ſuch treaſonable ſlaughter of his ſonne, he came, and ſo excuſed the matter with a faire painted tale, as though he had beene nothing guiltie in the cauſe, and for further declaration of his innocencie, he promiſed (if it might pleaſe the king to come vnto Edenburgh) he would bring in the offendors which were culpable of the murther. The king as then remaining in Bute (where for the moſt part he euer ſoiourned) though he were not well able to trauell by reaſon of long ſickneſſe, yet in a chariot he came vnto Edenburgh, vpon the earneſt deſire he had to ſee his ſons death puniſhed. And at his comming thither, the duke of Albanie deliuered vnto him certeine naughtie perſons, & ſuch in deed, as for their heinous acts and vngratious conditions deſerued well to die (though not for this matter) which neuertheleſſe by vntrue ſuggeſtions and forged accuſements, being brought before corrupt iudges (and ſuch as the duke of Albanie had prouided for his purpoſe) were condemned as giltie of his death, whome in all their life time they neuer ſaw.

Though this matter was handled as finelie as was poſſible, and made ſo ſound and cleare as could be deuiſed; yet was not the king ſo ſatisfied in his mind, but that he had a great ſuſpicion in the duke of Albanie as author of his ſonnes death: but for ſo much as the duke had all the realme vnder his obeiſance, partlie by policie, and partlie by authoritie of his office, being gouernor thereof, the king durſt not attempt anie thing againſt him, but rather doubted, leaſt he hauing an ambitious deſire to the crowne, would compaſſe alſo to haue the life of his ſecond ſonne (named James) as then prince of Scotland; and therefore by the faithfull helpe & good aduiſe of Walter Wardlaw the biſhop of ſaint Andrews, he prouided a ſhip, and ſent the ſaid prince forth in the ſame to paſſe into France to K. Charls the ſixt, deliuering him alſo a letter written and directed vnto the king of England in his fauour, if he chanced at vnwares by anie fortune to fall into the Engliſhmens hands.

The king ſendeth away his ſonne the prince.

Henrie lord Sinclare, the ſecond earle of Orkeneie, was appointed to haue the conuete of him, who hauing all his purueiance readie, tooke the ſhip that was appointed for them at the Baſſe, where it laie at anchor, and loſing from thence, they ſailed forward till they came to Flamburgh head, where (as ſome ſay) they were taken on the ſea by Engliſhmen, the which hearing how the prince of Scotland ſhould paſſe that waies, laie in wait for him. Others write, that his deſire was to be ſet on land there, becauſe he might not awaie with the aire of the ſea, being brought far out of quiet in his head & ſtomach therewith. But how ſoeuer it was, the truth is, taken he was in the ninth yeare of his age, the 33 day of March, in the yeare of our incarnation 1406, and was kept in captiuitie of the Engliſhmen by the ſpace of eightéene yeares. At his comming to the preſence of king Henrie, he deliuered to him the letter directed from his father king Robert, the tenor whereof here inſueth, as in the Scotiſh toong they be written.

James prince of Scotland taken by the Engliſhmen. H.B. 1404.

The tenor of the ſaid letter as it is written in the Scotiſh toong.

RObert king of Scots to Henrie king of England greeting. Thy great magnificence, humilitee, and iuſtice, are right patent to vs, by gouernance of thy laſt armie in Scotland; howbeit ſike things had beene vncerteine to vs afore. For though thou ſeemed as enemie with moſt awfull incurſions in our realme: zit we found mair humanities and plaiſures than damage (by thy cumming) to our ſubdittes. Specialie to yame that receiuit thy noble fader the duke of Longcaſtell the time of his exill in Scotland. We may not ceis yairfore, wuhile wee are on life, but aye luyk and loik thee as maiſt noble and worthie prince, to ioys thy realme. For yocht realmes and nations contend amang themſelfe for conqueſts of glorie & launds, zit na occaſioun is amang vs to inuade athir realmes or lieges with iniuries, bot erar to contend amang our ſelfe, quhay ſall perſew othir with maiſt humanitee and kindneſſe. As to vs we will meis all occaſion of battell, quare any occurres at thy pleaſure. Forther, becauſe we haue na leſſe ſollicitude in preſeruing our childzen fra certaine deidlie enimies, than had ſometime thy noble fader, we are conſtreined to ſeeke ſupport at vncowth princes hands. Howbeit, the inuaſioun of enimies is ſa great, that ſmall defenſe occurres againſt yame without they by preſerued by amitie of nobill men. For the warld is ſa full of peruerſit malice, that na crueltie nor offenſe may be deuiſit in erd, bot the ſamine may be wrought be motion of gold or ſiluer. Heirfore, becauſe we knaw thy hyneſſe full of monie, noble vertues, with ſike puiſſance and riches, that na prince in our daies may be compared thairto: we deſire thy humanitæ and suppoꝛt at this time.

We traist it is not vnknowen to thy maiestie, how our eldest sonne Dauid is slaine miserablie in pꝛisoun be our bꝛothir the duke of Albanie, quhome wæ chesit to be gouernour (quan we were fallen in decrepit age) to our subdittes and realme, beseekand thy hienes thairfoꝛe to be sa fauoꝛable, that this bearer James our second and allanerlie sonne may haue targe to liefe vnder thy faith, and iustice, to be some memoꝛie of our posteritie, knawand the vnstable conditioun of mans life sa sodanlie altered: now flurisaund, and sudenlie falling to vtter consumptioun. Foꝛthir beliefe well, quhan kings and pꝛinces hes na other beild bot in thair awin folks, thair empire is caduke and fragill. Foꝛ the minds of common people ar eurr flowaund and mair inconstant than wind. Zit quen pꝛinces ar roboꝛat be amitæ of othir vncowth kings thair bꝛethir and nighbouris, na aduerſitie may occurre to eiect thaim fra thair dignitie riall. Foꝛthir gif thy hienes thinke nocht expedient (as God foꝛbeid) to obtemper to thir owꝛ desires; zit we requeſt ane thing quhilk was ratifiſt in our laſt trewes & conditioun of peace, that the supplicatioun made be ony of the two kings of Ingland and Scotland sall staund in manner of saufeconduct to the bearer. And thus we desire to be obseruat to this our allanerlie sonne, and the gratious God conserue thæ maist noble pꝛince.

After that king Henrie had causeꝺ these letters to be opened and read, he aduiſed himselfe thereon with great deliberation; but in the end, he determined to staie this James pꝛince of Scotland as his lawfull pꝛisoner, foꝛ that he was thus taken in time of warres, and that moꝛeouer, there were diuers rebels of England succoꝛed within the bounds of his fathers dominion, to the high displeasure of the said king Henrie. But such was the fauour shewed in his bꝛinging vp, that his captiuitie turned moꝛe to his honoꝛ, pꝛofit, and commoditie, than anie other woꝛldlie hap that might by anie means haue otherwise chanced vnto him. He had such perfect instructoꝛs to teach him, aſwell the vnderſtanding of tongs as the sciences, that he became right expert and cunning in euerie of them. He was taught also to ride, to run at the tilt, and handle all kind of weapons conuenientlie to be vsed of such a personage, whereunto he was so apt and readie, that few in anie point of actiuitie might ouermatch him. He had good knowledge in musike, and could plaie on sundꝛie instruments right perfectlie. To be bꝛiefe, it appeared in all his behauiour and maners, in what companie so euer he came, that his bꝛinging vp had bœne according to his nature, neither of them differing from his birth, and the qualitie of a noble and most vertuous pꝛince.

After it was signified vnto his father king Robert, as he sat at super, that his sonne was thus arrested in England, he made full great and dolorous mone, soꝛe lamenting that euer he matched himselfe in mariage with a woman of so meane degrée (to the disparagement of his bloud) as was quœne Annabell, on whome he begat his sonnes, which (as he toke it) was the onelie cause why aſwell foꝛraine pꝛinces as his owne subiects had him thus in contempt. He toke this matter so soꝛe to hart, that within thꝛee daies after the newes came vnto him, he departed this woꝛld thꝛough foꝛce of sickneſſe, now increased by melancholie, which had vexed him a long time befoꝛe. He died at Rothsaie in the sixteenth yœre of his reigne complet, and from the incarnation 1408. His bodie was buried at Paſleie, with his wife quœne Annabell befoꝛe rehearsed. He was a man of a mightie stature, verie liberall and gentle, so that if he had not bœne maimed with a hoꝛſſe, and thereby grew lame, that he might trauell about the affaires of the realme himselfe, it was thought the common-wealth should haue pꝛospered vnder his gouernement, as much as euer it did vnder anie of his pꝛedeceſſoꝛs.

The gouernoꝛ Robert duke of Albanie, after the deceaſſe of his bꝛother king Robert, was by new election chosen, oꝛ rather confirmed in his office of gouernoꝛ, which he exerciſed moꝛe vpꝛightlie, & with better iuſtice now after his bꝛothers death, than befoꝛe. [Foꝛ (as saith Buchanan) take away from him, that he was ouermuch blinded with desire to gouerne (whereunto he cared not by anie means to aſpire) there were in him manie other good parts woꝛthie to haue such gouernement: foꝛ he was baliant in battell, wiſe in counſell, he did decide matters of controuerſie with great equitie, he wan the nobilitie with his liberalitie, and did not sucke the commons dꝛie by exactions.] In the meane time, the caſtell of Jedwoꝛth (which the Engliſhmen had held euer since the battell of Durham) was taken by Tiuidalemen, and raced downe to the earth. Archembald earle of Dowglaſſe, as yet remaining captiue in England, after he had knowledge of king Roberts death, made shift to agrée foꝛ his ransome, and so being set at libertie, returned with all speed now at length vnto Scotland.

Shoꝛtlie after, there was a councell called, wherein was a motion made foꝛ the reſtoꝛing of Geoꝛge earle of March to his countrie, lands, and bloud. After long debating of the matter, and hard hold to and fro both with him and againſt him, it was in the end concluded, that he should returne into Scotland, and be receiued as a true Scotiſhman; but vnder this condition, that he should foꝛgo his lands of Annerdale, and Lochmaben, which should foꝛ euer remaine to the Dowglaſſe, and to his heires. All his other lands and poſſeſſions, it was accoꝛded, that he should inioy as in his foꝛmer right & eſtate. And thus was the earle of March pardoned of all paſſed offenses committed againſt the crowne of Scotland, and returned home, to the great comfoꝛt of his friends.

✻ Perſie that before was fled into Scotland to the erle of March his old friend, was courteouſlie receiued, interteined, & nouriſhed accoꝛding to his eſtate, by the said earle of March: during which time, he ſolliciteꝺ his friends in England to find means foꝛ returne into his countrie. And amongſt other of his friends, with whom he dealt by secret meſſengers; he directed letters concerning the same, to an old (and as he deemed a moſt faithfull) friend of his, called Rafe Rokſbie, declaring vnto him that he should not want friends, both Scotiſh & Engliſh (thꝛough whoſe helpe he did not deſpaire to recouer his patrimonie) if he might haue his aid also therein, foꝛ this Rafe was shiriffe of Yoꝛkshire. This man, after he had intiſed Perſie (vnder the aſſurance of falſe hope and truſt in him) to come into England, he opened the conſpiracie to the king, and secretlie laid wait to intercept the said earle, by which meanes, (getting him into his poſſeſſion) he cut off his head, and sent it to the king to London. At which time also, there was an Engliſhman in Scotland, which called himselfe Richard the second: but falſlie (as I suppoſe ſuppoſe, ſaith Buchanan; for when the elder Perſie did often and importunatlie require to talke with him, he could neuer be perſuaded by anie mens words to come, or enter ſpæch to, or with the ſaid earle of Northumberland, fearing (belike) leaſt his deceipt would be vnderſtood by him, which knew his owne and true king verie well. This counterfeit king yet boaſting him to be of the princelie bloud, was honored accordinglie; after certeine yeares, and at length (feining himſelfe to be far from all deſire of gouernement, to the end he might worke his effect the more ſafelie) he died and was buried in the church of the frier Dominicks in Sterling, with a title of the king of England grauen vpon him.)

Rebellion moued by Donald of the Iles.

About the ſame time, there roſe great trouble in Scotland, by the rebellion of Donald of the Iles, who claming by right of his wife, a title to the earldome of Roſſe, was defeated of the ſame, by the practiſe of the gouernor, hauing by ſubtill conueiance, aſſured the ſaid earldome vnto his ſecond ſon the earle of Buchquhane named John. The foreſaid Donald, by way of ſupplication, beſought the gouernor to doo him reaſon; but he receiued nought, except it were froward ſpæch, wherewith he toke ſuch diſpleaſure, that raiſing all the power of the Iles he came into Roſſe, and ſubdued the ſame at his pleaſure. ✠ The which to make the matter more plaine, and to deduce his title out of Leſleus (which he forgetteth not to report for the honor of his owne houſe) I will ſet the ſame downe in this maner.

Donald ſubdued Roſſe. Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 7. cap. 268.

Walter Leſle a noble man, after ſingular proweſſe ſhewed by him (in externall battell) vnder the Romans, returned with honor into Scotland, where he maried the daughter of William earle of Roſſe, (ſlaine at the battell of Halidon) and with hir obteined the earldome of that prouince, of which wife he raiſed one ſonne called Alexander, after earle of Roſſe; and one daughter giuen in mariage to Donald of the Iles. This Alexander toiued himſelfe in mariage with Eufemie the daughter of Robert the gouernor, and had by hir one onelie daughter and heire chriſtened after the name of hir mother, who (after the death of hir father, being yet a tender maid and vnpractiſed in the courſe of things) was partlie by the flatteries, and partlie by the threats of the gouernor, induced to giue the earldome of Roſſe vnto him, by whoſe helpe, as it was reported, ſhe ſhortlie after died. Wherevpon, Donald that had to wife the ſiſter of Alexander Leſle (aunt to this Eufemie which ſold hir inheritance) demanding the erldome of Roſſe by right of inheritance (as is ſaid) by his wife, entered Roſſe, and brought it to his ſubiection. But not being ſatiſfied with this, he paſſed through Murrey, Boghtuall, and other bounds thereabouts, till he came vnto Garioch, purpoſing to burne Aberden.

The earldome of Roſſe tranſferred from the line of Walter Roſſe to the Stewards.

The earle of Mar.

But Alexander Steward earle of Mar, hauing gathered a power with all diligence to reſiſt this Donald, met with him at a village called Harlow, & incontinentlie not ſtaieng for more aid that was comming towards him, ſet on the enimies more raſhlie than orderlie, and more fiercelie than diſcreetlie, not paſſing for keeping anie accuſtomed arraie of battell, as had bæne requiſit. By reaſon whereof, great ſlaughter was made on either part, the victorie in the end being ſo doubtfull, that both parts were faine to withdraw out of the field, and flee to the next mounteins, as glad to be ſeuered the one from the other. There was ſlaine on Donalds part nine hundred men, with Makclane, and Makinthos. On the earle of Marres ſide, there died Alexander Ogiluie ſhiriffe of Angus, with ſeuen knights of name, and diuers other gentlemen, with commons, to the number of ſix hundred. This battell was ſtriken on ſaint Iames euen, in the yeare 1411. Donald of the Iles, after this bickering wholie granted the victorie to his enimies, in flæing all the night long after the battell towards Roſſe; and from thence with like ſpæd he paſſed ouer into the Iles.

In the yeere next following, the gouernor prepared to make a iournie into the Iles, to chaſtiſe the foreſaid Donald; but he through feare of further damage, ſubmitted himſelfe, and was ſworne neuer to procure anie trouble to the realme in time to come. Not long after the battell of Harlow, Patrike Dunbar, ſecond ſonne to the earle of March, with one hundred of hardie perſons, came earlie one morning ſomewhat before the breake of the day to Faſt caſtell, and wan the ſame, taking the capteine priſoner, whoſe name was Thomas Holdon. At the ſame time was the bridge of Rorburgh broken downe, and the towne burnt by William Dowglaſſe of Drumlanerik, Gawan Dunbar another of the erle of Marches ſonnes, and diuerſe others. In the ſame yeere (or rather in the yeere before) the vniuerſitie of ſaint Andrews was firſt founded, which afterwards was furniſhed with diuerſe notable learned men brought in and placed there by James the firſt, to the end that by their inſtructions his people might increaſe in learning, to the further aduancement of vertue, laudable maners, and all ſorts of ciuill cuſtomes. Amongeſt ſundrie other expert men in all ſciences which he brought into Scotland, there were 18 doctors of diuinitie, & 8 doctors of the canon law.

✠ From this time by the ſpace of ten yeeres (ſaith Buchanan) there was almoſt nothing done worthie of memorie, betweene the Scots and the Engliſh, either becauſe the truce occaſioned it (which yet I find not mentioned of anie man) either for that Henrie the fourth, king of England, being dead, and his ſonne Henrie the fift reigning in his place, and being all the time of his gouernement buſied in the warres of France, the Engliſh ceaſſed to offer iniuries to the Scots: or for that the gouernor of the Scots durſt not moue anie thing againſt the Engliſh, fearing leaſt the K. of England would then returne home the right and true heire of Scotland, who (he was moſt aſſured ſhould find fauour againſt him) in the hearts of his owne people, that would tenderlie pitie the miſfortune of his impriſonment, and ſeeke to eſtabliſh him in the kingdome. Wherefore if there were anie thing done in that meane time, they were but ſome few and ſmall excurſions within the realme, which more aptlie might be called robberies & ſpoiles, than anie right wars. For as Pennure in England was burned by Archembald Dowglas, ſo (to anſwer the ſame) Dunfreis in Scotland was in the like order deſtroied by the Engliſh. Beſides which there was a certeine exchange of priſoners of the one nation with the other: for Mordac the ſonne of the gouernor (taken at Halidon) was returned into Scotland, and Perſie (who was brought out of England by his grandfather into Scotland, and left vnder the protection of the gouernor) was deliuered to the Engliſh, and after by the new king of England was reſtored to the title & lands of his anceſtors earles of Northumberland.

This man (though by the lawes of armes he was no captiue) yet the vniuſt deteining of James the ſonne of the king of Scots ſtoped the mouths of the Engliſh, that they could not complaine of anie iniurie done in deteining him. The doing whereof ſo little offended this Perſie, that while he liued, he did (with all kind of courteſie) giue witnes of the humanitie ſhewed vnto him by the Scots. Not much different from this time, came two ambaſſadors into Scotland, the one from the councell of Conſtance (whereof the chiefe was the abbat of Pontineac) and the other was from Peter de Luna, who did ſtiflie reteine and defend the papaſie, whereof he had once gotten poſſeſſion, which Peter by the trauell and perſuaſion of Henrie Hardine (an Engliſh man, and a Franciſcane frier) had drawne the gouernor of Scotland to follow his faction, which yet ſucceeded to none effect: becauſe the vniuerſall companie of the cleargie ſtiffelie labored againſt it, and did ſubſcribe to the depoſition of Peter, and to the councell of Conſtance for the election of Martine the fift to the papaſie.

The earle of Stratherne ſlaine.

Much what about the ſame time, John Drummond ſlue Patrike Graham earle of Stratherne, by traitorous meanes, and thereupon fled into Ireland: but as he was about to haue paſſed from thence ouer into England, the veſſell wherein he ſailed, was driuen on the coaſt of Scotland, where hée was taken, and afterwards loſt his head for the ſaid offenſe. Shortlie after alſo, there roſe great warres betwixt England and France, as in the hiſtories of thoſe realmes may more plainlie appeare. There was alſo a great rebellion raiſed in Wales, againſt Henrie the fift king of England, which was the ſon of Henrie the fourth latelie deceaſſed. ¶ We find in the Scotiſh chronicles, that this Henrie the fift, at his returning forth of France, after his firſt iournie thither (hauing in the ſame woone the towne of Harfléet, & diſcomfited the whole power of France at Agincourt) was conſtreined to go againſt the Welſhmen, and incountering with the prince of Wales, was diſcomfited, and loſt ten thouſand of his men: but after this, he reinforced his power, and came againe into Wales, not ceaſſing till he had brought the Welſhmen ſubiect at his pleaſure: but the Engliſh writers make no mention of anie ſuch matter.

Whileſt things paſſed thus in England, William Haliburton wan the caſtell of Warke, and ſlue all ſuch as he found within it, howbeit ſmall while indured the ioy of this fortunate ſucceſſe to the Scots: for ſundrie Engliſhmen that knew all the ſecrets of the houſe, found means to enter through a gutter, that ſerued in maner of a ſinke, to auoid all the filth of the kitchen into the riuer of Twéed, breaking downe a pane of an old wall, and ſo made entrie for the reſidue of their fellowes; by reaſon whereof they eaſilie recouered the caſtell, and in reuenge of them that were ſlaine there when the Scots wan it, they likewiſe ſlue all thoſe which were then within it, without anie reſpect of one or other. After this, in the yéere 1419, the third day of September, Robert duke of Albanie, that had béene gouernor of Scotland for the ſpace of fifteene yéeres, after the death of king Robert the third, departed out of this life, hauing borne himſelfe in all his time as a right valiant and noble prince. [This doth Buchanan attribute to the yéere 1420, being the fiftéenth yeere after the death of Robert the third.]

The deceaſſe of Robert duke of Albanie. Fr. Thin.

A little before his deceaſſe, there came from Charles the French king, the earle of Vandoſme, and chancellor of France, both to renew the ancient league betwixt the two realmes of Scotland and France, & alſo to get ſome power of Scots to paſſe into France, to ſupport the ſaid Charles againſt the Engliſhmen, which as then ſore inuaded his realme. Wherevpon ſhortlie after by decrée of councell, it was ordeined, that John Steward earle of Buchquhane, ſecond ſonne to duke Robert, and Archembald Dowglas earle of Wigton, ſhould paſſe into France with ſeuen thouſand armed men. The king of England informed hereof, to cauſe the Scots to kéepe their men at home, menaced to inuade Scotland with a puiſſant armie, & that in all haſt. Which rumor being ſpred ouer all the bounds of his realme, cauſed the Scots for doubt thereof to lie all the nert ſummer on the borders: but in the meane time, king Henrie paſſed into Normandie, to purſue his wars againſt France with all diligence.

At length, through the procurement of the duke of Burgognie, vnder certeine conditions and couenants of agréement, king Henrie toke to wife the ladie Katharine daughter to the French king. And among other articles of the ſame agréement, it was concluded, that after the deceaſſe of Charles the French king, the crowne of France ſhould immediatlie deſcend vnto king Henrie, as lawfull inheritor vnto that realme, without all contradiction; by reaſon whereof, Charles the Dolphin, and ſonne to the ſaid king Charles, was clearelie excluded from all claime to the ſame: but this notwithſtanding, the Dolphin did not onelie refuſe to ſurrender his title, but alſo ſought to mainteine the war againſt king Henrie as his aduerſarie, and open enimie to the realme. In the meane while alſo, the earles of Buchquhane and Wigton, with Alexander Lindſeie brother to the earle of Crawford, and Thomas Swinton knights, accompanied with ſeuen thouſand well armed men, arriued in France, to the great reioiſing of the Dolphin, as he well declared in the thankfull receiuing, and moſt heartie welcomming of them. Finallie, the towne and caſtell of Chatelon in Touraine was deliuered to them, that they might haue a place at all times to reſort vnto, at their owne will and pleaſure.

✻ Shortlie after they were imploied in the battell of Bauge. For the duke of Clarence brother to the king of England (in whoſe place he was deputie and generall of the armies in France) after that he had ſpoiled and ouerrun the countrie of Anion (which hitherto had remained moſt ſtedfaſt in the obedience of the French) was comming (as it was ſuppoſed) to the towne of Bauge, about two daies before Eaſter: for which cauſe the Scots (thinking that the duke in that holie feaſt would, as the maner was, ceaſe from all violence of warre, and attend the church ceremonies appointed for thoſe times; or elſe as ſome write, by reaſon of the truce which was taken for eight daies) did more negligentlie looke vnto their eſtate than wiſdome would they ſhould haue done. The which when Clarence vnderſtood (either by Andrew Fregoſe an Italian, or by the Scotiſh forragers intercepted by his horſſemen) he reioiſed that he had ſo good occaſion offered worthilie to performe ſomething. Wherefore riſing forthwith from dinner, he commanded his horſſemen to arme themſelues, with whome he went directlie towards his enimies, at what time he was (beſides the beautie of his other furniture) richlie adorned with goodlie diadems of gold (ſet with manie pretious ſtones) and placed vpon a chaplet of iron. At whoſe ſudden approch, thoſe few French which were nére vnto them in a village called little Bauge (amongſt whom was John de la Croix) being feared, made their defenſe in flight; and for ſafegard entered the ſteeple of the nert church adioining, in the which they were hardlie after beſieged.

Whileſt theſe were thus inuiron'd, the clamor and cries which was now come to the nert armie (wherein the Scots were aſſembled) ſuddenlie cauſed them with great feare to flée to their weapons. At that time the erle of Buchquhane (whileſt the others prepared themſelues) ſent thirtie archers to poſſeſſe the bridge, vnder which the nert riuer had his courſe, and through which they might paſſe ouer; where (incountering with the Engliſh enimie) Hugh Kennedie came vnto them out of the nert church (in which he ſoiorned) with a hundred of his companie halfe armed, as it often falleth out in ſuch ſudden exploits. Theſe with their arrowes ſo ſtreictlie kept this ſtreict, that the horſſemen could not haue anie paſſage there, for which cauſe the duke of Clarence did firſt forſake horſſe (as the reſt of the companie did after him) began the battell on foot, and with a ſtrong aſſault made way for his men, beating from them the Scots, who were for the moſt part vnarmed, and the others not verie well armed.

After this, in the meane time whileſt Clarence taketh his horſſe againe, and ſome of the reſt ſcatteringlie do paſſe the bridge, the earle of Buchquhane commeth vpon them, & forthwith (deſirous to make triall of his people egerlie ſéeking after it) there was a bitter battell committed, with like minds of hatred the one againſt the other: for the Scots did reioiſe, that they had now obteined cauſe, time, and place, where they might (after their firſt arriuall in France) ſhew ſome token of their valure, and refute thoſe tawnts which the Frenchmen laid vpon them, obiecting that the grædineſſe of wine & vittels had brought them ouer into that countrie. With which reproch the Frenchmen are wont to vpbraid the Engliſh, the Spaniard the French, and the Affrican the Spaniard. But as the Scots were eger in a ſtrange countrie to win honor, ſo was the Engliſh no leſſe deſirous of conqueſt, greatlie diſdeining both at home and abroad, to be ſo infeſted with that implacable nature of the Scots. In which battell none did fight more valiantlie or egerlie than did the duke of Clarence himſelfe. Againſt whome (ſo noted for the richneſſe of his armor) came John Swinton, which græuouſlie wounded him in the face, and whome the earle of Buchquhane (ſtriking on the head with his mace) quite ouerthrew to the ground. Which done, the Engliſh fled, and were græuouſlie ſlaine, becauſe the ſame continued till the night ended the quarrell; which battell was fought on Eaſter eue, a little after the equinoctiall ſpring. In this battell were ſlaine of the Engliſh about 20000, amongſt whome were 26 of noble calling, whereof were the duke before ſaid, the earle of Riddeſdale, otherwiſe called the earle of Angus, & the lord Greie were part: but of the Scots and Frenchmen, there were few miſſing, and they of the meaner ſort. All which, as we haue here ſet it downe, is the common report of the death of the duke of Clarence. But the booke of Pluſcart reporteth, that the duke was ſlaine by Alexander Macelſell, a knight of Lenor, which tooke from him the coronet (whereof we ſpake before) and ſold the ſame to John Steward of Dernill, for a thouſand angels, which he after laied to pawne to Robert Huſtone, to whom he owght fiue thouſand angels; & this ſaith that booke was the moſt common report at thoſe daies. The chiefe praiſe of which victorie remained with the Scots, euen by the teſtimonie of the enuious aduerſaries, as the writer of this ſtorie ſaith vpon his credit.) At this battell alſo were a great companie of priſoners taken, amongeſt whome (as principall) were theſe, the earle of Huntington, & the earle of Summerſet, with his brother, both of them being brethren to the ladie Jane, that was after maried to king James the firſt, king of Scotland. For the high valiancie of the Scotiſhmen ſhewed in this battell, the Dolphin created the earle of Buchquhane high conſtable of France, and gaue him ſundrie townes, caſtels, and lands, therewith the better to mainteine his eſtate.

✠ King Henrie hearing of the death of his brother the duke of Clarence, did ſubſtitute for his deputie his other brother the duke of Bedford, promiſing that he would ſhortlie after come thither himſelfe with an armie of foure thouſand horſſe, and a thouſand footmen (which he performed accordinglie.) For with all ſpéd he after came into France with a mightie hoſt, and had with him James the Scotiſh king, or rather prince of Scotland, for all this while the Scots reputed him not as king, for that he was not as yet crowned: nor ſet at libertie out of the Engliſhmens hands, into the which (as before ye haue heard) he chanced to fall by his fathers life time.

The king of England taketh the prince of Scotland ouer with him into France.

The cauſe why king Henrie did take this James ouer with him at that preſent into France, was, for that he hoped by his meanes to procure all the Scotiſhmen that were in ſeruice with the Dolphin to forſake him, and to returne home into their owne countrie: but when he had broken this matter vnto the ſaid James, and promiſed, that if he could bring it to paſſe, he would not onelie remit his ranſome, but alſo ſend him into Scotland highlie rewarded with great riches: James anſwered herevnto, that he maruelled much, why he did not conſider how he had no authoritie ouer the Scots ſo long as he was holden in captiuitie, and as yet had not receiued the crowne, but (ſaith he) if it were ſo that I might be ſet at libertie, and had receiued the crowne according to the accuſtomed manner, together with the othes and homages of my ſubiects, I could then in this matter do as ſhould be thought to ſtand with reaſon; but in the meane time I ſhall deſire your grace to hold me excuſed, and not to will me to do that which I may in no wiſe performe.

The anſwer of James the king, or rather prince of Scotland.

King Henrie maruelling at the high wiſedome which appeered to be planted in the head of that young prince, left off to trauell with him anie further in this matter. In the meane time, the warres continuing betwixt the king of England and the Dolphin of France, manie townes were beſéged, woone, and ſacked, and ſundrie light bickerings and ſkirmiſhes chanced betwixt the parties, as occaſion ſerued. But the Engliſhmen ſhewed themſelues to beare ſuch hatred toward the Scots, that ſo manie as fell into their hands neuer néeded to ſtreine their friends for their ranſomes, which crueltie they put not in practiſe againſt their enimies, being of an other nation. [For king Henrie, when he had taken the towne of Meldens, hanged twentie Scots which he found therein, laieng to their charge that they had fought againſt their owne king.] At length, king Henrie fell into a græuous diſeaſe, which in ſhort time made an end of his life, notwithſtanding all the helpe that either by phyſicke or other waies might be miniſtred vnto him. The ſame yeere, that is to ſay, 1422, the French king Charles, the firt of that name, deceaſſed; after whome ſucceeded his ſonne Charles the ſeuenth, before named the Dolphin, as the cuſtome there is. By the death of theſe kings, the wars were not altogither ſo earneſtlie followed as before, whervpon the earles of Buchquhane and Wigton returned into Scotland, and ſhortlie after was an armie leuied, and ſiege laied both to Rockſburgh, and to Berwike, but for that they lay long abroad and did no good, returning home without gaine, this iournie in deriſion was called The durtie rode, or (as the Scots terme it) The dirtin raid.

But now to ſpeake ſomewhat concerning the order of the common-wealth in Scotland, ye ſhall vnderſtand, that after the death of Robert duke of Albanie, his ſonne Murdo Steward earle of Fife and Menteith was made gouernour, continuing in that office for the ſpace of foure yéeres, though (to confeſſe the truth) he was farre vnmeet thereto, differing much from the wiſedome and manhood of his father, for in him remained ſundrie vices, greatlie variable and contrarie one to another. In time of anie aduerſitie, he ſhewed himſelfe as a man deſpairing of all comfort or helpe: in proſperitie ſo lift vp in careleſſe inſolencie, that he had no ſtaie of himſelfe, by reaſon whereof whereof ſometimes he ſuffered heinous offendors, through dread of their puiſſant friends (a thing not to be ſuffered in Scotland) to eſcape vnpuniſhed; and at other times againe, he ſhewed himſelfe more ſeuere & cruell in executing of iuſtice, than the matter required.

Thus was he ſtill in extremities, keeping no temperance nor laudable meane in anie of his doings. Hereto was he ſo negligent in chaſtiſing his ſons Walter, James, & Alexander (whether through ſoftneſſe & lacke of wit, or by reaſon he bare ſuch a fond & tender fatherlie loue toward them) that they hauing him in ſmall regard, plaied manie outragious parts, to the ſore offending of a number. At length, one of them taking diſpleaſure with his father, for that he would not giue him a falcon, the which he had long before greatlie deſired, ſtepped to him, and plucking hir beſide his fiſt, wrong hir necke from hir bodie euen preſentlie before his face. Wherevpon the father somewhat kindeled with this preſumptuous deed of the ſonne: Walter (ſaid he, for ſo was his name that had thus miſuſed him) ſith it is ſo that thou and thy brother will not be ruled by my ſoft and gentle gouernement, I ſhall bring him home yer it be long, that ſhall chaſtiſe both you and me after an other manner. And after this, he reſted not to trauell ſtill for the redéeming of James the firſt out of captiuitie, till at length he brought him home in déed, to the great wealth, ioy, and good hap of all the Scotiſh nation. ✠ For calling togither a parlement (of the nobilitie) at Perth, they conſulted of receiuing home their James impriſoned in England, and at length willinglie agréed (either for fauour they bare to the lawfull heire, or being wearied with the lothſomnes of the preſent gouernement) to ſend an ambaſſage to the king of England, to demand the reſtitution of king James. Wherevpon they diſpatched into England (to execute their deuiſe) Henrie Lichton biſhop of Aberden, Archembald Dowglaſſe (the third earle of that name, and firſt of that familie) the ſonne of Archembald Dowglaſſe, duke of Touraine, William Hcie conſtable of Scotland, Richard Cornuall archdeacon of Londane, and Alexander Jarraine a Drum, knight.)

In the meane time, the French king, Charles the ſeuenth, being ſore vexed with wars by the Engliſhmen, ſent to the earle of Buchquhane his conſtable, requiring him to returne againe with all ſpeed into France, and to bring ſo manie Scotiſhmen with him, as he conuentientlie might. This earle therefore found meanes to perſuade Archembald earle of Dowglas, father to the foreſaid earle of Wigton, to paſſe with him into France, which two earles with an armie of fiue thouſand men, or (after ſome writers) ten thouſand, tooke the ſeas, and arriued with proſperous wind and weather at Rochell, and coming to the French king, were receiued of him with all ioy and gladnes. ✠ With this companie alſo was ſent ambaſſador, Gilbert Grenlaw biſhop of Aberden, a man of great authoritie amongeſt the nobilitie of Scotland, for his ſingular wiſedome, and ſuch a perſon as with great dexteritie executed the office of the chancellorſhip of the realme. The effect of whoſe meſſage was, to comfort Charles the ſeuenth, then king of France, and to aſſerteine him, that not onelie they which were now allanded in France, but alſo all the inhabitants of Scotland would remaine ſo ſtedfaſt in his faith & friendſhip, that they would ſpend both liues and goods in the defenſe of the crowne of France, as the following experience ſhould well trie. Wherevpon the earle of Dowglaſſe was by the king for his further aduancement, honored with the title of the dukedome of Touraine. But that glorie of the Scots was ſone diminiſhed (as ſaith Leſleus) by the infortunat ſucceſſe which they had through the Engliſh at the battell of Vernoile. In which (beſides all the hired or common ſouldiers which were alſo moſt ſlaine at that time) there periſhed of the nobilitie, the two brethren of the gouernour, the earle of Buchquhane conſtable of France, Archembald Dowglas duke of Touraine, with James his ſonne and heire, Alexander Lindſeie, Thomas Swinton, Robert Steward, and manie other, as in the French and Engliſh hiſtories more largelie may apéere.

Leſleus lib. 7. pag. 270. 1424. N. Gi.

And héere a little to ſtep out of the way, becauſe in this place Buchanan girdeth at the Engliſh (as he doth in all the parts of his booke, with moſt bitter tawnts) I will a little ſhew that he hath forgotten himſelfe in the ſame: as well againſt vs generallie (as apéereth in manie places) as againſt Graſton, Humfrie Lhoid, and Hall, eſpeciallie in manie other places thereof. And therefore (readers) giue me leaue in milder ſort to ſpeake of him (being dead) than he doth of others. For although (againſt all humanitie) he do moſt bitterlie with words of heat inflame his pen againſt Humfrie Lhoid, departed the world manie yéeres (as it apéereth) before he tooke the later penne in hand (after the ouerſéeing of his old fragments) as himſelfe in his epiſtle confeſſeth, to write an hiſtorie: yet I will ſpare him in better ſort. And therefore I much muſe, that he a man ſo learned and graue, would now in his later age, when reaſon ſhould moſt rule him, ſo dip his pen in gall, as forgetting himſelfe, he ſhould be of theſe rough conditions (contrarie to all learning, which Emollit mores, nec ſinit eſſe feros) he would call men impudent, immodeſt, vnlearned, liers, vnbrideled, malicious, backbiters, euill tonged; and that he can rather proue the Britains to be made of dogs and brute beaſts, better than to be deſcended of Brutus. All which ſpeeches are to be found in his booke: for (if there were a fault in Lhoid) as there was none, becauſe it ſéemes he did not well conceiue his mind: could not he either reprehend error, or diſproue men, but with ſuch bitter tawnts, when they but onelie ſhew their opinion, diſſenting in orderlie ſort from others, as it is lawfull for all learned men to do? Where learned he that rhetorike, to reiect the opinion of men with dogs eloquence, and ſooner to deduce that creature (formed to the image of God, and lord of all beaſts) to be rather made of dogs than of men, and for one or two priuat perſons to inueie againſt a whole ſtate?

A digreſſion againſt Buchanan.

But Humfrie Lhoid imputeth a note of infamie to his nation (as he ſuppoſed) in diſproouing Hector Boetius, who arrogantlie (beſide all truth) hath tranſferred to his Scots, both places, perſons, and déeds, which neuer belonged to them. And is this ſo great a fault in Lhoid, when himſelfe and Leſleus biſhop of Roſſe (ſecretlie miſliking Boetius) haue in ſilence paſſed ouer a great manie imperfections in the hiſtorie of Boetius, and placed manie other things after an other ſort, referring them to other times than Boetius doth? And why ſhould he maligne Lhoid for reprehending him, whome himſelfe condemneth, & of whome he ſaith that In deſcriptione Scotiæ quædam parùm verè prodidit, & alios in errorem induxit, and whome for manie faults (by Boetius eſcaped) he further ſaith in the later end of his ſecond booke, that he will not defend him in ſuch errors, as no reaſon there is why he ſhould? But if from the abundance of the hart the tong and hand do ſpeake and write, I can not ſée but that by his diſtempérat ſpéeches, I muſt condemne him of ſecret grudge, not ſo much to the perſon of Lhoid, as to the whole nation, againſt which the chiefeſt part of his booke ſéemeth to be a ſtomaching inuectiue. And yet ſuch as it is, they muſt of neceſſitie follow that intreat of the hiſtorie of his nation, or elſe he will exclame againſt them (as he doth in this place of the battell of Vernoile) that they malicioulie obſcure the glozie of the Scots, following the authozitie of the aduerſarie, and not the truth of the hiſtozie written by him, oz the French nation.

And in this place of his booke, rather than he will want occaſion to tawnt and diſgrace vs by his cholerike pen, he will ſéeke a knot in a ruſh, and make a mounteine of a molehill, in ſo behement inuaieng againſt the Engliſh, that ſay that the Scots were not able to mainteine ſuch titles of honoz as were giuen them by the French: a ſimple matter to make ſuch diſcourſe vpon, and to ſtep ſo much awzie out of the courſe of the ſtozie. But thinke you Buchanan hath committed no ſuch (nay greater) faults againſt vs? Yes trulie, and that I ſuppoſe will be well pzoued at an other time, in an other treatiſe vpon his booke now iuſtlie fozbidden in England, and (as I heare) moze iuſtlie in Scotland. And hære remember I pzaie thée gentle reader, that in one place of his booke he ſaith that he ment to haue obſerued this courſe from the beginning, that he would not ſéeke to digreſſe by bypaths out of the courſe of the hiſtozie. And hath he ſo ſone fozgotten that in the firſt fozehead of his booke, almoſt thzée leaues togither, & alſo in manie other parts of the ſame (as well as in this place of the battell of Vernoile) he hath lept manie miles out of the way, with bitter wozds to tawnt Humfrie Lhoid, Grafton, Hall, & all the Engliſh hiſtozies, and by manie whole pages (in manie parts of his wozke) with much ſpence of powder and ſhot, to batter the credit of the Engliſh writers. Theſe trulie were not parts of ſuch a perſon, as the place (which he had about the pzince whileſt he liued) required. But inough of this by me (who am not Honorarius arbiter, and will be no ſeuere cenſurer of other mens writings at this time (wherevnto I was occaſioned by Buchanans digreſſion in this place) ſince the ſame will be moze ſubſtantiallie touched by others in other wozks (wherevnto I refer my ſelfe) and ſo returne to the order of the hiſtozie.)

The Scotiſh chronicles declare, that the loſſe of this field chanced ſpectallie through enuie and diſcozd, which reigned amongeſt the chiefteins. Foz the duke of Alanſon enuieng that the Scots ſhould dailie riſe in honoz within France, kept himſelfe backe, till time the Scots were ouerthzowen and bzought to vtter deſtruction. Againe, euen vpon the ioining, there roſe great ſtrife and contention betwixt the conſtable & the duke of Touraine, who ſhould haue the ſupzeme rule of the Scotiſh legher, the one diſdaining to giue place to the other. Thus ye may perceiue, how the Scots with loſſe of manie of their liues, and much bloudſhed, supozted the ſide of Charles king of France, againſt the Engliſhmen. And though there came dailie newes of diuerſe great ouerthzowes giuen by the Engliſhmen to ſuch Scotiſhmen and other, as ſerued the ſaid king Charles, yet did not the Scots therefoze ſtaie at home, but at ſundzie times, and vnder ſundzie capteins repaired into France: as amongeſt other, one Robert Patillocke of Dundée with a new power of Scots went ouer to king Charles the ſeuenth afozeſaid, ſhewing ſuch pzoofe of his ſingular manhood and valiancie in thoſe wars, as in recouerie of the realme of France out of the Engliſhmens hands, his ſeruice ſtood king Charles in notable ſtéed. Chiefflie his diligence and pzoweſſe well appéered, in reducing the parties of Gaſcoigne vnto the French ſubiection, which had remained a great number of yéeres vnder the dominion of the Engliſh kings. And hærevpon was he called by the inhabitants euer after, Le petit roy de Gaſcoigne.

✲But to returne to the buſineſſe of Scotland and of the Scots, as they paſſed in the meane time. We ſay, that the French reioiſing of this conqueſt of Gaſcoigne, would not ſéeme to be vnthankfull to the Scots therefoze: foz which cauſe they erected a ſtatue oz image of this Patillocke, in the hall of the king of France, as a perpetuall memozie of this conqueſt, and as a ſingular teſtimonie of their good will towards the Scots, which they placed there to remaine a monument to all poſteritie. Beſide which, he confirmed and increaſed the number of the gard of Scotiſh archers (which they were wont to vſe in peace and warre) firſt inſtituted by Charles the king of France, ouer all which he made this Patillocke chiefe capteine, which office the Scots did then and ſince ſo well diſcharge, that the ſame continueth yet in our memozie. Beſides which (a little befoze this) Charles the firſt appointed an other companie of Scotiſh horſſemen to be in wages with him, being commonlie called the trope of the Scotiſhmen at armes. Of whome the chiefe gouernour was Robert Steward (bozne of the familie of the earle of Lennor) who was honozed by the king with the title of the lozd de Aubignie, with other lands and great poſſeſſions beſtowed vpon him. All which (being of long time poſſeſſed of the Scots of the ſame ſurname, by continuall ozder of bloud & deſcent, that is, by Bernard the famous capteine of warre, then by Robert, and to conclude, by John Steward, bzother of the earle of Lennor) is at this day alſo in poſſeſſion of the wozthie yong gentleman (the ſonne of the ſaid John) who giueth fozth a rare hope that he will not degenerat from the nobilitie of his anceſtozs. The ambaſſadozs ſent (as * befoze is ſhewed) into England foz K. James, behaued themſelues ſo ſagelie therein, that in the end, they bzought it to good concluſion: as thus. Firſt it was agréed, that king James ſhould be ſet at libertie, and alſo pay foz his ranſome the ſum of 100000 marks ſterling, the one halfe to be paid in hand, and foz the other halfe to leaue ſufficient pledges behind him, till it were paied. Albeit ſome writers alledge, that leauing pledges foz the paiment of the one halfe, he was diſcharged of the other, in conſideration that he toke to wife the ladie Jane, daughter to the earle of Summerſet. The ſaid earle and the cardinall of England his bzother, conueied him with his quéene their néece, vnto the bozders of both the realmes. And at their taking leaue each of other, there was pzeſented vnto king James and to the quéene his wife, beſides a cupboard of maſſie plate, ſundzie faire cloths of rich and coſtlie arras by his wiues friends, with manie other iewels and things of great pzice & valure.

King James then departed on this wiſe from his wiues bzethzen, and other ſuch his déere friends, as his vertue and pzincelie behauiour had pzocured him during his abode here by the ſpace of ſixtéene oz eightéene yeares in England, entered into Scotland, and came to Edenburgh on Care ſundaie, otherwiſe called Paſſion ſunday in Lent, where he was receiued with all honoz, ioy, and triumph that might be deuiſed. ✲At what time as the nobles came to giue him their dutifull welcome into his natiue ſoile and inheritance, there began to be manie complaints by them, who ſince the death of their laſt king (partlie by negligence, and partlie by the default of the gouernozs) had béene moleſted with diuers kinds of iniuries; wherevpon, Walter the ſon of Mozdac, Malcolme Fleming, and Thomas Boid being gréeuouſlie accuſed, were (to pacifie the exclamation of the common people) committed to diuers pziſons till the nert parlement, which was appointed the firſt kalends of June following, where is moze intreated of this matter, as after ſhall appeare, Buchanan hauing thus placed it befoze the kings

AND after that, as sone as the solemnitie of the feast of Easter was finished, he came to Perth, and shortlie after to Scone, where he was crowned king, and his wife quéene, by duke Murdo the gouernor, and Henrie bishop of saint Andrewes, the one and twentith day of Maie, after the incarnation 1424. There came forth of England with this James the first, diuerse English gentlemen, which remaining euer after in seruice with him, were aduanced to certeine lands, possessions, and liuings in Scotland. Amongest whome (as one of the chiefest) was Andrew Graie, who afterwards by the kings aid and good furtherance, got in mariage the daughter and heire of Henrie Mortimer of Foulis, named Helen, and by that means came the lordship of Foulis vnto the hands of the Graies, whose surname and posteritie continueth yet in Scotland, inuested with great lands and dignities, both in Gowrie and Angus.

King James after his coronation returned from Scone to Edenburgh, where he called before him all those that bare anie authoritie in the administration of the common-wealth, during the time of the gouernors duke Robert and duke Murdo, namelie the chancellor, the treasuror, the clearks of the register, the controller, the auditors, and receiuers, with all other that had borne offices, or had anie thing to do concerning the kings rents. At length, when he perceiued by their accounts made, that the most part of all the lands, rents, and reuennes perteining vnto the crowne, were wasted, bestowed, alienated, and transported by the two foresaid gouernors, vnto their friends and fautors, contrarie to all right or good consideration (the customs of burrowes and good townes onlie excepted) he was not well content herewith, though for the time he passed ouer his displeasure, in shewing outwardlie no semblance, but as if he had liked all things well.

King James keepeth an audit.

In the meane time, he aduisedlie perused all euidences, rols, and charters perteining to the crowne, and shortlie thereupon called a parlement at Edenburgh, in the which, by aduise of the three estates, a generall tax was ordeined and granted, to be raised through the whole realme; as twelue pence of the pound to be paied of all lands within Scotland, both spirituall and temporall; and foure pence for euerie cow, ore, and horsse, to be paied for the space of two yeares togither. This paiment was leuied the first yeare without anie trouble, but the second yeare there rose such murmur and grudging amongst the poore commons about the paiment thereof, that he remitted the residue that was behind, & tooke neuer anie tax after of his subiects, vntill he maried his daughter with the Dolphin of France. Amongst other bils put vp in this parlement, there was diuerse complaints exhibited by the people, for sundrie oppressions vsed and done by the sons of duke Murdo, and other great peeres of the realme, before the kings returne into Scotland.

Whereupon Walter Steward, one of the sons of the said duke Murdo, was arrested, and sent to a castell situated vpon a rocke within the sea called the Basse, there to remaine in safe keeping. Also Malcolme Fleming of Cumernald, and Thomas Boid of Kilmarnoke, were committed to ward in Dalkeith, but these two at the intercession of diuerse noble men were pardoned and forgiuen of all offenses for an easie fine, with condition, that they should satisfie all such persons as they had in anie wise wronged. In the foresaid parlement also, K. James tooke a solemne oth, to defend as well the liberties of his realme, as of the church, during the course of his naturall life. The like oth by his example did all the residue of the barons take at the same present time. Not long after, an other parlement was called and holden at Perth, in the which duke Murdo, with his sonne Alexander, were arrested and committed to ward. So was also Archembald earle of Dowglasse, with his brother William earle of Angus, George earle of March, Adam Hepborne of Hales, and manie other great barons of Scotland, euerie of them being put in sundrie castels and strengths, to remaine there in safe keeping. Duke Murdo was sent to Carlaurocke, and his duchesse was put in Temptalloun.

In the yeare following, on the Holie rod daie, called the Inuention of the crosse, James Steward the third sonne of duke Murdo moued with greatire, for that his father and brethren were holden in prison, came with a great power to the towne of Dunbreton, and burnt it, after he had slaine John Steward of Dondonald, and two and thirtie other persons, which were found in the same towne: but the king kindled in great displeasure for this attempt, pursued this James so fiercelie, that he was faine to flee into Ireland, where he afterwards deceassed. [And Finelaw (which was sometime one of the order of the frier Dominicks) which fled with him into Ireland, & was author that the said James committed all these outrages, died there also. Besides which, there fled into Ireland the wife of Walter, his two sonnes, Andrew and Alexander, with Arthure the bastard: who (in the end) returning home, was after by James the third aduanced to great honors.] In the nert yeare insuing, K. James called a parlement at Sterling, in the which he sitting with scepter, sword, and crowne in place of iudgement, Walter Steward with his brother Alexander were condemned, and incontinentlie were lead forth to a place before the castell, and there beheaded.

Walter and Alexander the sonnes of duke Murdo beheaded.

On the morrow after, duke Murdo himselfe, and Duncan Steward earle of Lennor were conuicted of high treason, and beheaded before the castell in semblable manner. [It is a constant fame (saith Buchanan) though I find it not written in any place, that the king sent the heads of the father, husband, & children, to Isabell the wife of his cosine germane, to trie whether she being a fierce woman, would (as it iustlie happened) by distemperance of griefe discouer the secrets of hir mind. But she (notwithstanding all which grieuous and vnlooked for spectacles) did not inordinatlie burst out into anie bitter words, but onlie said; If the faults be true which are laid against them, the king hath done but right and iustice vnto them.) Thus by the attaindor of duke Murdo and his sonnes, the earldome of Fife, Menteith, and Lennor came into the kings hands. The residue of the lords and barons remaining as then in prison, and abiding the kings pleasure, were sore afraid, when they heard what rigorous iustice had béene executed on duke Murdo and his sonnes: notwithstanding, within 12 moneths after they were all set at libertie, and receiued into the kings fauor, on promise of their loiall demeanor & dutifull obedience euer after to be shewed, during their naturall liues.

✠ The parlement being ended, John Mountgomerie, & Humfreie Cunningham were sent by the king to the castell of Louchleuine, which was kept against him by the runagat James Steward, whom in short time they forced to surrender the said castell. Not long after, John Steward of Dernleie (who was maister of the Scotish garrison of horssemen in France, the rest of the former capteins being consumed) came into Scotland with the bishop of Reims, as ambassador in the name of Charls, to renew new the old league betweene the two nations, and to conclude matrimonie betweene Lewes the sonne of the said Charles the seuenth, and Margaret the daughter of K. James, both being yet verie yong. Which thing so dispatched, in the next yeare being the (1428) he determined (hauing pacified all Scotland betweene the mountents of Granzeben) to subdue the further parts beyond it also. Wherefore to begin the same, he commanded the castell of Innernesse (setting conuenient place in the furthest borders of Murrey) to be repared. Whither when he came two yeares after, to sit in iudgement vpon misdemeanors of the inhabitants, and to suppresse their robberies, he called before him the chiefe of all the families of that countrie, especiallie such as being accompanied with great traines, were wont to fetch preies from their next borders, did set tribute on the quieter sort, and did compell the common people to minister sustenance to those idle loiterers: of which capteins, some had a thousand, some two thousand, & some far manie more redie at their call to obeie their commandement: with which they ceassed not to keepe the good in danger vnto them for feare of hurt, and made the euill (amongest whome they were assured of refuge & defense) the bolder to commit all kind of wickednesse. Which persons when the king had gotten in, and drawen to come before him, partlie by flatteries, and partlie by threats: he committed about fortie of their leaders to seuerall prisons: whose euill being throughlie knowen, he hanged two notable fellows amongst them, called Alexander Macror and John Macarecture; at what time also he beheded James Campbell (for the murther of John of the Iles) a man deerelie beloued of his people. The rest which remained (being of the common sort) they likewise dispersed into diuers prisons, whereof some were after executed, and some were permitted freelie to depart to their owne. The capteins of the factions thus slaine (or for the most part restreined in prison) the inferior sort durst not attempt anie thing, being destitute of leaders. Wherevpon the king calling them before him, did giue them a louing admonition to embrace iustice, because there was no surer or certeine hope of safetie in anie thing, than in the innocencie of life, the which if they would determine to doo, they should alwaies find him readie to honor and reward them; if not, they might learne by the examples of others what they should hope to receiue themselues.)

In the yeare next following, which was after the incarnation 1427, Alexander lord of the Iles was arrested by the king at Innernes, for that he was accused to be a succorer & maintener of theeues & robbers in the countrie: but forsomuch as he promised in time comming to reforme his former misdemeanors, he was pardoned and set at libertie, whereof insued great trouble immediatlie after. For shortlie vpõ his deliuerance, he gathered a power of wicked scapethrifts, and with the same comming into Innernes, burnt the towne, and besieged the castell, inforcing with all diligence to win the same, till he was aduertised that the king was comming towards him with a great power, whereupon he fled incontinentlie to the Iles. Finallie hauing knowledge that a great number of people lay dailie in wait to take him, that they might present him to the kings hands, he came disguised in poore araie to the Holie rod house, and there finding the king on Easter daie deuoutlie in the church at his praiers, he fell downe on his knees before him, and besought him of grace, for his sake that rose as that day from death vnto life.

At request of the queene, the king pardoned him of life; but he appointed William Dowglasse earle of Angus to haue the custodie of him, and that within the castell of Temptallon, that no trouble should rise by his meanes thereafter. His mother Eufemie daughter to Walter sometime earle of Rosse, was also committed to ward in saint Colmes inch; because it was knowne that she solicited hir sonne to rebell (in maner as is afore said) against the king.

Not long after, Donald Ballocht, brother to the said lord Alexander of the Iles, came with a great power of men into Lochquhaber. The earles of Mar and Cathnes came with such number of their people as they could raise, to defend the countrie against the inuasion of those Flandrien, and fought with the said Donald at Innerlochtie, where the erle of Cathnes was slaine, and the earle of Mar discomfited. Herewith did Donald returne with victorie, and a great preie of goods and riches into the Iles. The king sore moued with the newes hereof, came with a great armie vnto Dunstafage, purposing with all speed to passe into the Iles. The clans and other chiefe men of the said Iles aduertised hereof, came to Dunstafage, and submitted themselues vnto the king, excusing their offense, for that (as they alledged) the said Donald had constreined them against their willes, to passe with him in the last iournie. All those clans vpon this their excuse, were admitted to the kings fauour, and sworne to pursue the said Donald vnto death.

Shortlie hereupon, this Donald fled into Ireland, where he was slaine, and his head sent by one Odo a great lord of Ireland (in whose countrie he lurked) as a present to the king that laie as then at Sterling. There were also three hundred of his adherents taken, and by the kings commandement hanged for their offenses within three weekes space, after his first fleeing into Ireland. This trouble being thus quieted, king James passed through all the bounds of his realme, to punish all offendors and misruled persons, which in anie wise wronged and oppressed the poore people. He allowed no pardon granted afore by the gouernor, alledging the same to be expired by his death. For he thought indeed it stood neither with the pleasure of God, nor wealth of the realme, that so manie slaughters, reifes, and oppressions, as had beene done afore in the countrie, should remaine vnpunished through fault of iustice. It is said that within the first two yeres of his reigne, there were three thousand persons executed by death, for sundrie old crimes and offenses.

And though such extreme iustice might haue beene thought sufficient to giue example to other to reforme their naughtie vsages, yet one Angus Duffe of Stratherne nothing afraid thereof, came with a companie of theeues and robbers, and toke a great preie of goods out of the countrie of Murrey and Cathnes: for recouerie whereof, one Angus Murrey followed with a great power, and ouertaking the said Angus Duffe neere to Strachnauerne, fiercelie assailed him. Who with like manhood made stout resistance, by reason whereof there insued such a cruell fight betwixt the parties, that there remained in the end but onelie twelue persons aliue, & those so wounded, that they were scarse able to returne home to their houses, and lined but a few daies after. About the same time, there was also another notable theefe named Makdonald Rosse, which grew with spoiles and robberies to great riches. Wherevpon Makdonald being brought out of prison with twelue of his companions, the king commanded that they (by the talion law of Moses that yeeldeth an eie for an eie, and a tooth for a tooth, and by the example of Phalaris, who burnt him first in the bull that was the author thereof for others) should likewise be shod with iron horsshoes, in that sort as they before had serued the woman, and then to bee caried three daies togither about the citie for a spectacle to the people, to feare to attempt such extraordinarie wickednesse; making proclamation that euerie one might see this new kind of punishment. After which, at length (doubting if he liued he would not cease to commit the like, or else reuenge the same) he chopped off Makdonalds head, & caused his twelue fellowes and partakers to be hanged in the high waies.)

In the third yeere after, which was from the incarnation 1430, on the eleuenth daie of October, Jane the queene of Scots was deliuered of two sonnes at one birth, Alexander and James. The first deceassed in his infancie. The other succeeded after his fathers decease in the kingdome, & was named James the second. At the baptisme of these two infants, there were fiftie knights made. Amongst the which, and first of all other, was William the sonne of Archembald Dowglas, that succeeded his father in the earledome of Dowglas. His father the said Archembald Dowglas, somewhat before this time, or (as other authors say) in the yeere next insuing, was arrested by the kings commandement, and put in ward, remaining so a long time, till at length by supplication of the queene, and other peeres of the realme, the king pardoned him [with John Kennedie] of all offenses, and set both them And Alexander earle of Rosse at libertie. King James in this sort did what in him lay to bring the realme of Scotland in such quiet tranquillitie, that (in purging the same of all offendors, and such as liued by reiffe and robbing) passengers by the high waies might trauell without dread of anie euill disposed persons to molest them.

✠ Hauing thus with diligence suppressed the robberies (practised through all parts of his realme) he forgot not to looke into small offenses which were secretlie done, and of lesse danger; determining to take awaie all euill customes which had continued in the realme. For custome, being an other nature doth bring to passe, that a common error (by manie ages continued) maketh a perfect law, and therefore (because the inferior iudges would the better administer iustice, if they had persons of high authoritie that might punish their false sentences) he chose forth speciall persons of the better sort (commended for their wisedome, grauitie, and holinesse of life) and made them iustices, whome he sent ouer all the realme giuing them full authoritie to heare and determine all quarels and suites (if anie were brought vnto them) whereof the ordinarie iudges either (for feare) durst not or (for hatred or fauor) would not, or (for strength of others) could not giue anie perfect iudgement.)

so sundrie priuileges and great liberties to the vniuersitie of saint Andrews, to the high aduancement thereof, and was oftentimes himselfe present at their disputations, taking great pleasure therein. Such as were knowne to be learned men, and were presented to him by the vniuersitie, he preferred to great benefices and other ecclesiasticall liuings, still as the same chanced to be vacant. Organs brought into Scotland.

Much what about the same time, there was a parlement holden at Perth, in the which Henrie Wardlaw bishop of S. Andrews, in name of all the three estates there assembled, made a long and right pithie oration to this effect; that where by the high policie and prudent diligence of the kings maiestie there present, iustice, and all due administration of lawes and good ordinances were so reuiued, that nothing seemed to be ouerpassed, that might aduance to the profit and commoditie of the common-wealth; yet was there one wicked vsage crept in of late, increasing so fast, that if spedie remedie were not had in time, all those commodities brought into the realme by his comming, should be of small auaile, and that was, such superfluous riot in banketting cheere, and numbers of costlie dishes, as were then taken vp and vsed after the English fashion, both to the great hinderance of mans health, and also to the vnprofitable wasting of their goods and substance. If the laudable temperance vsed amongest the Scotishmen in old time were well considered, nothing might apeare more contrarie and repugnant thereto, than that new kind of gluttonie then vsed, by receiuing more excesse of meats and drinks than sufficeth to the nourishment of nature, through prouocation of such deintie and delicate dishes, confectioned sawces, and deuised potions, as were now brought in amongst them. As for such gentlemen as the king had brought with him forth of England, they were worthie in deed to be cherished and had in high fauour; neither was this abuse to be so greatlie imputed vnto them, considering it was appropriate to their nation. But the Scotishmen themselues were chieflie to be blamed, that had so quicklie yeelded to so great an inconuenience, the enormitie whereof appeared by the sundrie vices that followed of the same, as excesse, sensuall lust, slouth, reiffe, and wasting of goods. For if temperance be the nourisher of all vertue, then must the contrarie, that is to say, intemperance, be the bringer forth and prouoker of all vice. If it might therefore please the kings highnesse, to shew his accustomed wisedome and prouidence in repressing this abuse of costlie fare, so much damagable to his people, he should do the thing that was meritorious before God, and no lesse profitable and necessarie for the publike weale of all his subiects.

By these and manie other the like persuasions, bishop Wardlaw vsed to dissuade the king and his people from all superfluous courses of delicate dishes and surfetting bankets. Insomuch that euen then there was order taken, that fewer dishes and more spare diet should be vsed through the realme, licencing gentlemen onelie, and that on festiuall daies, to be serued with pies, the vse of them not being knowne in Scotland till that season. Neuertheless, such intemperance is risen in processe of time following.

following, that the grædie appetite of gluttons in this age may be ſatiſfied with no competent fæding, till their bellies be ſo ſtuffed with immoderate gormandiſe, that they mate ſcarſe fetch breath, through which their noiſome ſurfetting, they fall dailie into ſundrie ſtrange and lothſome kinds of diſeaſes, being oftentimes killed by the ſame in their flouriſhing youth, as by dailie experience plainlie appeareth.

A terrible eclipſe.

In the ſame yære the ſeuentænth day of June, was a terrible eclipſe of the ſunne, at three of the clocke at after none, the day being darkened ouer head for the ſpace of one halfe houre togither, as though it had bæne night, and therevpon it was called the blacke houre. At the nert Lammas, the king raiſed an armie, & came with the ſame to Rorburgh, beſieging the caſtell for the ſpace of fiftæne daies togither. He had in this armie (as the report went) the number of two hundred thouſand men, accounting cariage men & all other ſuch as followed the campe: yet notwithſtanding all this huge multitude, hauing waſted his powder and other munition, before hæ could doo anie great hurt to his enimies, he was conſtreined to raiſe his field, and leaue the caſtell in the Engliſhmens hands as he found it. After this king James perceiuing how the knowledge of handicrafts and manuall occupations was decaied in Scotland, through continuall exerciſe of wars, ſince the daies of Alexander the third, to the further aduancement of the common-wealth, and that his ſubiects might haue occaſion to auoid ſlouth and idleneſſe (the rot of all miſchiefe) he brought a great number of cunning craftſmen out of Germanie, France, and other parties, to inſtruct his people in their arts and faculties.

Not long after, one Paule Craw a Bohemian borne, was burnt at ſaint Andrews, for preaching and ſetting forth the doctrine of John Hus, & John Wikcliffe. John Fogo being one of them that helped chieflie to condemne him, was made (for his great and earneſt diligence therein ſhewed) abbat of Melroſſe. [After which, the ſaid king James began to take vpon him the perſon of a priuate man, ſundrie times aſſociating himſelfe to the compants of others (but eſpeciallie of the merchants) in changed apparell, according to the ſtate of ſuch perſons with whom he would companie, to the end he might thereby learne what men did ſay and iudge of him, and ſo vnderſtand what was to be corrected in the gouernement of the common-wealth.] About the ſame time was the abbeie of Charturar monks founded beſides Perth, by king James, with great coſt and magnificence.

Alſo the lord Scrope and other aſſociats with him, came in ambaſſage from Henrie the firt, king of England. The effect of whoſe meſſage was, to haue the ancient league betwirt the Scots and Frenchmen diſſolued, promiſing that if the councell of Scotland would conſent thereto, and ioine in leage with the Engliſhmen; that both the towne and caſtell of Berwike, with all the lands lieng betwirt Tweed and the Kecroſſe (as the Scots write) ſhould be deliuered into the Scotiſhmens hands. King James hauing ſmall credit in ſuch faire promiſes, perceiued the ſame to tend onlie to this end, that the league betwirt the Frenchmen and Scots might be once clearelie broken, and then to vſe the matter as occaſion ſhould ſerue their turne. This matter therefore being propoued before the councell, it was concluded, that in no wiſe the ſaid league betwirt the Frenchmen and Scots ſhould be diſſolued, and ſo therevpon the Engliſh ambaſſadors were diſpatched without more talke concerning that matter.

caused George Dunbar erle of March, ſonne to that earle which rebelled againſt his father king Robert the third, to be areſted and put in ſafe keeping within the caſtell of Edenburgh. He ſent alſo the earle of Angus with his chancellor William Creichton, and Adam Hepborne of Hales to the caſtell of Dunbar, deliuering them letters ſigned with his hand, and directed to the keepers of the ſaid caſtell, that they ſhuld deliuer vp the houſe immediatlie vpon ſight of thoſe letters vnto the bringers of the ſame. The keepers durſt not diſobeie his commandement, but ſuffered them to enter according to their commiſſion. Within twelue moneths after, a parlement was held at Perth, where the foreſaid George earle of March was diſherited of all his lands and liuings for his fathers offenſe committed againſt king Robert the third. Thus the houſe of the Dunbars loſt the earledome of March, wherein the ſame had flouriſhed ſo manie yæres togither, to the great defenſe and ſafegard of the realme of Scotland on that ſide, againſt both ciuill and forreine enimies.

The king yet moued with ſome pitie toward ſo noble a linage, within ſhort time after gaue the earldome of Buchquhan to the ſaid George; and after the kings deceaſſe, the lords of the councell thinking the ſame too little, aſſigned forth to him and his ſon Patrike, the ſumme of foure hundred marks yærelie, to be receiued out of a parcell of his owne ancient inheritance of the earledome of March, to inioy the ſame till James the ſecond came to full age. In the yære 1435, Alexander Steward earle of Mar departed out of this life. This Alexander was a baſtard ſonne of the earle of Buchquhan, that was one of the ſonnes of king Robert the ſecond. He was a man of right ſingular proweſſe, and in his youth following the warres, was with Philip duke of Burgognie at the ſiege of Liege, or Luike, where he bare himſelfe ſo manfullie, that few wan the like honor at that tournie. Not long after, to his high aduancement, he got in mariage the ladie Jacoba counteſſe of Holland: notwithſtanding, he continued but a while with hir, being forced to forgo hir companie, either for that ſhe had another huſband, or elſe for that the inhabitants would not ſuffer a ſtranger to reigne ouer them.

Leodium.

After his returne into Scotland, he ſent meſſengers into Holland, requiring to haue the iſſues and profits of ſuch lands as were due vnto him in right of the ſaid counteſſe his wife; but receiuing nought ſaue a froward anſwer, hæ prouided him of ſhips, and made fore warres on the Hollanders by ſea: firſt being put to the worſe; but at length he toke a number of their ſhips laden with merchandize, as they were returning homewards from Dantzicke. The mariners were drowned, and the ſhips burnt. Through which loſſe the Hollanders being ſore abaſhed, fell to a compoſition with him, and toke truce with the Scots for an hundred yæres. This earle of Mar ſo long as he liued had the gouernance of the north parts of Scotland vnder king James the firſt, for he was a right prudent perſon, as well in warlike enterpriſes, as in ciuill adminiſtration. Hæ brought forth of Hungarie ſundrie great horſſes and mares for generation, that by ſuch meanes the countrie might be prouided of great horſſes of their owne race, where till that time there was none bred within Scotland, but ſmall nags, more mæt to ſerue for tournieng hacknies, than for anie ſeruice in the warres.

The ambassadors that came with this message were honorablie receiued, and in like sort interteined by king James, who at their departure gaue to them sundrie rich gifts, and appointed sir William Creichton to go with them into Denmarke, ambassador frō him, to the king there, who vsed himselfe so sagelie in this businesse which he thus went about, that renewing the old league betwixt the two realmes of Denmarke and Scotland, stedfast peace and assured amitie without anie more adoo therof insued. Much about the same time, there came ambassadors from the French king, Charles the seuenth, not onelie desiring to haue the old league betwixt France and Scotland to be ratified at that present by a new confirmation, but also to confirme the same with better assurance. Margaret eldest daughter to king James, at request of the said king Charles, was giuen in mariage vnto Lewes the Dolphin, and eldest sonne to the said king Charles.

Manie great lords of Scotland were appointed to haue the conueiance of hir into France, and great prouision of ships made for that voiage, because the king was aduertised that the Englishmen had a fleet abroad on the seas, to take hir if they might meet with hir by the waie. But as the hap fell, it chanced the same time, as the Scotish ships should passe, there appeered on the coast of England, a great fleet of Spaniards, which the Englishmen supposing to be the Scots, they came vpon them with foure score sels of one and other, thinking verelie to haue had their wished preie, euen according to their expectation: but being receiued with as hot a storme as they brought, they quicklie vnderstood how they were in a wrong bor, and so shrewdlie amazed (as Hector Boetius saith) they susteined great losse both in men and ships, and in the meane time the Scotish naue passed by quietlie without damage, incountering not one ship by the waie that sought to impeach their passage. There went 140 ladies and gentlewomen forth of Scotland, to attend this ladie Margaret into France, amongest which number there were fiue of hir owne sisters.

In the meane time, whilest such things were a doing, Henrie Persie of Northumberland inuaded Scotland with foure thousand men, not being knowen whether he had commission so to do from the king of England, or that he made that enterprise of himselfe. William Dowglasse earle of Angus, to resist this inuasion, gathered a power of chosen men, amongest whome were Adam Hepborne of Hales, Alexander Ramsete of Dalehouse, and Alexander Elphingston, with others. The earle of Angus being thus associat, met the Persie at Piperden, where a sore battell was foughten betwixt them, with great slaughter on both sides; but at length the victorie fell to the Scots, though there were slaine togither with Alexander Elphingston, two hundred gentlemen and commons of Scotland: and of the English part there died Henrie of Cliddesdale, John Ogill, and Richard Persie, with fifteene hundred other of gentle men and commons, of the which gentlemen, fortie were knights. There were taken also and brought home by the Scots as prisoners, to the number of foure hundred.

Shortlie herevpon, king James raised a mightie armie, and besieged the castell of Rocksburgh, but when he had almost brought his purpose so neere to passe, that those within began to fall to communication, for the rendering of the place, the quéene came to the campe in great haste vnto him, signifieng that there was a conspiracie begun against him, so that if he tooke not the better héed, he was in great danger to fall into the hands of those that sought his life. The king doubting the matter, raised his siege and returned home to prouide the better for his owne suertie, but that preuailed little: for Walter Steward earle of Atholl, and head of the whole conspiracie, pretending euer a right to the crowne, by reason that he was procreat by king Robert the second on his first wife, procured his nephue Robert Steward, and his cosine Robert Graham, to slea the king by one meane or other, which finallie they accomplished in this wise. This Robert Graham, for diuerse wicked acts before committed, contrarie to the lawes and ordinances of the realme, was driuen to an outlawrie, so that if he were taken, he looked for nothing but present death, and therefore hated the king most deadlie. And though by the quéenes diligence both his and other of the conspirators purposes were now disappointed, hauing contriued to dispatch the king at the siege of Rocksburgh; yet forsomuch as their names were not knowne, they hoped still to find occasion to atchiue their detestable intention, sith they were no more mistrusted than the others.

Herevpon the said Steward and Graham came one euening to the blacke friers of Perth, where the king as then was lodged, and by licence of the porters comming into the house, entered vp into the gallerie before the kings chamber dore, minding to haue staied there till one of the kings seruants that was priuie to their diuelish purpose should come, by whose helpe they were promised to haue entrie into the chamber. But before the comming of this Judaslike traitor, an other of the kings seruants named Walter Straiton came forth of the chamber dore to haue fetched wine for the king: but being aduised of these two traitors standing there at the dore, either of them hauing a long sword girded to him, he stept backe, and cried, Treason: but yer he could get within the dore to haue made it fast, they leapt vnto him, and slue him there outright.

Whilest this was a doing, not without great noise & rumbling, a yong virgin named Katharine Dowglasse (that was after maried to Alexander Louell of Bolumnie) got to the dore, and shut it: but because the barre was awaie that should haue made it fast, she thrust hir arme in the place where the bar should haue passed: she was but yong, and hir bones not strong, but rather tender as a gristle, and therefore hir arme was sone crasht in sunder, and the dore broken vp by force. Herewith entering the chamber, they slue such of the seruants as made defense, and then the king himselfe with manie cruell and deadlie wounds [at 28 seuerall blowes.] The quéene was also hurt as she was about to saue hir husband. Patrike Dunbar, brother to George sometime earle of March, was left for dead on the floore, by reason of such wounds as he receiued in the kings defense, doing most manfullie his vttermost deuoire to haue preserued him from the murtherers hands. Thus was James the first murthered the 21 day of Februarie, the 44 yeere of his age, the 13 of his reigne, and from the incarnation of Christ 1436. His bodie was buried in the house of the Chartarars at Perth which he founded in his life time, but had not as yet throughlie finished.

* Of this James I find written in his singular commendation, that he was for proportion of bodie of the middle stature, with broad shoulders, hauing the other parts also answering therevnto, as they neither seemed monstrous big to be wondered at, nor ouertreme small to be scoffed at; but caried the maiestie of a person, whom Aeneas Syluius (expressing the most excellent conformitie of members in this our king) doth terme to be squared or of euen proportion tion, as the parts of a quadrangle or iust square do answer eth other, so that nature seemeth not to haue framed a creature more apt or excellent than he, either for shape of bodie, or for kinglie maiestie. He did manie times imbrace iustice more liberalie and seuerelie, than well became a king, which ought to be called (and so in truth to be) the father and nourisher of the common wealth. For he seemed so exactlie to measure all things by the rule of iustice, that he is said (within the space of three yeares) to haue executed three thousand persons for their committed offenses. Although this may rather seeme to be a slander (than otherwise) grounded vpon no foundation, since all things seemed to haue beene performed by him in respect of sincere zeale of iustice, whereof this may be a sufficient argument, that he was of so mild and sweet nature, that we read not of anie of our princes that did more reuerentlie imbrace peace at home amongst his subiects, or more willinglie conclude the same abroad with strangers. What shall I say of his wisedome, which in manie and the greatest affaires did so manifestlie appere, that the kings of other nations did ioine in league and friendship with him? Of which wisedome, and of other his vertues (although he obtained part by the benefit of nature) he got the greatest summe by the learning & instruction which he purchased in England, when he was prisoner: at what time he was by the commandement of Henrie the king most diligentlie instructed. For he was there by the kings beneuolence so well trained in all sciences and gentlemanlie actiuitie, with the diligence of good scholemaisters, that it is not easie to iudge what science he best vnderstood: for beside that he had skill in all kinds of musike (but most excellent in plaieng on the harpe) he was so good an orator, that nothing might be more artificiall than that which he spake: againe, he was a rare poet, in which he seemed not so much cunning by art, as furthered by nature, which is sufficientlie proued by verses of diuerse kinds (at this day remaining) composed by him (in Scotish meeter) with that singular art, as he is thought fullie to equall the sharpenesse, grauitie, and wisedome of the ancient poets.

Buchan. also saith he wrote Latine verses with such good grace, as the rudenesse of that age permitted.

It is straunge that I saie, and far beyond the diligence of the princes of our time, yea and almost beyond the opinion of men: but yet most true and confirmed by the testimonie of them which knew him well; and therefore to be written to his perpetuall praise. He did so exactlie in mind and memorie comprehend the depth of diuinitie and law, that therein he excelled manie, & in his time gaue not place to anie: to conclude, there was nothing wherein the commendation of wit consisted, or wherein anie shew of the liberall arts appeared, that he would not with great diligence aplie his indeuor for the knowledge thereof, yea and that sometime to all mechaniall or handie-craft labors which were meet for a free man, which he is said most studiouslie to haue followed. But in the end, iudging it ouer base for kinglie maiestie to be exercised in these meane & inferior knowledges, he caused artificers of all sorts to be brought out of England, Flanders, and other nations, which should instruct our people therein; for by that means he persuaded himselfe he should in the end calme the rough maners of his nation, and that with these mild arts they would also receiue a mild and sweete condition of life & maners. Wherefore I may well say; O most happie common-wealth which was gouerned by so worthie a prince: & may iustlie exclame; O you most fierce and wicked rebels, that would by murther take away such an honor, beautie, and piller of the common-wealth. Now, besides manie other things by him done, I will here (being better late than neuer) set downe this (not touched before) which is, that he was not onlie a beautie to his countrie, in prouiding for his people to liue at quiet within doores; but he also sought for the defense of his realme against his enimies without doores: by artillerie, and other necessaries required for the warres. For the inuention of guns happing about his time, or not much before; he caused certeine peeces of artillerie to be made beyond the seas in Flanders, of which, there was one most especiall and great peece called the Lion, on the circumference whereof were these verses ingraued, testifieng the antiquitie in like maner of the same:

Illustri Iacobo Scotorum principi digno,
Regi magnifico, dum fulmine castra reduco,
Factus sum subitò, nuncupor ergo Leo.

John Maior lib. 6. cap. 13.

The nobles and peeres of the realme right sorowfull for the death of this James, assembled togither, and made such earnest & diligent search for the traitors before mentioned, that at the length they were apprehended and brought to Edenburgh, where they were executed on this maner. The earle of Atholl, which was not onelie principall in practise of this treason concerning the kings death, but also in times past was chiefe of counsell with Robert duke of Albanie, in making away of Dauid the kings eldest brother, and after the kings returne forth of England did most earnestlie solicit him to put duke Murdo to death, with all other of his linage, trusting that when they were dispatched, he should find means to rid the king also, and his children out of the way, & so at length atteine to the crowne without anie obstacle. This earle (I say) was first stripped of all his clothes, saue onelie his shirt; and then was an instrument of wood, made like to the drawer of a well, set fast in a cart with a frame: at the end of which instrument, was the earle fastened and bound, and so caried about the towne, sometime hoised on high, that the people might see him aloft in the aire, and sometime let fall againe with a swaie downe vpon the pauement.

The search made for the traitors.

The execution of the erle of Atholl.

After this, being brought to an open place, where most resort of people was, they crowned him with an hot iron, for that (as was said) a witch had told him, that before his death he should be crowned openlie in sight of the people. Through whose illusion being deceiued, he liued vnder vaine hope to atteine the crowne, directing all his imaginations to compasse the meanes thereto. Thus was he serued on the first day. On the second day, he was drawen with his complices laid on hurdels, round about the towne at an horsse taile. The third day, his bellie was ript, and his bowels were taken forth, and throwne into the fire flickering before his eies, & then was his heart pulled forth of his bodie, and throwne likewise into the fire: and last of all, his head was cut off, and his bodie diuided into foure quarters.

The prophesie of a witch.

His nephue Robert Steward was not altogither so cruellie executed. But Robert Graham, for that it was knowne that he slue the king with his owne hands, was put into a cart, the hand that did the deed being fastened to a paire of gallows, which were raised vp in the said cart; and then were three persons appointed to thrust him through in all parts of his bodie with hot irons, beginning first in those places where it was thought no hastie death would thereof insue, as in the legs, armes, thighes, & shoulders. And thus was he caried through euerie street of the towne, and tormented in most miserable wise, and at length had his bellie ript, and was bowelled and quartered as the other were before. Christopher Clawn also, and other that were of counsell in the conspiracie, were put to most shamefull kinds of deaths, as they had iustlie deserued, few or none lamenting their case. spéedie reuenge therefore executed by the nobilitie) should say, that he much doubted, whether he ought with greater praise to commend them which reuennish those that had committed such parricide.] In the daies of king James the first, sundrie strange and monstrous things chanced in Scotland. At Perth there was a sow that brought forth a litter of pigs with heads like vnto dogs. A cow also brought forth a calfe, hauing a head like a colt. In the harueſt before the kings death, a blasing star was seene with long streaming beams. And in the winter following, the frost was so vehement, that ale and wine were sold by pound weight, and then melted against the fire. A sword was seene gliding vp and downe in the aire, to the no lesse dread than wonder of the people.

Iames the second.
1436

IAmes the first made away through the traitorous practise of the earle of Atholl (as before is specfied) his eldest sonne James the second of that name being as then but six yeares of age succéeded to the crowne, as lawfull heire to the same, and by his mother and the nobilitie of the realme was brought to Scone, where, by the vniuersall consent of the three estates he was crowned king of Scotland, being the 102 king of that realme from Fergus the first.
He was surnamed James with the fierie face, by reason of a broad red spot which he had in one of his chéekes. This James at his comming to mans state prooued a stout prince, and maried the daughter of the duke of Gelderland, as after shall appeare. In the beginning he had some trouble and businesse, by reason of the great authoritie and rule which the high barons of the realme sought to beare & mainteine, as the Dowglasse, and other, but in the end he subdued them all.

Buchan. 103.

The daughter of the duke of Gelderland maried to James the second.

Shortlie after his coronation, because he was not of himselfe able to gouerne, by reason of his tender age; the nobles and estates of the realme chose sir Alexander Leuingston of Calender knight, gouernor of the king and realme, and sir William Creichton knight was confirmed in his office to inioy the same as he before had done, the K. being committed to his keeping, togither with the castell of Eden-burgh. Archembald earle of Dowglas remained in his countries of Dowglas & Annandale, and would neither obeie gouernor nor chancellor, wherby great trouble was raised within the realme. Within a short time also, the gouernor and chancellor were diuided. The gouernor with the quéene remained at Striueling, but the chancellor had the king still with him in the castell of Edenburgh; and what the one commanded to be done, the other forbad: whereby neither of them was obeied, nor anie execution of iustice put in practise, so that through all the countrie, reiffe, spoiles, and oppression were exercised without feare of punishment. The quéene perceiuing such mischiefe to reigne throughout all parts of the realme, deuised a meane to aduance the gouernors side, and hereupon with a small companie repaired to Edenburgh, where she to bring hir purpose to passe, did so much by great dissimulation, that she persuaded the chancellor to suffer hir to enter the castell, and to remaine with the king; but within three daies after, she feigned one morning to go on pilgrimage vnto the White kirke, and caused the king hir sonne to be handsomlie couched in a trunke, as if he had béene some fardell of his apparell, and so packed vp, sent him by one of hir trustie seruants deceiuing so wise a man as the chancellor was. Then raised he a great power of his friends and well-wil-lers, and besieged the chancellor in the castell of E-

The king conueied vnto Striueling.

The bishop perceiuing in what danger he stod through the womans deceipt, sent to the earle of Dowglas, desiring his assistance against the quéene and gouernor. But the earle refusing either to helpe the one or the other, alledging that they were both ouer ambitious in seeking to haue the whole gouernment of the realme in their hands. The chancellor then perceiuing himselfe destitute of all helpe, made agreement with the gouernor, vnder certeine conditions, that he should reteine still the castell of Eden-burgh vnder his possession, and likewise continue still in his office of chancellor. Shortlie after the earle of Dowglasse deceassed at Lesselricke, in the yeare 1439, against whome aswell the gouernor as chancellor had conceiued great hatred. He left behind him a sonne (begot of the earle of Crawfords daughter) named William, a child of fourtéene yeares of age, who succéeded his father in the earldome of Dowglasse, appearing at the first to be well inclined of nature, but afterwards by euill companie he waxed wild and insolent.

1439.

About this season, James Steward sonne to the lord of Lorne, maried the quéene Dowager, and fauored the earle Dowglasse in his vnrulie demeanor: whereupon, both the said James and his brother William, with the quéene, were committed to prison in the castell of Strueling by the gouernors apointment; but shortlie after they were released by the sute of the lord chancellor, sir William Creichton, and Alexander Seton of Gurdon, who became suerties for their good abearing, vnder great forfeiture of sufficient band. About the same time, or rather somewhat before, Alane Steward lord of Dernlie was slaine at Palmais thorne, by sir Thomas Boid. And in the yeare following, the same sir Thomas was slaine by Alexander Steward of Bolmet and his sonnes; where through there rose, great troubles in the west part of Scotland. William earle of Dowglasse sent Malcolme Fleming of Cumernald, and Alane of Lowder, vnto Charles the seuenth, king of France, to obteine of him the duchie of Towraine, which was giuen to Archem-bald Dowglasse at the battell of Vernoill in Perth; and the last earle, father to this earle William, had inioied the same all his life time, whereupon that sute was the soner obteined: which made the yong earle more insolent than before.

Alane Steward is slain.

He kept such a port, and vsed to haue such a traine attending vpon him, specially when he came to the court, that it should séeme he had the king in small regard; for he thought himselfe safe inough in mainteining the like state and port, or rather greater than euer his father at anie time had mainteined before him: insomuch as he would ride with two thousand horsse, of the which number there were diuerse errant théeues and robbers, that were borne out in their vnlawfull and wicked practises by the same earle.
Certeine capteins of the Iles, as Lachlane, Make-laine, and Murdac Gipson, with a wicked number of the inhabitants of the same Iles, harried, spoiled, and burnt the countrie of Lenor, and slue John Col-quhouen lord of Lute vnder assurance. They also slue women and children, without respect to age or sex. In this yeare chanced a great dearth in Scotland, the like was neuer heard of before, and such a death by pestilence, that few escaped that were taken therewith, and so the realme was plagued with reiffe,

reiſke, oppreſſion, dearth, and death of people. This yeare alſo the gouernor toke the whole adminiſtration vpon him, wherewith the chancellor was diſpleaſed, and leauing the king and him in Striueling, repaired to Edenburgh, where he deuiſed the way how to recouer the king from the gouernor, and ſo on a morning toke foure and twentie men with him and rode to the parke of Striueling where the king was then hunting, and the gouernor abſent at Perth.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 11.

✻At what time the chancellor with great courteſie drawing towards the king, did ſalute him, being in ſome feare to ſée ſuch companie come vnto him, hauing ſo few in his traine. Which when the chancellor perceiued, he praied the king to be of good comfort, and in few words (fit for that time) exhorted him that he ſhould looke to himſelfe and the kingdome, and deliuer himſelfe from the impriſonment of Alexander the gouernor, liuing freelie from henceforth after a kinglie maner; that he ſhould not accuſtome himſelfe to obeie the pleaſure and couetouſnes of others, that he ſhould vſe to command his ſubiects in all iuſt and lawfull cauſes; and that he ſhould deliuer his people from theſe euils which increaſed vpon them, by the ambition and couetouſneſſe of the rulers, which he could not now well remedie or reſiſt, except the king would take on him the gouernement, the which to do, he had without all danger or trouble prouided a meane. For he had in a readineſſe ſufficient number therefore, which ſhould attend vpon the king where ſo euer he would go, or to vſe anie other matter as need ſhould require. Which the king taking with a pleaſant countenance (either becauſe the matter liked him well, or to diſſemble the feare he had of the chancellor) did fullie approue, and went with his ſmall vnarmed companie and the chancellor toward Edenburgh.)

The king went with the chancellor to Edenburgh.

The chancellor (as Hector Boetius ſaith) had cauſed the number of foure thouſand horſſemen of his ſeruants, tenants, and friends, ſecretlie to be readie that morning about the town of Striueling, to reſiſt his aduerſaries if they ſhould haue vſed anie force againſt him: and now vnderſtanding of the kings going thus with the chancellor, they came to him on the way, and attending him, brought him ſafelie and without further trouble vnto Edenburgh, where he was ioifullie receiued. The gouernor when he was aduertiſed hereof, was grieuoullie diſpleaſed; but becauſe he knew not how to remedie the matter, he went to Edenburgh, and there got John Innes biſhop of Murrey, and Henrie Lichton biſhop of Aberdene, to labor ſome agreement betwixt him and the chancellor: which they did in this wiſe: the king to remaine in the keeping of the chancellor, and the gouernor to continue his office. And ſo by this accord they were made friends.

The gouernor and chancellor are made friends.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 8. pag. 294. Buchan. lib. 11.

✻During which turmoiles, William Dowglaſſe (that with a certeine pride of mind had highlie borne himſelfe, diſobeieng the rule of the gouernor, & diſdaining to ioine in ſocietie of the chancellor) did ſhew the dedlie hatred of them both againſt him; for which cauſe they ſeeke by all means vtterlie to take him awaie. For the doing whereof (to the end it might be performed without anie tumult) they appoint a parlement to be holden at Edenburgh; whither came not a few (as at other times in ſuch aſſemblies it alwaies hapneth) but almoſt the whole countries came flocking thither, to complaine of the iniuries which they had receiued: of which ſort, there was ſuch a miſerable ſhew, that men could not behold the ſame without great motion of a pitifull mind: when euerie one for himſelfe, the father for the children, the children for the fathers, and the widows for their huſbands, did complaine that they were by the robbers ſpoiled of all their ſubſtance. Whereupon (as it happeneth alwaies through pitie of gentle harts, to rue the afflicted) there aroſe great enuie againſt the captains and leaders of the wicked doers of ſuch ſpoile, whoſe euils were now growne to ſuch exceſſe, as by no means they might be ſuffered; whoſe factions were ſo largelie ſpread ouer the realme, that none could defend their life or liuehod: but ſuch as did yéeld themſelues to their actions, and whoſe riches were ſo increaſed, as the weake could not well find anie helpe (in the authoritie of the magiſtrate) againſt their violence.

Whereupon it liked the wiſer ſort (ſince their force ſéemed not almoſt able to be broken, or their parts to be ſeuered) to flie to policie and leaue ſtrength, not daring openlie to call the earle Dowglaſſe by that name of captaine of them, although they well knew him to be the chiefe author and fautor of thoſe people. Wherefore the gouernor and the chancellor (for a time diſſembling the hatred which they harboured againſt Dowglaſſe) perſuaded the whole parlement, that it were more conuenient with faire ſpeeches to pacifie Dowglaſſe, than with ſhew of ſuſpicious and euill words to ſtirre him to further heat: eſpeciallie conſidering that he was of that great wealth and power, that he alone, if he ſtood againſt them, might hinder all the decrees of the parlement: but if hée ioined with the nobilitie, there might be eaſie remedie found to ſalue all theſe preſent euils. Through which wiſe and ſubtill perſuaſion of Alexander the gouernour, it was decréed amongſt them, that there ſhould be honourable letters directed to him in the common & ſpeciall name of all the nobilitie, which ſhould admoniſh him, that being mindfull of the honorable place which he poſſeſſed (and of his worthie anceſtors, by whome the common-wealth of Scotland had receiued manie ſingular benefits) hée ſhould repaire to the parlement, which well could not, and willinglie would not, either keepe or determine any thing in the ſame without his preſence. In which aſſemblie, if hée would complaine of anie wrongs or grieſes offered vnto him, hée ſhould be ſatiſfied ſo fullie as they might lawfullie.

And if he or anie of his friends or familie had committed anie diſordered part, the nobilitie there met would fullie remit the ſame, as well for the nobilitie of his, and the worthie memorie of the déeds done by his anceſtors; as for that they rather attributed ſuch actions to the iniurie of the times, and the frailtie of his age, and the perſuaſion of others, than vnto him, of whome there was conceiued a ſingular hope of great towardneſſe, for the aduancement of his name and beneſit of his countrie. Therfore if he would come and ioine with them, he ſhould receiue in gouernement what part, place, and office of the common-wealth pleaſeth him, to the end that as in times paſt, their countrie had béene manie waies deliuered out of moſt heauie dangers by the hand of the Dowglaſſes, ſo at this preſent, the ſame might alſo by his preſence and furtherance, be againe aduanced and ſtrengthened from and againſt thoſe inteſtine euils wherewithall it now fainted. The yong man (by nature and age greédie of glorie) being moued with theſe flatteries, and the other perſuaſions of his friends (whereof euerie one was blinded with a certeine hope of good to happen to himſelfe) they now déemed it beſt (forgetting all former dangers) to thinke vpon their priuate commodities, and with that reſolution toke their iournie to come to the parlement.

The chancellor when he vnderſtood they were on there way, rode forth of Edenburgh manie miles to méet the Dowglaſſe, and courteouſlie inuited the earle to his caſtell of Creichton, which laie in his waie as he ſhould ride, at which place he was moſt honourablie interteined by the chancellor. Where, when they had remained two daies, the chancellor (after hée had ſhewed manie tokens of a friendlie mind vnto him) bicauſe he would vtterlie baniſh from the earle all ſuſpicion of him, that he had anie miſlike in the ſaid earle) began familiarlie to perſuade him, that (remembring the kings dignitie, and the office of him whome the lot of inheritance, their countrie lawes, and the conſent of the parlament had aduanced to the gouernement and adminiſtration of all things) he ſhould in all humilitie acknowledge him for his chiefe lord and king; that he would permit the large patrimonie obteined by the bloud of his anceſtors to deſcend to poſteritie by lineall inheritance as he himſelfe receiued it; that he would clearelie deliuer the name and familie of the Dowglaſſes (no leſſe famous for their dutie, than their deeds) not onelie from the filthie ſpot of treaſon, but alſo from all note of ſuſpicion thereof; that he would reſtraine himſelfe and his from offering iniuries to the weake and common people; that he would remoue from him all ſuch as were giuen to robberie and ſpoile; that he would from henceforth aplie himſelfe to the defenſe of iuſtice, to the end that his former offenſes (if there were anie) might rather be attributed to euill counſell of the wicked, than to the naturall diſpoſition of himſelfe: for ſo the repentance of his yong yéeres might be taken for proofe of his innocencie in ſuch euils. With theſe and ſuch like ſpæches, declaring the faith of a wel-willing mind, he allured the earle to come to Edenburgh with Dauid his brother partaker of all his counſels and actions.

This faire tale of the chancellor, more than in times paſt or then beſéemed the place which he poſſeſſed, with the manie meſſengers ſent to him from Alexander the gouernor (to meet him on the way) almoſt euerie houre, draue a déepe ſuſpicion in the heads of the earles companie riding with him to Edenburgh, of ſome trecherie to be ment towards him. Whereupon the ſame began to be blundered from one to another of the traine, and came ſo faſt to the friends of Dowglaſſe, that ſome of them did boldlie and liberalitie admoniſh him, that he ſhould remaine in that purpoſe (which once he did) to ſtaie, to returne, and not to go forward with the chancellor: and at the leaſt (if he would aduenture himſelfe) to ſend home his brother Dauid, to the end that hée might not hazard the whole familie vnder the fortune of one ſtroke, as his father had before admoniſhed him when he died. Whereat the vnaduiſed youth of this man, being moued to anger againſt his friends, did by the voices of ſome of his men (as it were by one that ſhould make proclamation therfore) pacifie the ſecret murmurings that were amongeſt the companie; and anſwered ſuch of his friends as found fault therewith, that he ſufficientlie knew, that it was the common plague of all great families, alwaies to haue ſuch men about them, as being impatient of quiet and eaſe, reſpect not the danger and miſerie of their patrons, ſo it maie be commoditie vnto them: who bicauſe (they would not be reſtreined within the bounds of peacefull lawes) are authors of ſedition, in which (when all things are in turmoile) they may the better wander abroad to ſatiſfie their euill humor: whoſe ſpeaches hé regarded not, ſince hé rather reſpected and truſted the approued wiſedome of the chancellor and the gouernor, than the ſlouthfull & raſh minds of ſuch ſeditious perſons.

After which (to cut awaie occaſion from the reſt to anſwer) he ſet ſpurres to his horſſe, and haſtened his iourneie more than he did before, with his brother and a few of his other friends, taking his right courſe into the caſtell, and (as it were by a certeine deſtinie) caſting himſelfe hedlong into the ſnares of his enimies. At ſuch time as he came to the caſtell, the gouernor (according to his promiſe) was readie there to méet him, to the end the matter might ſéeme to be wrought by common conſent, and the weight of ſo great enuie might not light vpon the head of one man. Dowglaſſe being honorablie and friendlie by the gouernor receiued into the caſtell, was for dinner placed at the kings table. But in the middeſt of this ſweet meat (ſower ſawce being prepared) there was a bulles head ſet before him, which in thoſe daies was a ſigne of death. Wherewith the yong man amazed (and greatlie troubled in his mind, inwardlie repenting that he followed not the aduiſe of his followers) was about to riſe from the table: but being apprehended by armed men (appointed to that function) he was caried into the court next to the caſtell, and was there (in reuenge and puniſhment of his vnbrideled youth) beheaded, with his brother Dauid, and Malcolme Fleming, who (next vnto his brother) was in greateſt credit with him. Whoſe death the king now entring into his adoleſcencie or yéers (as we tearme it) of diſcretion, is ſaid heauilie with teares to lament, which the chancellor (grieuing to ſée) did greatlie rebuke in the king ſuch vntimelie and inordinate mourning, for the death of his and the common-wealths enimie, whoſe life (ſaid hé) would haue taken awaie all peace and tranquillitie in the realme.)

After the death of the ſaid earle, the ſtate of the realme became more quiet: for his vncle James Dowglaſſe baron of Abircorne that ſucceéded him, being a man of great ſtature, and verie fat, gaue himſelfe to quietneſſe, and liued but three yeeres after. The foreſaid William had but one ſiſter, that was called the faire maiden of Galloway, and was maried to one William Dowglaſſe, ſonne to this earle James before his deceaſſe, that the heritage ſhould not be diuided: bicauſe the earledome of Dowglaſſe was intailed vpon the heires male, and the lands of Wigton, Balwanie, Annardale; and Dermont remained to hir as heire generall. This earle William, after the deceaſſe of his father earle James, began to wax vnrulie, and to follow the vntoward maners of the other William Dowglaſſe latelie beheaded (as before ye haue heard) ſo that by ſupport manie diſobedient perſons would not obeie the gouernor and chancellor, wher vpon ſundrie great ſlaughters and oppreſſions were committed.

In the yéere 1443, not manie daies after, the caſtell of Dunbreton (which is not by ſtrength to be ſubdued) was twiſe taken within a few daies: for Robert Semplier that was captaine of the inferior caſtell, ſtell, and Patrike Galbꝛith captaine of the higher caſtell, did ſo diuide their gouernement of the ſaid caſtell (being a thing of great circuit) that euerie one had a peculiar and ſeuered entrance into his owne part without offenſe of the other. But yet theſe two (as moſt part of the realme of Scotland then was, and as it alwaies, oꝛ moſt commonlie happeneth in the minoꝛitie of the pꝛince, when euerie one will be a king) wanted not their factions, whome they did follow: foꝛ Patrike was ſecretlie thought to fauour Dowglaſſe, foꝛ which cauſe Semplier, oꝛ (as ſome haue Simplie) the other captaine perceiuing the part of the caſtell wherein Patrike ruled to be moꝛe negligentlie kept, than dutie oꝛ the ſtate of the time required, found opꝛoꝛtunitie to expell Patrike from thence, and to cauſe all his furniture to be caried out of the ſame, conuerting the ſaid caſtell to his owne vſe. In the end (the next day after) Patrike vnderſtanding thereof, and comming with foure vnarmed perſons (to fetch awaie his furniture and houſhold-ſtuffe) entered into the caſtell; and firſt finding the poꝛter alone, turned him awaie, then taking armoꝛ, expelled the others out of the higher caſtell: after which, calling aid out of the towne next adioining, he ſhut them alſo out of the inferioꝛ caſtell, and got poſſeſſion of the whole caſtell to himſelfe.)

1444. The king will rule himſelfe.

The king, after he came to the age of fouretéene yéeres, would not anie longer be vnder the gouernement of others, but toke the rule vpon himſelfe. The earle of Dowglaſſe informed thereof, came to him at Striueling, and put himſelfe and all he had to remaine at his pleaſure: whereupon the king receiued him, pardoned all his paſſed miſdemeanoꝛs, and admitted him to be one of his ſpeciall friends and pꝛiuie councelloꝛs in all his affaires. By his perſuaſion ſhoꝛtlie after, ſir Alexander Leuingſton, & William Creichton being diſcharged of their offices, were alſo put off from the councell, and all their friends baniſhed the court, and they themſelues were ſummoned to appéere befoꝛe the king: which becauſe they refuſed to doo, they were pꝛoclamed rebels, and put to the hoꝛne. The earle Dowglaſſe then foꝛ the old grudge he bare them, raiſed an armie, and harried their lands. In reuenge wherof, ſir William Creichton ſpoiled the earle of Dowglaſſe his lands, ſo that great trouble was raiſed thꝛough the whole countrie, and the lands of Strabꝛoke, Abircoꝛne, & the towne of Blackneſh were burnt and deſtroied.

1445. Leſle.

The earle of Dowglaſſe ruled wholie about the king, & made Archembald his bꝛother earle of Murrey, by ioining him in mariage with a ladie of the houſe of Dunbar inheretrix therof. Moꝛouer, Hugh Dowglaſſe was made earle of Oꝛmont. Thus the earle of Dowglaſſe aduanced his name, and ioined in friendſhip with the earle of Crawfoꝛd, with Donald earle of the Iles, and with the earle of Roſſe, to the end that ech of them ſhould be aſſiſtant to others. In this meane time, the earle of Crawfoꝛd at the requeſt of the earle of Dowglas, toke a great pꝛeie of goods out of the biſhop of S. Andꝛews lands in Fife, which biſhop was called James Benedie, ſiſters ſon to king James the firſt: where thꝛough the earle of Crawfoꝛd on the one part, and the earle of Huntleie with the Ogiluies on the other, met at Arbꝛoth in ſet battell, where the earle of Crawfoꝛd was ſlaine, and diuerſe barons on his ſide, although the victoꝛie and field remained with his ſonne, the maiſter of Crawfoꝛd, who ſucceeded his father, and was called earle Beirdie. On the earle of Huntleies ſide were ſlaine, John Foꝛbes of Petſlege, Alexander Berkleie of Gartulie, Robert Marwell of Teline, William Gurdun of Burrowfield, ſir John Oliphant of Aberdagie, and fiue hundꝛed moꝛe on their ſide, and one hundꝛed of the victoꝛers were alſo ſlaine, as Hector Boetius ſaith.

Buchanan. lib. 11.

The ſame writer repoꝛteth that the occaſion of this battell did chance, thꝛough the variance that fell out betwixt the earle of Crawfoꝛds eldeſt ſonne Alexander Lindſeie, and Alexander Ogilbie oꝛ Ogiluie (as ſome write him) about the office of the bailiffewike of Arbꝛoth, the which the maiſter of Crawfoꝛd inioieng, was diſplaced and put out by the ſaid Ogiluie. Whereupon the maiſter of Crawfoꝛd, to recouer his right (as he toke it) got a power togither with helpe of the Hamiltons, and with the ſame ſeized vpon the abbeie, and Ogiluie with helpe of the earle of Huntlie, came thither with an armie to recouer the place againe out of his aduerſaries hands, and ſo vpon knowledge héereof giuen vnto the earle of Crawfoꝛd, he himſelfe comming from Dundee vnto Arbꝛoth, at the verie inſtant when the battels were readie to ioine, cauſed firſt his ſonne to ſtaie; and after calling foꝛth ſir Alexander Ogiluie to talke with him, in purpoſe to haue made peace betwixt him and his ſonne, was thꝛuſt into the mouth with a ſpeare, by a common ſouldier that knew nothing what his demand ment, ſo that he fell downe therewith, and pꝛeſentlie died in the place: whereupon togither the parties went incontinentlie without moꝛe pꝛotracting of time, and ſo fought with ſuch ſucceſſe, as befoꝛe ye haue heard. The earle of Huntleie eſcaped by flight: but Alexander Ogiluie being taken and ſoꝛe wounded, was led to the caſtell of Fineluin, where ſhoꝛtlie after he died of his hurts. This battell was fought the 24 of Januarie, in the yéere of our Loꝛd 1445.

1445. I. Ma. 1446. Leſl. Buchanan. lib. 11. Leſleus lib. 8. pag. 279.

✻ The king thus ruled by the troꝛpe of the Dowglaſſes, the earle Dowglaſſe ſent to ſir William Creichton knight, to deliuer vp the caſtell of Edenburgh. But Creichton (faieng that the caſtell was committed to his gouernement by the whole realme, and that the king had not anie thing to doo therewith vntill he came to his full age) had all his goods foꝛthwith confiſcat to the kings vſe, with his caſtell of Creichton, which the kings people entered into and poſſeſſed. But leaſt they ſhould ſéeme to offer anie manifeſt wꝛong to the ſaid Creichton, they gaue out the ſame edict (as a veile of their malice and enuie) which Creichton had befoꝛe cauſed to be eſtabliſhed and pꝛoclamed. Foꝛ he firſt of all others made a law, that whoſoeuer did denie oꝛ reſiſt the king, demanding the deliuerie of anie caſtell, ſhould be in danger of treaſon; the bꝛeach and execution of which law did firſt come and fall by and vpon him, by whome that might be woꝛthilie ſaid (which is vſed to be ſpoken in common pꝛouerbe) Hee is fallen into the ſnare which he pꝛepared foꝛ others. Whereupon the Dowglaſſe (ſince the caſtell would not otherwiſe be deliuered) ſharpelie beſieged the ſame by the ſpace of nine moneths, which in the end Creichton ſurrendered into his hands, on certeine conditions to be perfoꝛmed. At which time alſo the ſaid Creichton was reinueſted with the honoꝛ of the chancelloꝛſhip, although he neuer after intangled himſelfe with affaires of the kingdome, hoping that in time to come (when the darke clouds of the wicked men, which had now ouerſpꝛead all things, were ouerblowen) a better foꝛme of gouernement would be bꝛought in, as a certeine light to giue ſhine to the common-wealth.

Buchan. lib. 11.

James Steward a woꝛthie knight (not he that was ſurnamed The blacke) was ſlaine at Kirkepatrike, two miles from Dunbꝛeton, by Alexander Lilie, and Robert Boid, whoſe crueltie not being ſatisfied with his bloud, they laboured to bꝛing his wife (great with child, & vpon point of deliuerance) within their danger. Foꝛ the perfoꝛmance whereof, they ſent a pꝛieſt vnto hir, that (in haſte and as it were troubled) ſhould tell hir in what diſtreſſe the now reſted sled, and that there was no meanes to relieue hirselfe by anie waie (since euerie place was beset with horsse and footmen) vnlesse she escaped by bote to Robert Bold at Dunbreton, who further vpon oth promised hir, that he would safelie bring hir backe to hir owne house.

The woman being credulous (and ignorant that Robert Bold was present at the death of hir husband) and caried out of Cardrosse, into the Dunbreton castell, might easilie perceiue hir selfe hardlie beset on euerie side by the deceipt of hir enimies, who (being so deceiued and ouercome with feare & griefe) was deliuered of child before hir time, and (togither with hir sonne) died there within few houres after.

Buchan. lib. 11. Almost at the same time, Patrike Hepburne (gouernour of Halis) held the castell of Dunbar, where he had Jane Seimer the quéene with him, to whome she fled for succour in the times of these tumults. Archembald Dunbar (supposing this to be a iust cause of anger) in the night did set vpon Halis the castell of Hepburne, which he toke at the first assault, by sleaing of the watch, who being stroken with a great feare for the same, did (in few dates after) restore the same to earle Dowglasse, with couenant that all they which were within, should depart in safetie without anie danger.)

James Steward is banished the realme. Sir James Steward surnamed the Blacke knight, husband to the quéene the kings mother, was banished the realme for speaking words against the misgouernement of the king and realme, wherewith he offended the earle of Dowglasse. As he passed the seas towards Flanders, he was taken by the Flemings, & shortlie after departed this life. The quéne his wife being aduertised of his death, died also within a while after, and was buried in the Charterhouse of Perth the fifteenth of Julie, in the yeere 1446. Hir name was Jane Summerset, daughter to the earle of Summerset. James the first maried hir (as before ye may read) in England. She had by him eight children, two sonnes, and six daughters, which were all honorablie maried: the first named Margaret, to the Dolphin of France: the second Eleanor, to the duke of Britaine: the third, to the lord of Tercuer in Zeland: the fourth, to the duke of Austrich: the fift, to the earle of Huntleie: and the first, to the earle of Morton. And by James Steward hir second husband, she had three sonnes: John earle of Atholl, James earle of Buchquhane, and Andrew bishop of Murrey.

He died. The quéne died. 1446.

Fr. Thin. ✻ After the death of the quéene, Hepburne deliuered the castell of Dunbar (to the king) being emptie, and without companie. ¶ In August, Alexander earle of Crawford did put to death at Toadune John Leonton, as an ingratefull person to him, since by his fathers helpe he had béene aduanced to great riches, and to the kings affinitie and kinred. Some after, sir William Creichton, with the bishop of Dunkeld, and Nicholas Otterburne a canon of Glascow, were sent in ambassage vnto the duke of Gelderland, for his daughter called Marie, to be ioined in mariage with king James. Their suit was obteined, and the ladie sent into Scotland noblie accompanied with diuerse lords both spirituall and temporall. At hir arriuall she was receiued by the king with great triumph, and the mariage solemnized by the assistance of all the nobles of Scotland, with great banketting, ioifull mirth, and all pleasant interteinment of those strangers that might be.

1448. Lesle. King James maried a daughter of the duke of Gelderland.

1447. 1448. Lesle. In the yeere 1447, there was a parlement holden at Edenburgh, in the which sir Alexander Leuingston of Kalendar late gouernour, James Dundas and Robert Dundas knights, at the pursute of the earle of Dowglasse were forfalted and condemned to perpetuall prison in Dunbreton, and James Leuingston his eldest sonne, Robert Leuingston treasuror, and Dauid Leuingston knights, lost their heads. James before his execution made a verie wise declaration to the standers by, declaring the instabilitie of fortune, and change of court, exhorting all persons to beware thereof; sith enuie euer followed high estate, and wicked malice neuer suffered good men to gouerne long. In the same parlement, sir William Creichton was also forfalted for diuerse causes, but principallie for that his seruants would not deliuer the house of Creichton to the kings herald, who charged them so to do. This forfalture was concluded in parlement by vertue of an act which the said William (when he was chancellor) caused to be made, and so being the first inuentor, was also the first against whome it was practised.

Incursions made. 1448. The yeere next insuing were sundrie incursions made betwixt Scots and Englishmen on the borders, Dunfreis was burnt, and likewise Anwike in England: but shortlie after a truce was concluded for seuen yeeres, great offers of friendship made by the Englishmen for to haue the wars ceasse on that side, because the warre betwixt them and France was verie hotlie pursued, and ciuill dissention disquieted the state of England, which was raised betwixt the two houses of Lancaster & Yorke. ✻ This yeere there were manie méetings or parlements of the nobilitie, in which were lawes established for bridling the wicked facts of such as aplied themselues to spoiling of other men; whereupon a long peace followed in Scotland: beside which, there were other lawes made for auoiding of treasons, and chiefli of such as touched the kinglie maiestie. This lawe of treason was afterward executed first vpon Dowglasse, which was author thereof. In this parlement were manie earles and lords created, whereof the chiefe were Alexander Seton baron of Gordon, who was made earle of Huntleie, and George Leslie baron was made earle of Rothsaie, both men singularlie famed for their wisedome and valure.)

Englishmen fetch booties out of Scotland. 1450. The English borderers of the west marches fetched a great bootie of cattell out of Scotland, notwithstanding the truce, in reuenge wherof the Scots inuading England, wasted the countrie, burnt townes and villages, slue the people, & with a great preie of prisoners, goods, and cattell, returned home into Scotland. Herewith followed dailie rodes and forraies made on both sides betwixt the Scots and Englishmen, and that with such rage and crueltie, that a great part of Cumberland was in manner laied wast: for on that side the Scots chiefli made their inuasions, because that from thence the first occasion of all this mischiefe might séeme to haue had the beginning. When such things were certified to the king of Englands councell, an armie was appointed forthwith to inuade Scotland, vnder the leading of the earle of Northumberland, and of one Magnus surnamed Redberd, a capteine of great experience, as he that had béene trained vp from his youth in the warres of France. The Scots, because of his long red berd, called him in scorne and derision, Magnus with the red mane.

The Scots inuade England.

A knight named Magnus

The Scots hearing of the approch of this armie towards their borders, leuied a power: George, or rather Hugh Dowglasse earle of Ormont by the kings commission, hauing the conduction thereof, who vnderstanding that the enimies would enter into Annandale, drew thither with the said armie to resist their attempts. The Englishmen passing ouer the riuer of Sulweie and Annand, came to another riuer called Sarc, & there pitched downe their tents. And on the next day they began to rob and spoile the countrie on ech side: but aduertised that the Scots were at hand with an armie, they that were thus gone forth, were with all spéed called backe to the campe campe by sound of trumpet, and forthwith their armie was brought into order of battell. Magnus with the red mane was apointed to lead the right wing, and sir John Penneinton a verie skilfull warriour gouerned the left wing, in the which the Welshmen were placed. The battell or middle ward the earle of Northumberland himselfe ruled.

Sir John Penneinton.

The earle of Ormont on the other side ordered his battels in this wise. He appointed a verie valiant knight called Wallase of Craggie, with an hardie number of souldiers to incounter with Magnus. And against the Welshmen he placed the lord Harwell, and lord Johnston, with a chosen companie of lustie Scotishmen, and commanding himselfe in the battell or middle ward, had scarse set his people in araie, when the trumpets in the English armie began to sound to the battell. He therefore exhorting his men to doo valiantlie, put them in remembrance that they had put on armor, being thereto prouoked by iniurie which their enimies had first offered them, whereupon they might conceiue good hope of victorie by the fauour of the righteous God, who giueth the vpper hand (for the most part) to that side that hath iust cause to make warre. He willed them then to put all feare out of their harts; and as they had force inough to banquish their enimies that came thus to brag and threaten them with vtter destruction: so he besought them to shew no lesse manlike stomachs to deliuer their countrie by hardie fight from iniurie of the same enimies.

The earle of Ormont exhorteth his armie.

He had no sooner made an end of his speech, but that the arrowes came so thicke from the English archers, that the Scots began to looke about them, as it were to see which waie they might best escape by flight. But Wallase perceiuing their faintnesse of courage, with lowd voice reproued their cowardise, and with most pithie words exhorted them to remember their duties, and to follow the example of him their leader, whome they should perceiue to haue fullie vowed to spend his life in defense of his countrie. The Scots herwith seemed to be so incouraged, that they rushed forward with great egernesse vpon the right wing of the Englishmen where Magnus stood, and so laied about them with speares, axes, and such like hand weapons, that with great slaughter they draue the Englishmen to breake araie and to flee: Magnus herewith being more chafed than afraid, as should appeare, preassed forward vpon Wallase with great violence, and seeking to approch vnto him that he might haue wroken his griefe vpon him, was inclosed among the Scotish troopes, and slaine with a few other of his friends and seruants that followed him.

The battell is begun.

Magnus is slaine.

The slaughter of this man, in whome consisted no small hope of victorie on the English part, put the residue of their armie in such feare, that they were not able longer to resist the Scotishmens violent impression, but turning their backs fled amaine, whom the Scots pursued in chase verie fiercelie, so that manie of the Englishmen died in the battell, but more now in the chase: for the tide being come in, staied manie of them that made their course to haue escaped thorough the riuer, whereby diuerse that ventured into the water were drowned; & other that durst not take the water, were oppressed by the Scots that followed them. There died in this battell of English men, to the number neere hand of three thousand, and amongest other, Magnus (as before ye haue heard) with eleuen other knights of no small account and estimation. Of Scots were lost somewhat aboue six hundred. There were taken prisoners of Englishmen sir John Penneinton, and sir Robert Harington knights, and the lord Persie, sonne to the earle of Northumberland, who holpe his father to horsbacke, whereby he escaped by flight: & beside these, a great number of other were by the Scots taken prisoners, whome the sword and water had spared.

The earle of Ormont hauing got this honorable victorie, conueied the chiefest of the prisoners to the castle of Lochmaben, and after repaired to the court, where he was of the king iolifullie receiued, honorablie feasted, and highlie rewarded. After this, the Scots that dwelled vpon the borders, liued for a season in better quiet: for though the Englishmen wished to haue béene reuenged for this losse and ouerthrow of their people, yet by reson of ciuill wars that shortlie after followed, they were constreined to forbeare to make anie further wars against the Scots, till better occasion might serue. And for the auoiding of danger that might insue in time of this intestine trouble by forren enimies, they sued to haue a truce with the Scots, which for the terme of three yeares was granted. In this yeare, William earle of Dowglasse, with a great companie of nobles and gentlemen, as the lords Hamilton, Graie, Salton, Seton, and Oliphant; also, Calder, Urquhart, Cambell, Frasier, and Lauder, knights, went into Italie, and was at Rome in time of the Jubile which was kept there that yeare. He left behind him to gouerne his lands in Scotland, Hugh earle of Ormont that was his brother: but in his absence (by counsell of such as were about him) the king summoned the erle to appeare before him within 40 daies; & because he came not within that set time, he was put to the horne, & his lands inuaded & spoiled.

But when Sentclare was not of sufficient strength to performe what he would, because some & the most part reiected (though others imbraced) him, he returned home without doing anie thing. Wherewith the king greatlie moued (because he saw his authoritie contemned) called all the Dowglasses into law, and declared them publike enimies and detractors of his gouernement. And therupon (prouiding an armie against them) he goeth into Galloway: where, at their first comming (since their capteins were all in prison) a small part of the armie (seeing the enimies dispersed into rougher parts of the countrie to hide themselues) turned backe to the king without anie thing done. Whereat the king highlie offended (in that such wandering theeues should so lightlie dare to contemne his power) followed them into their starting holes and caues, and with no great labor tooke the castell of Lochmaben, reducing the countrie of Dowglasse (with extreame labor of his soldiors) to his subiection, at what time he leuelled the castell thereof equall with the ground.)

The earle of Dowglasse goeth into England without licence of the king of Scots.

The earle aduertised hereof, with all speed returned home through England, and sent his brother James vnto the king, to know his pleasure: who commanding the earle to see his countries (namelie Annandale) purged of theeues and robbers, pardoned him of all offenses, and receiued him into fauor againe, so that he was also eftsones proclamed the kings lieutenant; but shortlie after going into England without the kings licence, to common with the king of England about the recouerie of losses susteined by the Englishmen by certeine inrodes (as he alleged) the king tooke the matter in verie euill part, for that he should seeme so to be had in contempt of the earle: and withall he mistrusted also, least there were some secret practises in hand to the preiudice of him and his realme: so that he stormed not a little towards the earle. Who being thereof aduertised, came in humble wise to the king, & besought him of pardon, if he had in anie wise offended him, assuring him that from thenceforth, he would neuer commit anie act that might tend to his maiesties displeasure.

Herewith the quéene also and other noble men made suite to the king for the earles pardon, so that in the end he was receiued againe into fauor, but yet discharged of bearing anie publike office, which pinched him so sore (namelie for that his aduersaries William Creichton lord chancellor, and the earle of Orknie séemed to beare all the rule about the king) that he sought to dispatch the chancellor, procuring certeine of his seruants and friends to assault him on a morning as he was comming forth of Edenburgh, but yet he escaped to his castell of Creichton, although wounded in déed right sore, and within few daies after, gathering a power of his kinsmen, friends, & alies, he returned againe to Edenburgh, and had destroied (as was thought) the earle of Dowglasse at that présent, if he had not shifted away the more speedilie, who being thus to his great greefe, and no small dishonor chased out of Edenburgh, deuised which way he might best be reuenged; and for the more easie accomplishment of his purpose, he procured the earles of Crawford and Rosse to ioine with him in that quarell against Creichton and other his complices, by force of which confederacie they couenanted to assist one another against the malice of the said Creichton, and all other their aduersaries.

The Dowglasse constrained to flée out of Edenburgh.

The earle of Dowglasse presumeth of assistance at the hands of his friends.

The earle of Dowglasse hauing concluded this bond of confederacie, bare himselfe verie high, in presuming further thereof than stood with reason: and this was one great cause of the kings displeasure now passinglie increased against the said earle. An other cause was this: a sort of théeues and robbers brake into the lands of the lord John Herres, a noble man, and one that had continued euer faithfull to the king, taking with them out of the same lands a great bootie of cattell. And whereas the said lord Herres complained vnto the earle of Dowglasse of that wrong, because the offendors were inhabiting within his roome, and yet could haue no redresse; he attempted to fetch out of Annandale some preie, wherewith to satisfie in part the wrong which had béene offered him by those limmers and robbers. But such was his euill hap, that taken he was with his retinue, and committed to prison, and shortlie after by commandement of the earle of Dowglasse he was hanged as a fellon, notwithstanding that the king by an herald commanded the contrarie.

The Lord Herres hanged.

The king being sore offended herewith (as he had no lesse cause) passed ouer his displeasure with silence, till he saw time and opportunitie to reuenge the same: but in the meane season manie an honest man bought the bargaine right déerelie, being spoiled of that he had, and otherwise euill intreated, and yet durst not the meaner sort once complaine for feare of further mischiefe: where the higher powers also sore lamented the great disorders dailie increasing, and yet were not able in anie wise to reforme the same, insomuch as it was greatlie doubted least the earles of Dowglasse, Crawford, Rosse, Murrey, and other of that faction ment to put the king beside his seat. Which dout being put into the kings head, brought him into no small perplexitie, whereupon by courteous messages he sent for the earle of Dowglasse, willing him to repaire to his presence, sotourning then in Striueling castell, which he refused to do, till he had assurance vnder the kings great seale for his safe comming and going (as some haue said.) And then about Shrouetide in the yeare 1451, he came to the court at Striueling, where the king tooke him aside, & in secret talke moued and requested him to forsake the league and bond of friendship betwixt him and the earle of Crawford, and other such his confederats.

There was a secret murmuring amongst a number, that this earle of Dowglasse purposed to make a prose on a day to get the garland beside the kings head. In déed by reason of his kinsmen and alies, he was of more puissance in the realme, than (as it was thought) stood with the suertie of the kings estate, vnlesse he were the more faithfull. He had at the same time two brethren that were also earles, as Archembald earle of Murrey, and Hugh, or (as other haue) George earle of Ormont, beside the earle of Angus, and the earle of Mortoune, that were of his surname and bloud, with a great number of other lords, knights, and men of great possessions and liuings, all of the same surname, and linked in friendship and aliance with other the chiefest Images of all the realme. Hereto (by reason there had béene so manie valiant men and worthie captains of the Dowglasses one after another, as it had béene by succession) the people and commons of Scotland bare such good will and fauour towards that name, that they were readie to ride and go with them, they cared not whither, nor against whome. It is said, that the earles of Dowglasses might haue raised thirtie or fortie thousand warlike persons readie at their commandement, whensoeuer it had pleased them to call. In déed the Dowglasses had euer the gouernement of all matters perteining vnto the defense of the realme, so that the men of war had them still in all the estimation and honor that might be.

But now to the purpose, touching the conference had betwixt king James the second, and the earle of Dowglasse: it chanced in the end (vpon what occasion I know not) that the earle answered the king somewhat ouerthwartlie, wherewith the king tooke such indignation, that the earle herevpon was slaine by him, and such other as were there about him, on Shroue euen. Then after the earle was thus made awaie, his brethren made open warre against the king, and slue all such of his friends and seruants, as they might incounter with: insomuch that those which trauelled by the high waies, were in doubt to confesse whether they belonged to the king, or to the Dowglasses. The Lord of Cadzow being in the towne of Striueling, with a great companie of the earle of Dowglasses friends, in reuenge of his death incontinentlie burnt that towne, and did manie other great displeasures to the king and his subiects, setting forth proclamations against the king and his councell, for the violating of the assurance granted (as before is said) to the earle of Dowglas.

And that with such despite, as in the 6 kalends of Aprill, binding a wodden trunchion to an horsse taile, they fasten them to the safe conduct of the king and the nobles, which they forbeare not to traile vp and downe the streets (not sparing to reuile the king) with bitter and heaule words of contumelie and exclamation. With which not satisfied, when they were come into the market place, they did with the noise of fiue hundred hornes, and by the mouth of a crier, proclame the king and all such as were about him, faithbreakers, periured, and such persons as were to be denounced enimies of all godnesse and good men. And yet supposing this not a sufficient reuenge to quench the furie of their rebellious minds, they run with like rage, and with like order do spoile the countries & possessions of all such as tooke part with the king, and stedfastlie remained in the execution of their obedient dutie. For they besieged the castell of Dalketh, binding themselues (as coniured and periured enimies of all vertue) not to depart from thence, thence before they had taken and spoiled the same, being grieuouslie offended with John the lord of that place, bicause that he with the earle of Angus had seuered themselues from the opinion & faction of the Dowglasses, whose furie (growing still to extremitie) found such support (by the inclining multitud) that the king was put to his shifts) that he was determined to haue left the realme, and to haue fled by sea into France, had not James Kenedie the bishop of saint Andrews caused him to staie, on the hope he had of assistance onelie by the earle of Huntleie, which earle hearing that the Dowglasses had gathered an armie in the south against the king, raised an other armie in the north to aid the king.

The king would haue fled.

On the other side the earle of Crawford, hauing assembled a great power, incountered him at Brethune, in purpose to stop the earle of Huntleies passage, where betwixt them was fought a sore battell, and the earle of Crawford chased into Finwin, so that manie noble men, gentlemen, and commons were slaine, and amongest other the earle of Crawfords brother was one. Hector Boetius writeth, that John Cullace of Bannamwin, whome the earle of Crawford had appointed to lead them that bare the battell axes, or (as I maie terme them) the bilmen, in the left wing of his armie, fled of purpose in the hotest of the fight, & so left the midle ward naked on the one side of the chiefest aid that the said earle had, and so the victorie by that meanes onelie inclined to the kings standard, which the earle of Huntleie had there with him. But howsoeuer it was, the said erle of Huntleie had the honor of the field, who neuertheless lost diuerse of his men also, though nothing so manie as his aduersaries did. This battell was fought the eightéenth of Maie, being the Ascension day, 1452.

The earle of Huntleie the same day before the battels ioined, gaue lands to the principall men of those surnames that were with him, as to the Forbesses, Leslies, Iouings, Ogiluies, Grants, and diuerse other. Which bountifulnesse of the earle made them to fight more valiantlie. In recompense wherof the king gaue to the said earle the lands of Badzenoth & Lochquhaber. In the meane time, Archembald Dowglas earle of Murrey burnt the peill of Straboggie, perteining to the erle of Huntleie, and haried the lands thereabouts. In reuenge wherof, the erle of Huntleie at his returning backe, burnt & haried all the lands of the earledome of Murrey. In the meane time, at a parlement holden at Edenburgh, the earle of Crawford was denounced a traitor, and all his lands and goods deemed to be forfeited into the kings hands. James earle of Dowglas, James Lord Hammilton, the earles of Murrey, and Dzmont, the lord of Baluay, and manie other of that faction, were by publike proclamation made by an herald, commanded to appeare by a day to vnderlie the law. But in the next night that followed the day of this proclamation, certeine of the Dowglasses seruants that were sent priuilie to Edenburgh, to vnderstand what was done there, faltened writings vpon the church doores, sealed with the Dowglasses seale in this forme. The earle from hencefoorth will neither obeie citation, nor other commandement. Beside this, in the same writings, they charged the king with manie heinous crimes, calling him a murtherer, periured, false, and a bloudsucker.

The king therefore assembled an armie, and went forth against them: but bicause the time of the yere was contrarie to his purpose, he could do no great hurt to his enimies, although he burnt vp their corne, and droue awaie their cattell. But the Dowglas seemed to passe little for the kings malice, and the erle himselfe maried his brothers wife the countesse Beatrice, & sent to Rome for a licence to haue that mariage made lawfull: but by the kings agents in that court, the earles suite might not be obteined. Neuertheless, he kept hir still in place of his wife, and continuing in rebellion against the king, the next spring, and for the more part of the tearme of two yéeres next insuing, he haried and spoiled the kings possessions; and the king on the other part wasted Annandale, and all other the lands and possessions that belonged to the said earle of Dowglas or his friends: but shortlie after, as the king passed through Angus, to go into the north parts of the realme, the earle of Crawford came and submitted himselfe vnto him, craning mercie in most humble and lamentable wise, and obteined the kings pardon thorough mediation of James Kenedie bishop of saint Andrews, and sir William Creichton; but the said earle liued not past six moneths after, departing this life by force of an hot ague in the yéere 1454.

A parlement.

The same yéere, the king called a parlement at Edenburgh, in the which James earle of Dowglas, and his brothers wife the countesse Beatrice (whome he had taken to him by waie of a pretensed & feined mariage) Archembald Dowglas earle of Murrey, George Dowglas earle of Dzmont, and John Dowglas baron of Baluay, were forfalted & condemned of treason. The earledome of Murrey was giuen to sir James Creichton, or rather restored to him from whome it had béene wrongfullie taken by the vniust sentence of William earle of Dowglas, who had procured it to be assigned vnto his brother the forsaid Archembald, though the right remained in the said sir James Creichton. But yet when the said sir James Creichton could not kéepe that earldome without enuie of diuerse and sundrie persons, hée handled the matter so, that shortlie after it returned againe to the kings hands. Moreouer at this parlement, George Creichton was created erle of Cathnesse, & William Haie constable of Scotland was made earle of Erroll. There were also diuerse created lords of the parlement, whose titles were as follow; Darlie, Halis, Boid, Lile, and Lorne. After the breaking vp of the parlement, the king made a iournie against his aduersaries into Galloway, and with small adoo brought all the castels of that countrie into his possession, and then turning into Dowglasdale, bicause the inhabitants thereof would not obeie him, he abandoned the spoile thereof vnto his souldiors, who practised no small crueltie against the inhabitants.

The Dowglasses forfalted, or (as I may say) attainted.

Herevpon the Dowglasses being driuen to their shifts, the lord James Hammilton of Cadzow was sent from them into England to sue for aid, but in vaine, for none there would be granted: wherevpon returning to his friends, he counselled the earle of Dowglas to trust to his owne forces; and sith the same were farre superior in number of men to the kings power, he gaue like wise counsell without delaie, to set vpon the king, that the matter might bée tried by chance of battell, the onelie meane to assure them of their liues and estates, for otherwise he saw not how anie vnfeined agreement might be concluded, the matter being now pulled so farre forth to an extremitie. But the earle of Dowglas vtterlie (as some write) refused to fight against his souereigne and true liege lord, if any other meane might be found. Wherevpon diuerse great lords which were with him there on his side, being men of great wit, and no lesse experience, aduised him yet to keepe togither his host, till by their trauell and assistance a peace were concluded, and pardon obteined for all parts: for if the armie were once broken vp, all hope was then past (as they alledged) for anie indifferent

The lord Hammilton departeth from the Dowglas.

Herewith also, the lord Hammilton being wiser than the residue, bad the Dowglas farewell, and so departed, concluding that he should neuer see so faire a day againe, wherein he might haue cast the dice for the whole kingdome. And being thus departed from the Dowglas, he repaired to the king as then lieng at the siege of Abircorne, who sent him to the castell of Rosseine, there to remaine vnder safe keeping with the earle of Orkenie, to whom the said castell belonged: but at length, the king did not onlie pardon the lord Hämilton of all passed offenses, but also receiued him into such fauor, that he gaue him his eldest daughter in mariage, as after shall appeare. But now vpon the withdrawing thus of the said lord Hammilton from the Dowglas, bicause the king had set forth an open proclamation of pardon to all those that would forsake the earle of Dowglas, the most part of the same earles companie departed from him, by reason whereof he fled into England, togither with his brethren. The king lieng at the siege of Abircorne, lost diuerse of his men, besides manie that were wounded; but yet taking first a strong tower, being one of the chiefest limmes of that fortresse, shortlie after hee wan the rest.

The earle of Dowglas being withdrawne (as yée haue heard) into England, within a while after got togither certeine companies of men, and with the same returned againe into Scotland by the west borders, in hope to find friends in those parties: but such as the king had apointed there to defend the countrie, assembling themselues togither, and setting vpon him, discomfited his people, slue his brother Archembald, and toke the erle of Ormont prisoner, being first sore wounded. The baron of Baluay escaped into a wood, and so got away. The earle himselfe also (as Hector Boetius saith) escaped by flight, and got vnto Dunstafage, where finding Donald earle of Rosse and lord of the Iles, he procured him (being of nature inclined and readie inough to follow such counsell) to make warre in his fauour against the king. And after he had once set him on worke, he got him backe againe into England. Donald wasted not onelie the kings possessions that lay nére to Dunstafage, but also passing through Argile, did much hurt in all places where he came. He inuaded also the Ile of Arrane, and chased the bishop of Lismore, constreining him to take sanctuarie. This done, he entered into Lochquhabir, & so into Murrey land, where he burnt the towne of Inuernes, and wan the castell by a guilefull traine.

In the meane time, the earle of Ormont after he was recouered of his hurts (as the said Boetius writeth) was presented to the king, and after he had remained in prison a certeine time, he was at length beheaded. Moreouer the countesse Beatrice, after she saw no hope left that the earle of Dowglas should recouer his former estate, came to the king, and submitted hirselfe, laieng all the blame in the earle, who had procured hir vnto such vnlawfull mariage with him, being hir former husbands brother. The king receiued hir right courteouslie, and gaue to hir the baronie of Baluay, to mainteine therwith hir estate. Shortlie after also the countesse of Rosse fled from hir husband, & came to the king for feare of hir husbands crueltie, wherof partlie she had alreadie tasted. The king because he had made the mariage betwixt hir and hir husband, assigned hir forth sufficient reuenues also for the maintenance of hir estate. About the same time Patrike Thornton one of the kings seruants, but a fauourer of the Dowglasse, slue John Sandlands of Calder the kings cousine, and Alane Steward at Dunbreton, for that they fauored the contrarie faction: but the king getting the offendor into his hands, caused him and his complices to die for their wicked offense committed. The vniuersitie of Glascow was founded about this time by one Turnbull, bishop of that see. In the yeere following, died William Hate earle of Erroll, and constable of Scotland: also George Creichton earle of Catnes, and William Creichton chiefe of that familie.

Death of noble men.

In this meane while, the earle of Dowglas remaining in England, procured the Englishmen diuers times to make rodes into Scotland, whereby he lost (as the Scotish writers affirme) the loue of his owne countrimen, when they saw him thus ioine with the Englishmen, to the damage of his natiue land. At one time, Henrie earle of Northumberland, and the said earle of Dowglas inuaded the Mers, but taking little heed to themselues, and suffering their people to ride abrode to harie the countrie without order; Dowglas earle of Angus with a mightie armie of Scotishmen set vpon them, and put them to flight, sleaing diuers, and taking to the number of seuen hundred prisoners. Thus (as should appeare) the earle of Dowglas in vaine sought to disquiet his countrie, for all his friends in Scotland continued faithfull to the king, who had granted peace to all other of the Dowglasses and their complices: for it was Gods will the matter should be taken vp without more bloudshed, that the right line of the Scotish kings might be preserued. [For (as it appeareth) he was amongst the English inuading Scotland, subdued and taken by the barons Johnston and Colpull, who presented him vnto the king, whereupon the king after a sort banished him into the monasterie of Lendore, where he was bountifullie and honorablie receiued (according to his nobilitie) of the religious persons, in which place he liued manie yeres, and then died.] Fr. Thin. 1454. Lesleus. lib. 8. pag. 305.

And though the almightie God might haue brought that to passe by other meanes, according as it should haue pleased his good will and omnipotent power; yet he chose this way, whereby the effusion of much bloud might be auoided, which by ciuill battell had béene spilled, if the parties hauing their harts filled with rancor & ire, had buckled togither in battell. But the K. vsing the aduise of his kinsman James Kenedie archbishop of S. Andrews, compassed his purpose in the end, dispatching out of the way such as he ante wates forth mistrusted, of which number namelie were the Dowglasses, whose puissance and authoritie not without cause he euermore suspected. Many haue reported (as before is said) that in the beginning king James the second, through feare of the great power of these Dowglasses, was in mind to haue fled the realme, but being recomforted by the counsell and authoritie of the said bishop James Kenedie, he aduanced his studie to matters of greater importance.

James Kenedie archbish. of S. Andrews, chéefe chancellor to the king.

The said Kenedie turned the earle of Angus, bieing of the surname of the Dowglasses, and brother to him by his mother, to take part with the king. He procured also diuers other of the same bloud and surname, to reuolt from the other confederats, and to submit themselues vpon promise of pardon vnto the kings mercie; and so infeebling the forces of such as were aduersaries to the king, in the end he had them all at his pleasure. It was thought, that forsomuch as the Dowglasses had their lands lieng so vpon the west and middle marches of the realme, (that no man might beare anie rule in those parts, but onelie they themselues) if they had happilie ioined with the Englishmen, considering the great intelligence beside, which they had in all other parts of the realme, what by kinred and aliance, the realme might might haue fallen into great perill: for truelie it is a dangerous thing (as Io. Maior ſaith) for the eſtate of a realme to haue men of great power and authoritie inhabiting on the borders and vttermoſt parts thereof. For if they chance (vpon anie occaſion giuen) to renounce their obedience to their naturall prince & ſupreme gouernor, the preiudice may be great and irrecouerable, that oftentimes thereof inſueth; as well appeareth in the earles of March, and other before mentioned in this hiſtorie: and likewiſe in France by the duke of Burgognie, Britaine, and Normandie: for till thoſe countries were incorporated and annered vnto the crowne of France, the kings of that realme were oftentimes put to great hinderance through rebellion by them, whome they accounted for their ſubiects.

But now to returne where I left. After the Dowglaſſes were once diſpatched, and things quieted, king James the ſecond began then to reigne and rule reallie, not doubting the controlment of anie other perſon. For then he ordeined lawes for his people as ſeemed beſt to his liking, commanding the ſame to be kept vnder great penalties and forfeitures. And being counſelled chieflie by the biſhop of ſaint Andrews, James Kenedie that was his vncle, and the earle of Orkenie, he paſſed through all the parts of his realme, granting a generall pardon of all offenſes paſſed. And ſo he ruled and gouerned his ſubiects in great quietneſſe, and cauſed iuſtice ſo dulie to be miniſtred on all ſides, that it was ſaid in his daies, how he cauſed the raſh buſh to keepe the cow.

In the yeere 1455, the king held a parlement, in which were manie good lawes made and eſtabliſhed for the weale of all the realme, as in the bookes of the acts of parlement is conteined. He vſed the matter alſo in ſuch wiſe with the principall capteins of the Iles, and of the hie lands, that the ſame were as quietlie gouerned, as anie part of the low lands, ſhewing all obedience as well in paieng ſuch duties as they owed to the king for their lands, as alſo in readineſſe to ſerue in the warres with great companies of men, as became them to dow: ſpeciallie Donald lord of the Iles and earle of Roſſe, who had before ioined himſelfe in confederacie with the earles of Dowglas and Crawford againſt the king, and had taken into his hands the kings houſe, and caſtell of Inuerneſſe (as before ye haue head) naming himſelfe king of the Iles.

Neuertheleſſe, he was now at length reconciled to the king, and gaue pledges for his good demeanor, and afterwards brought to the king three thouſand men in aid at the ſiege of Roxburgh, * whoſe reconciliation was after this maner. When this Donald perceiued aduerſe fortune to beſiege him on euerie ſide, he ſent meſſengers to the king, craning peace and pardon for himſelfe and for his offenſes. Who comming before the king (and with manie humble ſpéeches, remembring the manie parts of clemencie which the king had vſed to the earle of Crawford, and ſuch as followed his faction) they did ſo purge the fault of Donald (by tranſferring the ſame to the fatall rage and iniurie of the preſent times, and by promiſing in his behalfe that hereafter he ſhould liue moſt quietlie in dutifull obedience) that they moued the kings mind to haue compaſſion vpon him.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 11.

"But yet the king anſwered in a meane ſort betweene both, not vtterlie pardoning, nor flatlie reiecting him: for (ſaith he) there be yet manie ſhewes extant of his wickedneſſe, and he hath not giuen forth anie one token of a changed mind. Wherefore, to the end that we may beléeue the ſame to be true (which you haue promiſed in his behalfe) hereafter to become a dutifull ſubiect and louing neighbour to vs, and to thoſe which are about him, he muſt with repentance (proceeding from an vnfeined tong) craue pardon from vs whome he hath grieuouſlie offended, and (with ſufficient reſtitution) recompenſe thoſe whome (by ſpoiling) he had iniured: beſides which alſo, he muſt with ſome worthie exploit wipe awaie the memorie and blot of all his former committed wickednes. And although I well know that no vertue doth more beſéeme a kinglie maieſtie than clemencie, yet we ought ſo to prouide, that (meaſuring all things by the line of reaſon) the wicked war not ſo proud and rebellious (by ouermuch lenitie and loſe gouernement) as the good may be excited to the honeſt performance of their dutie by fauour and iuſtice. Wherefore I will inioine a time to Donald, and the reſt of his aſſociats, wherein they may openlie ſhew ſome déeds of an altered diſpoſition, and from henceforth we will ſo account of him, as his workes and not his words ſhall iuſtifie him to be. But in the meane time, I will him to reſt in quiet, leauing it in the power of him and his, whether I, he, and they, will héereafter be accounted (by due deſerts) happie or miſerable. Which ſaid, the meſſengers departed, and Donald reſted ſatiſfied.)"

In the meane while great diſſention roſe in England betwéene the two houſes of Lancaſter & Yorke; the king being principall of the houſe of Lancaſter, was taken himſelfe at the battell of ſaint Albons. But the quéene with hir ſonne the prince, and Henrie the yong duke of Summerſet, with diuers other fled into the north parts of England, and ſent to the king of Scotland to deſire him of aid, who vpon good aduiſe taken with his councell, for that king Henrie had euer kept well the peace with the realme of Scotland, and alſo for reuenge of his vncle the duke of Summerſet his death, prepared an armie of twentie thouſand men to paſſe into England: and in the meane time all the north parts of England, hearing that king James was readie to ſupport the quéene of England, ioined with hir, and paſt forward into the ſouth parts, conſtreining the duke of Yorke to flée the realme, and ſo king Henrie inioied the gouernement of his realme againe, and for that time concluded an agréement with the duke of Yorke his aduerſarie; which laſted not long.

Diſſention in England.

The duke of Yorke remembring how readie king James was to prepare an armie in ſupport of his aduerſarie king Henrie, procured the borderers to make incurſions vpon the Scotiſh ſubiects, & would ſuffer no redreſſe to be had, nor daies of truce to be kept on the borders, as in time of peace the cuſtome was. Wherevpon king James raiſed a power, and in perſon entered with the ſame into England, doing great hurt by deſtroieng diuers townes, caſtels and peiles in Northumberland, the biſhoprike and other parts, till at length vpon faire promiſes made by the Engliſhmen, he returned into his owne countrie. After this, king Henrie of England, perceiuing that the duke of Yorke by the counſell of the earle of Warwike, ceaſſed not to practiſe conſpiracies againſt him, ſent eſtſones to king James, requiring him of aid againſt them, and promiſed therefore to reſtore vnto the king of Scotland the lands in Northumberland, Cumberland, the biſhoprike of Dureſme, and ſuch like, which the kings of Scotland had held before. This offer was accepted, and by treaties and contracts accorded, ſealed, and interchanged betwixt the two princes (as the Scotiſhmen alledge.) The yeere next following, at the quéene of Englands desire to support hir against the house of Yorke, king James with a great armie entered England, but after that the queene in the meane time had slaine the duke of Yorke, & got the vpper hand of hir enimies, at the same quéenes request, he retired into Scotland againe. Neuertheless shortlie after, when the earles of March and Warwike sought still to maintein their quarrell against the quéene of England, she was constreined to withdraw into the north parts, and to desire king James to approch effsones 1460. with his armie vnto the borders: which he did, meaning to win the castels of Rocksburgh and Warke, which were amongest other things promised to be deliuered vnto him by king Henrie, and so comming to Rocksburgh, laied his armie round about that castell, and planted his siege in full warlike manner.

Héere the king hauing great experience in knowledge of shoting great artillerie, departed from his campe, accompanied with the earle of Angus, and others, and came to the trenches where the great ordinance was planted, which he caused to be shot off. And héere by great misfortune, this worthie prince James the second, was slaine by the slice of a great péece of artillerie, which by ouercharging chanced to breake, and slue not onelie the king standing somewhat néere it, but also hurt the earle of Angus, with other: being a notable president from henceforth, how such great princes approch so néere within danger of such péeces of ordinance, when they are shot off. He was thus killed the third day of August, in the yéere of his life 29, of his reigne 24, and after the incarnation 1460. His bodie was buried with all funerall obsequies according to his estate, within the monasterie of Holie rood house at Edenburgh, the people generallie lamenting his death with no lesse sorow and dolefull mone, than as is séene in a priuat house for the decease of the welbeloued maister and owner thereof.

In time of warre, amongest his subiects in the campe, he behaued himselfe so gentlie towards all men, that they séemed not to feare him as their king, but to réuerence & loue him like a father. He would ride vp and downe amongest them, and eat & drinke with them, euen as he had béene fellowlike with the meanest. He had issue by his wife quéene Marie three sonnes, and two daughters. His eldest sonne named James, succeeded him in the kingdome; the second named Alexander, was created duke of Albanie; and his third sonne called John, was made earle of Mar. & All the time of the reigne of this king, christian religion did greatlie flourish amongest the Scots: for there were amongest them twelue notable and famous bishops, whereof the chiefest were James Kennedie bishop of saint Andrewes, Turnebull bishop of Glascow, Thomas Spenser bishop of Aberden, and Henrie Lichton bishop of Murrey. At what time likewise there were manie religious abbats that kept such great houses, as both the nobilitie and communaltie trauelling through out the kingdome, did neuer almost lodge in anie publike hosterie, but in the monasteries: which were neuer vered or spoiled, during the time of the ciuill warres of the kingdome. Beside these men of eminent learning, there flourished also Nicholas Deidone, and John Eldmaire, singular diuines, with manie other doctors laudablie séene in all kind of learning. In the reigne of which king also, Charles the 7, king of France, for singular seruice done vnto him by the Scots, in the warres (betweene the English and the French) did honorablie indow manie of the Scots (for recompense thereof) with manie rich possessions in Aquitaine, who by that meanes (setling themselues in that countrie) were the originall of manie worthie families of that prouince, amongest which is that famous kinred of Caldell de la Campania in Tolouse, at this time greatlie flourishing, which had his beginning from Caldell a thane (or baron) being knight in the north parts of Scotland: for the grandfather of him which is now liuing, head of that house did inioy the place of magistrat or ruler of the Capitoline in that citie, hauing that title confirmed to his posteritie. This mans sonne Peter Caldell being a senator in the high court of Tolouse (commonlie called the parlement) was for his singular learning and wisedome had in great honor of all men during his life, which stretched to extreame age. And his other children with great honor are indued with other offices of gouernement in the said citie.)

Lesleus lib. 8. pag. 300.

Some strange sights there appéered before the death of this king James the second: for the day before he was slaine, a blazing star was plainlie séene, which signified (as was thought) the death of the said king. In the yéere before the siege, there was in Dundee an hermophrodyt, that is, a person with both shapes, but esteemed for a woman onelie, till it was proued, that lieng with hir maisters daughter nightlie where she dwelt, she had got the yong damsell with child; for the which act, because she had counterfeited hir selfe a woman, and yet had wrought the part of a man; she was condemned to be buried quicke, and suffered according to that iudgement. At the same time, there was a certeine theefe, that with his familie liued apart from the companie of men, remaining secretlie within a den in Angus called Fenisden, who vsed to kill yong persons, and to féed on their flesh, for the which abhominable offense, being apprehended with his wife and all his familie, they were burnt to death. One of his daughters that was scarse twelue moneths of age, onelie excepted, the which being preserued and brought vp in Dundee, before she came to the age of twelue yéeres, she was taken in the like crime for the which hir father died, whereupon she was iudged to be buried quicke: and going to execution, when the people in great multitudes followed hir, in wondering at so horrible an offense committed by one of hir age and sere, she turned to them that thus detested hir wicked doing, and with a countenance representing hir cruell inclination, said to them: What néed you thus to raile vpon me, as if I had done an heinous act contrarie to the nature of man? I tell you, that if you knew how pleasant mans flesh is in taste, there would none of you all forbeare to eat it. And thus with an impenitent and stubborne mind she suffered the appointed execution.

Iames the third.

AFter the death of James the second, his sonne James the third a child of seuen yeares of age succeeded, and forthwith was sent for to the siege of Rorsburgh, whither he was conueied by the quéene, a woman of a stout stomach, representing the manlike race of hir countrie Gelderland, of the which she was descended. For comming with hir sonne thus to the siege, she spent not time in lamenting and womanish bewailing the irrecouerable losse of hir husband, but rather in comforting the lords, whose part had bin to haue comforted hir: and aboue all things she exhorted them with all diligence to imploie their whole indeuors and forces to the winning of that castell. Whose words so incouraged the captens and whole armie, that the siege was continued till the castell was wone, raced, and beaten downe flat to the ground; and the yong king was crowned at Warke beſieged and won.

This done, they beſieged the caſtell of Warke, which likewiſe they toke, and threw downe, and afterwards the king with the nobles of his realme came to Edenburgh, to take order for the quiet gouernement of the realme. And becauſe the king was yong, there were choſen ſeuen regents to gouerne both king & realme, as theſe, the quéene his mother, James Kenedie biſhop of S. Andrews, that was ſiſters ſonne to James the firſt, the biſhop of Glaſcow, the earles of Angus, Huntleie, Argile, and Orkeneie. Theſe, ſo long as James Kenedie liued, agréed well togither about the gouernement of the realme; but within a while after his deceaſſe, they fell at ſquare, or rather before, as appeareth by Hector Boetius, who ſaieth, that in the ſecond yéere of this kings reigne, there was diſcord in brewing betwixt the quéene and the archbiſhop Kenedie, who perceiuing that the woman ſought to vſurpe wholie the gouernement vnto hir ſelfe, withſtood hir in that behalfe, in ſo much that it was doubted leaſt the matter would haue broken forth into ſome ciuill warre, if the biſhops of Glaſcow, Dunkeld, and Aberden, and certeine abbats had not taken in hand to trauell betwixt the parties for an attonement, who did ſo much in the matter, that they compounded the variance in this wiſe.

The quéene mother was appointed to haue the charge of the kings perſon, and of his brethren, Alexander duke of Albanie, and John earle of Mar, and likewiſe of his two ſiſters; but as for the adminiſtration and gouernance of the realme, ſhe ſhould leaue it vnto the peeres. There were therefore elected by common conſent as rulers, the biſhops of Glaſcow and Dunkeld, the earle of Orkeneie, the lord Graham, Thomas Boid, and the chancellor. About the ſame time, one Alane Keir, in hope to get the heritage of his brother, John lord of Lorne toke him, and kept him in priſon. But Colen Campbell earle of Argile, taking great indignation with ſo preſumptuous a part, gathered a power, and comming againſt Keir, toke him, and ſet his brother at libertie, and brought the offendor vnto Edenburgh, where he died in priſon. Moreouer, ſhortlie after Donald lord of the Iles and earle of Roſſe, who had ſerued obedientlie in the armie at Rorburgh, and was (as outwardlie appeared) well reconciled, began anew to vſe his old maners, ſpoiling & harrieng the whole countrie of Atholl, and toke the earle thereof, and the counteſſe his wife captiues with him into the Iles.

Donald of the Iles eſtſones rebellath.

To repreſſe his iniurious attempts, the regents togither were preparing an armie; but therewith came true aduertiſements, that the ſaid lord of the Iles, and other the principall offendors of his companie, were ſtricken through the hand of God with a certeine frenſie or madneſſe, and had loſt all their ſhips and ſpoiles in the ſea, ſo that the earle of Atholl and his ladie were reſtored, and thoſe frantike perſons were brought vnto ſaint Brides church in Atholl, for the recouerie of their health, but it would not be. Donald himſelfe was afterward ſlaine in the caſtell of Inuernes by an Iriſhman that was a minſtrell. In the yeare 1461, Henrie the firſt king of England being vanquiſhed by his aduerſarie Edward the fourth, purchaſed of king James the third a ſafe conduct for himſelfe and a thouſand horſſe to enter into Scotland; and hereupon he came to Edenburgh, and was lodged in the houſe of the friers preachers, with his wife quéene Margaret, and his ſonne prince Edward. There was alſo with him the duke of Excetter, and the duke of Sommerſet, with manie other of the Engliſh nobilitie.

Henrie king of England by ſafe conduct commeth into Scotland.

✻ And to the end this firme amitie thus begun, might more increaſe, and be further ſtrengthened: the two quénes Margaret (of England) and Marie (of Scotland) both French (by birth and nature) began to intreat of a mariage (hoping by affinitie to eſtabliſh that perfect amitie) to be ſolemnized betweene the daughter of James the ſecond king of Scots, and the ſonne of Henrie (king of England) being called prince of Wales, although none of them as yet was aboue ſeuen yeares old. Which mariage, Philip duke of Burgognie (vncle to the quéene of Scots, and deadlie enimie to the quéene of England) labored by all means to hinder, by his ambaſſador Gruthuſius, a noble man and of great iudgement; for this Philip did vſe ſuch bitter eninitie againſt Reinold, grandfather to the ſon of king Henrie by the mothers ſide, that he did deepelie enuie anie good ſucceſſe to happen to anie of that race, whereby it might increaſe or floriſh; and therefore ſought occaſion by all deuiſe to hinder it: for whoſe cauſe, and at whoſe requeſt, the ſaid mariage was at that time rather deferred, than vtterlie broken off. But the end thereof (which was greatlie feared by this Philip to be the conſummation of the mariage) was by the aduerſe fortune of king Henrie vtterlie diſapointed. For (as after ſhall appeare) this Henrie being incouraged (by the beneuolence of the Scots towards him) and throughlie confirmed (by the letters of his friend ſent vnto him) diſpatched his wife into France to Reinold hir father, to procure what aid ſhe could of hir friends beyond the ſeas, to helpe to reſtore him to the kingdome: which iournie ſucceeded not to hir in vaine, obteining ſuccor from thence.)

The ſame time, king Henrie deliuered the towne & caſtell of Berwike into the Scotiſhmens hands, whether by couenant thereby to haue the foreſaid ſafe conduct granted, or of his own voluntarie will, to the end he might haue the more ſupport and fauor amongeſt them, it is vncerteine by the variable report of writers. Neuertheleſſe, ſhortlie after a truce was taken betwixt king James and king Edward, for the tearme of fiftéene yeares, vpon what conditions or promiſes made on king Edwards part I find not. This truce was concluded in the moneth of Maie, in the yeare 1462, at the citie of Yorke, whither had bin ſent the biſhop of Glaſcow, the earle of Argile, keeper of the priuie ſeale, the abbat of Holie rod houſe, ſir Alexander Boid, and ſir William Crawfton knights, ambaſſadors and commiſſioners for king James.

All things in this ſeaſon were ordered in Scotland by the aduiſe and counſell of James Kenedie biſhop of ſaint Andrews, a man of great wiſedome and policie, as well appeared in his prudent & ſage gouernement of the realme, as well during the minoritie of this James the third, as alſo in the daies of his father king James the ſecond. Pierre de Brezeie, otherwiſe called le Seigneur de la Varenne, great ſeneſchall of Normandie, was ſent by the French king Lewes the eleuenth, with two thouſand fighting men, to aid the part of king Henrie againſt king Edward. This Brezeie was one moſt in fauour with king Charles the ſeuenth, father vnto the ſaid king Lewes, and therefore (as manie did ſuppoſe) he was appointed by K. Lewes (who greatlie loued him not) to be chiefe in this iourneie, to the end his life might be put in hazard and aduenture; notwithſtanding, after ſome danger both of tempeſt on the ſea, and alſo of the enimies hands, he wan the caſtels of Bamburgh and Dunſtanburgh, which he caſt to the ground, and after toke in hand to keepe the caſtell of Anwike, and being beſieged therein,

Some Engliſhmen there were, that would faine haue fought with the Scots; but other (whoſe counſell was followed) were otherwiſe minded, alleging that better it were to let them paſſe without incounter, ſith they left the caſtell void, than to ieopard vpon the doubtfull chance of battell, for though their number were not great, yet were they piked and choſen men, able to atchiue a great enterpriſe.

1463. The queene mother died.

After this, the ſixteenth of Nouember, in the yeare 1463, the queene of Scots, mother to James the third, died at Edenburgh, and was buried in the college of the Trinitie, which ſhe hir ſelfe had founded. This woman, after the deceaſſe of hir husband James the ſecond, liued ſomewhat diſſolutelie, procuring Adam Hepborne of Hales a maried man to keepe hir ſuch familiar companie, as ſounded greatlie to hir diſhonor: for that ſhe could not within the whole realme find ſome ſingle man amongeſt all the nobilitie, with whome ſhe might haue maried, & in ſome ſort to haue auoided the greater open ſlander & infamie. In the ſame yeare, Alexander duke of Albanie, and brother to the king, was taken on the ſea by the Engliſhmen in the moneth of June, as he was returning from his grandfather the duke of Gilder: but the biſhop of ſaint Andrews James Kenedie, cauſed both the ſaid duke and alſo the ſhip, with all the goods there in being, at the time of the taking of it, to be reſtored; for otherwiſe (as he flatlie proteſted) he would not keepe the truce anie longer concluded betwixt the two realmes.

The duke of Summerſet, in hope of great fauor which he ſhould find in England, perſuaded king Henrie to paſſe thither, and with a great companie of Scotiſhmen he entered England, and manie of the north parts reſorted vnto him: but at length, at his comming to Eram, the lord Montacute with a great power was readie to giue him battell, and there diſcomfited him and his whole armie. The duke of Summerſet and the lords Hungerford and Roſſe were taken and put to death; the duke at Eram, and the lords at Newcaſtell. King Henrie eſcaped verie hardlie into Scotland againe, and there remained a certeine ſpace after, till at length he thought to returne into England in ſuch ſecret wiſe, as he ſhould not haue beene once knowen, till he might haue got amongeſt his friends, which would haue ſupported him: but ſuch diligent watch was laid for him all alongſt the borders, that he was eſpied, taken, and deliuered to king Edward his aduerſarie, who ſhut him vp in the tower of London till he was at length there made away, as in the hiſtorie of England ye may ſee more at large.

In the yeare 1466, that famous biſhop James Kenedie departed this life, and was buried in the college of ſaint Sauiour, founded by him within the towne of ſaint Andrewes in moſt ſumptuous wiſe. This prelat in prudent policie excelled all other Scotiſh biſhops, of whome anie writer maketh mention. He kept the realme in good quiet, and obſerued the truce concluded with the Engliſhmen, to the great weale and commoditie of the poore commons. He was verie rich, as appeared by ſundrie buildings and workes which he left behind him, as a memorall of his name. [Whereof the three eſpecial things for rareneſſe and magnificence, were his college of ſaint Sauiour (wherein youth might be trained to learning and religion) the other his ſepulchre, wherein he was buried (being a ſtatelie peece of worke, ſuch as before had not beene accuſtomed for biſhops of Scotland) & the third was a ſhip of wonderfull burden: all which three, the common people affirmed were of one price, and ſtood him in like charge.] Beſides his biſhoprike, he held in his hands the commandarie of the abbeie of Pettinweme, which was worth vnto him eight hundred crowns by yeare. [Afterward, at the parlement holden in October and Januarie, there were manie edicts made for the benefit of the commonwealth, & chiefelie for the eſtate of the merchants; at what time alſo there was a proclamation made, that none of the Engliſhmen ſhould beare anie office, nor receiue anie benefice or benefit in Scotland.]

1469. The mariage of James the third.

In the yeare 1469, on the tenth day of Julie, king James the third, being as then about twentie yeares of age, maried in the abbeie of Holie rod houſe neere Edenburgh, the ladie Margaret, daughter to the king of Denmarke and Norwaie, which ladie was at the ſame time not paſt twelue yeares of age, ſome ſaie ſixteene. Hir father the king of Denmarke and Norwaie, in name of hir dower, tranſported and reſigned to K. James all his right, title, and intereſt which he pretended to the out Iles. The ambaſſadors that were ſent into Denmarke to conclude this mariage, and to conueie the bride into Scotland, were theſe: Andrew Buſdeir biſhop of Glaſcow, the biſhop of Orkenie, the lord Auandale chancellor of Scotland, and Thomas Boid earle of Arrane, who had maried the kings ſiſter, and was now in his abſence run into the kings diſpleaſure; whereof his wife hauing intelligence, hearing of hir husbands arriuall with the other in the Forth, got out of Edenburgh, & comming on ſhipbord to him, gaue him to vnderſtand what diſpleaſure the king had conceiued againſt him: who perceiuing himſelfe in what danger he ſtood if he toke land, returned backe into Denmarke, taking his wife with him.

The king of Norwaie reſigneth his title to the out Iles.

The earle of Arrane in the kings diſpleaſure.

The king herewith was ſo offended, that he cauſed both the ſaid earle and his father to be attainted of high treaſon, and ſent for his ſiſter backe into Scotland, cauſing a diuorſe in abſence of hir husband to be ſued & gotten forth againſt them, marieng hir afterwards to James lord Hamilton, to whome he gaue the earldome of Arrane, which hir former husband had in gift before. Of this mariage, thoſe of the houſe of Hamiltons are deſcended, & are neereſt of blood to the crowne of Scotland, as they pretend. [For (as ſaith Leſleus, lib. 8. pag. 316.) if the line of the Stewards faile, the crowne is to come to them.] But now to ſhew further what we find written concerning the maner and cauſe of the baniſhment of the afore remembred Thomas Boid, Giouan Ferrerio, in his appendix of the Scotiſh hiſtorie annexed vnto Hector Boetius laſtlie printed at Paris in the yeare 1574, agreeth not with that which ye haue red before. For as he telleth the tale, the ſaid lord Boid being one of the gouernors of the realme, elected thereto (as before ye haue heard) within ſhort time grew ſo far in fauor with the king, that he might do all things with him at his pleaſure, although his aſſociats in authoritie did neuer ſo much go about to hinder his deuiſes: by reaſon whereof, he ſeemed to vſurpe the whole rule & adminiſtration of the realme into his owne hands, ſore to the griefe of thoſe his ſaid aſſociats being ioined with him in like office.

brought into a miserable plight; for iustice in most places wanted hir due course, so as theeues and robbers taking boldnesse thereof, not onelie vpon the borders, but also elsewhere, began to exercise great outrage, to the breach of publike peace, and namelie the inhabitants of the out Iles fell to their wonted trade of pilfering, so that passing ouer in their long boats or barges, and landing here & there on the shore, they tooke preies of cattell and other goods, greatlie to their profit, and no lesse damage of the people that inhabited on the coasts ouer against them. In the north parts also, seditious tumults amongest the nobles, gentlemen, and people were raised, to the great disquieting of the whole countrie. Such disorders continued no small time, and because the said Thomas lord Boid bare greatest rule about the king, the blame (as it commonlie happeneth) was imputed to him.

They that be in authoritie be euer subiect to the spitefull bloy of enuies dart.

At length, when the king was growen to ripe yeares, and able to see to the administration of the common-wealth himselfe, he was admonished by certeine graue personages to haue some regard, that such misorders as disquieted the whole state of the realme, might be reformed. Herevpon he called a parlement, in the which, whether through enuie that the lords had conceiued against the lord Boid, or for that his dooings no lesse deserued such complaint, was exhibited by generall voices of the states against him, that it was decreed by authoritie of the whole assemblie, that he should come to answer in iudgement such crimes wherewith he was charged; but when he refused so to do, and in contempt of the kings authoritie got togither a power of armed men to defend him from iniurie, that might seeme (as he pretended) to be offered him: at length, the king was driuen of necessitie to make preparation for the leuieng of an armie to apprehend him by force. Whereof Boid being aduertised, fled into England, because he perceiued himselfe not able to resist the kings power. The king assured that he was thus auoided out of his realme, banished him for euer, and seized vpon his lands and goods as forfeited.

The lord Boid is accused.

He refuseth to be tried by way of arrainment.

He fleeth into England.

After this, when the said Boid saw no hope to returne againe into the kings fauor, and finding no great comfort among the Englishmen, he passed from thence into Denmarke, where he remained till the mariage was concluded betwixt the king, and the ladie Margaret, daughter to the king of Denmarke, as ye before haue heard: and then in hope by occasion of this mariage to obteine pardon, returned now in companie of the bride, and of those ambassadors that were sent to haue the conueiance of hir into Scotland: neuertheless, vnderstanding by his wife that came to him on shipboord before he set foot on land, that the kings displeasure continued still towards him so greatlie, that if he came on land, he should be sure to lose his head, he returned into Denmarke, and tooke his wife with him; as before is mentioned. Finallie he went into Italie, where at length he was murthered by one, whose wife he went about to allure for the satisfieng of his sensuall lust. Before he was diuorsed from his wife the kings sister, he begat on hir a sonne, the which in the daies of king James the fourth, in a priuat quarrell that rose betwixt him and an other noble man, chanced to be slaine. Thus much touching the lord Thomas Boid of Kalmarnocke out of Ferrerio, who also in report of the matter touching the mariage betwixt the king and the daughter of Denmarke, somewhat varieth from an other that writ thereof.

He passeth into Denmarke.

The ambassadors sent

The ambassadors that were sent vnto Christierne king of Denmarke & Norwaie in the yeare 1468, as the said Ferrerio affirmeth, were these; Andrew bishop of Glascow, William bishop of Orkeneie, Andrew lord of Anandale chancellor of the realme, Martine Mane the great almoner, & the kings confessor, Gilbert de Kericke archdeacon of Glascow, Dauid Creichton of Craukon, & John Shaw of Hatlie. These ambassadors being dispatched into Denmarke in Julie, in the yeare aforesaid, came at length to Hafkuen, where K. Christierne then remained, and were of him ioifullie receiued, & well heard concerning their suit, in so much at length, after he had proponed the matter to his councell about the eight of September, it was agreed in this sort, that the ladie Margaret, daughter to the said king Christierne, should be giuen in mariage vnto K. James of Scotland, and that the Iles of Orkeneie, being in number 28, and likewise the Iles of Shetland, of which there are eightéene, should remaine in possession of the kings of Scotland, till either the said king Christierne or his successors in name of the mariage monie should pay vnto king James, or to his successors, the summe of fiftie thousand florens of the Rheine. This mariage was thought, by reason of this ingaging of those Iles, right profitable vnto the realme of Scotland, because of the controuersie and variance which had continued long before those daies betwixt the kings of Scotland and Denmarke, about the right of possessing those Iles.

The Iles of Orkencie and Shetland ingaged.

In the moneth of Nouember next insuing, after the mariage had béene consummate in Julie before, within the abbeie church of Holie rood house (as before ye haue heard) or in saint Giles church in Edenburgh (as other write) the three estates were called to assemble in Edenburgh, where the quæne was crowned, and the parlement holden, the most part of the lords remaining still in Edenburgh all the next winter: and in the summer following, the king and quæne made their progresse into the north parts, and were honorablie receiued in the principall cities and townes where they came, and likewise by the nobles of the countrie, to the great reioising of the whole realme. After their returning to Edenburgh, the king called a parlement in the moneth of Maie 1471, in the which among other things it was ordeined, that the lords, barons, and burroughs of the realme, should build ships and boats, and prouide nets for fishing. Also it was ordeined that none should weare silks in dublet, gowne, or cloake, except knights, minstrels, & heralds; except they might dispend one hundred pounds in lands by yeere: and that the football and other vnlawfull games should be debarred, and the exercise of shooting maintained. James eldest sonne to king James the third, was borne the tenth day of March, in the yeere 1472, who afterwards succéeded his father, and was called James the fourth. Christierne K. of Denmarke, to congratulate the happie birth of this yong prince being his nephue by his daughter, released all the right, title & claime which he or his successors might haue to the Iles of Orkeneie and Shetland.

A great ship built by Kenedie the late archbishop of saint Andrews, called the bishops barge, brake and was lost beside Wanburgh, being fraught with merchandize, the twelfth of March. Manie merchantmens seruants and other passengers were drowned with hir, some escaped by boat, and were taken by the Englishmen, among whome was the abbat of saint Colme, who was constreined to pay vnto his taker one James Kar foure score pounds for his ransome yer he could be suffered to depart. vacant, the couent chose one of their owne monks called Alexander Thomson, and the king promoted Henrie Creichton abbat of Paisley thervnto, whom the pope admitted, & Robert Shaw parson of Minto was preferred by the king vnto the abbasie of Paisley, and then in such wise began promotings of secular priests to abbasies at the princes request, and the laudable elections ancientlie vsed, made void: bicause the court of Rome admitted such as the princes made sute for and named, getting great rewards and notable summes of monie thereby, so that neither the bishops durst admit such as the couents elected, nor such as were elected durst pursue their right, and so the abbasies were bestowed vpon such as followed the court, and liued courtlie, secularlie, and voluptuouslie, to the great slander of religious men, which by the naughtie examples of their gouernors fell to the works of wickednesse, whereupon dailie much euill increased, and vertue in all estates decaied.

Abbeies giuen by vnlawfull meanes.

This yeere in September, the indulgence of the sée of saint Andrews was published by Patrike Graham bishop thereof, and the same sée erected into the dignitie of an archbishops sée, at the sute of the said Patrike, who gaue information to the pope, that bicause the archbishop of Yorke was metropolitan of Scotland, and that there was oftentimes warre betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland, the Scotishmen could not haue accesse to their metropolitan, speciallie in cases of appellation. And therefore the pope (as some write) thought it reason to make saint Andrews primat and metropolitan of Scotland, and ordeined that the twelue other bishops of Scotland should be vnder his primasie, who would not agrée therto; but promised the king by way of a taration eleuen thousand marks for his maintenance against the said archbishop: and the prelats sent to Rome about this matter. This yeere was a great death in the realme of Scotland, so that where a parlement was called in September, it was proroged vntill the twelfe day after Christmas. In Januarie the parlement was holden at Edenburgh, in which John lord of the Iles and earle of Ros was atteinted, partlie for his owne euill deeds, but most speciallie for the defaults of his father Donald lord of the Iles.

In Maie, in the yeere 1477, the king raised a puissant armie of the most able men vpon the north side of the water of Forth, to pursue the lord of the Iles both by sea and land. The earle of Crawford was made admerall of the armie by sea, and the erle of Atholl the kings vncle by his father was lieutenant of the armie by land. But such meanes was vsed by the earle of Atholl, that the lord of the Iles humbled himselfe to the kings pleasure, vpon certeine conditions; and thervpon in the beginning of Julie next insuing, the said lord of the Iles came to the parlement vnto Edenburgh, and there was the agréement made and confirmed betwixt the king and him: he resigned into the kings hands all the right he had to the earledome of Rosse, the lands of Cantire and Knapden, which earledome the king annexed to the crowne, and pardoned him and his seruants of all offenses and transgressions before that day committed, and inuested him anew in the lordship and seignorie of the Iles, and other his lands not released, to hold the same of the king by the seruice of ward and relefe. The king also gaue vnto the earle of Atholl for his diligence shewed, in reducing the said lord of the Iles vnto order, the lands and forrest of Clonie.

There was an inquisitor called Husman this yeere sent by pope Sextus into Scotland, to examin by vertue of his commission Patrike Graham archbishop of saint Andrews, whose examination and proues being sent vnto the pope, he pronounced him an heretike, schismatike, and simoniake, and declared him accursed, condemning him to perpetuall prison: and so he was degraded from all orders, cure, and dignitie of ecclesiasticall office, and William Schewes archdeacon of the same sée was promoted in his place, to whome he was also committed to sée him safelie kept in prison. He was first sent vnto saint Colmes inch, and from thence to Dunfermling, and laslie to Lochleuin, where he died, and was buried in saint Sarffis Ile in Lochleuin. The said William Schewes was consecrated archbishop of saint Andrews on Passion sunday in Lent, within Holie rod house, the king being present, and manie of the nobles of the realme. And there the said archbishop receiued the pall, as a signe of his archbishops dignitie, and so was confirmed primat and legat of the realme, notwithstanding the impediment made against Graham before by the bishops about the same.

This yeere also Alexander duke of Albanie was committed to prison by the king his brother, within the castell of Edenburgh, through euill counsell; but he brake out and escaped to Dunbar, where he caused the castell to be furnished with all necessaries: and leauing his seruants within it, passed himselfe into France, and was there of the king honorablie receiued, and louinglie intreated. In the beginning of Maie following, the king besieged that castell by his lieutenant the earle of Auendale, who lost at that siege three good knights, the lord of Lute, sir John Schaw of Sauch, & the lord of Cragiwallase, with the shot of a gun, & John Ramseie was slaine with a stone cast by hand. When they within saw they could not long indure, they left the castell and fled awaie by sea, and the earle of Auendale entered, and found it void of all things whereof ante account was to be made.

Doctor Ireland being graduat in diuinitie at Paris, was sent from the French king vnto the king of Scots, to persuade him to make war vpon England, to the end that king Edward should not aid the duke of Burgognie. And moreouer, he had in charge to moue for the pardon of the duke of Albanie, and shortlie after returned with answer. The erle of Mar called John Steward the kings ponger brother, this yeere in the moneth of December, was taken in the night within his owne house, and conueied vnto Cragmiller, where he was kept as prisoner by the kings commandement, and after was conuict of conspiracie for witchcraft which he should practise against the king: and herevpon in Cannogate beside Edenburgh, his veines were cut, and so he bled to death. There were manie and diuerse witches and sorcerers, as well men as women conuicted of that crime, and burnt for the same at Edenburgh. The king sent ambassadors into England to make sute to haue the ladie Cicill, daughter to king Edward, ioined in mariage with his sonne James the prince, which was granted, and the mariage concluded to be solemnized, when the prince of Scotland should come to perfect age: as in the English historie it more plainlie appeareth. Doctor Ireland, with a knight, and another religious man, came againe to king James from the French king, to persuade him to make warres against England: and at length, king James and his nobles condescended to breake the peace, wherwith Thomas Spenser bishop of Abirden (that was full tenderlie beloued of king Edward, and had beene euer a mediator for peace betwixt the kings of England, France, and Scotland, & the duke of Burgognie) when he heard that warre would follow, he died through griefe of mind mind and melancholie at Edenburgh, in the moneth of Aprill. The king sent two heralds vnto king Edward, requesting him not to aid the duke of Burgognie, nor anie other against the king of France: for if he did, he must nèeds support the Frenchmen, by reason of the league betwixt France and Scotland: but king Edward would not admit those heralds to his presence, but kept them still without answer, till he had sent forth a naule of ships into the Forth before Lieth, Kingorne, and Pettenwen, and then were the heralds licenced to returne. The English fleet entering the Forth, tooke eight great ships which they found in that riuer, and landing at Blacknesse, burnt the towne, and a great barge that late there at rode, and so returned.

K. Edward sent a naule into Scotland.

Ships taken and burnt.

The king of Scotland prepared an armie.

The king assembled an armie from all parts of the realme, and amongest other, the lord of the Iles came with a great companie: and now the king being readie to enter into England, there came to him a messenger of king Edward, sent from a cardinall legat that was resident as then in England, commanding king James by authoritie apostolike, not to proceed anie further in his purposed iournie, to the end that peace being obserued, all christian princes might bend their powers against the Turke & Infidels. This commandement did king James obeie, and so discharged his armie, notwithstanding that king Edward sent forth his naule againe into the Forth, to the Ile of Ins Keith, but they did no hurt: for the countrie men kept them off. The Scotish borderers inuaded the English marches, destroied townes, and led manie prisoners awaie with them into Scotland. The king of England caused Berwike to be assieged both by sea and land all the winter season, and ouerthrew a wall that was newlie made about it for defense thereof: but the Scots within it defended the towne for that time so stoutlie, that the enimies might not win it from them.

The duke of Albanie commeth into England.

The duke of Albanie was maruellouslie beloued of the Scots, and namelie of the nobilitie, for his wise was dead, whom he had maried in France, perceiuing himselfe not so well intreated as before, came ouer into England, where king Edward receiued him verie honorablie, promising (as some haue written) to make him king of Scotland: and therevpon assembled an armie of thirtie thousand men, with a great naule by sea to inuade Scotland, and appointed capteins and leaders of the armie by land, his owne brother the duke of Gloucester, the duke of Albanie, and others. The king of Scots hearing of their approch to inuade his realme, raised a puissant armie to resist them, and came forward with the same vnto the towne of Lowder, where being incamped, the principall nobles of his realme, as Archembald earle of Angus, George earle of Huntleie, John earle of Lenor, James earle of Buchquhane, Andrew lord Greie, Robert lord Lile, and diuerse other being armed, entered the kings lodging, where they accused him of diuerse things done and practised by him contrarie to his honor and the common-weale of his realme; and specíallie, because he vsed yong counsell of lewd persons, vnworthie and base of birth, such as Thomas Cochram, whome of a mason he had made earle of Mar, through whose deuise and counsell he had caused to be coined certeine monie of copper, not conuenient to be currant in anie realme, which the people refused, and so great dearth and hunger was raised through the countrie. Moreouer, that he would not suffer the noble men to come nèere his presence, nor to take their counsell in gouerning the realme, but gaue himselfe to voluptuous pleasure, setting naught by the quéene his lawfull wife, & kéeping a naughtie harlot called the Daisie in hir place.

Also they laied to his charge, that he had put his brother the earle of Mar to death, and banished his other brother the duke of Albanie, and therefore they could not suffer him and the whole realme to be longer misled by such naughtie persons. And hèerevpon they tooke Thomas Cochram earle of Mar, William Roger, and James Hommill tailor, who with others being conuicted, were hanged ouer the bridge at Lowder. Onelie John Ramsèie a yong man of eighténe yéeres of age, for whome the king made great instance, was pardoned of life. This done, they returned to Edenburgh, and appointed the king himselfe to be kept in the castell by the earle of Atholl, and in the meane time, the second of August, they sent Andrew Steward elect bishop of Murrey, & John lord Darneleie to the English armie, lieng then at Tuider, to take truce for thrée moneths: but the dukes of Glocester and Albanie came forward vnto Restalrig, where they incamped without anie resistance. The English naule lieng also in the Forth was readie to assist their fellowes by land.

The king kept vnder arrest.

Hærevpon, certeine noble men of Scotland, as the archbishop of saint Andrewes, the bishop of Dunkeld, Colin earle of Argile, and Andrew Steward lord Auendale, great chancellor of Scotland, went to the English campe, & treating with the two dukes, agréed vpon certeine articles, whereby the duke of Albanie was receiued into his countrie againe in peaceable wise, and had giuen to him the castell of Dunbar with the earledoms of March and Mar. He was proclamed also generall lieutenant to the king. And so the Englishmen returned homewards, and came vnto Berwike, where they hauing wone the towne as they passed that waies into Scotland, had left the lord Stanleie, and sir John Eldrington, with foure thousand men, to kéepe a siege before the castell, and now they inforced the same: but the lord of Halis then capteine within that castell, defended it verie manfullie, sending to the duke of Albanie and other, the lords of the councell, for reliefe to raise the siege. The duke in deed raised an armie, and came to Lamer more, but when they within perceiued that through dissention betwixt the king and the nobles of the realme, they were not like to be rescued, they yéelded the castell into the Englishmens hands, the 24 of August, in that yéere 1482, after it had remained now at this time in the Scotishmens hands the space of 21 yeeres.

The king remaining as prisoner in Edenburgh castell, all things were ordered by the duke of Albanie, Andrew Steward lord of Auendale, chancellor, and others, till the said duke, the archbishop of saint Andrewes, the chancellor, the earle of Argile, and diuerse others, went to Striueling to visit the quéene and prince, where the duke was persuaded by the quéene, without knowledge thereof giuen to the other, to go vnto Edenburgh, and to restore the king vnto libertie. The duke accordinglie to the quéenes pleasure comming to Edenburgh, besieged the castell and wan it, remoued the earle of Atholl, and set the king and all his seruants at libertie, for the which good turne, the king shewed great tokens of loue to his brother the duke, although it lasted not long. The earle of Argile, the bishop of saint Andrewes, the chancellor, and others, which remained at Striueling, when they heard those newes, fled into their owne countries: and shortlie after, the bishop of S. Andrewes, at request of the king, resigned his bishoprike in fauor of maister Andrew Steward prouost of Glenelowden, and was content in recompense thereof, with the bishoprike of Murrey. This yéere there was great theft, reiffe, and slaughter in diuerse parts of the realme, by occasion of the variance betwixt the king and his nobles.

teine ambassadors, which were Beroald or Bernard Steward, lord of Aubignie, marshall of France, and Peter Mallart doctor of both lawes, to renew the old league betweene this James the third, and the king of France: for which cause the king of Scots and the nobles assembled at Edenburgh, where (with the French ambassadors) seeking all the rols of all the ancient leagues, they reconfirmed the same, with the seales of both parts set thereunto; which done, the Frenchmen (with whome were sent into France diuerse Scots) returned home. Amongest the Scots, one Robertson was the chiefe, a man famous for the feates of battell, and hauing imploied his seruice on the parts of the French in the Italian warres, which being ended, the said chosen soldiers following the conduct of Beroald Steward, went into England with Henrie earle of Richmont, after king, whose part they tooke against Richard at that time vsurper vpon the English, for which cause the earle of Richmont (when he was after king) did deerelie loue the Scots.

The seditions also, which a long time did burne in France, caused deadlie wars to grow betweene the king of France and the duke of Burgognie. Whereunto, when the death of Charles (the last duke of Burgognie, slaine at Nants by the duke of Loraine) did set end: Charles the eight of that name, king of France (assembling a great armie) did applie all his force and deuise to expell Alphonse out of the kingdome of Naples, who at that time succeeded happilie vnto him, by reason that Alphonse was then easilie removed. But after, when the Neapolitane people did reuolt (from the French faction) to Ferdinand the son of Alphonse, there arose great flames of warre and sedition through Italie, each part studieng to support the strength of his owne. The administration of which warre against Ferdinand, was chieflie performed by the Scots, as principall captens of that armie, or at the least equall with the best. Of which Scots the chiefe were Alexander duke of Albanie, son to James the second king of Scots, John also duke of Albanie sonne of this Alexander, George Montgomerie lord of Lorges, Bernard Steward (who was after made viceroy of Naples, which office he wiselie manie yeeres did execute) Robert Steward marshall of France, Nicholas Scot, and others, whereof manie (for their worthie exploits) were by the French honorablie rewarded with great possessions. Who also (as manie of the Scots before had done) planting themselues in Insubria, became the authors of manie ancient families. For though by the euill custome of common speech, they reteine the name of Scot (as taken of their countrie) yet by the ensignes, and tokens which they had and vsed, it may easilie be knowne of what families the Scots their ancestors did descend.

Certeine noble families in Italie and Insubria sprung from the Scots.

Wherefore it followeth by most certeine coniecture, that the ancient familie of the earles (to whome vse of speech hath long obteined the surname of Scots) flourishing in Placentia, had their originall from the stocke of the Dowglasses, as the armes of them both do well witnesse: which kindred (besides manie other earles thereof) is at this day notablie beautified by Christopher Scot, who (with singular pietie and learning) doth gouerne the church of Cauallon. Againe, there is another familie of Scots, commonlie called the Scoties in Insubria, whereof Bernard Scotta and Horace his brother (the one a senator of Mantua, and the other a prelat) are both famous, as well for their vertue, as nobilitie: also Francis Scotia, lord of Pine and Mondone, and other nobles of the marquesdome of Saluce, are descended from the Scots, with the large familie of the Schities (descended of James Orlando Scot, which we haue heard confirmed by the armes of that familie) are well aduanced about Cremona, Mantua, and Verona, as are also the Paparons in Rome (so called for their armes and ensignes) whose ancestors to be of the Scotish nobilitie, is witnessed by a worthie monument thereof in the church of saint Marie the great, in which the father and the son called Paparons, being there buried, are both adorned with the ensignes of knighthod out of Scotland.)

The duke of Albanie, for that he vnderstood there was poison giuen to him in drinke in the kings chamber, and therefore stood in feare of his life, fled from the court vnto the castell of Dunbar, whereby insued great discord. The king fearing the displeasure of his nobles, got him also into the castell of Edenburgh. The earles of Angus, Buchquhane, and others, left the king, and assisted the duke of Albanie. And the king through counsell of certeine meane persons whome he had againe taken vnto him, summoned the duke and other his assistants, to come to answer for such treason as he had to lay against them, withall prepared an armie to besiege Dunbar, wherof the duke being aduertised, fled into England, and afterwards being accompanied with the earle of Dowglasse, and a great number of Englishmen, inuaded Scotland vpon the west marches, where manie Englishmen were slaine and taken by the resistance of the lords Cokpull, Johnston, and others, the duke was put to flight, and the earle Dowglasse taken and brought to the king, who because he was an aged man, and had beene long banished his countrie, was sent to the abbeie of Lundoris, where he remained the rest of his daies, and at length, departing this life, was buried there.

The duke of Albanie for the losse of that armie, was blamed of the king of England, and therevpon taking a misliking, secretlie departed ouer into France by the helpe of John Liddell, sonne to sir James Liddell knight, who afterwards lost his life for the same. The duke was well interteined in France by the king there: and shallie running at tilt with Lewes duke of Orleance, was hurt with the splint of a speare, and thereof died. He left behind him two sonnes, John duke of Albanie, that was after gouernor and tutor to king James the fift, and Alexander that was after bishop of Murrey, and abbat of Scone. This yeere the lord Hume, Torreblis, Oliphant, and Drummond, were made lords of the parlement. In the yeere 1484, the king sent the archbishop of saint Andrewes vnto Rome, for certeine priuileges which he obteined. And the same yeere, pope Innocent the eight of that name, sent the bishop of Imola to treat of peace, betwixt Richard king of England, & James king of Scotland. James king of Scots, hauing not long before made diuerse incursions and rodes into England, and that to his profit, he sued therevpon for a truce, which came to passe euen as king Richard wished, so that condescending to haue a communication, commissioners were appointed for both parts to meet at Notingham, the seuenth day of September next insuing.

For king Richard, there came Richard bishop of saint Assaph, John duke of Norfolke, Henrie earle of Northumberland, Thomas lord Stanleie, George Stanleie lord Strange, John Greie lord Powes, Richard lord Fitzhugh, John Gunthorpe keeper of the kings priuie seale, Thomas Barrow maister of the rols, sir

Thomas Bꝛian chiefe iuſtice of the common plées, ſir Richard Ratcliffe knight, William Cateſbie, & Richard Salkeld eſquires. Theſe councellors in the later end of September, after ſundꝛie meetings and communications had togither, concluded (as followeth) a peace to be had betwixt both the realmes foꝛ the ſpace of thꝛée yéeres, the ſame to begin at the riſing of the ſunne, on the 29 of September in the yéere 1484, and to continue vnto the ſetting of the ſunne on the 29 of September in the yéere 1487.

A peace concluded foꝛ thꝛée yéeres.

During which terme, it was agréed, that not onelie all hoſtilitie and warre ſhould ceaſſe betwixt the two realmes, but that alſo all aid and abatement of enimies ſhould be auoided, & by no colorable meanes oꝛ waie in anie caſe vſed. The towne and caſtell of Berwike to remaine in the Engliſhmens hands, foꝛ the ſpace of the ſaid terme, with the ſame bounds as the Engliſhmen poſſeſſed it at that ſeaſon, when it was deliuered to the Scotiſhmen by king Henrie the firt. It was likewiſe condeſcended, that all other caſtels, holds, and foꝛtreſſes, during the tearme of the ſaid thꝛee yéeres, ſhould abide in the hands of thoſe that held them at that preſent, the caſtell of Dunbar onelie excepted. This caſtell of Dunbar was deliuered vnto the Engliſhmen by the duke of Albanie, when he fled into France, and ſo remained in their hands at that time of concluding this truce.

Hére vpon (by reaſon the Scotiſh commiſſioners had not authoꝛitie to conclude anie full agréement foꝛ that caſtell, vnleſſe the ſame might be reſtoꝛed vnto the king their maiſters hands) it was accoꝛded, that if the king of Scots, within the ſpace of foꝛtie daies nert inſuing, did intimate his reſolute refuſall to be agreeable, that the ſaid caſtell ſhould remaine in the Engliſhmens hands aboue the ſpace of ſix moneths, that then during that terme of ſix moneths, thoſe that kept the caſtell foꝛ the Engliſhmen ſhould remaine in quiet, and not be troubled noꝛ moleſted by anie kind of meanes by the ſaid king of Scots, oꝛ anie other by his pꝛocurement, ſo that they within the caſtell likewiſe abſteining from making anie iſſues oꝛ reiſſes vpon the Scotiſh people. And if after that the ſaid terme of ſix moneths were once expired, it ſhould chance that anie warre aroſe foꝛ defending oꝛ recouering the ſaid caſtell, yet the truce ſhould indure foꝛ all other rights and poſſeſſions; notwithſtanding that it might be lawfull to doo what lay in anie of their powers, either foꝛ winning oꝛ defending the foꝛeſaid caſtell, as though no truce had béene concluded.

It was further agréed, that no traitoꝛ of either realme ſhould be receiued by the pꝛince of either realme; and if anie traitoꝛ oꝛ rebell chanced to arriue in either realme, the pꝛince thereof to deliuer him vpon demand made. Scots alreadie abiding in England & ſwoꝛne to the king there, may remaine ſtill, ſo their names be certified to the Scotiſh king within foꝛtie daies. If anie warden of either realme ſhould inuade the others ſubiects, he to whome ſuch warden is ſubiect, ſhall within ſix daies pꝛoclame him traitoꝛ, and certifie the other pꝛince therof within 12 daies. And in euerie ſafe conduct this clauſe ſhould be conteined; Pꝛouided allwaies that the obteiner of this ſafe conduct be no traitoꝛ. If anie of the ſubiects of either pꝛince doo pꝛeſume to aid, helpe, mainteine, oꝛ ſerue anie other pꝛince againſt anie of the contractors of this truce, then it ſhall be lawfull foꝛ him, to whome he ſhewed himſelfe enimie, to apꝛehend and attach the ſaid ſubiect, going, comming, oꝛ tarieng within anie of his dominions.

Colleagues compꝛiſed in this truce (if they would aſſent thereto) on the Engliſh part were theſe: the king of Caſtile and Leon, the king of Aragon, the king of Poꝛtingale, the archduke of Auſtrich & Burgognie, and the duke of Bꝛitaine. On the Scotiſh part, Charles the French king, John king of Denmarke and Noꝛwaie, the duke of Gelderland, and the duke of Bꝛitaine. The lordſhip of Loꝛne in the realme of Scotland, and the Iland of Lundaie lieng in the riuer of Seuerne, in the realme of England, were not compꝛehended in this agréement. This concoꝛd, peace, and amitie thus concluded, was appointed to be publiſhed the firſt day of October, in the moſt notable cities and townes of both the realmes.

Loꝛne & Lundaie excepted.

Foꝛ the ſure obſeruation, kéeping, & perfoꝛmance of this truce & league, there were appointed foꝛ conſeruatoꝛs on the Scotiſh ſide, Dauid earle of Crawfoꝛd and lord Lindſeie, George earle of Huntleie lord Goꝛdon and Badzenath, John lord Darneleie, John lord Kenedie, Robert lord Lile, Patrike lord Halæne, Laurence lord Oliphant, William lord Boꝛthwike; ſir John Roſſe of Halkheid, ſir Gilbert Johnſton of Elphinſton, ſir John Lundie, ſir John Ogiluie of Arlie, ſir Robert Hammilton of Fingalton, ſir William Balze of Lamington, ſir John Kenedie of Blarqhone, ſir John Wemes, ſir William Kochwen; Edward Stochton of Kirke patie, John Dundas, John Roſſe of Mountgrenan, eſquires.

It was further agréed, that commiſſioners ſhould mæet at Loughmaben on the eightéenth day of Nouember, as well foꝛ redꝛeſſe of certeine offenſes done on the weſt marches, as alſo foꝛ declaring and publiſhing the peace. On the Engliſh part, the lord Dacres, the lord Fitzhugh, ſir Richard Ratcliffe, ſir Chriſtopher Moꝛeſbie, ſir Richard Salkeild, oꝛ thꝛée of them. Foꝛ the Scots, the lord Kenedie, the lord Mountgomerie, the lord Lile, John Marwell ſteward of Annandale, Robert Creichton of Sanquhan, oꝛ thꝛée of them. Alſo, there were aſſigned commiſſioners to mæet at Roidenboꝛne foꝛ the eaſt marches, the firſt day of December; and at Haldan Stanke foꝛ the middle marches, on the fourth day of the ſame moneth. At which two places foꝛ Scotland, there were aſſigned to appeere the earle of Huntleie, the earle of Angus, the earle of Argile chancellor of Scotland, the lord Auandale, the lord Seiton, the lord Oliphant, the lord Stubhall, with others.

Foꝛ England, the earle of Noꝛthumberland, the lord Gꝛeiſtocke, the lord Scrope of Maſſan, ſir William Gaſcoigne, ſir Robert Conſtable, and other. The ſame commiſſioners had authoꝛitie to aſſigne certeine perſons, to view and declare the bounds and limits apperteining to Berwike, accoꝛding to the true meaning of the league. Foꝛ the battell ground it was accoꝛded, that the ſame ſhould remaine without ſowing, earing, building, oꝛ inhabiting, as it had doone befoꝛe. Shoꝛtlie after the concluding of this truce, king Richard intreated foꝛ a mariage to be had betwixt the pꝛince of Rothſaie, eldeſt ſonne to king James & ladie Anne de la Pole, daughter to John duke of Suffolke and to the ladie Anne his wife, that was ſiſter to the ſaid king Richard. Foꝛ the concluding of this mariage, both the kings ſent their ambaſſadoꝛs againe vnto Nottingham, where their treatie had ſuch ſucceſſe foꝛ that time, that the mariage was agréed vpon, and writings thereof dꝛawen, ingroſſed, and ſealed, and affiances made and taken by pꝛoctoꝛs and deputies on both parts. The foꝛeſaid yong ladie was immediatlie called pꝛinceſſe of Rothſaie, but by the ſhoꝛt life of king Richard hir vncle ſhe ſhoꝛtlie after loſt that name.

King James by letters signifieth his mind touching the articles of Dunbar.

during the tearme of the whole truce in the Englishmens possessions, he wrote vnto king Richard a louing letter, signifieng vnto him, that he was not minded to seeke the recouerie of the said castell by force of armes, but rather to leaue it in his hand, during the whole terme of the truce. Neuertheless, he instantlie required him for the bond of that loue and familiaritie, which now by treatie and aliance was sprong vp betwixt them, that he would redeliuer the said castell into his hands, according as reason might moue him thereto; considering the Englishmen had no right to it, being onelie deliuered to them by traitors of their natiue countrie, without anie reasonable cause, or commission lawfullie authorised.

K. Richard would not deliuer the castell of Dunbar.

King Richard dalied in this matter with pleasant letters and faire words feeding forth king James, without minding to gratifie him in that suite, so that as long as king Richard liued, king James could neuer get it for anie thing he might do. In the yeare 1486, Henrie earle of Richmond comming out of France with a power of men, of the which Bernard Steward a Scotishman was chiefe capteine, landed in Wales, and passing through the countrie into England, at length incountred king Richard, and slue him, so obteining the crowne of that realme. And after he was somewhat quietlie established in the same, he came into the north parts, where he remained the most part of the next summer, and regarding nothing more than to haue the loue and friendship of his neighbors, & to be confederat with the kings and princes ioining next vnto him, he sent from Newcastell one of his councellors Richard Fox bishop of Exceter, and sir Richard Edgcombe knight, ambassadors vnto king James, to treat a contract, and renew the bond of peace and truce betwixt the said kings and their realmes.

K. Richard ouerthrowne by the earle of Richmond.

An ambassage sent into Scotland.

The kings answer.

These ambassadors were gladlie receiued of king James, who declared vnto them, that he bare great fauor and loue vnto their maister, and would be glad to pleasure him in all he might: howbeit, that his subiects were not of so good a mind towards the English nation as he himselfe wished, and therefore he willed them to be contented with a truce for seuen yeares, sith further he could not do, for doubt to offend his nobilitie and subiects. But he promised secretlie, that when those seuen yeares were expired, he would renew the same for the tearme of other seuen yeares, and so from seuen yeares to seuen yeares so long as he liued. This he did, because he perceiued that his people had him in such hatred, that they would not consent to anie bond that he should make. The ambassadors perceiuing his good meaning toward king Henrie, confirmed the truce for those seuen yeares, and so returned home to king Henrie, who was glad of that they had done.

His promise.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 12.

the kings brother, leauing behind him two sonnes, which were Alexander borne of his first wife (daughter to the earle of Orkeneie) and John (borne of his second wife) being after made gouernor of Scotland.) Immediatlie after that this truce was thus concluded betwixt the two realmes, king James caused the three estates to assemble in parlement at Edenburgh the first of October in the yeare 1487, in the which order was taken, that iustice oires should be holden through all the parts of the realme, & that no pardons should be granted for anie great crime that shuld be committed for the space of seuen yeares to come, so that the king began to vse sharpe execution of iustice in all parts, which was right displeasant to manie.

A parlement.

No pardon to be granted to offendors for the space of seuen yeares.

At the same time was an ambassador sent to the king of Romans, for the calling in of a letter of marque, which had beene granted against Scotish merchants, at the suite and instance of certeine Hollanders and Burgognions, and was shortlie after herevpon reuoked. After the parlement was ended, the king remoued vnto Striueling, leauing his wife the queene, and hir sonne the prince at Edenburgh castell, whilest he keeping persons about him of meane calling, gaue himselfe to take his pleasure with women, & to gather vp gold and siluer, greatlie to the offense of his subiects. Yet in the meane time, now after the death of king Richard, whether it was by treson or appointment, the castell of Dunbar was deliuered to the hands of king James, and that to his great ioy and high contentation; for he that ruled his kingdome more with rigor than with anie tractable meane of fauorable iustice, stood euer in feare of some troublesome tumult that might be raised by his owne people, if occasion were ministred either through hope of forren aid or otherwise.

Ambassador sent to the king of the Romans.

The king giueth himselfe to satisfie his lust in keeping women and gathering treasure.

After the death of king Richard, Dunbar is deliuered.

So long therefore as the castell was in the Englishmens hands, he doubted least through practise, some conspiracie should be contriued betwixt his owne subiects and the English nation, greatlie to the annoiance of his estate, & therevpon he was the more desirous to reduce the same castell into his possession. But the onelie meane to haue assured himselfe from the hands of such as sought his life, had beene to haue changed his wilfull maner of gouernment, & to haue leaned vnto such counsell as would haue aduised him for the wealth of his whole realme, and not vpon desire to please, haue mainteined his vndiscreet opinions, to the wronging aswell of his commons as of the nobles and peeres of his realme; for the nobilitie of Scotland, namelie the earles of Angus, Argile, and Lenox, the lords Halis, Hume, Drummond, Greie, and others, perceiuing themselues oppressed by such as from base birth had risen (without worthie deseruing) to the degree of councellors, and therewith aduanced to so high authoritie, as all things were ordered at their appointment, conspired togither, & determined by force of armes to see a reformation in such a disordered maner of gouernement.

The means whereby king James might haue auoided danger of det by his subiects.

The conspiracie of the Scotish lords against king James the third.

But yet because it should not be thought that they minded the destruction of their countrie, but rather the aduancement thereof, they made the lord James duke of Rothsaie sonne to the king (a child borne to goodnesse and vertue) the chiefe capteine in this their enterprise, and that in maner against his will; hereby openlie protesting, that they minded and purposed the suppressing and confusion of an euill king, and not the subuersion of their natiue countrie. By which their craftie imagined inuention, they thought to remoue all suspicion of their purposed vntruth and shamefull disloialtie. They had sent to the earle of Dowglasse, who remained prisoner (as ye haue heard) in the abbeie of Lundors, and required him to assist them in their begun enterprise, promising that they would restore him againe to his lands and former dignitie, and honor him as principall of their faction. But that noble, wise, and ancient earle, being alreadie schooled with troubles, and hauing learned by experience (to his great griefe) what such matter meant, refused to breake his ward, or to assist them in anie wise, dissuading them from their enterprisse, because it seemed to him neither godlie nor honorable, sithens both himselfe and his friends had tasted for the like, great hinderance, which might be an example to him and others to beware in time to come.

and conſpiracie againſt him, was ſore diſquieted in his mind, and to meet their miſchiefous attempts, gathered an armie. Yet before the vsing of anie force, he ſent meſſengers to his ſonne, and to the nobles with him, to trie if he might come to ſome agreement with them. He ſent alſo letters to the king of England, & to the French king, requiring them to take ſome paines in the matter, to procure an attonement betwixt him and his nobles. And beſides this, he wrote to pope Innocent about the ſame purpoſe, praieng him to intermeddle his authoritie by ſending ſome legate into Scotland, to appeaſe the troubles thereof. But the Scotiſh nobilitie, and ſuch of the people as were vp in armor againſt him, were ſo deſperatlie ſet, and wholie bent on reuenge, that no wholeſome counſell nor medicinable aduiſe might appeaſe their furious rage, ſo that for anſwer to his meſſengers, they ſent him word, that if hee would reſigne the title of his crowne and realme, & depoſe himſelfe of his whole regall dignitie, then they would come to ſome communication with him or elſe not. The like anſwer was giuen to the ambaſſadors of England and France, that were ſent vnto them from the kings of both thoſe realmes, which ſore lamented the fortune of their friend and allie the Scotiſh king.

But Adrian the biſhop of Romes legat came too late, as who ſhould ſay, a day after the faire: for their grounded malice and ſpitefull hatred conceiued againſt him might not be qualified by anie maner of means, but that they were now comming forward with all their puiſance to Striueling where he then remained, he would not ſtaie till the erles of Huntleie, Ercroll, Atholl, Crawford, Rothus, Sutherland, Cathneſſe, & Marſhall; the barons, Forbes, Ogiluie, Granth, Fraſer, and others, were arriued with their powers, amounting to the number of fortie thouſand men, with the which they were comming forth of the north parts to his aid: but raſhlie and without good aduiſe he iſſued out of the towne, accompanied with the erles of Glencarne & Montros, the lords Graham, Ruthuen, Marwell, and certeine others, and forthwith ioined battell with his aduerſaries at Banockeſborne, within two miles of Striueling.

Now when nothing might quiet them, at length they met thus in a pitched field, where after great ſlaughter & murther made of an huge multitude of people, the king being put to the worſſe, fled into a mill, whither being fiercelie followed and found therein, he was cruellie ſlaine, and vnreuerentlie left ſtarke naked. ¶ A notable mirror to all princes, that calling to remembrance ſuch a miſerable and moſt dolorous ſight, they may take heed by what maner of perſons they ſuffer themſelues to be led and abuſed. For if this prince king James the third had not followed vpon a wilfull pretenſe, and obſtinat mind, the counſell and aduiſe of vanperlors, and ſuch as (being aduanced from baſe degree vnto high authoritie) ſtudied more to keepe themſelues in fauor, than to giue true aduertiſements, and faithfull aduiſe vnto their prince, he might haue reigned longer by manie daies & yeares, in great and high felicitie.

NOw then, after that the barons of Scotland had thus ſlaine their ſouereigne lord and liege king James, the third of that name: his eldeſt ſon James the fourth was crowned king of Scotland, and began his reigne the 24 of June, in the yeare 1488, being not paſt fifténe yeares of age, who notwithſtanding that he had béene in the field with the nobles of the realme againſt his father, that contrarie to his mind was ſlaine; yet neuerthleſſe afterwards, hée became a right noble prince, & ſeemed to take great repentance for that his offenſe, and in token therof, he ware continuallie an iron chaine about his midle all the daies of his life. He was greatlie giuen to deuotion and praier, viſiting religious houſes, and beſtowing on them ſundrie gifts. He gouerned his realme in great reſt, peace, iuſtice, and quietneſſe, riding him ſelfe in proper perſon diuerſe daies and nights, to ſuppreſſe and take théeues, robbers, and oppreſſors of his ſubiects in all parts of his realme, till he had brought the countrie to great quietneſſe. He was learned and liberall, and indued with manie other good vertues and qualities.

The king was repentant.

The king wore an iron chaine.

He was a great iuſticer.

He was learned.

Anon after his coronation, the erle of Lennor, and the lord Lile, with diuers other their aſſiſtants, notwithſtanding that they had béene with him at the ſlaughter of his father, ſéeing that things went not as they wiſhed, raiſed an armie, and cauſed the dead kings bleudie ſhirt to be borne afore them for a banner: and comming forwards toward Striueling againſt the yong king, were ouerthrowne at Tolmoſſe, where the Lennor men, and ſundrie other of the barons ſide were ſlaine, as the lord of Biltrucht, and other taken and hanged for their offenſes. The king called a parlement at Edenburgh, which was holden the firſt of October, where he being moued by clemencie, granted a generall pardon to all thoſe that came in field at Striueling with his father againſt him, and appointed euerie one to haue ſpeciall pardons there vpon vnder his ſeales. He likewiſe diſpenſed with the heires of them that were ſlaine with his father there in field, appointing them their particular diſpenſations vnder his ſeales, after the ſame maner. Further it was ordeined, that all iuſtices, ſhirriffes, ſtewards, bailiffes, lieutenants, and other which had offices in heritage, and had béene with his father at the field, ſhould be ſuſpended from the ſame offices for the tearme of thrée yeares: and thoſe which had offices for life, or for terme of yéeres, ſhould be vtterlie excluded from the ſame.

The nobles raiſe an armie againe.

They were ouerthrowne.

A generall pardon.

Moreouer, he tooke order that all ſuch goods as had béene taken from landed men and burgeſſes, ſhould be reſtored to them againe, except that which was taken from ſuch landed men and burgeſſes as were in the field againſt him; for that was deemed a lawfull praie. It was alſo iudged that the death of his father came vpon him through his owne default, and that king James the fourth then reigning, and all his adherents and partakers in that field, were innocent and giltleſſe of all ſlaughter made there at that time, and clearlie acquit of all purſute and occaſion thereof: the thrée eſtates granting to giue their ſeales to teſtifie the ſame, with the kings great ſeale of the realme, to be ſhewed vnto the pope, the kings of France, Spaine, Denmarke, and other princes their confederats. And for the ceaſſing of theft, reiffe, & ſuch other great enormities, the king was appointed to ride in perſon once euerie yeare through all parts of the realme. And certeine noble men were ordeined to exerciſe iuſtice in euerie ſhire next adioining to the places where they had their chiefe reſidence: and hereunto they gaue their othes to be diligent in the adminiſtration of iuſtice. Theſe ordinances were right well obſerued all the daies of K. James the fourth his life time, ſo that the realme was reduced to great tranquillitie, and gouerned in good peace and iuſtice. Furthermore, all gifts made by his father in preiudice of the crowne, were reuoked, from the ſecond day of Februarie immediatlie preceading his death, to the day in which hée was ſlaine.

*About

Fr. Thin. Buchan.lib.13.

✠ About this time was a monster borne of a strange forme, hauing from the nauill downeward the perfect parts of one man, not different from the right proportion of a man: but from the nauill vpward, it was double bodied, hauing all perfect parts answering euerie of those bodies, sundered to all actions and shew. This monster the king commanded to be diligentlie nourished and instructed, but chiefflie in musike (wherein it profited verie much.) Further also learning diuers sorts of languages, whose seuerall wits and natures manifestlie appeared by diuers dispositions of their minds. For sometime they would fall out one with another, and when anie thing displeased them, they would most bitterly contend the one with the other: contrarilie, when anie thing happened to their liking or desire, they would consult and agrée togither as friends. In which this was worthie remembrance, that if the legges or loines had bæne hurt below, they both togither felt the paine; but if they were pinched or grieued in any part aboue seuered from the other, then that bodie onelie felt the same which had that hurt done vnto it. Which different sense did more plainelie appeare in the death of the one of them: for when the one bodie died manie daies before the other, that which liued, did after by little and little consume, by the putrifaction of the other bodie then dead; which monster liued 28 yéeres, and in the time of John the gouernor: of which thing we doubt not to write (more boldlie) sith there are men yet liuing of honest fame which saw these things.)

Buchan.li.13.

This king in the beginning of his reigne, to make his estate the surer, and more faithfull to reconcile the harts of such as had mainteined factions against him, determined to marie the daughters of his aunt by two husbands, to two of those noble men: for which cause he maried Grecina Boid to Alexander Forbois, and Margaret Hammilton to Matthew Steward, by which in time there followed a most singular peace in the kingdome.) Also an esquier, and an herald were sent into France, Spaine, and other places, to learne where the king might be a suter for some great ladie to ioine with him in mariage. Moreouer beside these, there were sent honorable ambassadors into France, Spaine, and Denmarke, to renew the old amities & leagues betwixt those realmes and Scotland, as had bæne vsed in the daies of this kings progenitors. His two brethren, the duke of Rothsete, and the earle of Mar, he caused to be brought vp in good nourture and vertuous exercise, appointing to them such liuings for maintenance of their estates, as his father had assigned them.

1486 A mariage sought for the king.

For his councell he chose a certeine number of the prelats, noble men, and barons of his realme, such as were thought most meet, taking this order, that six of them at the least should continuallie remaine about him, by whose aduise he should do all things that touched the affaires of the realme: and in case any thing was done without their aduise, the same should be iudged void, & not to be obeied, & this was inuiolablie kept all his daies. When the esquier and herald were returned againe into Scotland, which had bene to visit strange countries, and made report of that they had sæne, there was a parlement holden, in which it was ordeined, that the bishop of Glascow, the earle Bothwell, and others, should go as ambassadors to sue for the kings mariage in place where it should be most expedient, and most to the kings liking. Great variance rose betwixt the archbishop of saint Andrews, and the bishop of Glascow, touching the prehemineyce of their iurisdiction, which drew the noble men into factions, till the king commanded the same to ceasse, and that they should trie it by law before competent iudges.

✠ James Ogiluie knight of Aire, was sent ambassador to the king of Denmarke, to whome the king gaue in charge, that he should labor to renew the old league that was betwéene the Danes and the Scots, which he wiselie executed and obteined, with certeine priuileges for the benefit of the merchants. By means whereof at his returne, he purchased such fauour of the king, as that he was aduanced to the title of a lord, in which the name of the Ogiluies was first increased with anie honorable title.) The king about the same time toke order for increase of some number of ships to be had in his realme, and that euerie hauen towne should build some, as well for fishing, as to transport merchandize from place to place.

The lords and barons, and such other as would, were commanded to helpe the merchants toward the building of such ships: and for good example, the king caused to make certeine ships at his owne charges, which might vse the trade of fishing. Moreouer, the king considering the ignorance that was amongst the landed men of his realme, when they should passe vpon inquests, he ordeined that euerie landed man should put his eldest sonne to schole, that he might learne perfectlie the lawes of the realme, and that vpon great forfeiture. Thus in the beginning of his reigne, diuers good lawes and constitutions were made, for the aduancement of the common-wealth, which he caused to be dulie obserued and kept during his time. The pope sent a protonotarie called Forman into Scotland, with a rose and a scepter of gold, to be presented vnto the king, desiring him to perseuere in godlinesse, honor, and vertue, as he had begun. The most part of this yéere the king spent in riding abroad through all parts of his realme to sée iustice ministred, speciallie in the north parts, where the people are commonlie furthest out of order.

1492. The king goeth on progresse.

There was shortlie after some appearance of warres betwixt England and France, whereupon king Charles sent vnto king James, requiring him of assistance, if it came to passe that the Englishmen did inuade France: and further declared, that he had one with him called Richard duke of Yorke, second sonne to king Edward the fourth, who had bæne preserued now manie yéeres secretlie by his aunt Margaret duches of Burgognie, and therefore was iust inheritor to the realme of England, whom he would send into Scotland, praieng the king to assist him to recouer his rightfull heritage, the said realme of England. And shortlie after hereupon, the said feined duke (whose right name was Perkin Warbecke, as in the English historie it appeareth) arriued in Scotland well and honorablie accompanied, to trie what purchase he might make there for succors to atteine his pretended right to the crowne of England.

Perkin Warbecke.

✠ After whose arriuall he was brought to the presence of king James, before whom he did lamentablie bewaile (as he well could) the fall of the house of Yorke, and his owne calamities: most humblie and vehementlie beséeching him, to ransome the kinglie bloud from that contumelie. For answer whereunto at that present time, the king bid him be of good heart, for he would so worke, that he should find his sute not defrauded of all due effect, in obteining succor in his distresse. Few daies after, the king assembling togither his councell, commanded this (counterfeit) duke of Yorke to be brought vnto him, who now (more than before) did in this assemblie bitterlie complaine of his misfortune, shewing, that being borne to great hope of a kingdome (as the sonne of the noblest king of that age) he was left void of all helpe by the death of his father, & had like to haue fallen into the tyrannie of his vncle Richard duke of Glocester, before he could vnderſtand what calamitie or miſfortune might ſignifie.

But aided by diuine aſſiſtance, he (when his elder brother was murthered by his vncle) was preſerued by the helpe of his fathers friends, and conueied away from the bloudie hands of the vſurping king Richard, who (not able in that kingdome, whoſe heire by right he was) to lead a bare and begged life, did ſo liue in forein countries, as he counted the condition of his brother (taken from thoſe miſeries by ſudden death) to be happie in reſpect of his owne troubles and extremitie: for he was reſerued aliue to the ſcorne of fortune, not daring at the firſt to bewaile his calamitie amongſt ſtrangers, whereby he might moue their pitie towards him: yea (and after) when by little and little he came to open what perſon hee was, how noblie borne, whoſe heire, and to whome alied, he was (to increaſe all his former miſeries) more grieuouſlie aſſaulted by the malice of fortune than before. For then he could not almoſt liue in ſafetie in anie place, bicauſe of the ſubtiltie of his enimies, who would haue bought his life (of thoſe with whom he remained) priuilie ſoliciting them to diſcouer his ſecrets, and (vnder the colour of feined amitie) to corrupt his true friends, to ſearch out and diſcouer his hidden friends, and to defame him amongſt the common people.

Herewithall not yet ſatisfied, they reuile (ſaid he) the ladie Margaret his aunt, and impriſon the nobles of England that ſéemed to fauor his cauſe; notwithſtanding all which (ſhe vſing the truth of hir owne conſcience againſt the ſlanders of hir and his enimies, and moued with pitie for the diſtreſſe of hir kinſman) did with hir abilitie relieue his neceſſitie. But at length, when he ſaw no ſure defenſe in a woman and widow (whoſe authoritie could not ſtretch to the command of hir people in that liberall ſort as ſhe would) he was driuen to ſéeke the aid of other princes, and to requeſt them to looke into the miſfortunes that might light vpon ſuch great eſtates, and that they would not ſuffer kinglie bloud (oppreſſed by tyrants) to lament in ſuch extremitie. For yet he was not ſo baſe minded (although hee were in manie great miſeries) that he would not hope at one time or other to be reſtored to his kingdome, by the helpe of ſuch friends as he had in Ireland and England: adding thereunto the helpe which he ſhould haue out of France, whereof he had alreadie made ſome triall by the ſingular benenolence of the ſame king, hauing liberallie imparted manie benefits vnto him.

Beſides which, not ſuppoſing this to allure the kings mind to his fauor, he began by flattrie to extoll him, not douting but he (whoſe fauor had bene liberallie ſhewd to the deſtreſſed) would now diminiſh the ſame to him; but that he hoped that he would (for his ſingular humanitie to all baniſhed perſons, for pitie towards a miſerable creature, for loue towards his kinſman, for neceſſities cauſe towards his friend, and for the néereneſſe of league that ought to be among princes) ſuccor and relieue him with men and monie, thereby to helpe him to the recouerie of his kingdom. Wherfore againe he importunatly requireth the king of aid in this extremitie, ſince the ſame was honorable to himſelfe, acceptable to God, beneficiall for his realme, and a ſingular fame among other princes in ioining with them determined to reſtore him. Which if he might obteine (and that the rather by his furtherance) he did liberallie promiſe alwaies to ſtand a moſt firme friend to the Scots, for whoſe cauſe he would ſpend his crowne and life.)

Thus Perkin Warbecke did vſe the matter in ſuch ſubtill wiſe, that king James either giuing, or ſéeming to giue credit to his words, after aduiſe and deliberation had and taken with his councell, receiued him in honorable wiſe, naming and reputing him duke of Yorke, and therefore promiſed him to aid him in all that he might. And ſhortlie after, hee maried him to his nære kinſwoman the ladie Katharine, daughter to the earle of Huntleie, and moreouer raiſed a great armie, ſpeciallie of the borderers, and with the ſame hauing this pretenſed duke in companie with him, inuaded England, burnt towns ſpoiled houſes, and toke great boties and rich preies both of goods and priſoners, & allured with the ſweetneſſe of ſuch ſpoile and gaine, walked all the countrie of Northumberland, and had gone further, but that he could perceiue no aid comming in vnto this new found duke, contrarie to ſuch golden promiſes as he had made, that as ſone as they were entered into England, there would flocke vnto him both of the nobilitie and commons, and that in great numbers.

King James perceiuing no ſuch matter, thought it better to returne with aſſured gaine, than to tarie this new ſprong dukes doubtfull and vncerteine victorie. And ſo hauing his people laden and peſtered with ſpoile and priſoners, he drew backe into Scotland. The king of England aduertiſed hereof, made preparation for the raiſing of an armie, meaning to ſend the ſame againſt the Scots: but the rebellion of the Corniſhmen, which chanced the ſame time about a tare leuied then of the people, conſtreined him to imploie that armie to repreſſe the enterpriſe of thoſe rebels. Yet neuertheleſſe he ſent the earle of Surreie to the borders, that with the power of the countrie adioining, he might defend the ſame from the inuaſions of the Scots, if they attempted to breake in: and ſo the earle laie on the borders all that yéere. 1497. And ſo before the comming of the Engliſh armie, king James was returned. The earle of Surreie yet (as the Engliſh writers affirme) followed into Scotland, and toke diuerſe caſtels and towers, remaining within the countrie the ſpace of ſix or ſeuen daies, and then came backe without battell or anie notable ſkirmiſh offered. 1498.

About the ſame time was one Peter Hialas ſent ambaſſador from Ferdinando king of Spaine, to treat as a mediator for the concluding of peace betwixt the kings of England and Scotland, which Hialas trauelled ſo earneſtlie in the matter, that at length it was agréed, that certeine commiſſioners of both the realmes ſhould méet at Melroſſe, where for the king of England, doctor Fox, then biſhop of Durham, with this Hialas, and other graue perſonages, met the Scotiſh commiſſioners. After long conference and much talke had, for the concluſion of a generall peace, finallie nothing but a truce might be accorded for certeine yéeres, though Hialas did what he poſſiblie might, to haue agréed them for all maner of matters, quarrels, demands, and cauſes, whatſoeuer the ſame had bene, that a perpetuall peace might haue béene concluded, becauſe he was chieflie ſent

The king of England required to haue the counterfeit duke of Yorke (otherwise named Perkin Warbecke) deliuered to him: but king James (esteeming his honor more than anie earthlie thing) would in no wise seeme to betraie him that fled to him for succour, and with whome he had coupled one of his owne kinswomen in mariage: but he was contented to couenant, that the same Perkin should be constreined to depart out of Scotland, and not to be further aided by him, or by anie other through his meanes or procurement. The king of Scots to keepe promise made in the said treatie of peace, and knowing himselfe to be abused by the said Richard, whom he had reputed to be verelie duke of Yorke (although he was not so called him before his presence, and declared to him the great fauour and good will which he had borne towards him, putting him in remembrance that for his sake he had taken warre in hand against England, and inuaded the countrie in hope of assistance by his friends within the land, where not one resorted to him.

An article for Perkin Warbecke.

King James reasoneth with the counterfeit duke of Yorke.

And albeit he had maried his nere kinswoman, yet might he not keepe longer warre with England for his sake onelie; except he might be sure of some aid through his meanes, whereof he could see no appearance. He desired him therefore to withdraw forth of his realme, either into Flanders to his fathers sister the ladie Margaret; or into some other place where it pleased him to abide, and expect some better time more conuenient for his purpose. The said Richard gaue the king thanks, and obeied his pleasure, departing shortlie after out of Scotland, and sailed into Ireland, from thence to transport into Flanders. But finallie making an attempt into England, he was taken prisoner in the abbeie of Beaulieu, together with his wife, whose beautie was such, as king Henrie thought hir a more meet prete for an emperor, than for souldiors, and therefore vsed hir verie honorablie, appointing hir to remaine in the court with the queene his wife, where she continued so long as the said king liued.

1499. This yeere, the peace being well kept betwixt England and Scotland, the same was neere at point to haue beene broken; by reason that the Englishmen which laie in garrison within the castell of Norham, did make a frate with certeine Scotishmen that came riding neere to the castell, as it had beene to haue viewed it. But although they ment no euill, yet diuerse of the Scotishmen were slaine, and manie wounded and sore hurt; so that king James hauing information thereof, was sore displeased therewith, thinking and saieng, that there was no more vncerteine thing, than to haue peace with England. And herevpon he sent his herald Merchmount with sharpe and vehement letters vnto the king of England, making great complaint for this iniurie and wrong done to his subiects, by those within the castell of Norham. But receiuing most reasonable letters for excuse of that which was done, as well from the king of England himselfe, as from the bishop of Durham owner of the castell, he was indifferentlie well appeased & satisfied, so that he required to haue the bishop to come into Scotland vpon safe conduct to common with him, as well for the full quieting of this matter, as for other things which he had to talke with him of.

The truce like to be broken.

King James requireth to talke with the bishop of Durham.

The bishop by licence of the king his maister, accomplished the Scotish kings request; so that comming into Scotland, he was receiued by him verie honorablie at Melrosse, where (after certeine talke had betwixt them for the appeasing of this last displeasure) the king brake with the bishop for the hauing of the ladie Margaret, eldest daughter to Henrie the seuenth, as then king of England, to be giuen him in mariage: and further declared that he was minded to send his orators vnto hir father the said king Henrie, about the same matter. And forsomuch as he knew that the bishop was one that might do much with king Henrie, who highlie fauoured him for his singular wisedome and learning, he desired him to be a meane to further his suit, which if it were obteined, he trusted it should highlie redound to the honor & wealth of both the realmes. The bishop considering herein as much as the king was able to tell him, did not onelie promise to do all that in him lay, but also incouraged him to send his orators with all speed, trusting that they should receiue a verie towardlie answer.

King James hauing the bishops aduise, anon after his returne into England, sent certeine persons ambassadors vnto king Henrie, to moue him to the effect aboue mentioned. These ambassadors were highlie welcomed, and verie well heard, so that to be briefe, their request seemed so agreeable to king Henries mind, that the mariage was shortlie thereupon concluded (but not consummate betwixt the foresaid James king of Scotland, and the said ladie Margaret daughter to king Henrie) in the seuentéenth yeere of the said king Henries reigne. At the same time, when this mariage was so agréed vpon, a peace was also concluded betwixt the kings of England and Scotland, for the terme of their two liues. And to auoid that none of either of the said kings subiects that had offended the lawes, should be receiued into anie of their dominions; it was accorded, that no Englishman should come within Scotland, without his princes letters supplicatorie vnto the king of Scots, nor anie Scotishman to come within England, without the like letters from his prince, desiring safe conduct and passeport.

Peace concluded betwixt England & Scotland.

1501. In the yeere next insuing, Robert Blakater the bishop of Glascow, Adam Heyborne the earle Bothwell, and other noble men of Scotland, were sent in ambassage from king James vnto the king of England, for the perfecting of the foresaid mariage betwixt king James, and the ladie Margaret, eldest daughter to king Henrie, which earle by letters of procuracie and mandat, in the name of his maister king James, affied and handfasted the foresaid ladie Margaret in all solemne wise, according to the maner: which assurance and contract thus made, was published at Paules crosse in London, on the day of the conuersion of saint Paule, in reioising whereof Te Deum was song, and fiers made, with great feasting & banketting throughout that citie. This done, the ambassadors returned into Scotland, and then afterwards was great preparation made in England for the conueieng of the said ladie into Scotland, and likewise great purueiance there for the receiuing of hir.

This was in the yeere 1502.

1503. Lesse. On the sirtéenth of June, king Henrie toke his iournie from Richmond, with his daughter the said ladie Margaret, and came to Coliweston, where his mother the countesse of Richmond then laie. And after he had remained there certeine daies in pastime and great solace, he toke leaue of his daughter, giuing hir his blessing with a fatherlie exhortation, and committed the conueiance of hir into Scotland vnto the earle of Surreie, and others. The earle of Northumberland, as then warden of the marches, was appointed to deliuer hir vpon the borders vnto the king of Scotland. And so this faire ladie was conueied with a great companie of lords, ladies, knights, esquires, and gentlemen, vntill she came to the towne of Berwike, and from thence vnto Lambert church in Lamer more within Scotland, where she was receiued by the king and all the nobles of that

And verelie the Engliſh lords (as the earle of Surreie and others) which gaue their attendance on the ſaid ladie till the mariage and feaſt were ended) at their returne home, gaue great praiſe not onelie to the manhood of the Scots, but alſo to their maners and heartie interteinment. For aſwell the noble men as the ladies and gentlewomen of Scotland at that preſent, were nothing behind the Engliſh lords & ladies in coſtlie apparell, maſſie chaines, and other furniture, as well for themſelues as their horſſes, and made great bankets to the Engliſhmen, and ſhewed them ſuch iuſts and other pleaſant paſtimes in honor of the mariage, ſo well, as after the maner of the countrie could be deuiſed. By reaſon of this mariage and aliance, men were in great good hope that perfect peace and ſincere amitie ſhould continue betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland a long time after: and verelie during the life of king Henrie the ſeuenth, no cauſe of breach was miniſtred betwixt him and his ſonne in law, but that they liued in great loue and amitie.

The king of Denmarke commeth into Scotland.

About this time, the king of Denmarke, through diuiſion that did riſe betwixt him & his lords, was conſtreined to forſake his countrie, and to come for aid into Scotland, where the king receiued him louinglie, and vpon his earneſt ſute, for that he was both his coſine and confederat, and alſo the rather, at the contemplation of the French kings requeſt and perſuaſion, he prepared an armie of ten thouſand men, the which vnder the conduct of the earle of Arrane, he ſent with the ſaid king of Denmarke to aſſiſt him againſt his aduerſaries. The earle of Arrane according to his commiſſion, attending the Daniſh king into his countrie, reſtored him to his kingdome and former gouernement, and ſo leauing him in peaceable poſſeſſion thereof, returned with his armie againe into Scotland, with great honor both to himſelfe, the king, and realme.

He is reſtored to his kingdome by the earle of Arrane lieutenant to king James.

Shortlie after was a parlement called, during the which the queene was crowned, and manie good acts and conſtitutions made, eſpeciallie touching the limiting of places where iuſtice ſhould be miniſtred in the Iles and hie lands: whereby it came to paſſe, that the king was aſwell obeied, & his lawes were as duelie obſerued and kept by the hie land men, as by thoſe that dwelled in anie part of the low land.

prince of Scotland departed this life at Striueling, and the bishop of Galloway also, who was appointed to be his gouernor.

Fr. Thin. Lesleus.lib.8. pag.345.

¶ About this time, the K. (to tell you here, as saith Lesleus, a matter that to this day is remembred amongest the Romane people with great laughter) created a certeine Italian (with whose wit and pleasant speach he was delighted) abbat of Tungland. This man (being a noble framer of deceipt, & boaster of his wit) did on a time persuade the king, that he was so conuersant in all hidden knowledge of naturall things, and in the secret science of Alchumie, that he could turne all other mettals into pure gold, if anie would beare the charge thereof. But after much time spent thereabout (with long loking of the king, and the nobilitie, to see the effect hereof) there was nothing done, but that their purses were emptied, and the vaine man was defamed by the breach of his promise. At length when he was fallen into the hatred and offense of all men, he did (partlie to gather againe an opinion & report of his vaine glorie, and partlie to recouer the kings fauor) giue out a rumor, that he would (by flieng) be in France before the ambassadors (which were sent thither, and had losed from thore to take their iournie) should come thither. For the performance whereof, he appointed a day for them to met at Striueling, from whence he would take his flight, and begin his iournie. At what time, and to what place, manie resorted togither, desirous to see this new bird; amongest whome (for recreations cause) came the king also.

What need manie words. This man fastening (which he had caused to be made of the fethers of diuerse foules) vnto both his sides, lifted vp himselfe from the castell of Striueling, into the aire to take his iournie: but this deceiuer suddenlie fell headlong to the ground, not able to be holpen by the force of his wings: wherewith the people (vncerteine whether they should rebuke the follie of the man, or pittie his misfortune) flocked about him, demanding this winged abbat how he did: to whome he answered, that he had broken the bone of his thigh, and was out of hope to flie anie more hereafter. To conclude, they all were like to die with laughing, to see him, which before would flie like Icarus, did now lie like Simon Magus, with all his bodie almost broken in peeces. At length when euerie one had laughed their fill, this worthie abbat, to salue all the matter, referred the defalt of his flieng wholie to his wings, because they were not made of eagles fethers and such like, but onelie of pullens fethers, not met or accustomed to cut the aire with flight; and which by a certeine inward vertue (working according to the nature of those foules) did draw the fethers downe toward the downghill (wherupon those birds liue) as the adamant draweth iron.]

1508. In ambassage sent vnto the king.

The 9 of Maie in the yeare after, the lord D'obinie, and the president of Tholous, came from Lewes the French king as ambassadors to declare vnto king James, that he ment to match his eldest daughter in mariage with Francis de Vallois of Vien, and duke of Angolesme; notwithstanding that Charles king of Castile that was after emperor, made suite for hir. Because therefore he ment not to conclude anie thing in such a weightie matter without consent of his confederats, of which he esteemed king James as chiefe, he required him of his aduise and counsell therein; who after aduisement taken, made answer, that albeit the king of France had sufficient counsell about him, yet sith he had desired his aduise, he would frendlie giue the same: which was that he should rather marie his daughter within his owne realme, vnto such as should succeed him, than to bestow hir vpon anie forren prince, sith otherwise some claime might be made in time comming vnto the crowne by such as should match with hir. And so with this answer, the president of Tholous departed, reporting the same at his comming home vnto the French king, who thereupon followed his owne determination therein, confirmed and allowed thus by his confederat the king of Scotland.

The king of Scotland.

The lord D'obignie tooke a sickenesse and died thereof at Corstorphin, in the moneth of June, and caused his heart to be sent vnto saint Ninians in Galloway; because he had vowed a pilgrimage thither whilest he remained the French kings lieutenant in Naples, where he had atchiued manie high enterprises against his enimies. His name was Bernard Steward, lieutenant of those men of warre which Charles the eight of that name king of France did send with Henrie earle of Richmond into England, when the same earle came against king Richard, whome he vanquished, and thereby got the crowne. And so after manie noble victories and valiant acts atchiued, this lord D'obignie ended his life in his owne countrie of Scotland, where he was borne. This yeare also in Maie and June, there were kept great iusts and tourneies in Edenburgh, by one calling himselfe the wild knight, who counterfeited the round table.

The lord D'obignie died.

This was the king himselfe.

There were diuerse ambassadors sent forth this yeare also, as the archdeacon of saint Andrews, and sir Anthonie Darcie into France, and the bishop of Murrey into England. The fiftéenth of Julie, the quéene was deliuered of a daughter, which shortlie after she had receiued baptisme, deceassed, and the quéene in that childbed was againe in great perill of death. The bishop of Glascow died this yeare in his iournie to Jerusalem, the nine and twentith of Julie; James Beton succéeded him in that see. The thirtith of Julie, there was a great fraie betwixt the lord Yarwell, and the lord Creichton of Sanchar, where the lord Creichton was chased with his companie from Dunfreis, & the lord of Daliell and the yong lord of Crauthlaie with diuerse other were slaine. The nineténth of September was a great earthquake in manie places both of England and Scotland, namelie, the same was perceiued in churches.

The king of England sent a gentleman with horses trimlie trapped with bards of steele to be presented to king James, who thankefullie receiued them, and right honorablie rewarded the messenger. The archdeacon of saint Andrews returned forth of France in a great ship called the treasuror, which ship was cast away on the coast of England, and the archdeacon, and foure hundred persons that were in hir, were brought to the king of England: but the archdeacon in November following returned home and came to Edenburgh. Adam earle of Bothwell and lord Hales departed this life at Edenburgh the seuentéenth day of October, and earle Patrike succéeded him. Henrie the seuenth king of England, passed out of this world the two and twentith of April, in the yeare 1509, and his sonne Henrie the eight succéeded him, after whose coronation king James sent an honorable ambassage of certeine lords and a bishop to congratulat him at his first entrie into the rule of his kingdome, as to the maner in such cases appertaineth.

¶ At this time, John and Andrew Barton (obteining letters of marque from the king against the Portingals) preieng on the borderers of Portingale did take manie of their ships (landed with rich merchandize) which they brought into Scotland. Which kind of prises being often made by the Bartons vnto the Portingals, gaue them cause greeuouslie to complaine to their king, of the wicked piracie of the Scots.

Fr. Thin. Lesleus lib. 8. cap. 250.

The kings answer.

Scots: but neither the king of Portingale with his councell, nor his people with their force, could at anie time ſuppreſſe the Bartons (defended with the Scotiſh letters of marque) but that he would inuade, ſpoile, & carie awaie the Portingale ſhips, if he happened vpon anie of them. Touching which, becauſe it ſhall not ſeeme to be a manifeſt iniurie by the Bartons to the other (and not rather a iuſt cauſe giuen by the Portingals) we haue here inſerted the letters of our king Iames the fift (as they be found amongſt the records) written to Immanuell king of Portingale for this matter. In which it ſhall manifeſtlie appeare, whether the fault were not moſtlie in the Portingals or no.

Iames the fift, king of Scotland, to Immanuell the woorthie king of Portingale.

Woorthie king, friend, and deere cowſine, certeine yeares paſt, a Scotiſh ſhip laden with merchandize, & loſing from the port of Sluis in Flanders, was inuaded by two armed ſhips, gouerned by Portingals; whereof, the one was called John Vaſgue, and the other John Bret. Which ſhip (after certeine of hir merchants ſlaine, manie wounded, manie taken priſoners, and the reſt caſt into a fiſher-bote to be ſet on land at the next ſhore) was by them caried into Portingale: all which was done in the ſight of the reſt of the Luſitan ſhips, which at the ſame time did alſo loſe out of that hauen to paſſe into Portingale. The full trueth whereof, Charles the duke of Burgognie, and earle of Flanders, vnderſtanding (and moued not ſo much for the ſingular iniurie done to the Scots, as by the breach of the priuilege, & right of his harborows) did ſignifie the ſame (knowne, and found by order of iudgement) to the king of Portingale, admoniſhing him, that vnleſſe he tooke order for ſuch wicked deeds, and for the reſtitution of the hurt and loſſe: that he would indeuor, that all the Portingals (which frequented the marts of Flanders) ſhould by ſentence of iudgement, ſatiſfie all the damages which the Scots had ſuſteined. But the vntimelie death (of that iuſt and valiant man) did fruſtrat all his determination.

The king alſo our grandfather (when he had by his letters complained of that iniurie to the king of Portingale, and had not much profited) gaue forth letters of marque, that is, he gaue authoritie to John & Robert Barton, brothers & heires to that John, which was maiſter of that ſhip ſo caried away, to recouer ſo much of the Luſitans. Before the execution whereof, my grandfather died: after which (my father being yet verie yong) the whole ſtate of the realme did ſuppoſe it beſt to alter nothing in forren cauſes, vntill he came to full age. At time (being of ſufficient yeares) he did forbeare to grant the vſe of the ſaid letter of marque, till he had firſt conſulted with the king of Portingale thereabouts. Wherevpon (diſpatching an ambaſſador vnto him) our father alſo died (before we could againe heare anie anſwer from thence) leauing me a child not paſt three yeres old. For which cauſe, the gouernor of the kingdome iudged it beſt (during our minoritie) to defer theſe letters of marque, vntill we came to riper yeares; which was done, not without great griefe and complaint of thoſe miſerable and poore men.

Wherevpon, we alſo for theſe laſt two yeares (being now growen to riper age) willing to prouide, that aſwell the other merchants which in that ſhip of Julian, haue loſt their goods and kinred, as alſo to permit the heirs of the ſaid John Barton (by way of letter of marque before granted) hauing giuen them power, onelie to take ſo much recompenſe of the Portingals. Whereof yet, we thought it meet, that they ſhould vſe anie of them, vntill we had firſt (by this Snodoune our eſquier) laid before your maieſtie the whole order of the matter, which is the iudiciall knowledge of the piracie, the value of the loſſe, and the cauſe of our long ſilence, aſſuredlie hoping that you will not doo anie thing, in reſpect of your humanitie and vprightnes, but that which ſhall be good and iuſt. The which, if you deeme is yet to be deferred; we require your woorthineſſe to conſider, that we cannot forſake our ſubiects, afflicted with ſo great iniuries, whome hereafter we refer to the law of all nations, for recouerie of their goods taken away, which thing ought not to ſeeme to anie man (by anie meanes) to be the violating of friendſhip, league, or conſanguinitie, wherewith we haue beene linked. Wherefore, when that ſame ſhall happen, we deſire your excellencie to take the ſame in good part (moſt woorthie cowſine and confederat king) to whom I wiſh long and happie life. From Edenburgh, the day before the Ides of Aprill, in the yeare, 1540.

The king about this time gaue liberall poſſeſſions to Robert Borthwike, a notable artificer for making of field peeces and other guns; for the which liberalitie, he ſhould make certeine great peeces in the caſtell of Edenburgh; whereof there are manie yet to be ſeene in Scotland, with this ſuperſcription:

Machina, ſum Scoto Borthuik fabricata Roberto.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 8. pag 353.

This ſummed the king went in pilgrimage vnto ſaint Duthois in Roſſe, and the queene remaining at Holie rod houſe, was brought to bed of a prince, the twentie day of October, the which the third day after was baptiſed and named Arthur. Two great ſhips came forth of France to the king, fraught with guns, ſpeares, and all other kind of munition for warre. Alexander, baſtard ſonne to the king, newlie made archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews; who had beene long in Germanie ſtudent there in the ſchooles with that famous clearke Eraſmus Roterodamus, and had profited verie well, came from Flanders by ſea into Scotland, and was ioifullie receiued, becauſe he had beſtowed his time ſo well in vertues and learning.

perour of Turkie at the citie of Caire, who reteined him in seruice, and gaue him good interteinement, so that he remained with him, till he heard that the liuing of Fast castell was fallen to him by lawfull succession; notwithstanding that when he departed out of Scotland, there were eight seuerall persons before him to succéd one after another, which in the meane time were all deceassed. The 14 of Julie, Arthur prince of Scotland and the Iles, departed this life in the castell of Edenburgh. Two scorpions were found, the one quicke, and the other dead, in the orchard of the castell of Cragmiller, which thing was reputed for a maruellous great wonder, that anie should be séene within the Ile of Britaine. In the moneth of September, an vniuersall sickenesse reigned through all Scotland, whereof manie died. It was verie contagious, and they called it Stope gallant.

There came also a passing faire woman into Scotland about the same time, naming hir selfe Katharine Gordon, wife to Perkin Warbecke, that had named himselfe duke of Yorke, but at length being brought to the king, she confessed what shée was, and so auoided the realme. In which meane while, the ladie Katharine Gordon hir selfe remained in England, and had right good maintenance, so that she liued there verie well and honorablie manie yéeres after. Furthermore, the king vpon the eighth day of Nouember comming from Edenburgh to the water of Kule, tooke diuers misgouerned persons, & brought them to Jedworth, where the principall of the Trumbils, with naked swords in their hands, and withs about their necks met him, putting themselues in the kings mercie, which were sent to sundrie places to be kept in ward, with diuers other of those countrimen, whereby the marches were more quiet afterwards: and from thence the king passed to saint Johns towne, where iustice were holden the residue of the winter.

1511. The next yéere in the beginning of Maie, the quéene went from Dunfermling toward saint Duthois in Rosse, and was all the way right honorablie vsed and interteined. About the tenth of Julie, she returned to Edenburgh, where she found the lord Dacres, and sir Robert Durie knight come thither as ambassadors from the king of England hir brother, who were honorablie receiued. In the yéere next insuing, in June, Andrew Barton being on the seas to meet the Portingals (against whom he had a letter of marque) sir Edmund Howard lord admerall of England, and the lord Thomas Howard, sonne and heire vnto the earle of Surrey, were appointed by the king of England to go likewise to sea with certeine ships, and met with the said Andrew as he returned homewards néere to the Downes, hauing with him onelie one ship and one barke.

The Englishmen at the first made signe vnto the Scots as though they ment none euill, saue onelie to salute them as friends; but getting within them, they set vpon them right fiercelie, and the Scots for a while did as valiantlie defend themselues, so that manie were slaine on both sides: but in the end the Englishmen got the vpper hand, wounded Andrew Barton the chiefe capteine of the Scots, that he died of the hurts that he there receiued, and the ship called the Unicorne, and the barke called Jennie Peruine, were both taken, with all the Scotishmen that remained aliue in the same, which were had to London, and staied as prisoners in the bishop of Yorke his house for a time, and after sent home into Scotland. King James was sore offended with this matter, and therevpon sent an herald with letters, requiring redresse for the slaughter of his people, and restitution of his ships, sith otherwise it might séeme to giue occasion of breach of the peace. But the king of England denied, that the slaughter of a pirat (as he tooke Andrew Barton to be) ought to breake anie bond of peace, yet neuertheless he promised to send commissioners to the borders, that should intreat of that matter, and other enormities chanced betwéene the two realmes.

✲ About this time was Alexander Hume the onlie gouernor of all the marches of Scotland (which before were accustomed to be diuided into thrée parts) derelie beloued to king James, being a man of a fiercer disposition than was conuenient for the profit of the common-wealth. This man promised to the king (troubled with the cares of warre, and carefull to wipe awaie the reproch of late receiued by the English) that shortlie he and his followers with their kindred and alliances, would so bring the matter about, that the English should as greatlie lament for their losses, as they had now conceiued ioies of their victories. To the performance whereof, he gathered thrée thousand souldiers, wherewith he entered England, and there spoiled seuen townes before anie succour might come to rescue them: but as he returned backe laden with booties of all kinds, his men (being accustomed to pilfries and robberies) impatient of delate, presentlie diuided the preie in the host, euerie one departing home to his owne as it was nérest vnto him. Yet Alexander did not disperse such as he might keepe togither: but assembling as manie of them as would tarie, with a small companie abode the end of all things, alwaies hauing an eie to sée if anie pursute were made after them. But when he perceiued no bodie to follow, and that there was no doubt of danger (passing the time more careles than before) he fell vnwares into the hands of thrée hundred English laid in wait for him, who (taking the opportunitie of the time) did set vpon him and his, and (driuing them into extreme feare) they killed and put to flight all such as they incountered. In which tumult diuers of the Scots were slaine, and two hundred taken, of whome George Hume, brother of the said Alexander (exchanged for Comarch, Heron, and Ford, taken prisoners, and long reteined in Scotland for reuenge of the death of Robert Car) was one, and the chiefest, whereby he departed quietlie into Scotland.)

Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 12.

The French king and the duke of Gelderland, perceiuing that the king of England was minded through procurement of the pope & others, to make them warres, either of them sent ambassadors into Scotland vnto king James, requiring his assistance against England: but king James minding to mainteine peace and concord betwixt the parties, sent an ambassador vnto the king of England, desiring him in brotherlie and most louing wise to liue in peace and quietnesse, and not to make anie warres against his confederat friends, offering himselfe to agrée and compound anie difference that was fallen betwixt the king of England and the said princes. The king of England, who had alreadie sent aid vnto the ladie regent of the low countries against the duke of Gelderland, made such faire answer hereunto as he thought stood with reason, and so dispatched the ambassadour backe againe to his maister, without anie more adoo in that matter, about the which he came for that time.

The king of France required aid against England.

✲ Much about these daies, there was called a prouinciall synod of bishops, abbats, and other religious persons at Edenburgh, in the monasterie of the Dominicke friers, Baiomanie the popes legat being present. In which by the common voice of them all (although against the will of manie of them) it was ordeined that benefices or priests liuings (whose reuenues did yerlie exceed the value of 40 pounds) should

The biſhop of Murrey came home.

Shortlie after came the biſhop of Murrey home, hauing bene at Rome, in France, and England, bringing with him from the pope, and the kings of France and England, manie good and pleaſant letters: and with him came a clearke of Spaine in ambaſſage vnto the king. This yere the eleuenth day of Aprill, the quéene was deliuered of a yong prince in the palace of Luithgo, who was ſhortlie after baptiſed, and named James the fift prince of Scotland, and of the Iles, that after ſucceeded his father in the kingdome. The lord Dacres, and doctor Weſt came in ambaſſage from the king of England, and Monſieur de la Mot came with letters alſo from the French king, to perſuade king James to make warre againſt England, promiſing him monie, munition, and all other neceſſarie prouiſions of warre. In his waie as he paſſed the ſeas towards Scotland, he had drowned three Engliſh ſhips, & brought ſeuen awaie with him vnto Lieth for prizes, in the which were but three Engliſhmen left aliue. Shortlie after, maiſter James Ogiluie abbat of Dirburgh came forth of France with letters of the like effect. After this Robert Barton went to the ſea, and in Julie brought into Scotland 14 prizes of Engliſh men which he had taken.

About this ſeaſon, the lord of Drumweidie was ſlaine in Edenburgh by two perſons, which tooke ſanctuarie in Holie rood houſe, and ſo eſcaped. John erle of Atholl deceaſſed the nineténth of September, & Lion Harold king of armes deceaſſed the firſt of October. Great miſrule was exerciſed on the borders in this ſeaſon, and therefore the king aſſembled the lords in Edenburgh for reformation thereof; and while they were there, the quéene was brought to bed of a child, which died ſhortlie after it was chriſtened.

1513. Leſle. There came a great ſhip into Scotland, which the king of France had ſent vnto the king, laden with artillerie, powder, and wines, & then was the league and band renewed betwixt Scotland and France. The ſame ſhip landed at Blackneſſe the nineténth of November. And this appointment was kept, but no good could be done, as after ſhall appeare. The king ſent Fornian biſhop of Murrey into France, to ſignifie vnto the French king the meſſage of the ſaid doctor Weſt, and other things. In the moneth of Maie, there came certeine ſhips out of Denmarke laden with guns, powder, armor, & other kind of munition. And ſo the band of friendſhip being with him concluded, he returned into his countrie. The king prepared a great nauie of ſhips, the principall whereof were the Michaell, Margaret, and James. They made ſaile towards the ſea the twentie ſeuenth of Julie; and the king ſailed in the Michaell himſelfe, till they were paſt the Iland of Maie, James Gordon ſon to George earle of Huntleie being one of the capteins of the ſame ſhip.

The commiſſioners met on the borders in June, according to the appointment: but becauſe the Engliſhmen would not conſent to make anie redreſſe or reſtitution, till the fiftéenth of October next, thinking by that delaie and continuance of time, they ſhould vnderſtand the ſtate of their kings proceedings in France, and in the meane time reteine in their hands the Scotiſhmens goods which they had taken both by ſea and land (as the Scotiſh writers affirme) the king of Scots being thereof aduertiſed, ſent Lion king of armes vnto king Henrie then lieng at ſiege before Terwine, with letters of complaint, commanding him that if king Henrie refuſed to accompliſh the contents of his ſaid letters, he ſhould denounce warre vnto him. Whereupon Lion arriuing in the Engliſh armie with his cote of armes on his backe, about the middeſt of Auguſt, deſired to ſpeake with the king, and was within a ſhort ſpace by Garter chiefe king at armes of England brought to the kings preſence, hauing his nobles and councellors about him, where, with due reuerence, & ſome good words firſt vttered, he deliuered his letters, the tenor whereof inſueth.

Notwithstanding, in defense of his person we mon take part, and thereto ye because of vthers, haue giuen occasion to vs and to our leiges in time by past, nouther doing iustlie nor kindlie toward vs, procæding alwaies to the vtter destructioun of our nærest friendes, quha mon do for vs quhan it shall be necessarie; in euill example that ye will hereafter be better vnto vs, quham ye lightly fauour, manifestlie wranged your sister for our sake incontrarie our writs: and saieng to our herauld that we giue you faire wordes, and thinke the contrarie, in dæd such it is, we gaue you words as ye dud vs, trusting that ye suld haue emended to vs, or worthin kinder to our frends for our sakes, and suld naughtight haue stopped our seruitors passage to labour peax, that they mought as the papes halines exhorted vs by his breuites to do. And therevpon we were contented to haue ouersene our harmes, and to haue remitted the same, though vther informatioun was made to our halie father pape Julie, by the cardinall of Yorke, your ambassador.

And sen you haue now put vs fra our gude beleue through the premisses, and speciallie in denieng of safe conduct to our seruants, to resort to your presence, as your ambassador doctor West instantlie desired we suld sende one of our councell vnto you vpon great matters, and appointing of differences debatable betwirt you and vs, furthering of peax if we might, betwixt the most christen king & you, we neuer hard to this purpose safe conduct denied betwirt Infidels. Herefore we write to you this time at length plainesse of our mind, that we require and desire you to desist fra farther inuasioun and vtter destructioun of our brother and cousing the maist christen king, to quham by all confederatioun, blude and alie, and also by new band quhilk you haue compelled vs latelie to take through your iniuries & harmes without remedie done dailie vnto vs, our leiges and subiects, we are bounden and oblist for mutuall defense ilk of vthers, like as ye & your confederates be oblist for mutuall inuasiouns and actuall warre.

Certifieng you, we will take part in defense of our brother and cousing the maist christen king, and will do what thing we trust may cause you to desist fra pursute of him, and for deuit and postponit iustice to our leiges we mon giue letters of marque accordng to the amitie betwirt you and vs, quharto ye haue had little regard in time by past, as we haue ordaint our herauld the bearer hereof to say, gif it like you to heare him and gif him credence: right excellent, right high & mightie prince our derest brother and cousing, the trinitie haue you in kæping. Geuen vnder our signet at Edenburgh the twentie sixt day of Julie.

The heraulds sent for.

King Henrie hauing read the letter, and considered thereof with aduise of his councell, sent for the herald againe, and told him that he had read and well perceiued the contents of the letters which he had deliuered to him, and would make him answer with condition, condition, that he would promiſe to declare the ſame to his maiſter. Wherevnto Lion made this anſwer: The heraldis anſwer.

"Sir, I am his naturall ſubiect, and he is my naturall lord, and what he commandeth me to ſay, I may boldlie ſay with fauour; but the commandements of others I may not, nor dare ſay vnto my ſouereigne lord. But your letters ſent by me, may declare your maiſters pleaſure, albeit your anſwer requireth dowings and not ſaiengs, that is, that you immediatlie ſhould returne home. Then ſaid the king: I will returne at my pleaſure to your damage, and not at thy maiſters ſummons. And herewith he cauſed an anſwer to be written to the king of Scots, in forme as followeth.

King Henrie his anſwer.

RIght excellent, right high & mightie prince, &c. We haue receiued your writing dated at Edenburgh the twentie firſt day of Julie, by your herald Lion this bearer, wherein after rehearſall and accumulation of manie ſurmiſed iniuries, griefs and dangers don by vs and our ſubiects to you and your lieges, the ſpecialties whereof were ſuperfluous to rehearſe, remembring that to them and euerie of them in effect reaſonable anſwer founded vpon law and conſcience, hath tofore bene made to you & your councell; ye not onelie require vs to deſiſt from further inuaſion and vtter deſtruction of your brother and cooſine the French king, but alſo certifie vs that you will take part in defenſe of the ſaid king, and that thing which ye truſt may rather cauſe vs to deſiſt from purſute of him, with manie contriued occaſions and communications by you cauſeleſſe ſought & imagined, ſounding to the breach of the perpetuall peace paſſed, concluded, and ſworne betwixt you and vs, of which your imagined quarrels cauſeleſſe deuiſed to breake to vs, contrarie to your oth promiſed, all honor & kindneſſe, we can not maruell; conſidering the ancient accuſtomed manners of your progenitors, which neuer kept longer faith & promiſe than pleaſed them.

Howbeit, if the loue and dread of God, nighneſſe of bloud, honor of the world, law and reaſon had bound you, we ſuppoſe ye would neuer haue ſo farre procæded, ſpeciallie in our abſence. Wherin the pope and all princes chriſtened may well note in you diſhonorable demeanour, when ye lieng in wait, ſeeke the waies to do that in our ſaid abſence, which ye would haue bene well aduiſed to attempt, we being within our realme and preſent. And for euident approbation hereof, we need none other proofes nor witneſſes, but your owne writings heretofore to vs ſent, we being within our realme, wherein ye neuer made mention of taking part with our enimie the French king, but paſſed the time with vs till after our departure from our ſaid realme. And now percaſe ye ſuppoſing vs ſo farre from our ſaid realme, to be deſtitute of defenſe againſt your inuaſions, haue vttered the old rancour of your mind, which in couert manner ye haue long kept ſecret.

Neuertheleſſe, we remembring the brittlenes of your promiſe, & ſuſpecting though not wholie beleeuing ſo much vnſtedfaſtneſſe, thought it verie expedient and neceſſarie to put our ſaid realme in a readines for reſiſting of your ſaid enterpriſes, hauing firme truſt in our Lord God, and the righteouſneſſe of our cauſe, with the aſſiſtance of our confederats & alies, we ſhall be able to reſiſt the malice of ſchiſmatiks and their adherents, being by the generall councell expreſſie excommunicate and interdicted; truſting alſo in time conuenient to remember our friends, and requite you and our enimies, which by ſuch vnnaturall demeanor haue giuen ſufficient cauſe to the diſheriſon of you and your poſteritie for euer, from the poſſibilitie that ye thinke to haue to the realme, which ye now attempt to inuade.

And if the example of the king of Nauarre, being excluded from his realme for aſſiſtance giuen to the French king, can not reſtraine you from this vnnaturall dealing; we ſuppoſe ye ſhall haue like aſſiſtance of the French king, as the king of Nauarre hath now, who is a king without a realme, & ſo the French king peaceablie ſuffereth him to continue, wherevnto good regard would be taken. And like as we heretofore touched in this our writing, we need not to make anie further anſwer to the manifold griefs by you ſurmiſed in your letter: forſomuch as if anie law or reaſon could haue remoued you from your ſenſuall opinions, ye haue bene manie and oftentimes ſufficientlie anſwered to the ſame: except onelie to the pretended greefs touching the denieng of our ſafe conduct to your ambaſſador laſt ſent vnto vs.

Wherevnto we make this anſwer, that we had granted the ſaid ſafe conduct; and if your herald would haue taken the ſame with him, like as he hath bene accuſtomed to ſolicit ſafe conducts for merchants and others heretofore, ye might as ſoone haue had that, as anie other: for we neuer denied ſafe conduct to anie your lieges to come vnto vs and no further to paſſe, but we ſee well, like as your ſaid herald had hertofore made ſiniſter report contrarie to truth, ſo hath he done now in this caſe, as it is manifeſt and open. Finallie, as touching your requiſition to deſiſt from further attempting againſt our enimie the French king, we know you for no competent iudge of ſo high authoritie to require vs in that behalfe. Wherfore (God willing) we purpoſe with the aid and aſſiſtance of our confederats and alies to proſecute the ſame; and as ye do to vs and our realme, ſo it ſhall be remembred and acquited hereafter by the helpe of our Lord & our patrone ſaint George, who right excellent, right high and mightie prince, &c. Dated vnder our ſignet in our campe before Tirwine, the twelfth day of Auguſt.

This

This letter being deliuered vnto the Scotish herald, he departed with the same into Flanders, there to haue taken ship: but for want of readie passage he staied, and returned not into Scotland till Flodden field was fought, and the king slaine. For king James perceiuing all the Englishmens doings to tend vnto war rather than to peace, hauing taken order for the assembling of his people, immediatlie after he had sent forth his herald with commandement to denounce the warre, he determined to inuade the English confines, and first before his mane force was come togither, the lord Humes that was lord chamberlaine and warden of Scotland, the thirteenth day of August, hearing that the Englishmen had fetched a bootie within the Scotish ground, assembled a power, & followed them into Northumberland, but yer he could returne he was forelaid [in Broome house, or Broome field] by the Englishmen, which breaking out of their ambushes, put the Scotishmen to the worse, and of them toke and slue manie.

Englishmen fetched a bootie in Scotland.

Fr. Thin. ✻ These wars thus begun, the king determined to go to his armie (as it seemeth) not yet fullie assembled. Whereupon comming to Linuch, he went to the church to heare euensong, as the maner was. Buchan. lib. 13. To whome, after he had entered the chappell, there came an old man, whose heare was somewhat yellowish red, hanging downe vpon his shoulders, his forehead high with baldnesse, bare headed, hauing his bodie couered with a blewish garment, girded with white, and verie reuerent in his countenance. This man seeking the king, passed through the companie standing there, and drew neere to the king. Who being now come vnto him (and with a certeine rude behauiour, leaning vpon the seat wherein the king was placed) in homelie sort saied vnto him:

"King James sent vnto thee, to giue thee admonishment that thou hasten not forward to the place which thou hast determined: which warning if thou dost despise, it shall succeed ill with thee, and with all such as shall attend vpon thee. Further I am commanded to giue thee intelligence before hand, that thou eschue the familiaritie, custome, or counsell of women, and if thou dooest otherwise, it shall succeed to thy hurt and reproch. After which thus spoken, he mingled himselfe with the other companie, neither could after be found (the euensong being ended) when he was sought for by the king: for he was neuer seene after that he had thus deliuered his message. Which seemed the more strange, because that manie which stood neere him (marking all his order, and desirous to haue heard more things from him) could not perceiue his departure; amongest which persons (of those that meant to haue asked him further questions) Dauid Lindsete (a man of approued credit and vertue, verie well learned, and whose life was far estranged from lieng and falshood) was one, who told this same to me (saith Buchanan) as a thing most certeine; or else I would haue ouerpassed it as a fable caried about by common report.]

In the meane time was the whole power of Scotland assembled, with the which king James approching to the borders, and nothing abashed with the euill lucke thus at the beginning chanced to his people, purposed with greater aduantage of victorie to recouer that detriment; and hereupon he made such hast, that he would not staie for the whole power of his realme, which was in preparing to come forward vnto him; but comming to the borders, he passed ouer the water of Tweed the two and twentith of August, and entered into England, lodging that night at Wesilham neere to the riuer of Tuisell, and the next day laid siege vnto the castell of Norham, and within short space wan the Braies, ouerthrew the Barnekine, & slue diuerse within the castell, so that the capteine and such as had charge within it, desired the king to delaie the siege, while they might send to the earle of Surreie alreadie come with an armie into the north parts, couenanting if they were not rescued by the nineteenth day of that moneth, they should deliuer the castell vnto the king. This was granted: and because none came within the time to the rescue, the castell was deliuered at the appointed day; a great part of it was ouerthrowne and beaten downe. After this he wan the castels of Fourd and Etell, & diuerse other places of strength, of which, part were ouerthrowne. He also toke manie prisoners, and sent them away into Scotland, and diuerse he assured: and thus he abode an eightéene daies within England, till two parts of his armie were scaled & departed home from him, which they did vpon this occasion. Barnekine. Fourd and Etell taken.

Fr. Thin. ✻ The king was determined & persuaded to haue besieged Berwike (beyond which he was now passed) since the same alone was more honor (than all the other places besides) if they wan it; the taking thereof they supposed not to be verie hard, because they were sure that the towne and castell were vnfurnished of all things for the defense thereof. Buchan. li. 13. Whereupon, the king (deeming nothing too hard for his armie, especiallie, since the English were set on worke as much as they might in the French wars) being nourished in that daintie (by his flattering courtiers) did leaue the same vndone at this time, meaning in his returne easilie to haue obteined it. But as they were yet at Ford, a herald of the English came vnto them, requiring that they would appoint a day and place, where and when both the armies might ioine in battell. Whereupon, there was a councell called amongest the Scots, in which it was agréed by the greater part, that the Scots should returne home into their countrie, least with so small a companie they might hazard the state of the whole countrie; especiallie, since that they had alreadie sufficientlie obteined fame, glorie and riches, and to the vttermost satisfied the band of amitie with the French; for there was no iust cause, why they for number (so few) and for trauell (in ouerthrowing so manie forts) so much weakened, should now againe be laid open to so great a multitude of the English daillie increasing with succors. For it was said at that time; that Thomas Hayward brought into the field (besides the rest of his armie) 6000 of chosen and valiant souldiers from the English campe (in France) before Turweine.

To which persuasion (to make the matter more strange) it was further added, that if the king did depart; the English host of necessitie must be dissolued, and could not that yeare againe be repared, because their souldiers were fet from the furthest parts of the realme; and that if the king would needs fight, that he then should do it in his owne realme, kéeping the time & place in his power alwaies to be appointed. But when the French ambassador (and certeine other, fed with the French pensions) labored to the contrarie; the king being by nature fierce, and grédie of warre, was easilie persuaded to abide his enimie in that place. In the meane time, when the English came not forth (at the day appointed to them by the herald, which before had béene with the Scots) the noblemen of Scotland, taking occasion thereof, did afresh go to the king, declaring that their not comming to battell was onelie a traine and deceipt, deferring the matter from day to day, to the end that their force might be increased, and the Scots diminished.

The king of Scots made too much hast.

Norham. The Braies.

Wherefore said they, we should vse the like policie against them. For since they haue not attended the time prescribed vnto them, it is no shame to the Scots to returne into their countrie without battell, or to fight within their owne limits. Of both which, the surer counsell were to follow the first; which if it be not liked, then is there good occasion offered to execute the other. For since the riuer of Till (hauing hie banks) is not passable, but at certeine miles hence (except it be by a bridge) some few may there resist a great multitude. Besides which, when a part of the English armie is passed the bridge, the same bridge maie easilie (by engins placed therefore) be cut in sunder; so that there shall not be passage for anie more: by means whereof, the one part of them shall be subdued on the one side of this riuer, before that anie aid can come vnto them from the other banke. The king liked neither of these deuises and persuasions; but answered, that he would not suffer the English to depart (vnfoughten with) although there were an 100000 against him. At which rash answer, the whole nobilitie was greeuouslie offended.

Wherevpon Archembald Dowglas earle of Angus (which farre excelled all the others both in peeres and authoritie) laboured to turne the kings mind with all gentle persuasions, and began to make a more ample discourse vpon the two former counsels giuen by the nobilitie. For he shewed that the king had fullie satisfied the request of the French, in that he had now turned the greatest part of the English armie before bent against the French, against himselfe and his owne people; and had so wrought, that those great armies should neither hurt France nor do anie iniurie vnto the Scots, sith they were not able long to remaine in campe in those cold places, and in a barren countrie vnfurnished of all things (by the calamities of the last warres) and in which there was no corne; and if there were, it could not be ripened (the winter comming on so fast) in those northerne parts of the realme.

And where the French ambassador doth so much vrge vs vnto the battell, I suppose that the same should not seeme either new or strange vnto vs, that a strange man (which doth not respect the common euill of the realme, but the priuat commoditie of his owne nation) be ouer lauish in powring out the bloud of other men. Besides which, his request is ouer impudent, to demand of the Scots that which the French king (a man of singular experience and wisedome) doth not iudge conuenient for his owne kingdome or dignitie, if we be ouerthrowne. Neither should the losse of his host seeme more light vnto him (although we are few in number) bicause that all they of Scotland (which excell in force, authoritie or counsell) are assembled here togither, who being slaine, the rest of the realme would soone be a preie to the victor. What? Is it more safe for vs, and more profitable to the eschewing of all danger, for him to fight at this present? No trulie. For if Lewes do suppose, that the English (by imagined meanes) may be either made needie of monie, or else wearied by delaie; what can be done more necessarie for the present state of things, than to compell the enimie to diuide his armie, to the end that we may ease the weight of warre against the French by one part of the host to be sent against vs, and still to hold them plaie as it were alwaies to keepe them readie to set vpon vs, & by remouing to giue them cause to follow vs? For so I suppose shall the glorie and shew (which these men I feare rather valiant in words than deeds, do with their rashnesse so much pretend) be fullie answered. For what can happen more honorable to the king, than that we (by the ouerthrow of so manie castels, by the spoile of so manie countries with sword and fire, and by the driuing home of so great bodies and preies) haue done that iniurie to them, as that their countrie shall not by the peace of manie peeres recouer hir former estate? What greater profit may we loke for by warre, than in so great tumult of warres, with great praise and honor to vs, and with shame and reproch to our enimies, to obteine quiet, ioined with gaine and glorie for the refreshing of our selues? Which kind of victorie (that is gotten more by words than by swords) chiefflie belongeth to men, and of men specially to the leaders and capteins, as such a glorie whereof the common souldiors may not challenge anie part.

Which being thus spoken by earle Dowglas, although all they which were present seemed (by their countenance) to giue consent thereto: yet the king (who had with other bound himselfe to fight with the English) receiued these counsels with contrarie eares; and in heat commanded Dowglas to depart home, if he were afraid of the enimie. Wherevpon he (conceiuing some vnkindnesse, and inwardlie beholding wherevnto all these things would come by the kings rashnesse) forthwith burst out in teares. After which (as soone as he could settle himselfe thereto) he spake these few words. If (said he) my former life did not cleare me from the reproch of a coward, I know not with what reason or persuasion I might cleare or defend my selfe. For trulie so long as this my bodie was able to sustaine anie labor, I neuer spared to spend the same in the defense of my countries helpe, and my souereignes honor. But since I see their eares to exclude my counsell (which is the onelie thing wherewith I can now be profitable) I here leaue my two sonnes (who next vnto my countrie are most deare to me) and the rest of my kinred (of whom I greatlie account) as a certeine pledge of the truth and loue of my mind towards thee, and the common helpe of my countrie. And I pray God that he make this feare of mine to be false, and that I may rather be counted a lieng prophet, than behold those things which I feare will happen vnto vs. Which words when the Dowglas had said to the king, he departed thence with his companie. The rest of the nobilitie (bicause they saw they could not draw the king to their mind) take that place for battell which was next vnto them, to the end (seeing they were much inferior in number to their enimies, for there were 26000 fighting men in the English armie, as it was knowne by the scouts) to defend themselues with the benefit of the place, and thereupon got the hill next vnto their campe.)

The power of the north countrie raised.

In which meane time, the earle of Surrie, lieutenant to the king of England, hauing raised all the power of the north parts of England, came with the same towards the place where he heard that king James was incamped, and approching within three miles of the Scotish campe in full sight of the Scotishmen, pitcht downe his tents, and incamped with his whole armie. Although king James had great desire to fight with his enimies thus lodged in full view of his campe; yet bicause he was incamped in a place of great aduantage, so as the enimies could not approch to fight with him, but with great losse and danger to cast themselues away, he thought good to keepe his ground, specially bicause all those of the nobilitie, who were knowne to be of experience, did not hold with their aduise that counselled him to giue battell.

The English campe in sight of the Scotish campe.

King James was minded to keepe his ground.

At what time the earle of Surrie had sent an officer at armes vnto him, requiring him to come forth of his strength vnto some indifferent ground, where he would be readie to incounter him, & namelie the earle of Huntleie, a man for his high valiancie ioined with wisedome and policie, had in most reputation of all the residue, affirmed in plaine words [besides that which Dowglasse had before said] that nothing nothing could be either more fond or foolish, than to fight at pleasure of the enimie, and to set all on a maine chance at his will and appointment, and therfore it should be good for them to remaine there in place of aduantage, and with prolonging the time to trifle with the enimie, in whose campe there was alreadie great scarsitie of vittels, neither was it possible that they should be vittelled from the inner parts of the realme, by reason of the cumbersome waies for cartage to passe now after such abundance of continuall raine as of late was fallen, and not like as yet to ceasse, so that in sitting still and attempting nothing rashlie without aduisement, the king should haue his enimies at his pleasure, as vanquished without stroke striken through disaduantage of the place, and lacke of vittels to sustaine their languishing bodies.

His persuasions.

Foule weather.

And suerlie beside the want of vittels, the foule and euill weather sore annoied both parties: for there had not beene one faire day, no scarse one houre of faire weather of all the time the Scotish armie had lien within England, but great cold, wind & raine, which had not onelie caused manie of the Scots to returne home, but also sore vered the Englishmen, as well in their iournie thitherwards, as also while they lay in campe against the Scotish armie. There was sending of messengers betwixt them to and fro, and the king had sent his quarell in writing vnto the earle of Surrie by his herald Ilaie the night before the battell, conteining as followeth.

Where it is alledged that we are come into England against our bond and promise, thereto we answer: that our brother was bound as farre to vs as we were to him, and when we sware last before his ambassadors in presence of our councell, we expressed speciallie in our oth, that we would keepe to our brother, if our brother kept to vs, and not else. We sweare that our brother brake first to vs, and of his breach we required him diuers times of amends: and latelie we warned him, as he did not vs yet we brake. And this we take for our quarell, and by Gods grace shall defend the same at your assired time, which with Gods helpe we shall abide. ¶ Thus was the king verie desirous to trie the matter by battell, although the wisest sort of his nobles wished not that he should do anie thing ouer rashlie.

There chanced also manie things taken (as yée would say) for warnings of some great mischance to follow, which though some reputed but as vaine and casuall haps; yet the impression of them bred a certeine religious feare and new terror in his heart. For as he was in councell with his lords, to vnderstand their opinions touching the order of his battels, there was an hare start amongst them, which hauing a thousand arrowes, daggers, and other kind of things bestowed at hir, with great noise and showting, yet she escaped from them all safe and without hurt. The same night also, mise had gnawne in sunder the buckle and leather of his helmet wherewith he should fasten the same to his hed. And moreouer, the cloth or veile of his inner tent (as is said) about the breake of the day, appeared as though the dewie moisture thereof had beene of a bloudie colour.

Herevpon the king keeping himselfe within his tent, the earle of Surrie constreined by necessitie to seeke all waies whereby to traine the king downe from the hill where he was lodged, remoued his campe towards the hils of Floddon, where the king of Scots laie incamped: and on the ninth day of September passed the water of Till at Twisell bridge; the rereward going ouer at Milford, putting themselues as neere as they could betwixt the Scotish campe and Scotland. King James perceiuing the Englishmen to passe the water, iudged that they had ment to win an hill that laie betwixt them and his campe, and therefore to preuent them, he caused his field to be raised, and fier to be set on the litter & cabins which they had made of boughs, and so with all speed remoued to the other hill, being gotten thither yer the English men could perceiue him to be remoued out of his former lodgings, bicause the smoke of the fiers which the Scots had made, couered all the countrie betwixt the two armies.

The Englishe campe remoued by the earle.

The Scots campe remoued also.

In the meane while were the Englishmen aduanced to the foot of Floddon hill, hauing thereby gotten double aduantage: for the Scotish ordinance could not much annoie them in marching vpwards vnder the leuill thereof, and they againe might gall the Scots in shoting off at them, as they came downewards vpon them. For king James hauing disappointed the Englishmen of the hill, thought verelie it should be an easie matter for him to ouerthrow them, which being put beside the place where they intended (as he thought) to haue camped, would neuer abide the countenance of his puissant armie, if he might atteine to ioine with them. Therefore the Scotish armie [after they had appointed the same into three wards, whereof (as saith Lesleus) the earle of Huntlete and the lord Hume led the right wing, the left had the earle of Crawford and Montrosse; and the king himselfe kept the middle ward, with the earles of Argile and Lennox] making downwards, incountered with the English host neere to the foot of the mounteine called Brankton, and first sir Edmund Haward leading one of the out wings of the English armie, hauing with him three thousand men, being fiercelie assailed by the Scots on foot, hauing speares and long weapons, and also by certeine horsemen, was in the end discomfited, and his people beaten downe and put to flight, so that being of them forsaken, he was constreined to follow. But yet he and diuerse other which escaped, ioined themselues to the next battell as well as they might. This so prosperous a beginning, who would thinke should haue turned to the losse of the Scots part, and aduancement of the English side. But so it came to passe, for king James no sooner saw that wing of the English host ouerthrowne and discomfited, but that he deemed how all the whole power of the Englishmen had beene fleeing away: and therfore alighting beside his horsse, and commanding those that were about him to follow, prepared himselfe to pursue the chase.

Aduantage getten by the ground.

King Iames his practise.

Fr. Thin.

Sir Edmund Haward was fiercelie assailed.

A good beginning had an euill ending.

King James deceiued himselfe and alighted from his horsse.

His capteins did what they could by words to remoue him from his purpose, declaring to him the dutie of a prince: which is not rashlie to enter the fight, but to prouide and see that euerie thing be done in order: and whereas comming to trie the matter by hand blowes, he can do no more than another man; yet keeping his place as apperteineth to his person, he may be worth manie thousands of other. The king nothing moued with these exhortations, breaking his arraie of battell, with a companie of noble men, rushed forward into the fore ward, where accomplishing the office of a footman, he found the Englishmen not fleeing, but manfullie standing at resistance, reſiſtance, ſo that there was a right hard incounter, and manie arrowes ſhot on euerie ſide, and great hurt done therewith.

The capteins good counsell not regarded.

The kings hardinesse marred all.

At length ſir Edward Stanlie with the reregard of the Engliſhmen came fiercelie downe from the hill of Brauerton, vpon the backe of the kings armie, wherein they fought cruellie on both parts for a long ſpace; but at length the victorie inclined to the Engliſhmen. For the king himſelfe was there beaten downe and ſlaine, with all that whole battell which firſt entered the fight. The other part of the Scotiſh hoſt, whereof Alexander Hume lord chamberlaine had the gouernance, although he ſaw where the other Scotiſhmen were in danger, and cloſed in on euerie ſide, yet would he not once remoue one fot forward out of the place (where he ſtood) to aid them. Moreouer, the lacke of diſcretion in the king, which would needs run vpon his owne death, amazed the minds of all men, and brought them into ſuch perplexitie, that they knew not what to do; but loked one vpon another without ſtirring to or fro, as thoſe that were in deſpaire now after the death of their king to recouer the victorie, which by ſo ſtrange a chance ſeemed as it were ſliped out of their hands.

Howbeit, the lord chamberlaine bare the moſt blame, for that he did not cauſe a new onſet to be giuen. But it happened well for the Engliſhmen: for if king James had ordered himſelfe wiſelie in this battell, or that after he was ſlaine, a new furie had moued the Scots to haue renewed the fight in reuenge of the kings death, as had beene expedient, the victorie vndoubtedlie had beene theirs (as was thought by men of great vnderſtanding.) Whereupon the Engliſhmen remembring how manifeſtlie Gods godneſſe appeared towards them in this battell, confeſſed themſelues long after bound to God for their ſafetie and deliuerance out of that preſent danger. The fight began about foure of the clocke in the after noone, and continued three houres, in the which fifteene thouſand men were ſlaine on both parts: and of that number a third part at the leaſt was of Engliſhmen (as was crediblie reported) but (as our Engliſh writers affirme) there died of Engliſhmen not paſt fifteene hundred.

But yet the Scotiſhmen hold, that there died more of the Engliſhmen than of their nation at this field, and that manie thought it was not the bodie of king James which the Engliſhmen found in the field, and toke it for his; but rather an other Scotiſh mans corps, called the lard of Bonehard, who was alſo ſlaine there. And it was affirmed by ſundrie, that the king was ſeene the ſame night aliue at Kelſo: and ſo it was commonlie thought that he was liuing long after, and that he paſſed the ſeas into other countries, namelie to Jeruſalem to viſit the holie ſepulchre, and ſo to driue forth the reſidue of his daies, in doing penance for his former paſſed offenſes: but he appeared not in Scotland after as king, no more than Charles duke of Burgognie did appeare in his countries after the battell of Nancie, although his people had the like vaine opinion that he eſcaped from that diſcomfiture aliue.

But now to returne to the truth of the matter where we left. In the night following after this terrible battell, the reſidue of the Scotiſh armie returned homewards the ſame way they came, waſting and ſpoiling the Engliſh borders as they paſſed. At their comming home, euerie man ſpake euill of them, for that as cowards and naughtie perſons, they neither ſought to reuenge the death of their noble king, nor yet to ſuccour their fellowes that were beaten downe and ſlaine before their faces. But namelie Alexander Hume lord chamberlaine was reproued, as cauſe of all that miſchiefe, which behaued himſelfe not as a captetne, but as a traitor or enimie to his countrie. ✻ Upon the honor of this victorie, Thomas Haward earle of Surrie (as a note of the conqueſt) gaue to his ſeruants this cogniſance (to weare on their left arme) which was a white lion (the beaſt which he before bare as the proper enſigne of that houſe) ſtanding ouer a red lion (the peculiar note of the kingdome of Scotland) and tearing the ſame red lion with his pawes.]

Thus haue you heard how through raſhneſſe and lacke of ſkilfull order, the Scotiſh armie was ouercome, and that worthie prince king James the fourth brought to his fatall end, on the ninth day of September, in the twentie and fift yeere of his reigne, and thirtie and ninth of his age, which was in the yeere from the incarnation 1513. For his politike gouernment and due adminiſtration of iuſtice, which he exerciſed during the time of his reigne, hee deſerued to be numbred amongeſt the beſt princes that euer reigned ouer the Scotiſh nation. All theft, reiffe, murther, and robberie ceaſſed in his daies, by ſuch rigorous execution of lawes penall as he cauſed to be exerciſed through all the bounds of Scotland: inſomuch that the ſauage people of the out Iles ſorted themſelues through terror and dread of due puniſhment to liue after the order of lawes and iuſtice, where otherwiſe of themſelues they are naturallie inclined to ſedition, & diſquieting of each other. To conclude, men were in great hope, that if it had pleaſed the hie determinate power of almightie God to haue lent to him longer life, he ſhould haue brought the realme of Scotland to ſuch a flouriſhing eſtate, as the like in none of his predeceſſors times was yet euer heard of.

There died with him in that infortunate battell, of noble men (beſide others of the meaner ſort) the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrewes his baſtard ſonne, the biſhop of the Iles: the abbats of Inchaffreie and Kilwennie: the earles of Montroſſe, Crawford, Argile, Lennor, Glencar, Cathnes, Caſſelles, Bothwell; Arrell high conſtable of Scotland, Addell, Atholl, and Morton: the lords Louet, Forbois, Cluetton, Rws, Inderbie, Saintcleare, Parwell, and his three brethren, Daunlie, Sempill, Borthicke, Bogonie, Arſkill, Blackater, and Cowin: knights and gentlemen of name, ſir John Dowglas, Cuthbert Hume of Faſt caſtell, ſir Alexander Seton, ſir Danie, maiſter John Grant, ſir Dunkin Cawfield, ſir Sander Lowder, ſir George Lowder, maiſter Marſhall, maiſter Key, maiſter Ellot, maiſter Cawell clerke of the chancerie, the deane of Elleſter, Macke Kene, Macke Clene, with manie others.

✻ This James the fourth was of a firme bodie, of iuſt ſtature, of moſt comelie countenance, and of ſharpe wit, but altogither vnlearned, as the fault of that age was. But he did diligentlie aplie himſelfe to an old cuſtome of the countrie, cunninglie to cure wounds, the knowledge whereof in times paſt was a thing common to all the nobilitie, being alwaies vſed to the warres. He was eaſilie to be ſpoken vnto, gentle in his anſwers, iuſt in his iudgements, and ſo moderat in puniſhments, that all men might eaſilie ſee he was vnwillinglie drawen vnto them. Againſt the detraction of the euill, and admoniſhment of the good, there was ſuch worthineſſe of mind in him (confirmed by the quiet of a good conſcience, and the hope of his innocencie) that he would not onelie not be angrie, but not ſo much as vſe a ſharpe word vnto them. Amongeſt which vertues, there were certeine vices crept in by the ouermuch deſire to pleaſe the people, for whileſt he labored to auoid the note of couetouſneſſe (obiected to his father) and ſought to win the fauour of the common ſort (with ſumptuous feaſts, gorgeous ſhewes, and large gifts) he fell into Iames the fift.

AFter the death of that worthie prince king Iames the fourth, slaine at Branrton (as before ye haue heard) his sonne James the fift succéded him: for after the returne of those that escaped from the said field, the quéene assembled the lords and estates of the realme togither at Striueling, where the 21 day of September 1513, hir sonne the foresaid James the fift, a child of one yéere, fiue moneths, & ten daies of age, by vniuersall aduise and consent was crowned king, and his mother the quéene apointed regent of the realme, vsing the counsell of the reuerend father James Beton archbishop of Glascow, the earles of Huntlete, Angus, and Arrane. ✻ This gouernement the quéene obteined by reason of hir husbands testament, who making his last will (before that he went to the warres) did appoint thereby that the whole administration of all things should remaine with hir, so long as she continued a widow: the which though it were against the custome of the countrie (being the first example of a womans gouernement amongest the Scots) yet it séemed tolerable to most men (giuen to peace) especiallie since there were not men sufficient at that time for honor and experience to take that charge in hand, by occasion of the great slaughter of the nobles at Floddon field, which gouernement she did not long inioy.]

For shortlie after they fell at variance amongest themselues, about the bestowing of those benefices which were vacant by the deaths of those persons which had béene slaine at the field; by reason whereof, some of them writ letters secretlie into France to John duke of Albanie, willing him to come into Scotland to be tutor to the king, and gouernor of the realme, as he that was nert of bloud to the king, and nærest to the crowne, in case the kings children deceassed without issue. He therefore sent monsieur de la Bastie into Scotland, who in companie of the earle of Arrane, the lord Fleming, and Lion the herald (which long had béene in France) landed on the west coast the third of November. And shortlie after, the said monsieur de la Bastie deliuered his letters to the quéene and lords, who thereupon met at saint Johns towne, and there by vniuersall consent it was accorded, that the duke of Albanie should be admitted tutor and gouernor to the king & realme, and that the same should be confirmed in parlement by the three estates which should be kept at Edenburgh, the thirtenth day of March next, for the same intent.

To rehearse the troubles and great disquietnesse that chanced, during the minoritie of this king, thorough lacke of due administration of iustice, and by discord & variance dailie rising amongest the lords & péeres of the realme, a man might haue iust cause greatlie to wonder thereat, and in weieng the same throughlie, no lesse lament the oppression done to the poore commons in that wicked and most miserable time, when iustice séemed to sléepe, and rapine with all the other sorts and rabble of iniurious violence inuaded hir emptie seat, triumphing ouer all as a conqueror. ✻ During the times of which disorder, there was (amongest those which preied and spoiled others) a great capteine of the same faction, called Macrobert Struan, who (ouerrunning Atholl and the adioining places) was accompanied for the most part with eight hundred théeues, and sometime more. Which Struan was at length (whilest he spoiled euerie man at his owne pleasure, and at that time remaining with his vncle John Creichton) taken by wait laied for him, and inforced to depart with his life.]

The quéene sent louing letters vnto the king of England, hir brother, requiring him of peace. Whereupon a truce was taken betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, for the space of one yéere and a day. In the beginning of Februarie, the king of England, hearing that a parlement should be holden in Scotland, for the bringing in of the duke of Albanie to be tutor, wrote to his sister that she should in anie wise impeach and staie his comming thither; declaring how dangerous it was, not onelie for hir, but also for hir sonne to haue him gouernor, which was to succéed, if hir son were once out of the way. But the chiefest cause that moued the king of England to labour, that the duke should haue nothing to do in Scotland, was (as manie thought) for that he knew how the duke, in fauour of the king of France, would shew himselfe an enimie against England, with all the force he might make or procure.

The king of England writeth to his sister.

Now shortlie after that the peace was concluded betwixt him and the king of France, he sent a letter also, requiring him not to suffer the duke to passe into Scotland, for the reason first alleged. But notwithstanding the labor that king Henrie made to the contrarie, it was concluded by the states in parlement assembled in Edenburgh, at the time prefixed, that sir Patrike Hamilton, and Lion king of armes should be sent into France, to procure the duke to come into Scotland, being now confirmed tutor and gouernor, according to the lawes of the realme in such cases prouided. Whereupon, in Aprill then nert following they toke the seas, and passed into France, accordinglie as by the states had béene deuised.

This yéere came a legat into Scotland from the pope, with certeine priuileges granted to the king and realme. The thirtith of Aprill was the quéene deliuered of a prince in the castell of Striueling, which was baptised by the postulat of Dunfirmling, and the archdeane of saint Andrewes, and instantlie confirmed by the bishop of Cathnesse, by the name of Alexander. During the time that the quéene lay in childbed, great discord fell out betwixt the lords of the west parts, and the other lords of the realme: but shortlie after the quéene called an assemblie at Edenburgh the twelfth of Julie, where they were all well agréed. And hérewith two of the cleargie were sent into England for peace. And the 28 of the same moneth, maister James Ogiluie abbat of Dri burgh, and sir Patrike Hamilton, and Lion the herald came forth of France with articles in writing from the king there, and the duke of Albanie; by the which the dukes comming was excused, because the king could not want him, till some end were had touching the warres betwixt him and the king of England, which was concluded in October nert insuing.

This yéere, the first of August, the quéene maried Archembald Dowglasse earle of Angus, and immediatlie after in saint Johns towne toke the great seale from the bishop of Glascow, that was chancellor of the realme. Wherupon the said bishop got him to Edenburgh, where manie lords assisted him, and kept out the quéene and hir new husband, so that they might not enter there: whereof great discord rose within the realme amongest the nobles and péeres of the same. In the peace contracted betwixt Lewes the twelfth of that name, king of France, and Henrie the eight king of England, no mention was made of the realme of Scotland: for the which the Scotishmen thought great fait in the French king, seeing that for his cause the warre had béene attempted betwixt them and England. Monſieur de la Bautie.

The 20 of November, Le ſire de la Bautie receiued the caſtell of Dunbar in the name of the duke of Albanie, at the hands of the deane of Glaſcow brother to the biſhop of Murrey, called Forman. Shortlie after, John Hepborne the prior of ſaint Andrews then elect archbiſhop of that ſée, beſieged the caſtell of ſaint Andrews, and wan it by force from the keepers of it, which were appointed to defend it in the name of Gawin Dowglaſſe, wherewith the quéene and the earle of Angus were highlie offended. The twelfth of Januarie, being a verie darke & windie 1514. night, the earle of Lennor, and the maiſter of Glencarne vndermined the nether groundſoile of the caſtell gate of Dunbreton, & entered thereby into the caſtell, & ſo toke it, putting out thereof the lord Erſkin. Shortlie after (that is to ſay) the fifteenth of that moneth, a great aſſemblie was made betwixt the earles of Angus and Arrane, the one to haue fought with the other, which was the cauſe and beginning of great trouble that inſued.

The ſame day in Edenburgh were the buls publiſhed, which Forman the biſhop of Murrey had purchaſed at Rome, for the obteining of the archbiſhoprike of ſaint Andrews, the abbaſies of Dunfirmeling, and Arbroeth, through ſupplication of the quéene and duke of Albanie. From which buls the prior of ſaint Andrews appealed, pretending title to the archbiſhops ſée by election and generall gift of the lords of the realme; and herupon got togither his friends in Edenburgh, as the maiſter of Hales and others. And on the other part, the lord chamberleine, and diuerſe of the biſhop of Murreis friends got the kings letters, by vertue whereof they proclamed the ſaid maiſter of Hales, and the prior of ſaint Andrews rebels, with all their aſſiſtants, putting them to the horne: whereupon they were conſtreined to depart out of Edenburgh. And in Maie following, the prior went vnto Rome, there to iuſtifie his appeale.

Contention about the inioieng of the ſée of ſaint Andrews.

The foure and twentith of Februarie, a parlement was aſſembled at Striueling; but becauſe the lords could not agrée amongſt themſelues, it was proroged till the comming of the duke of Albanie, which was loked for to be in Scotland, in Aprill; or at the furtheſt in Maie next inſuing, as he had ſent word by ſir John Striueling of the Keir, that was latelie come from him with letters vnto the lords and péeres of the realme. The fifteenth of Maie, truce was proclamed betwixt England and Scotland, to 1515. indure for three yeares, or three moneths (as ſaith Leſleus) but the ſame day at ſix of the clocke in the afternoone, the Engliſhmen entered the borders of Scotland vpon the water of Rule, and forraied the countrie, doing great hurt therein, notwithſtanding the truce. The ſeuentéenth day of Maie, John duke of Albanie, tutor and gouernor of Scotland, arriued at the towne of Aire, with eight ſhips well appointed, and furniſhed with men and all kind of neceſſarie proviſion for his eſtate.

Truce betwixt England and Scotland.

The duke of Albanie his arriuall in Scotland.

From thence taking the ſea againe, he ſailed alongſt the coaſt till he came to Dunbreton, and there came onland, & on the next day paſſed forth to Glaſcow, where all the weſtland lords receiued him with great ſemblance of reioiſing for his arriuall. The ſix and twentith day of Maie, he was receiued into Edenburgh, a great number of lords méeting him on the way. The quéene alſo came from hir owne lodging and met him, to do him honor. Sundrie conceipts, pageants, & plaies were ſhewed by the burgeſſes, to honor his entrie in the beſt maner they could deuiſe. Shortlie after his comming to Edenburgh, there came thither forth of all parts of the realme, the lords and barons, where they being aſſembled in councell, he toke vpon him the gouernement of the realme, which he promiſed to vſe by their aduiſe, ſo that they would aſſiſt him in ſetting forth of iuſtice and good orders, which they vndertoke to do.

The duke of Albanie receiued into Edenburgh.

Herevpon was the parlement, which had béene proroged till his comming, ſummoned to be kept at Edenburgh the twelfth of Julie, in the which diuerſe acts were concluded and made; and the lord Drummond was adiudged in the dukes mercie, for ſtriking Lion king of armes. The duke pardoned him of life and honor, but his lands and goods remained in the kings hands: notwithſtanding, he was afterwards reſtored to the ſame againe. In this parlement alſo, the duke of Albanie was confirmed by the three eſtates of the realme tutor and gouernor to the king, the ſcepter and ſword being deliuered to him: his oth alſo was taken by the lords, and theirs giuen to him, that each of them ſhould be faithfull to others, and namelie to their king and ſouereigne lord, and alſo ſhould mainteine iuſtice to the vttermoſt of their powers, for the aduancement of his honor, and ſuertie of the realme.

A parlement ſummoned.

In the meane time, whileſt this parlement was in hand, the gouernor was aduertiſed that the king ſhould haue béene conueied forth of the realme ſecretlie into England: whereupon he ſuddenlie departed in the night time from Edenburgh, with his men of warre in good order, & came to Striueling, where the king, with his brother Alexander, laie with the quéene; which caſtell, togither with the kings perſon, and the other within it, were deliuered to him the third day of Auguſt; whereupon he committed them and the caſtell to the keeping of foure lords of the realme, whereof the earles of Eglenton and Montroſſe were two. The lord Hume, becauſe he had aſſiſted the earle of Angus and the quéene againſt the gouernor, was denounced a rebell; and the earles of Lennor & Arrane, with manie others, were ſent to his houſes to ſeize the ſame into the kings hands. In the caſtell of Hume was laid gunpowder by a traine, wherby diuerſe of them that entered firſt into the caſtell were burned.

The king deliuered to the keeping of certeine lords.

The lord Hume denounced a rebell.

The lord Hume himſelfe got him into England, and ſore diſquieted the marches, ſo that no day of truce was holden, neither on the eaſt nor middle marches. The twelfth of Auguſt, the quéene, the earle of Angus, and his brother George Dowglas, went from Temptallon vnto Berwike, and from thence paſſed to the nunrie of Caudſtreame whereupon aduertiſement being giuen to the K. of England, and his pleaſure therein knowne, the ſix and twentith of that moneth ſhe was receiued by the lord Dacres, & conueied to Harbottell caſtell, where Herevpon, the gouernor causing the parlement to be holden that was summoned to begin the foure and twentith of October, the said lord Hume, maister William Hume, and Dauid Hume, were conuict of treason by all the states, to lose their liues, lands, and goods. This parlement was proroged till fiftéene daies after, within which time the earle of Arrane was appointed to make appearance, or else it was agréed that they should proceed against him in like maner. And in that meane space, the gouernor went to beseege the castell of Hamilton, where that noble aged ladie, the old countesse of Arrane, daughter to king James the second, & mother to the earle of Arrane, and aunt to the duke by his fathers side, caused not onelie the castell to be surrendered at the dukes pleasure, but procured also the earle of Arrans peace, which earle, the twelfth of Nouember nert insuing, came with the bishop of Glascow vnto Edenburgh, and there submitted himselfe to the dukes will.

About the same time, certeine lords toke part with the earle of Murreie the kings bastard brother, and the earle of Erroll, against the erle of Huntleie, and raised a commotion; so that being got into Edenburgh, there was much adoo, & the towne greatlie disquieted. The gouernor lieng in the abbeie, came into the towne, and toke the earles of Huntleie, Erroll, Murreie, and others; and committed them to ward within the castell, while he tried the cause, and finding that maister William Haie being with the earle of Murreie had raised that sturre, he sent the same Haie into France, there to remaine during his pleasure, and forthwith the said earles were set at libertie. Lion king of armes appointed to go into England with letters to king Henrie, was stopped at Caldstreame by the lord Hume, who toke his letters from him, and kept him prisoner, till Alexander Humes mother, that remained prisoner in Dunbar, was exchanged for him. The eightéenth day of December, Alexander duke of Rosseie the kings brother departed this life at Striueling.

A commotion betwixt the earles of Murreie and Huntleie.

Lion king of armes staied by the lord Humes.

The seuentéenth day of Januarie, a truce was taken betwixt Eggland and Scotland, till the feast of Pentecost nert. This truce was agréed vpon at Coldingham, by certeine commissioners, appointed on either part there, to treat for peace. For the realme of Scotland were these: Monsieur de Planes the French ambassador, archdeacon of saint Andrews, maister Gawin de Dunbar, and sir William Scot of Baluerie knights. The Englishmen comprised for their part, the earle of Angus and the lord Hume within the compasse of this truce. In the meane time, the earle of Arrane departed from the gouernor againe, and repaired to the west parts, where he confederated himselfe with certeine lords, notwithstanding that sir James Hamilton, and the lord of Cauder remained pledges for his good demeanor within the castell of Edenburgh. The earles of Lennor, Glencarne, and other caused the castell of Dunbreton and diuerse other to be furnished, and toke the castell of Glascow with the kings great artillerie that laie within it, and spoiled the same.

A truce concluded betwixt England & Scotland.

The earle of Lenox furnisheth Dunbreton.

The gouernor aduertised thereof, raised an armie & went to Glascow, where, by the labor of the bishop of that place, an appointment was taken, so that the castell was deliuered into the bishops hands. The earle of Lennor came in to the gouernor, and toke a new respit, and about the beginning of March nert following, the earle of Arrane and the lord Hume did the like. Forman the archbishop of saint Andrews, against whome the prior of saint Andrews did stand (as ye haue heard) for that same benefice, to the great disquieting of the realme, by such partakings as chanced thereabout among the lords, came now to the towne of Edenburgh, and resigned all the three benefices, whereof he had purchased buls of the pope, that is to say, the archbishoprike of saint Andrews, the abbasies of Arbroth and Dunfirmeling in the gouernors hands, to bestow the same at his pleasure: who by the counsell of certeine lords, to satisfie such as claimed interest to the same, and pacifieng of all debates, bestowed them as followeth.

The earles of Lennor and Arrane take a respit.

Forman resigneth his title to the archbishops sée.

First, the said archbishoprike he gaue to the said Forman with the abbasies of Dunfirmeling, and to maister James Hepborne he gaue the bishoprike of Murrey, and benefices worth a thousand marks by the yeare vnto the prior of saint Andrews for a recompense; the abbasie of Dryburgh he gaue vnto maister James Ogiluie, and the bishoprike of Aberden (then vacant) vnto Alexander Gurdon, and to the archbishop of Glascow called Beton he gaue the abbacie of Arbroth, assigning to the earle of Murrey a large pension out thereof. One of the Hamiltons was made abbat of Kilwinning, [and George Dundasse was made prior of the knights of the roads.] And thus he bestowed the benefices which had béene vacant euer since Floddon field, vnto diuerse lords, or to their kinsmen, that by such liberalitie vsed towards them, all debates and discords might ceasse, which had happened amongest them, specially about the bestowing of the same benefices. This was done in the moneth of Februarie.

Shortlie after, the gouernor, by counsell of the lords, to the end the realme might come to a perfect quietnesse, and the noble men vnited togither, receiued into fauor the earle of Angus, & maister Patrike Pantoun secretarie, who for his cause had béene kept as prisoner in Insche galle. He likewise receiued the lord Hume, and his brother, pardoning them all their offenses past. And in parlement holden the fift of Maie, they were restored to all their lands, heritages, fées, and honors. About that time, the lord of Strawen in Atholl committed diuerse great offenses and crimes, for the which he was taken by the earle of Atholl, and beheaded at Logtraith by the gouernors commission.

The earle of Angus and others receiued into fauor.

All this while, the parlement was not dissolued but vpon prorogation, and so the same began againe the first day of Julie, at what time the king of England, at request of his sister the quéene of Scotland, wrote letters to the lords now assembled in parlement, requesting them to expell the gouernor forth of the realme. But all the lords and states with vniuersall consent sent Albanie the herald with letters to the said king, excusing them, that they might not in anie wise satisfie his desire therein, the same being against reason and the lawes of their countrie.

remained in England amongeſt his friends. Iohn abbat of Jedworth was baniſhed beyond Taie. Dauid the yonger brother, which was prior of Coldingham two yeares after the death of his brethren, was (by Iames Hepborne, the huſband of his ſiſter) ſlaine by a traine, vnder colour of a meeting and parlée, wherevnto he was called; whome all men did pittie, becauſe he was a harmeleſſe yong gentleman, of a ſingular wit, and fowlie betraied by thoſe of whom he ought not ſo to haue bin intrapped.

The duke of Albanie viſiteth the borders.

Another parlement.

The duke of Albanie ſecond perſon of the realme.

Shortlie after, the duke rode to Jedworth with a great companie of men, & ſtaied the great robbing & reauing which had béene vſed on the borders, & left there good wardens to kéepe good rule in thoſe parts, and ſo returned to Edenburgh. The third of Nouember, another parlement was holden, in which it was decréed, that the gouernor ſhould be déemed and reputed for ſecond perſon of the realme, notwithſtanding the claime made by his elder brother Alexander Stewart, that was begotten on the daughter of the earle of Orkeneie, which was alleged to haue béene firſt maried to their father the duke of Albanie, before he was maried to the earle of Bullognes daughter, on whome he begot the gouernor. Whereupon this Alexander made proteſtation to be heire to his father; but they were afterward agréed, and Alexander renounced his title in his brothers fauor, and was made biſhop of Murreie, and abbat of Scone. At this parlement, the gouernor required licence to go into France, and to be abſent there ſix moneths: but this ſute was not granted till Aprill following.

The gouernor aſketh licence to go into France.

The earle of Lennox in ward.

At the ſame time was the earle of Lennor put in ward within the caſtell of Edenburgh, till he had cauſed the caſtell of Dunbreton to be deliuered vnto one Alane Stewart in the conſtables name, & then he was ſet at libertie. In the moneth of December, Monſieur de la Bautie was made warden of the eaſt marches in ſtead of the lord Hume, and kept daies of truce: which procured ſuch hatred, that it coſt him afterwards his life. In the moneth of Ianuarie, the gouernor went to ſaint Johns towne, and there held his ſeat of iuſtice, where the lord Fleming for the time was made great chamberlaine of Scotland, with all the fées thereof. In the yeare 1517, there came ambaſſadors from Francis the new French king, to deſire, that the ancient league might be renewed betwixt him and the king of Scotland, their realmes, dominions, and ſubiects.

Monſieur de la Bautie made warden of the marches.

Ambaſſadors from France.

For this cauſe, all the lords of the realme were aſſembled at Edenburgh, where, by them it was concluded, that the gouernor himſelfe ſhould paſſe the ſeas into France; and alſo that the biſhop of Dunkeild, the ſecretarie, and the maiſter of Glencarne as ambaſſadors ſhould go thither: the which the thirteenth of Maie, went a ſhipbord, and by the eaſt ſeas ſailed thither, and the gouernor toke ſhip at Newmarke beſide Dunbreton the ſeuenth of June, taking his courſe by the weſt ſeas, and ſo paſſed into France, where it was agréed, that he ſhould haue remained but onelie foure moneths, he hauing appointed the biſhops of ſaint Andrews and Glaſcow, the earles of Huntleie, Argile, Angus, and Arrane, to gouerne in his place, whileſt he was abſent. Alſo he ordeined Anthonie Darcie, or Monſieur de la Bautie lieutenant of the borders.

An ambaſſage into France.

The gouernor goeth into France.

He alſo had cauſed the king to be brought into Edenburgh caſtell, within the which he ſhould remaine in the kéeping of the earle Marſhall, the lords Erſkin, Borthwike, Kithuen; of the which, two at leaſt ſhould be alwaies preſent. The quéene that remained as then in England, after ſhe vnderſtood that the gouernor was departed towards France, returned to Edenburgh the ſeuenteenth of June, but ſhe was not ſuffered to ſée the king till Auguſt following: at what time, for feare of the peſtilence to be crept into the caſtell, he was remoued to Cragmiller, where the quéene oftentimes came vnto him; but at length, through ſome ſuſpicion conceiued, leaſt the quéene might conueie him away from thence into England, he was eſſoones brought vnto the caſtell of Edenburgh, in which he was kept after, according to the order taken in that behalfe.

Gouernors appointed to the kings perſon.

The king remoued.

The doubt which the Scots had in the quéene.

Much about this time in the which theſe things were done, John Gordon (the eldeſt ſonne of that Alexander earle of Huntleie, which for the praiſe of his ſingular goodneſſe obteined the ſurname of good) returning out of France (whither a little before he had ſailed with the gouernor) was ſingularlie welcomed and interteined of all men, who going vnto his owne people (in the north parts) was vrged with ſuch grieuous ſickneſſe that he died therwith, and by his father (to whom he ſhould by courſe of nature execute the ſame office) ſhortlie after buried in the abbeie of Kilroſſe, with a goodlie towne erected on him by his ſaid father. The death of which John gaue (for manie cauſes) manie griefes vnto manie perſons: but amongſt other the chiefeſt to his father, who liued not long after his ſonne. Which Alexander when he died, left the ſaid earledome to his nephue, ſonne of his ſonne John; who becauſe he was but ten yéeres old, was committed to the earle of Angus, to be inſtructed in all goodneſſe of maners anſwering to the excellencie of that wit wherewith he was indued.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 9. pag. 386.

This earle Huntleie adorned with excellent ſweetneſſe of maners and pleaſantneſſe of wit, the earle of Angus would neuer or verie hardlie ſuffer to depart out of his companie. For which cauſe when the erle of Angus, for certeine ſuſpicions of treſon was baniſhed Scotland into England, he attempted by all deuiſes and perſuaſions to intiſe the child to haue gone with him: but the yong boie could not be allured with anie flatteries or perſuaſions to ſubmit himſelfe to the leaſt note of reproch, in forſaking his king and countrie. Wherefore when the earle of Angus was departed into England, the child lifting vp his craning hands to the king, did grant himſelfe and all he had to the king and his countrie, whome the king receiued with all kind of humanitie; and prouided that he ſhould be inſtructed in euerie ſort of vertue and learning, that was to be deſired in ſuch a prince; becauſe the ſaid child was borne of his ſiſters mariage.

The lords and other nobles highlie offended (as well for the death of the lord Hume, as for that they ſaw Anthonie Darcie lord Bautie the French aduanced to greater credit than themſelues, and not onelie to be made warden of the marches, but alſo capteine of Dunbreton, the ſtrongeſt fort of Scotland) began to raiſe tumults in the land. For William Cockborne (vncle of Comarch Lancton) who (expelling the gardians of the pupill) did kéepe the caſtell of Lancton, aſſiſted with the helpe of Dauid Hume lord of Wodburne (whoſe ſiſter the ſaid Cokborne had maried) firſt began a commotion in thoſe parts. For when they ſaw that all means were taken from them openlie to reuenge the ſame, and to ſet vpon Bautie, they determined to performe the ſame (with ſome ſecret deuiſe) by lieng in wait for him.

For the caſtell of Langton or Lancton, being kept in the poſſeſſion of Wodburne (and ſuch as toke his part againſt the king) he the ſaid Wodburne appointed ſubtill fellows ſecretlie to enter the caſtell, and to reteine it in the kings name. After which, this Wodburne feining a counterfeit anger (for he was a man full of all ſubtiltie) that this caſtell was ſo iniurioſlie taken from him, and kept to the kings behoofe, he laid siege to the castell (as though he went about to recouer the same with all the power he could) to the intent that Bautie might be intised to come thither to raise the siege. For which cause Bautie (supposing in truth that the castell had bene kept to the vse of the king) hastening the rescue thereof, came forth of the castell of Dunbar to assemble the men of the countrie to raise the siege, as lieutenant of the borders, he was chased by the said lord of Woodburne and other so fiercelie, that in the end he was slaine, and foure Frenchmen with him: his head was cut from the shoulders, and set vp in the towne of Duns [vpon the castell of Hume] the nintéenth of Januarie.

The lords regents were herewith meruellouslie offended, & chose the earle of Arrane to be warden of the borders in de la Bauties place, who was also chosen to be prouost of Edenburgh: therewith the earle of Angus was highlie displeased. But the erle of Arrane, not séeming to passe much thereof, tooke George Dowglas the said earle of Angus his brother, and Marke Kar, committing them to ward within the castell of Edenburgh, because of the fauor he bare vnto the said lord of Woodburne & his complices. Moreouer, for due punishment of the murther of the foresaid de la Bautie, there was a parlement called the nintéenth of Februarie next, in the which, Dauid Hume lord of Woodburne, and his thrée brethren, William Cockborne & John Hume, with diuerse other their partakers, were indicted for the besieging of the castell of Langton, the slaughter of monsieur de la Bautie, and for the setting vp of his head, intercommuning with the Englishmen, and diuers other misdoings.

Immediatlie after the end of this parlement, the earle of Arrane came into the Mers, with a great armie, and hauing with him the kings great artillerie, ment to haue besieged such places as would haue resisted him. But at his being in Lowder, the keies of the castell of Hume were brought vnto him, which on the next morrow he receiued, and put men within it to keepe it, as he did in Langton and Woodburne, which he receiued at the same time. The maister of Hales was also sought for at that time, that hée might haue bene apprehended to answer the slaughter of Dauid Hume, prior of Coldingham, whom he had slaine traitorouslie. A litle before this parlement, the bishop of Dunkeld was returned from the French king with a bond of the league renewed betwixt Scotland and France. And at that same time was one capteine Mores a Frenchman sent forth of France, with a certeine number of men, to receiue the castell of Dunbar into his kéeping, which accordinglie he did, the same béeing deliuered vnto him.

The earle of Lennor, who had béene with the gouernor in France, returned home into Scotland, & with him came a French herald from the king with letters, and maister Walter Steward abbat of Glenluce came likewise from the gouernor. And about that time, because the quéene and lords were aduertised that the French king had contracted new bonds of peace and amitie with the king of England, without making mention of Scotland, they thought themselues euill vsed, being his confederat friends, and therevpon sent sharpe letters to the king of France, and to the gouernor, by Albanie the herald. In the moneth of June, maister Gawen Dunbar, archdeane of saint Andrews, and clearke of the register, was preferred to the bishops sée of Abberden that was vacant by the death of Alexander Gourdon.

This Gawen founded an hospitall in Abberden, and indowed the same with lands for sustenance of twelue poore men, with a prouost to haue care ouer them. He also builded a faire bridge, with seuen arches ouer the water of Dée beside Abberden, and purchased lands for the perpetuall vpholding thereof. He also builded two steeples in the cathedrall church, with halfe of the crosse church, and a faire palace for the small prebendaries, called the chapleins. Moreouer, he bestowed manie rich & pretious ornaments vpon the same church of Abberden, as copes, chalices, and other such like things, which remained there long after. Manie right commendable works were accomplished by this diligent prelat, greatlie to his praise and high renowme; for he spent not the fruits of his benefice in vaine, but on such maner of buildings.

The seuentéenth of June, there rose great stur in Edenburgh, by the falling out of the earle of Rothes, and the lord Lindsey, about the inioieng of the chirkewike of Fife, by reason whereof, they were put in ward, the one in Dunbar, and the other in Dunbreton. About the beginning of August, the quéene remaining in Edenburgh, vnderstood that the earle of Angus hir husband, as then sojourning in Dowglas dale, had taken a faire gentlewoman in those parts, and kept hir as his concubine; for the which act she conceiued such hatred against him, that there was neuer no perfect loue betwixt them afterwards. In the beginning of Februarie, there came a clearke as ambassador from the French king with letters, concerning the concluding of the truce betwixt Scotland and England, which message the lords made small account of, because the king had omitted to comprehend Scotland in the league which he lastlie made with England. The seuenth of June, a mad man in Dundee slue in his mad fit a ladie of inheritance, a nun, with two other women, the one of them being great with child, and also two men.

The king of England wrote letters vnto the French king, desiring him to staie the duke of Albanie, that he might not come into Scotland; and furthermore, he laid ships of warre in the pase vpon the seas to watch for his comming, and to take him by the waie as he should passe. In September the king was remoued forth of the castell of Edenburgh vnto Dalkith, for doubt of the pestilence, which was suspected to be in the castell of Edenburgh. And from Dalkith the erle of Arrane rode to Edenburgh to haue bin effsones elected regent & prouost of that towne: but he missed his purpose, for the townesmen would not suffer him to enter, but repelled him backe, so that diuerse were hurt on both sides.

Herevpon, great dissention rose betwixt the said earle of Arrane, and the earle of Angus, because of his repulse in that sute: whereby the whole realme was diuided into partakings, so that sundrie slaughters thereof insued, as of the prior of Coldingham, and six of his men murthered, by the lord of Woodburne at Lamerton, the first of October. About the same time, the king returned to the castell of Edenburgh, and in the towne there were remaining at the same time the earles of Angus, Erroll, and Crawford; the lord Glames, and other; the bishops of saint Andrews, Abberden, Dikenele, and Dublane, with diuerse abbats and other prelats. And in the towne of Glascow was the bishop of Glascows chancellor, with the earles of Arrane, Lennor, Eglenton, and Cassels; the lords Rosse, Sempill, the abbat of Paisley, the bishop of Galloway, and other noble men of the west. Thus the lords were diuided, and would not take anie order for the good gouernment of the common-wealth.

and England, with an ambaſſador alſo from the gouernor, with a concluſion of peace taken for one yeere, betwixt Scotland and England: who comming to Edenburgh, were receiued by the earle of Angus, and the other lords there with him, the which ſent for the chancellor & the earle of Arrane to come thither; but they would not come anie néerer than to Linlithgo. The ambaſſador therefore toke in hand to perſuade, that an aſſemblie might be had in Striueling: but the earle of Angus would not come there. Neuertheleſſe, the ſaid ambaſſadors went thither, where the earle of Arrane and his partakers, as the chancellor and others, receiued them thankfullie, and proclamed the peace, according to the treatie which they had brought, and ſo with courteous anſwer and great rewards licenced them to depart. But in their returne toward England, the earle of Angus with a great number of men met them at Carlauerok, reprouing them sharpelie for their demeanor, and for taking their anſwer of the chancellor, ſo that they were not a litle afraid, leaſt the earle in his diſpleaſure would haue vſed ſome outrage towards them, which otherwiſe than in words it ſhould appéere he did not.

The peace proclamed.

1520. In Januarie, about the keeping of a court at Jedworth, there was raiſing of people betwixt the earle of Angus on the one part, and Andrew Kar the lord of Fernihurſt; in whoſe aid, James Hamilton came with foure hundred Pers men: but the lord of Seſſeford then warden, aſſiſting the earle of Angus his part, met Hamilton at Kelſo with a great companie, and when they were lighted on foot, and ſhould haue foughten, the Pers men left ſir James Hamilton, the baſtard of the earle of Arrane, in all the danger, with a few of his owne men about him, ſo that with much paine he was horſſed, and eſcaped in great danger vnto Hume, with loſſe of foure of his ſeruants which were ſlaine: and on the other part, there was an Engliſhman ſlaine called Kaſe Kar, that came in aid of the warden. On the morrow after, the lord of Fernihurſt, as baliffe to the earle of Arrane, of that regalitie, held his court at the principall place of the forreſt of Jedburgh, and the earle himſelfe held his court likewiſe in an other part of the ſame land, three miles diſtant from the other.

1520. Variance betwixt the earle of Angus and the lord of Fernihurſt.

The thirtieth day of Aprill, the lord of Woodburne, and maiſter William Dowglaſſe, newlie made prior of Coldingham, with their partakers in great numbers, came to Edenburgh to aid the earle of Angus, who was within the towne, againſt the earle of Arrane, and James Beton the chancellor, who were alſo there. But now by the comming of theſe ſuccors, which entered by force at the neather bowe, and ſlue the maiſter of Mountgomerie, ſonne of the earle Eglenton, and ſir Patrike Hamilton knight; the earle of Arrane, and the chancellor, were conſtreined to forſake the towne, & to paſſe through the north loch. [To reuenge this contumelie, the Hamiltons beſieged the cell of Parnocke (which is the caſtell of Cuningham) but they ſhortlie returned backe without doing anie thing againſt them.]

Fr. Thin. Buchan. li. 14.

The one and twentith of Julie, the earle of Angus being in the towne of Edenburgh, George Hume, brother to the late lord Hume beheaded, came thither with the abbat of Coldingham, brother to the earle of Angus, and Dauid Hume of Woodburne, and a great companie of gentlemen, and others, and paſſed to the Tolbuith, where they remained, till the heads of the lord Hume, and of his brother William were taken downe beſide the place where they were faſtened on a tauill, and this was done in preſence of the prouoſt for the time being. The nert day they went to Linlithgo, and from thence to Striueling, in hope to haue found the chancellor, and ſome other of that faction there. But miſſing of their purpoſe, they returned to Edenburgh againe, and cauſing ſolemne funerall obſequies to be kept in the blacke friers, for them that ought thoſe heads, with offerings and bankets, they afterwards returned home to their owne dwellings, without attempting anie other thing for that preſent.

In November, the duke of Albanie arriued in Scotland on the weſt parts, at an hauen called Crawach, the nineteenth of the ſame moneth; and on the three and twentith he came to Edenburgh, accompanied with the queene, the archbiſhop of Glaſcows chancellor, the earle of Huntleie, and manie other lords, knights, barons, and gentlemen; and within ſir daies after their comming thither, the prouoſt and baliffes were depoſed, becauſe they had béene choſen in fauour of the earle of Angus, and other appointed in their romes. Then was there a parlement ſummoned to be kept at Edenburgh, the ſix and twentith of Januarie nert following; and on the ninth of Januarie, a generall ſummons of forfalture was proclamed at the market croſſe in Edenburgh, wherein were ſummoned the earle of Angus and his brother, the prior of Coldingham, the lord of Woodburne, the lord of Dalehouſie, John Summerwell of Cawdſtreme, and William Cockborne of Langton, with their complices, to make their appéerance in the ſaid parlement, to be tried for ſundrie great offenſes by them committed.

Maiſter Gawin Dowglaſſe biſhop of Dunkeld, hearing of this proclamation, fled into England, and remained in London at the Sauoie, where he departed this life, and is buried in the church there. He was a cunning clearke, and a verie good poet: he tranſlated the twelue bookes of the Aeneidos of Virgill in Scotiſh méeter, and compiled alſo The palace of honor, with diuerſe other treatiſes in the Scotiſh language, which are yet extant. The earle of Angus fearing the ſentence of forfalture to be laied againſt him at the parlement, procured his wife (although there was ſmall liking betwixt them) to labor for his pardon to the gouernor. Whereupon it was agreed, that the earle, and his brother George Dowglaſſe ſhould paſſe out of the realme into France, and there to remaine during the gouernors pleaſure: and ſo they departed into France, and remained there all the nert yéere following.

The king of England, hearing that the duke of Albanie was arriued in Scotland, and had taken the rule vpon him, doubting leaſt he ſhould perſuade the Scotiſhmen to aſſiſt the French king, againſt whome, by perſuaſion of the emperor he ment ſhortlie to make warre, ſent his herald Clarencieux into Scotland, to require the duke to depart from thence, alledging, that it was promiſed by the king of France at the laſt enterueiw betwixt them, which chanced the ſummer before, that he ſhould not come into Scotland. And moreouer, whereas the king of England was vncle vnto the king of Scots, he conſidered with himſelfe that by nature he was bound to defend his nephue, as he ment to do; and therefore he thought it not reaſon, that the duke being nert to the crowne to ſucceed, if ought came to the yong king, ſhould haue the gouernement of him, leaſt he might be made awaie, as other yong kings had béene. He further complained, that the earle of Angus ſhould be ſent out of the realme, ſo that he could not inioy the companie of his wife, ſiſter vnto the ſame king of England.

point at Holie rod house, as he had in commandement. To whome the duke answered, that neither the king of France, nor the king of England should staie him from comming into his countrie. And as touching the king, who was as yet yong in yeres, he loued him as his souereigne lord, and would keepe him, and defend both him and his realme against all other that would attempt to inuade the same, according to his conscience, honor, and dutie. And as touching the earle of Angus, he had vsed towards him all clemencie and mercie, notwithstanding his euill demerits, and that principallie for the quenes cause, whome he would honor as mother to his souereigne lord. This answer being reported vnto the king of England, contented him nothing at all, and therefore prepared to make warre.

The tenth of Aprill, there came seuen great ships into the Forth, vnto Inchkeith, to haue spoiled the ships, and inuade the coast there: but they were so stoutlie resisted and kept off, that they were not suffered to do anie great exploit, and so they returned without preie or prise. In this season, Andrew Forman bishop of saint Andrewes deceassed, and bishop James Beton archbishop of Glascow, chancellor of Scotland, was remoued to saint Andrewes, & made abbat also of Dunfirmling, and the archbishoprike of Glascow was giuen a yong man one Gawin Dunbar, that was the kings schoolemaister. In the moneth of Maie, there was great adoo in Edenburgh, by the falling out of the seruants of the earles of Murrey and Erroll, with the seruants of the earle of Huntleie, by reason whereof, the whole towne fell to partakings; but the duke comming suddenlie from the abbeie of Holie rod house, staied the matter, and committed the said earles vnto ward within the castell.

The emperor commeth into England. Scots and Frenchmen banished forth of England.

The emperor came into England, and persuaded the king there to moue warres against the French king, and so not onelie the Frenchmen but also the Scots were commanded to auoid out of England, their goods confiscated, and they conueied forth of the land, with a white crosse sowed vpon their vppermost garment. In Julie, the earle of Shrewesburie was sent by the king of England vnto the borders, with commission, to raise the power of the north parts to inuade Scotland, who vpon the sudden entered and came to Kelso, where he burnt one part of the towne; but the borderers of the Mers and Teuidale, not being halfe so manie in number as the other, set vpon them, slue, and tooke manie prisoners, and so constreined them to returne into England with small honor.

The earle of Shrewesburie inuadeth Scotland.

Fr. Thin. Lesleus lib. 9. pag. 400.

* The gouernor after this (when he saw the English ouerrun all the borders of Scotland) called a parlement at Edenburgh, the 9 kalends of August, to cure the same wound. Beside this, the French fearing them selues (because of a prepared and well furnished nauie of the English which did euerie waie couer and keepe the sea) sent manie (and those wise and of excellent knowledge) vnto the gouernor, to request him that he would either by counsell persuade, or by authoritie inforce his Scots to take armor against the English. After which (the matter being with great consultation and manie reasons tossed in argument to and fro) it was decreed by common consent of the parlement, that a chosen number of souldiers should be prepared, to defend the borders from the inuasion of the enimie, & (the more stronglie to repell the English force) it was concluded, that the children of such as were slaine in that expedition, should be freed from all charges or troubles that might light on them during their minoritie: and further, that the wiues of all such which had anie lands (during their liues & fell in that conflict) should after the death of their husbands keepe the same for the terme of fiue yeeres.)

The duke of Albanie, hearing of the great preparation that the earle of Shrewesburie made, to raise an armie of foure score thousand men to inuade Scotland, he likewise (as it was before decreed) sent vnto all the earles, lords, and nobles of the realme, willing them to raise all such power as they could make in defense of their countrie; which they did. And so being assembled, the duke with a mightie armie of Scotishmen and certeine Frenchmen, with great artillerie, marched forward, till he came to the water of Eske ouer against Carleill: and perceiuing that the English armie came not then forward, he did what he could to persuade the noble men to enter into England: but as they were in councell togither about that earnest motion made to them by the duke, a certeine graue personage said to them in this maner.

The duke of Albanie raiseth an armie to inuade England.

The words of a councellor.

My lards, hither we be come by the commaundement of my lard gouernor duke of Albanie, and albeit we be readie to defend our awne natiue realme, contrarie the inuasioun of our auld enimies of Englaund, yet neuertheless it semeth not guid, nor for the weele of our realme of Scotlaund, to passe within Englaund with our armie to inuade the same at this time. And the earnest persuasiouns quhilk the gouernor makes to vs to do the same, procedes alanerlie for the pleasure of France. It appeareth to be sufficient inough for vs so lang as the king our souereigne lard is within age to defend our awn realme, and not to inuade: otherwise, we may put the haile countrie and nobilitie thereof in hazard of tintsall: for king James the fourth brought the realme of Scotlaund to the best that it euer was, and by the war it was brought to the worst almost that might be: for by that warre, was he and his nobilitie tinte, quhilk Scotlaund sare laments. Wherefore by mine aduise, let vs go to the gouernor, and know of him the cause why he wauld persuade vs to inuade Englaund.

Then they all came to the gouernors tent, and the earle of Arrane, an auncient wise man spake for them all, and said: My lard gouernor, by your will and commaundement, heere is assembled the maist of the nobilitie of Scotlaund with their power, vpon a pretense to enter within Englaund. My lards heere wauld know the cause and quarrell why this warre is begun, gif it might please your godnesse, it should well satisfie their minds. The duke studied a little space, and said: This questioun wauld haif bin demaunded per now; for well you know, that I for verie luse I beare to the realme of Scotlaund (of the quhilk I haue my name, honor, and lignage) haike passed the seas from the noble realme of France, into this realme of Scotlaund. And great cause there was for me so to do, to bring you to a vnitie, when ye ware in diuisioun, by reasoun whereof, your realme was like to haue bin conquered and destroied. And also the king of Fraunce, by my suites and intercessioun, will ioine with you in aid against the English natioun: and when this warre was determinate in the parlement, you made me capteine, authorizing me to inuade Englaund with banner displaied. Then was no demaund made of the cause or quarrell, and that I haif done, is by your assent and agreement, and that I will iustifie. But to answer your demaund, me thinke you haif iust cause to inuade Englaund with fire, sword, and blond, gif ye be not forgetfull, and without you will beare dishonor and reproch for euer. For ye know that this realme of Scotlaund is our inheritaunce, as a portioun of the world allotted to our natioun and aunceslors whome we succeed. Then where may there be better warre, than cc than to mainteine this our naturall inheritance? Is it not dailie ſéene, the great inuaſiouns that the cc Engliſhmen on vs make, the great manſlaughters and murders, with theſts and ſpoiles that they do cc dailie? Is not this one cauſe of warre? To defend the countrie is the office of a king, the honor of noble men, and the verie ſeruice of chiualrie, and the dutie cc naturall of the communaltie: for I thinke it a iuſt quarrell, gif we might conquer the realme of Eng- cc laund, and anner it to our owne realme, for the great iniuries and wrongs done by that nation vn to vs and cc our predeceſſors. For ſéene the begining of our habi- tatioun in this Ile of Britaine, the Engliſhmen and we haue euer bin enimies, and vs haik they euer ha- cc ted, and yet haue we euer withſtand them. Suppoſe, we at the laſt battell of Floddoun field by chaunce cc loſt our ſouereigne lard, & diuerſe noble men, quhilk was rather by treaſoun of the lard chamberlaine, cc than otherwiſe, who would not relieue the kings ar- mie when he might. And yet I thinke we wan the cc field, quhilk murder all we noble men ought to re- cc uenge. Therefore I wauld that you ſuld couragi- ouſlie aduance your ſelues in this quarrell to get ho- cc nor, and to be reuenged.

The earle of Arrane declareth to the gouernor the mind of the lords.

The dukes answer to the earle of Arrane.

1522. The repite of wiſe counſellor.

Then one wiſe man that was preſident of the councell, anſwered the gouernor, ſaieng: My lard, fortune of weir is led by him that all leides, and he ſtrikis the ſtrake, we can warke na meracles, & heare are the lards of Englaund readie to incounter vs. cc And gif we inuade their realme, ſuerlie they will cc fight, for their power ſall increaſe dailie, and ours cc will diminiſh. And gif God graunt vs the victorie (as I truſt he ſall) yet haue we not won the field, cc for readie comming is the earle of Shrewesburie ſa mikell dread in Fraunce (as ye knaw well) with an cc great puiſſant armie, and there is na doubt, but the king of Englaund will ſend or bring another armie cc gif we ſuld chance to get the firſt battell. And gif we get the ſecound field, that will not be without cc great loſſe of manie nobles, by reaſoun whereof, the cc realme ſhall be weaker. And gif we be ouercommen how manie ſuld be ſlaine, God knawes. They that cc flée are worthie to be reputed as traitors to the king, and ſo by wilfulneſſe and fule hardineſſe, the realme cc may be in ieopardie to be vndone. I ſay, while the king is within age, we aught to moue na weir, leaſt by weir we may bring him to deſtructioun.

The gouernors words & the preſidents replie.

Then ſaid the valiant gouernor: Yére is an puiſſaunt armie of Scotlaund, gif we returne, we ſall incourage our enimies. Therefore ſéene you thinke cc it not gude to inuade, my councell is that we campe cc ſtill on the bordures, while we ſée what the Engliſh- men pretends to do againſt our relme. To the which the nobles conſented, and laie ſtill there in campe certeine daies after. After this conference had be- twixt the nobles and the gouernor, the quéene as then being not with them, but aduertiſed of all the procée- dings and determinations, ſent word to the gouer- nor, and deſired him that there might be a treatie of peace had, and ſhe promiſed to get the warden of the Engliſh marches to come to the gouernors campe, vpon pledges, whervnto the gouernor condeſcended.

Meanes made for peace.

The lord Dacres.

Yérevpon, the lord Dacres, warden of the weſt marches of England [with Thomas Mulgraue] came vnto the gouernors campe, and thither alſo at that time was the quéene hir ſelfe come, and ſo vp- on the eleuenth of September, an abſtinence of war was taken and couenanted, that in the meane time the duke and quéene ſhould ſend ambaſſadors into England, to treat and conclude a reſolute peace.

In the moneth of October nert inſuing, there were thrée ambaſſadors ſent into England, accor- ding to the agreement in the laſt treatie, but there were ſo hard and extreame conditions propoued on the king of Englands behalfe, that the ſame could not be accepted, as being contrarie to the honor and weale of the realme of Scotland, as the Scotiſhmen toke the matter. And ſo thoſe ambaſſadors returned without agrément or concluſion of peace: wherevp- on followed great trouble betwixt them of the bor- ders of both realmes. The earle of Northumberland was made warden of the whole marches, but ſhortlie after, he began to make ſute to be diſcharged of that office, & ceaſſed not till he obteined it: and then was the earle of Surreie made generall warden, and the lord marqueſſe Dorſet, warden of the eaſt & middle marches; the lord Dacres continuing ſtill in his of- fice of wardenſhip ouer the weſt marches.

The earle of Northumber- land made lord warden.

The earle of Surreie.

The lord marques Dorſet.

The lord Da- cres.

About the firſt day of March, the ſaid lords came to the borders, about which time, the duke of Albanie conſidering that the warres betwixt Scotland and England were irkſome to the nobles of the realme, becauſe the ſame wars were taken in hand chieflie to ſerue the French kings turne, therefore he paſſed by the weſt ſeas into France. And in the beginning of March, where he was verie hartilie and gladlie re- ceiued of the king, his requeſt was onelie to haue fiue thouſand horſſemen, and ten thouſand footmen of Almains, to be tranſported into Scotland: and doubted not, if he might haue this granted, but that with that power, and the aſſiſtance of the Scots, he ſhould be able to ouerthrow the king of England in battell, or elſe to driue him out of his realme. But the French king neither beléeued this vaine brag, nor yet might ſpare anie ſuch power, hauing warre at that time both againſt England, and the emperor: neuertheleſſe, he promiſed him ſome aid, wherevpon the duke abode and waited for the ſame a long ſea- ſon. In the meane while, the lords of Scotland cau- ſed certeine noble men to lie vpon the borders mo- nethlie, in defenſe of the ſame againſt the Engliſh- men, dailie looking for ſupport from France. Euerie companie remained their moneths, and then depar- ted home as the cuſtome is, and thus they continued ſtill till September following. Much hurt was done on either part, and diuerſe houſes were ouerthrowne and deſtroied both in England and Scotland.

The borders watched.

During which time, the king of France prepared certeine ſhips, with men, and munition, to paſſe with the duke of Albanie into Scotland. But the king of England, to catch him by the way, had laid a great nauie of ſhips in the paſe on the ſeas, as he ſhould make his courſe. But the duke embarquing himſelfe with his people at Breſt in Britaine, ſai- led by the weſt parts of Scotland: and the one and twentith day of September landed at Kirkowbre in the weſt part of Scotland; he brought with him (beſide a good number of Frenchmen) Richard de la Pole, a man of great parentage, borne in Eng- land, and baniſhed his countrie. Whileſt the duke was on the ſea making ſaile toward Scotland, the earle of Surreie, with an armie of twentie thou- ſand men, entered into Scotland, and comming to Edenburgh, burned the towne and the abbeie. [But Leſleus, lib. 9. pag. 407. ſaith it was Jedworth which the earle burnt.] It was thought they ment to haue paſſed further, but the Scotiſhmen aſſembling themſelues againſt their inuaſions, they were con- ſtreined to returne with loſſe (as ſome Scotiſhmen haue written.)

✲In this place, Buchanan (before he commeth to the parlement aſſembled by the duke of Albanie af- ter his returne out of France) writeth in this ſort. We haue ſhewed (ſaieth he) how miſerable the ſtate of Scotland was the laſt ſummer (through the diſ- ſention which was amongeſt the nobilitie) by the Engliſh (with all kind of ſlaughter) ſpoiling the places bordering nére vnto them, and beſetting the

the ſea on euerie ſide, whereby we might be out of hope of all forren aid. For the deuiſe of the enimie tended to compell the fierce minds of the Scots (abated with ſuch euils) to conclude a league with him; wherewith the Scots were not behind (by reaſon of the French faction) that by the means of the quéene there might be a perpetuall truce taken betwéene them. For when the lord Hume was (by death) taken away, the Dowglaſſe baniſhed, and all the reſt of the nobilitie rather mét for companions than leaders in battels; ſuch as had withdrawen their mind from the French, aplied themſelues to the quénes faction.

Wherevpon ſhe (to gratifie hir brother, and to wreſt all the gouernement into hir owne hands) did (diſſembling hir grædie deſire to rule) perſuade them, to deliuer their ſonne (almoſt now paſt childiſh yeares) out of the hands of ſtrangers, and themſelues from the yoke of other mens bondage. For the quæne did well foreſée, that preparation and ſuccor was made, and did come againſt hir huſband, whome before ſhe had begun to hate extreamelie. The king of England alſo did commend and prefer to the Scots the counſell of his ſiſter, by manie letters ſent, and with faire promiſes offered; becauſe he had none other mind, but that a perpetuall friendſhip might alwaies remaine betwéene the adioined kingdoms; the which, as he had at other times deſired; ſo now he moſtlie wiſhed it, not for anie commoditie to himſelfe, but to the end that all men might well perceiue that he would imbrace, defend, and almuch as reſted within his abilitie, ſéeke the commoditie of his ſiſters ſonne by all the means he might. And if the Scots would perſuade themſelues to breake the league with the French, and ioine in amitie with the Engliſh; they ſhould ſhortlie well vnderſtand, that the king of England did not ſéeke after ſouereingtie, glorie, power, or honor; but onelie ſtudied for a concord amongſt themſelues, & a league betwéene their nations. For which cauſe, he would beſtow his onelie daughter Marie vpon James the king of Scotland; by which mariage, the Scots ſhould not be ſubiect to the gouernement of England; but contrarie, the Engliſh vnder the rule of the Scots. For by that means, beſides the quenching of great hatred betwéene the nations (and intercourſe of merchandize, exchange of mutuall curteſies and ioinings in affinitie) there ſhould be an indiſſoluble knot made for the honor of the whole Iland.

And with this, they (for England) remembred the profit and diſaduantage that might riſe to the one from other, by the friendſhip or hatred of either kingdome, and the benefit that they might looke for, from their Engliſh neighbours, more than by anie poſſibilitie they might obteine from their French confederats. For on the one ſide, the Engliſh and they were borne in one continent, brought vp vnder the ſame influence of the heauen, and ſo like in all things, in tong, in maners, in lawes, in decrées, in countenance, in color, and in lineaments of bodie, as that they rather ſéeme one than two nations. On the other ſide, the French are not onelie different from them, by naturall ſoile and clemencie of the heauens; but more ſeuered from them in order and forme of liuing, being further ſuch a people, as if they were enimies vnto them, they could not greatlie hurt them; and if they be their friends they can not greatlie helpe them. But the Engliſh are at hand with men, munition, and monie; when the French, being ſo far off, are onelie with allurements, inforcements, and for their owne commoditie drawen to take their part. Beſides which, there can be no ſuccor from France but by ſea, which the enimie may eaſilie ſtop; and ſo the Scots not able to be ſuccored by them. But from the Engliſh they may haue aid by land with ſpéed, and no man can hinder them thereof. Wherefore they ſhould conſider how diſcommodious (for the diſpatch of their affairs) and how vnapt (for the defenſe of themſelues) it ſhould be, to hang all the hope of their succor vpon the fauor of the wind, and to place the moſt ſuertie of their eſtate in the vnconſtant friendſhip of the vncerteine elements. For (if neuer before) yet at this time the Scots might not onlie perceiue in thought but féele in déed what helpe is to be hoped (in preſent dangers) from abſent friends, when that the Engliſh can not onelie helpe you now, but at this inſtant do alſo kéepe away your promiſed and long expected aid, which they haue ſo beſieged vpon the ſea, that you can receiue no benefit or helpe from them.

After that theſe things were thus laid abroad for the knitting of the Engliſh league, as there were not a few which gaue conſent to that motion, ſo were there manie that ſtiflie argued to the contrarie. For in that aſſemblie, there were manie penſioners of the French faction, who (increaſing their priuat commoditie by the publike detriment) did vtterlie abhor from all peace; beſides whome, there were alſo ſome, which ſuſpected the facilitie of promiſe in the Engliſh: eſpeciallie, ſince the whole eſtate of England did then chiefelie hang vpon the backe of Thomas Wolſeie the cardinall, an euill and ambitious perſon, and who referred all counſels and conſultations to the amplifieng of his owne priuat authoritie and dignitie; and for that cauſe, aplied that and all other things to euerie blaſt of fortune. All our men although they were moued by diuerſe reaſons (as the varietie of diuerſe wits bred diuerſe minds) did yet with like endeuor tend vnto one end, which was alwaies to defend the French league; for they denied, that the ſame ſudden liberalitie of the enimie, could anie way ſort to their benefit; ſince this was not the firſt time that the Engliſh had vſed that policie to intrap vnwarie men: as did Edward the firſt, who (ſwearing and binding himſelfe with all bonds of law, when he was choſen an arbitrator to ceaſe the ſtrife of the kingdome of Scotland) did with great iniurie make a king of Scots at his pleaſure: and of late alſo, Edward the fourth king of England (when he had promiſed his daughter Cecilie to the ſonne of James the third) did (the maid being readie for the mariage) diſſolue the ſame, by taking occaſion of warre through our ciuill diſſentions. According to which, the Engliſh do now alſo ſéeke none other matter, than (caſting a vaine hope before vs to gouerne them, to bring vs into right ſeruitude; and (when we are deſtitute of all forren helpe) to oppreſſe vs with all the power of their kingdome.

Neither is that true alſo (wherein the chiefeſt ſtrength of their ſpéech conſiſteth) that the aid of our neighbors nére at hand, is better or ſurer to vs than further friendſhip. For how may we looke for anie good from thoſe our neighbors, ſince commonlie amongeſt neighbors there neuer want occaſions of diſſention; which oftentimes chance bringeth forth, and the ſtronger (hauing ſmall or no occaſion) will manie times ſéeke to offer: at what time, he which is greateſt in armes, muſt & will appoint lawes of agréement as ſéemes beſt to his liking. Beſide, there was neuer yet ſo ſacred or firme a bond of amitie betwéene adioining kingdoms, which was not oftentimes broken, either by offered or ſought occaſions of diſpleaſure & breach: neither is it to be hoped, that the Engliſh will abſteine from offering violence vnto vs; that haue not ſpared the bloud of ſo manie of their owne kings. For the ſanctitie of leagues, & the religion of an oth, and the faith of compacts and

and couenants, are in truth firme bonds of amitie amongeſt the good: but amongeſt the wicked, they are nets to intrap others, if occaſion of commoditie be offered for breach of them. All which benefits and iniuries, do dwell in people, whome nærenesse of bounds, conuerſation of language, and not vnlike maner of life hath ioined togither.

And if all theſe things ſhould be far otherwiſe, yet there be two things which we ought ſpeciallie to foreſée and prouide for; whereof, the one is, that we ſpend not our time in vaine by chiding and diſagréement, as perſons drawen into diuerſe factions; the other, that we reiect not our old friends (for this new alliance) before we haue heard what they can ſay; eſpeciallie in ſuch a cauſe (as this) which may not be determined, but by the conſent of the parlement. Vpon which, the French followers did earneſtlie ſtand, that there ſhould not anie thing be done therein; and therefore ſent certeine of the French aid as ambaſſadors about the cauſe. This thus ended, and the comming of the gouernour ſpread abroad, the ſame made manie glad, confirmed the doubtfull thereof, and withdrew others (that were inclined to the Engliſh part) from the ſame opinion they were of.]

The duke immediatlie after his arriuall came to Edenburgh, where he cauſed all the lords of the realme to aſſemble in that towne, where he declared the great loue and affection that the king of France bare to the realme of Scotland, inſomuch as hearing of the ſlaughters, murthers and burnings, practiſed by the Engliſhmen, he thought that he felt the ſame done vnto him, reputing himſelfe one of their members. And for reuenging thereof, he would bée partner with them as their member: for more credit whereof, he ſhewed the kings letter, confirming his declaration. He therefore exhorted them to aſſemble an armie, in reuenge of iniuries & wrongs done to them and their countrie; for he had brought with him monie, men, and artillerie to the furtherance thereof. Hereupon it was concluded, that the armie ſhould aſſemble at Dowglas dale the eighteenth of October: the which concluſion they kept, and from thence they marched to Caldſtreame vpon Twæd, and ſent ouer the water certeine of their great artillerie, with a companie of Frenchmen and Scots, by the guiding of Dauid Car; and being got ouer, they lay ſiege to the caſtell of Warke, which was kept by ſir William Liſle capteine thereof, hauing with him a ſtrong garriſon of Engliſh ſouldiors, and great prouiſion of artillerie, and all things neceſſarie: yet at the firſt aſſault, the vtter barnekin was wone, and the ſaid companie of Scotiſhmen and Frenchmen lay within the ſame, indamaging the caſtell in all they might.

Dauid Car. Warke caſtell beſieged.

The earle of Surrie and diuerſe others of the Engliſh nobilitie, with an armie of fortie thouſand men, were at Anwike, not far diſtant from Warke, and the marqueſſe Dorſet was ſent with a great companie to kéepe the towne of Berwike, for doubt leaſt the ſame ſhould haue béene beſieged. Alſo in the meane time, a new aſſault was made to the inner barnekin of Warke, and the ſame wone likewiſe as the other had béene before. After this was the caſtell aſſailed, and part of it beaten downe with the artillerie lieng on the Scotiſh ſide of the water of Twéd. At which breach, the aſſault was giuen, and the ſame continued, till that through darkneſſe and lacke of light, the aſſailants were driuen to retire. Great ſlaughter was made at that aſſault on both ſides, but eſpeciallie of them within the houſe. The aſſailants ment to haue giuen a freſh aſſault the next day, being the fourth of Nouember: but a ſore and vehement ſtorme and tempeſt of raine chanced that night, ſo that they were conſtreined to leaue off that enterpriſe, and to get themſelues ouer the riuer againe vnto the armie, leaſt by the riſing of the water of Twéd, they might haue béene cut off by their enimies, before they could haue béene ſuccoured.

The earle of Surrie and diuerſe others of the Engliſh nobilitie, with an armie of fortie thouſand men, were at Anwike, not far diſtant from Warke, and the marqueſſe Dorſet was ſent with a great companie to kéepe the towne of Berwike, for doubt leaſt the ſame ſhould haue béene beſieged. Alſo in the meane time, a new aſſault was made to the inner barnekin of Warke, and the ſame wone likewiſe as the other had béene before. In the meane time, whileſt this ſiege continued, a number of Scotiſhmen made a road into the countrie of Glendale within the Engliſh marches, and burnt and ſpoiled diuerſe townes, caſt downe ſundrie piles, and returned without anie reſiſtance: for the earle of Surrie would ſuffer none of his people to depart from the armie, nor breake order, for feare of more inconuenience. The duke of Albanie lieng on the Scotiſh ſide of Twéd, ſent an herald vnto the earle of Surrie, willing him to call to remembrance, how in his abſence he had inuaded Scotland with fire and ſword: for the which cruell dealing, he required him vpon his honor to come forward, and he would méet him in the confines of both the realmes, and giue him battell. To the which meſſage the earle anſwered, that he had no commiſſion to inuade Scotland at that time, but it onlie to defend. And (as ſome haue reported) he cauſed a ſecret meſſenger to paſſe to the quéene, as then lieng a good way diſtant from the armie, to moue for ſome abſtinence and truce, and further to perſuade the duke to retire home; which he did, ſo that by hir labor, a truce was taken for that inſtant, and afterward confirmed for a longer time: and thus the duke returned with honor (as the Scotiſhmen report.) This truce was well kept all the next winter following, and no inuaſion made, till the moneth of Maie: and then was the erle of Surrie ſent againe to the Engliſh borders, and the lords of Scotland on the other part monethlie laie on their borders by quarters, for defenſe of their countrie, as the vſe is.

On Trinitie ſunndale, being the one and twentith of Maie, fiue hundred Scots entered England, to ſurpriſe the Engliſh merchants, and others, going that day vnto Berwike, where yérelie on that day the faire is kept; and ſo by reaſon therof, they met with diuerſe of them that went to this faire, and tooke to the number of two hundred priſoners, whom they led with them into Scotland. But Hall ſaith, that by the comming of the yong lord of Fulberie to the ſuccors of the Engliſhmen, the Scots were chaſed, and loſt two hundred of their numbers. On the firſt of Julie, ſir William Fenwike, Leonard Muſgraue, & Baſtard Heron, with diuers other, to the number of nine hundred Engliſhmen, entred into the Mers, and began to ſpoile and rob the countrie: but they were ſhortlie compaſſed about with Scotiſhmen, & ſo hardlie aſſailed, that although they fought valiantlie a good while, yet by fine force they were compelled to giue ground, and ſéeke to ſaue themſelues by flight, in which two hundred of them were taken priſoners, and Baſtard Heron with diuerſe other ſlaine. Amongeſt the priſoners, were ſir Raſe Fenwike, Leonard Muſgraue, and diuers other gentlemen of good calling.

On the ſeuententh of Julie, the lord Marwell, and ſir Alexander Jordein, with diuerſe other Scotiſhmen in great numbers, entred England at the weſt marches by Caerleill, with diſplaied banners, and began to harrie the countrie, and burne diuers places. The Engliſhmen aſſembled on euerie ſide, ſo that they were farre more in number than the Scotiſhmen, and thereupon ſet fiercelie vpon their enimies, inſomuch that for the ſpace of an houre, there was a ſore fight continued betwixt them. But the lord Marwell like a right politike capteine (as of all that knew him he was no leſſe reputed) ceaſſed not to incourage his people: & after that, by the taking of of Alexander Iordein & diuers others, they had bin put backe, he brought them in araie againe, and beginning a new skirmish, recouered in maner all the prisoners, toke and slue diuerse Englishmen, so that he returned with victorie, and led aboue three hundred prisoners with him home into Scotland.

In assemblie of the lords.

After this tourneie, there was an assemblie of the lords in Edenburgh, with the duke of Albanie, where some of the lords were of mind that the warre should continue: other thought it not reason, that for the pleasure onelie of France, the realme should susteine such damage, as it had done by those three last yeres wars now passed, and therefore they persuaded peace. Moreouer, there was also much debating of the matter, touching the age and gouernement of the king; some of the lords holding that he was now of age to take the rule vpon himselfe, and that the gardianship or tutorie of a king expired sooner than of another priuate person. The duke of Albanie perceiuing how the lords were diuided amongest themselues, and neither content with his gouernement, nor willing to mainteine the warres which he had so earnestlie persuaded for the pleasure of France, hee declared to them that he wold returne into France, and so taking his leaue of the nobilitie, went to Striueling where the king was, of whome he toke leaue, also giuing vnto him such louing and faithfull counsell, as to his knowledge seemed expedient, and so went into the west countrie, where he toke the seas in September, and sailed forth into France, [neuer to returne into Scotland.]

The duke of Albanie returneth into France. Fr. Thin.

The king of England [before the rumor of the departure of the duke of Albanie] hauing in the moneth of June sent ouer into France, vnto Archembald earle of Angus, that remained there vpon the commandement of the duke of Albanie, persuaded him to come from thence secretlie into England, which accordinglie he did; and being safelie arriued in England, king Henrie procured him to passe into Scotland, that with the assistance of such lords as would be readie to take his part, he might raise war against the duke of Albanie, which sought by all meanes (as the king of England was informed) to destroie him & his: but yer the earle could come into Scotland, the duke was departed toward France. On the six and twentith of Julie, the king by the aduise of his mother, and certeine yong lords, came from Striueling vnto Edenburgh; and three daies after, the quéene toke the whole gouernment of the king vpon hir, and entered into the castell of Edenburgh with the king, where they soiourned the most part of the nert winter. The prouost of Edenburgh was discharged, whom the towne had chosen, and the lord Marwell was appointed by the quæne, prouost in his place. For the performance wherof, there was a parlement also summoned to be holden at Edenburgh the third day of Februarie nert insuing [and the bishop of saint Andrews and Aberden (as saith Buchanan li. 14.) were cast into prison, who after gathering armes (and cursing all others) within the space of a moneth following were reconciled to the king.]

A parlement summoned. Fr. Thin.

The king of England glad to heare that the duke of Albanie was departed into France, sent into Scotland in ambassage one maister John Magnus, and Roger Ratcliffe esquier, to declare vnto the quæne and lords, that he would be content that a truce might be accorded betwirt the two realmes of England and Scotland, now that the duke of Albanie was returned into France, who had bene the onlie procurer of the warres. Herevpon they agréed to take truce to indure for one yére, and in the meane time they appointed to send ambassadors into England to treat vpon a continuall peace, alliance, and amitie to be had betwirt both the realmes. In this meane while, the earle of Angus came into Scotland: and because of the displeasure which the quéene bare him, there insued occasions of great diuisions within the realme. Notwithstanding the quéene by aduise of certeine lords, sent the lord Gilbert earle of Cassels, Robert Cockeborne bishop of Dunkeld, and doctor Mille abbat of Cambuskenneth, ambassadors into England, in the moneth of December; the which were receiued at Greenewich by the king of England the foure and twentith of the same moneth: where the bishop of Dunkeld made an eloquent oration in Latine, declaring the cause of their comming, the which in effect was for intreatment of peace, loue, and amitie betwirt the two realmes: and for the more sure establishment thereof, they required that a mariage might be concluded betwirt their king & the ladie Marie, daughter to the king of England.

Ambassadors into England

A truce taken for one yeare.

This request was well heard by the king, who thereupon appointed commissioners to common thereof with the said ambassadors. Diuerse articles were proponed by the said commissioners on the king of England his behalfe, and in especiall one; which was, that the king of Scotland should renounce the league with the king of France; and that further he should come into England, and remaine there till he came to perfect age to be maried. Because the ambassadors had not commission to conclude so farre, the earle of Cassels returned into Scotland, to vnderstand the minds of the lords and councell in these points, the other remaining at London till his returne to them againe. ✲ Vpon All saints day there was a great motion of wind, with such stormes and tempests of thunder and lightning which suddenlie arose, that the same (ouerthrowing manie priuat houses in Edenburgh, and the pinacle of the tower of Dauid in the same castell) entered into the quéenes lodging with a great flame, which burnt so vehementlie, and went so farre, that it had almost consumed the same; which storme (ouerthrowing the buildings about the chamber of the bishop of Whitchurch) the bishops lodging did yet remaine safe not touched with the violence of the flame.)

Candida Casa.

When the day of the parlement appointed to be holden in the Tolbuith of Edenburgh was come, the king, quæne, and lords, fearing some tumult in the towne to be raised by the earle of Angus, would not passe forth of the castell, but kept the parlement within the same. Archembald Dowglasse earle of Angus, and John Steward earle of Lennor, with diuerse others, to the number of two thousand men, came in the night season vnto Edenburgh, because they durst not enter the towne in the day time, for feare of the gunnes that laie in the castell. The nert day, being the fourtéenth day of Februarie, the said earles with the archbishop of saint Andrews, the bishop of Aberden, that by the quénes appointment had béene kept before in ward, the bishop of Dublane, Calene Campbell, the earle of Argile, and diuerse other lords and barons being in the towne, sent to the castell, alledging that the king was kept as prisoner by the quæne, and iustice suppressed, with great damage of the common wealth; and therefore he desired, that the king might be deliuered vnto them, to be gouerned by the aduise of the three states, and if they refused to deliuer him, they would besiege the castell, and if they wan it, all their liues within should rest at their pleasures, the kings onelie excepted.

The earle of Angus his request.

The quæne, by the counsell of the earles of Arrane and Murrey, refused not onelie to deliuer the king, but sent them word, that except they did depart the towne, they would suerlie discharge all the artillerie artillerie of the caſtell againſt them. Hereupon, great feare roſe in the towne, ſpeciallie among the burgeſſes, but by the diligence of certeine perſons that trauelled betweene the parties, an aſſurance was taken on either ſide for certeine daies. In the meane time, the earle of Angus cauſed the caſtell to be forſet, that neither meat nor other thing might be ſuffered to be conueied into it, except ſo much as might ſerue for the ſuſtentation of the kings owne perſon. At length, all the parties were agréed, ſo that the foure and twentith day of Februarie, the king came vnto the parlement holden in the Tolbuith in moſt honorable wiſe, with the aſſiſtance of all the eſtates, hauing the crowne, ſcepter, and ſword borne before him, and from thence he was brought to the abbeie, where he remained.

He forſetteth the caſtell of Edenburgh.

The parties are agréed.

In this parlement, there were eight lords choſen to be of the kings priuie councell, the which toke the gouernement of the king and realme vpon them, as theſe: the archbiſhops of ſaint Andrews and Glaſcow, the biſhops of of Aberden and Dublane: the earles of Angus, Argile, Arrane, and Lennor: the quéene was adioined to them as principall, without whoſe aduiſe nothing ſhould be done. From this parlement alſo was the earle of Caſſels ſent, with anſwer to the king of England; who came to London the nintéenth of March. But bicauſe the king had knowledge that the French king was taken at the battell of Pauie, he would not proceéd in the treatie of mariage betwixt the king of Scotland and his daughter, till he had the emperors aduiſe, whome he affirmed to be his confederat friend: and ſo renewing the truce for three yéers and ſix moneths, the ambaſſadors returned into Scotland about the beginning of Aprill next inſuing, without anie contract of mariage at that time. The agréement betwixt the quéene and lords continued not long, for anon after died the biſhop of Dublane or Dunkeld (as ſaith Leſleus) whoſe benefice the earle of Angus obteined of the king for his brother William Dowglas, without the aduiſe of the quéene and other lords. Whereupon the quéene departed and went vnto Striueling, leauing the king with the eale of Angus, who toke the whole rule and gouernment of the realme and king vpon him, and made his vncle Archembald Dowglas treaſuror of the realme, and beſtowed benefices, offices, and all other things, by the aduiſe of his brother George Dowglas, and the earle of Lennor, who aſſiſted him.

In this meane time, the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrewes, and the earles of Arrane, Argile, and Murrey, remaining with the quéene at Striueling, alledged that the king was withholden from them by the earle of Angus ſore againſt his will: and therefore they ſent vnto the earle, requiring him to deliuer him. But the earle cauſed the king to giue the anſwer himſelfe, that he would not come from the erle of Angus, albeit he would gladlie haue béene out of his hands if he might; as by ſecret meſſages ſent to ſundrie of the lords, and likewiſe at that time it appéered, for he willed them by priuie meanes to aſſemble an armie, and to come & fetch him out of their hands that thus deteined him. Herevpon ſhortlie after, they raiſed a power, and comming therewith to Linlithgew, purpoſing to paſſe into Edenburgh, that they might get the king out of the earle of Angus his hands: the ſaid earle, with the earle of Lennor and other his aſſiſtants being thereof aduertiſed, came to the field with the kings banner diſplaied, and brought the king with him, although partlie againſt his will.

The quéene and ſuch lords as were with hir there in the armie, for the reuerence they bare vnto the kings perſon, and alſo fearing the danger that might chance to them if they buckled togither in a foughten field, they withdrew themſelues to Striueling, and from thence the quéene went into Murrey land with the earle of Murrey, and there remained a long time after. The earles of Arrane and Argile went into the weſt countrie, and the biſhop of ſaint Andrews to Dunfermling: and then the earle of Angus toke vpon him more boldlie the gouernment of the king and realme, and ſent to the biſhop of ſaint Andrews (who was chancellor) for the great ſeale, which was deliuered to them that were ſo ſent for it. The nobles of the realme remaining thus at variance, and diuided among themſelues, there was ſmall obedience of lawes & iuſtice. Diuerſe ſlaughters in ſundrie parts were committed, great theefts & robberies made by the borderers vpon the inland countries. Moreouer, a diuorſe this yéere (as ſome haue ſaid) was ſued before the archbiſhop of S. Andrews, betwixt the quéene, and the earle of Angus hir huſband, and then afterwards ſhe toke to huſband one Henrie Steward, ſonne to the lord of Auendale, the which Henrie was after created by the king lord of Methwen.

A diuorſe betweene the quéene and the earle of Angus.

On the foure and twentith of Julie, the king being accompanied with the earle of Angus, the lord Hume, the Karres & others, rode vnto Jedburgh, in purpoſe to haue reformed the miſgouernance of the borderers; but after that they had remained there three daies with little obedience ſhewed towards them, they all returned. And vpon the 29 day of Julie, at the bridge of Melroſſe, the lard of Boclouth, accompanied with a thouſand horſſemen, began to ſhew himſelfe in ſight, whoſe principall purpoſe was to haue taken the king from the earle of Angus and his aſſiſtants, being requeſted and commanded by the king himſelfe ſo to do. The earle of Angus incontinentlie ſent an herald vnto the lard of Boclough, to know what his intention was to do; who anſwered, that he came to do the king honor and ſeruice, and to ſhew his friends and power as the vſe is of the borderers.

The lard of Boclough his enterpriſe, to take the king from the earle of Angus.

The earle of Angus, with the lord Hume, and the reſt, not being content with this anſwer, becauſe of the great feud betwixt him and the Humes, and the Kars, ſent vnto him a commandement in the kings name to depart, and not to approch néere to the kings preſence, vnder paine of high treaſon. Whervnto he anſwered, that he knew the kings mind well inough & would not ſpare for this commandement to come to his graces preſence. Which anſwer receiued from him, incontinentlie the earle of Angus, the lords Fleming and Hume, the Kars, the lard of Seſſeford, with their friends, alighted on foot; the king remaining on horſbacke, accompanied with the earle of Lennor, the lord Parwell, George Dowglaſſe, and Ninian Creichton, tutor of Sainquhar.

The lard of Boclough lighted alſo on foot, but becauſe the moſt part of his men were of the theeues and outlawes of the borders, commonlie called broken men, vpon their firſt comming to ioining with their ſpeares, they fled, leauing the lard of Boclough with a ſmall number of his owne ſeruants about him in all the danger: yet they defended themſelues verie manfullie, and ſlue the lard of Seſſeford and diuerſe other, on the earle of Angus his ſide: but finallie, oppreſſed with multitude, they were put to flight, and foure ſcore of Boclоughes men ſlaine in the chaſe. After this, the king returned to Jedburgh, and remained there the ſpace of foure daies, and then returned to Edenburgh.

All this while, the king was gouerned and holden againſt his will, by the earle of Angus and his aſſiſters, although he did not outwardlie ſhew ſo in countenance, but diſſembled the matter as well as he might, yet perceiuing two enterpriſes to haue quailed that had béene attempted for his deliuerance, he thought to aſſaie the third; and hérevpon, procured the earle of Lennor to aſſemble an armie, with aſſiſtance of the quéene and hir friends, to helpe to deliuer him from the hands of his enimies. The earle of Lennor did ſo, and came with ſuch power as he could raiſe from the weſt parts vnto Linlithgo. The earle of Angus being aduertiſed, that the earle of Lennor was gathering men, ſent to the earle of Arrane for aid, requiring him to come with ſuch power as he could make, and to méet him at Linlithgo. The earle of Arrane immediatlie hérewith gathered a power, and with the ſame came to Linlithgo before the earle of Lennor came thither, who ſhortlie after comming with his people, approched that towne, vnto whome the earle of Arrane ſent a meſſenger, requiring him to turne and ſaue his enterpriſe, aſſuring him, that albeit he was his ſiſters ſonne, he would not ſpare him, if he held forward vpon his iournie. The earle of Lennor hérewith anſwered in a great rage, that he would not ſtaie, till he came to Edenburgh, or elſe die for it by the waie. The earle of Arrane therefore not ſtaieng for the earle of Angus his comming from Edenburgh, iſſued forth of Linlithgo at the weſt end of the towne, and incountered the earle of Lennor and his companie, where there was a cruell onſet giuen on both ſides, but ſuddenlie the earle of Lennor his companie fled, and he himſelfe with the lord of Hunſton and diuerſe other gentlemen were ſlaine.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 14.

The death of which Dowglas the king did greatlie lament, and hearing the clamor and noiſe that was made in that conflict, did ſend forth (but all to late) Andrew Wood (his familiar) to haue ſuccored the Lennor, if by anie meanes he could. After this victorie, the faction of the Dowglaſſes (to the end that ſtriking a feare in thoſe that were enuious againſt them, they might make them alwaies to be in danger to them) began to moue queſtions and ſutes in law, againſt ſuch as had borne armor againſt the king: for feare whereof ſome bought their peace with monie, ſome tooke part with the Dowglaſſes, ſome followed the Hamiltons, and ſome ſtillie ſtanding in the matter, were followed and called into the law. Of which number Gilbert earle of Caſſiles (when he was earneſtlie preſſed by James Hamilton the baſtard, to yéeld himſelfe to the part of the Hamiltons) being a man of great ſtomach, gaue this anſwer, that the old league of friendſhip, which was betwéene their grandfathers (in which his grandfather was alwaies the more honorable and firſt named) ſhould not make him now ſo forgetfull of the honor of his familie, that he would ſéeme to degenerat from his anceſtors, and willinglie grant to be vnder defenſe (which is the next degrée of ſeruitude) of them, whoſe head in making an equall league and couenant was contented with the ſecond place of honor.

Wherefore, when the ſaid Gilbert apéered in the law at the day appointed, for the deciding of his cauſe: Hugh Kennedie his kinſman anſwered for him, that he was preſent in that battell, as ſent thither by the king, and not as enimie to the king, and he would (if néed required) bring forth the kings letters therfore, notwithſtanding the Hamiltons frowning and fretting againſt his boldneſſe: for the king had written as well to Gilbert (going home) as to manie others, to ioine with John Steward earle of Lennor, who ſéeing the battell at hand, and that he had not time left to call togither his friends and followers, did with his preſent companie (taking his iournie out of the waie) turne to Striueling. Wherfore (the power of the Hamiltons in that cauſe ſomewhat ſuppreſſed) James Hamilton the baſtard ſtirred with great hatred againſt Kennedie, did procure Hugh Campbell ſhirriffe of Aire to diſpatch him out of the waie, which he ſhortlie after did in his returne home. Afterward this Hugh, to the end he might diſſemble his conſcience or knowledge of this euill (the execution wherof he had committed to his fellowes) was remaining at the day and time of the ſame murther, with John Areſkine, whoſe ſiſter was the wife of Gilbert Kennedie.

The death of the earle of Caſſiles.

But ſhe (as ſone as ſhe heard of that déed) did with manie bitter words lay the fault vnto him, becauſe by that fact the noble houſe of the Kennedies had almoſt béene brought to vtter ſubuerſion, had he not left a yong ſonne behind him. This yong earle, after the death of his father, fled to his kinſman Archembald Dowglaſſe then the kings treaſuror, to whome he committed the defenſe of himſelfe and his familie. This done, Hugh Campbell was called into law for the ſaid déed, who being manifeſtlie conuicted thereof, was baniſhed into an other place. Neither did the Dowglaſſes with leſſe bitternelle exerciſe their anger againſt James Beton, for bringing their power to ſaint Andrewes, which they ſpoiled, as after appéereth.)

In the meane time, the earle of Angus bringing the king with him, arriued, and had come to the battell, but that the king was not willing to come forth of Edenburgh in that quarrell (as ſome haue written) and therefore made excuſes, as he did alſo by the waie, fayning himſelfe ſicke: but George Dowglas droue and called vpon his horſſe verie charpelie, and conſtreined him to ride forth with faſter pace than he would haue done, giuing him manie iniurious words, which he remembred afterwards, and would not forget them. They went that night to Striueling, and ſhortlie after paſſed through Fife, ſearching for the quéene, and the biſhop of ſaint Andrewes; and becauſe they were kept ſecretlie in their friends houſes, ſo that they could not be heard of, they ſpoiled the abbeie of Dunfirmeling, and the caſtell of ſaint Andrewes, taking awaie all the moueables which the archbiſhop had within the ſame.

The quéene ſought for.

✠ In the north parts alſo, the two families of the Leſlées and the Forboiſes, intangled with mutuall hatred, raiſed great flames of tumults and parts taking: which enimities did after grow to be the greater, becauſe there were dailie manie ſlaughters of the nobles & other people committed in Mar, Garreoth, and Aberden, whileſt ech faction labored to defend it ſelfe againſt the others. For which cauſe (when the common-wealth was much deformed thereby, and all iuſtice ſæmed almoſt vtterlie ouerthrowne in thoſe parts) the earle of Angus and other of the nobilitie (which were of the kings priuie councell) did not ceaſſe, vntill they had made vnitie betwéene thoſe two families. But in the end (the heire of the Forboiſes, & the lord Lenturke, hauing by wait killed the noble baron Meldrume, which fauored the Leſlées) thoſe buried contentions began againe to be raiſed from the dead; whoſe enimities being once againe knowne to the nobilitie (and what hurt might inſue thereof to the common ſtate) they attempted all poſſible meanes once more to quench that deadlie flame, and afreſh to ioine their minds togither in amitie, with this prouiſo, that the murtherers of Meldrume ſhould (for punilhment of their offenſe) be baniſhed into France, where the greateſt part of them died, after manie miſeries and reproches ſuſtained in their pitifull life. Which laſt league ſo ſincerelie vnited betwéene the Forboiſes and the Leſlées, was imbraced with ſuch faith ech to other, by renewing thereof with continuall mariages & other courteſies, that it continueth moſt firme euen vnto this day.

1520. Leſleus lib. 9. pag. 423, 24, &c.

In which north parts alſo, the inhabitants (partlie following their naturall diſpoſition, and partlie excited by the example of the former times long ſuffered ſo to be vſed) did in like ſort ouerrun and ſpoile all things, by reaſon of ouermuch libertie. But of all other ſturs raiſed in thoſe parts, that was the greateſt and moſt troubleſome, which was raiſed by the Makintoſches. Of which vnrulie people, the one familie was called the Glenchattens, and the other was ſurnamed Makintoſches after the head of that kindred; in which, the chiefe was called Lachlane Makintoſche a man of great poſſeſſions, and of ſuch excellencie in ſingularitie of wiſedome, that with great commendation he did conteine all his followers within the limits of their dueties, more than others did. Which conſtreints (when they could hardlie beare (as loth to liue in order) hauing ſo long paſſed their time licentiouſlie) did withdraw the hearts of manie men from him. Amongeſt whome was James Malcolmeſon his kinſman (who thirſting after the deſire to rule) toke occaſion (by the inſurie of the time) traitorouſlie with deceipt to kill this Makintoſche; after which (fearing further trouble to inſue towards him) he flieth to the Ile (at the lake Rothmurcoſie) as a ſanctuarie or defenſe for him. But the reſt of the familie of the Makintoſches did purſue him with ſuch eager minds, that by force taking him in the Ile, they worthilie killed him, and manie of his confederats, guiltie of that wickednelle. After which (becauſe the ſonne of Makintoſche, for his tender yeares, was not ſufficient with feare & puniſhment to bridle the minds of his fierce ſubiects) by common conſent they choſe the baſtard brother of the ſlaine man (called Hector Makintoſche) to be head and leader of that familie, vntill this yong nephue might grow to yéeres, and might weeld the gouernement of his owne tribe.

Rothmurcoſie

New tumults in that familie.

Now when when the earle of Murreie perceiued that if the ſonne of Makintoſche were committed to the raſhneſſe of a people ſomewhat fierce and cruell, that he ſhould (on euerie ſide) be oppreſſed with manie troubles, he did moſt godlie (for the care he had of him his nephue being his ſiſters ſonne) prouide, that he ſhould be caried to an other place, to the Dgiluies, the childs kin on the mothers ſide, where he ſhould be well inſtructed and imbued with the precepts of all learning and vertue. Whereat Hector was greatlie offended, to ſée that the child ſhould ſo ſubtilie be taken from him. Wherefore (affirming that much of his authoritie was thereby diminiſhed) he attempted (euerie way he might) to get the child againe into his poſſeſſion, that thereby he might ſalue and recouer his credit and authoritie. But ſome there were, which ſuppoſed that the great care and labor which he ſo much emploied (for getting the child into his hands) was to none other intent, but that he might make him awaie, and prepare a path whereby to lead his owne ſonne to the gouernement of that familie. Which conceipt being déeplie grauen in the mind of the earle of Murreie, cauſed him to ſéeke the preſeruation of the child, that by no means he might fall into the hands of Hector.

Therewith Hector being highlie incenſed (and determining to ſpue out his choler, ſéeking reuenge by anie kind of means) he did cauſe his brother William & other of his kindred, that ioining their force, they might ſtronglie ver the earle of Murreie, and ſpoile his poſſeſſions: which they did with ſo great furie, that ouerthrowing the fort of Dikes, and beſieging the caſtell of Tornewaie, they executed manie cruelties, ſlaughters, ſpoiles, burnings, and other miſchiefes vpon all ſorts of people, men, women, and children, and all ſuch as fauored them. For their hatred not limited againſt the earle of Murreie, extended further againſt the familie of the Dgiluies, amongeſt whome the child was left in cuſtodie for educations cauſe. With which mind this Hector and his complices placing their campe at the caſtell of Pettens, which belonged to the lord of Durnens (one of the familie of the Dgiluies) they did ſo furiouſlie beſiege the ſame, as the people of the ſame were in the end forced to yéeld the fort: which when they had entred, they killed foure and twentie of the Dgiluies, whom they found therein. Wherupon (their minds being now aduanced with ſpoiles and happie ſucceſſes) they became ſo proud, as (truſting ouermuch to proſperous euent in all their actions) they neuer ſet end to their wicked crueltie, vntill the erle of Murreie did with force execute iuſt iudgement vpon them. For when the earle beheld them immoderatlie reioiſing, in ſpoiling his lands, and committing other exceſſiue euils; he obteined of the king and his councell, that he might be made the kings deputie and gouernor in that battell, to bridle the rage and boldneſſe of thoſe in that order ſpoiling the common-wealth.

Wherefore the earle aſſembling an armie, did with ſuch ſpeedie valure come vpon them and their countrie, that at the firſt he toke almoſt two hundred of their capteins, and committed them to the gallowes. All whoſe faith was ſo true to their capteine, as (when life was ſcuerallie promiſed to euerie one man as he was alone lead to the gallowes) there would not anie one of them confeſſe where their capteine Hector had hidden himſelfe. For euerie one anſwered (with bold ſpirit) that they knew not where he was become; and if ſo be they did, that yet they would not (by anie paine or terror of death) be induced to breake their faith and to betraie their maiſter. But hanging not being thought a ſufficient reuenge (for ſuch capteins as the earle had taken) there were more grieuous puniſhments laid vpon William Makintoſche (brother to Hector) becauſe in the beginning he nouriſhed thoſe coles of choler for his brothers cauſe. For after that this William was hanged, his head was chopped off and faſtned vpon a pole at Dikes, and the other foure parts of his bodie were ſent to the townes of Elgin, Foreſſe, Inuerneſſe, and Alderne, there to be ſet vp publikelie to the reproch of them, and the example of others.

The familie of Makintoſche raiſe ſeditions.

Now, after all theſe ſturs, Hector (ſeeing his men were thus diſperſed and executed, and that himſelfe was excluded from anie other ſuccor) fled to the faithfull helpe of Alexander Dunbar deane of Murreie, by whoſe aduiſe he goeth humblie and ſecretlie to the king, beſeeching his mercie and fauor to be extended vnto him: for he ſuppoſed it better, rather to craue the doubtfull mercie of his lord, than to make triall of the earle of Murreis certeine reuenge. Wherevpon the king (ſeeing his humble ſubmiſſion) receiued him into his fauor; and did with all his heart louinglie after embrace him, becauſe he was valiant and wiſe in warre, and in counſell. But God, whoſe iuſtice is alwaies ſhewed in puniſhing of wickednelle, would not ſuffer this filthinelle of crueltie, theft, murther, & ſpoile (wherewith Hector did wickedlie defile his life) to go vnreuenged with moſt grieuous paine vpon the ſaid Hector. For in the citie of ſaint Andrews, ſudden death (than which there can be no greater puniſhment) was laid vpon him by one James Spenſe a prieſt, who was himſelfe afterwards beheaded.

When the earle of Murreie had ſhewed ſuch reuenge vpon the freends of Hector and their companions; the people of the prouince of Glencatten did from thenceforth keepe themſelues within the limits of their duetie: vntill that the ſonne of Lachlane lane Makintosche came to mans estate and full age. Which yong man was in his first yeares imbued with such learnings and policie of life conformed thereunto, that when he was imploied about the common-wealth; all the capteins of them (who naturallie speake Irish in the furthest part of Scotland) did embrace him as a perfect paterne of all vertue, and an excellent workemaister to frame a well ordered state. Wherefore certeine (not able to sustеine the brightnesse of his vertue) did ioine in counsell with such as were nèerest of blood vnto him, and had before laid violent hands on his father, to take his life away by forceable means. Whereof we shall more liberallie intreat in an other place.]

This yeare the king by counsell of the earle of Angus, Arrane, and others, went with eight thousand men vnto Jedburgh, to set some order amongest the borderers, for the keeping of better rule: and so on the eight of June, the principals of all the surnames of the clans on the borders, came to the king, binding themselues, and deliuering pledges for their good demenors. The seuentеenth of Julie, there was a great assemblie of the lords at Holie rod house, at what time, there came a simple fellow (to loke vpon) seruant and horskeeper sometime to the earle of Lennor, who in the midst of a great companie of people in the abbeie close, strake sir James Hamilton knight verie desperatlie with a short prage or dagger in the bellie three seuerall stripes vp to the hast, and yet the said sir James died not of those hurts.

1527. Lesle.

Sir James Hamilton hurt by a desperat person.

The man being taken, by & by confessed the deed
" without repentance, saieng; Fy on the feeble hand
" quilke wald not do that thing the heart thought, and
" was determinat to do. And being inquired what he was, and who caused him to do the same; he answered that he was a seruant of God, sent by him to do that deed. And albeit he was put to great torture and paines dailie by the space of a moneth, yet would he neuer giue other answer, and so he was hanged, and his head set ouer one of the gates of Edenburgh towne. About the same time, there came out of Germanie maister Patrike Hamilton, abbat of Ferne, brothers sonne to the earle of Arrane, who had beene scholer to Martin Luther, & others there. This man being conuented and examined vpon certeine articles, as of iustification, predestination, of frée will, and such like, contrarie to the doctrine taught by the church in that time, because he did affirme, and constantlie defend them, he was declared an heretike and burned.

The abbat of Ferne burnt.

The eightеenth of March, the king besieged the castell of Edenburgh, the quеene and hir husband Henrie Steward, with James his brother being within it. But as soone as the quеene vnderstood, that hir sonne the king was there in person, she caused the gates to be set open, and vpon hir knées besought him of grace for hir husband and his brother, and would not rest, till she had obteined the same; but yet they were kept in ward within the castell, till the king afterwards released them. In the yeare following, the king being now come to the age of seuentеene yeares, and of good discretion and wit for his time, would not longer remaine vnder the gouernement of the earle of Angus and his companie. Whereupon he assembled diuerse noble men of Striueling, & by their counsell sent an herald vnto the earle of Angus & his assistans resiant as then in Edenburgh, commanding them on paine of high treason, that they should depart forth of that towne, & that none of them should come within foure miles of the court, whersoeuer the same chanced to lie.

The king being seuentеene yeares of age, refuseth to be longer vnder gouernement.

Shortlie after, the king himselfe with two thousand men, followed the herald: whereupon the earle of Angus (both being charged by the herald, and aduertised of the kings comming toward the towne, departed thence immediatlie. And shortlie after, the same herald was sent vnto him againe with commandement from the king, that he should remaine prisoner within ward in the countrie of Murrey, till the kings pleasure were further knowen: which he would not obeie; wherefore both he and his adherents were summoned to appeare in parlement to be holden at Edenburgh, in September next following. In this parlement begun at Edenburgh the first of September in this yeare 1528, the earle of Angus, with his brother George Dowglas, his vncle by his father Archembald Dowglas, Alexander Drommond of Carnocke, and diuerse other, were by decrée of parlement atteinted, and forfalted for diuerse offenses, and speciallie, for assembling the kings people to haue assailed the kings person: and because he had deteined the king against his will with him the space of two yeares and more, all which time he stood in feare of his life.

The earle of Angus forfalted.

The earle of Angus atteinted by parlement.

Henrie Steward created erle of Methwen.

In this parlement Henrie Steward the quеenes husband was created lord of Methwen, and made maister of the ordinance. ✻ Besides which, in place of earle Dowglas was Gawin Dunbar, the kings schoolemaister made chancellor, a good and a learned man, and one in whome manie did desire more ciuill policie; and in the place of Archembald Dowglas the treasurer was admitted Robert Carnicruce, more famous for his monie than his vertue. In this parlement there was onelie one found, called John Bannatine, who fauoring the Dowglas, did boldlie there protest, that what soeuer was therin don, ought by no meanes to be hurtfull to the earle Dowglas; since iust feare of his appearance there, was a iust cause to force him to be absent from thence. Within a few daies after, a brother of the earles called William, abbat of the monasterie of Holirod died, partlie by sickenesse, and partlie by griefe of mind, being wearied with the present state of things; whose place Robert Carnicruce, a man of base birth, but well monied, did obteine of the king: who had granted vnto him the auoidance of the next spirituall liuing. At length, the Dowglas out of hope of all good successe, burnt the townes of Constandie and Cranstoune, and so fled to the castell of Tantallon.]

Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 14.

In October following, the king assembled a great companie of men, with artillerie, and diuerse kinds of munition, to besiege the castell of Tantallon, which the earle of Angus did hold, who aduertised of the preparation made for the same siege, furnished the castell with men and all kind of necessaries, and went himselfe into England. When the siege then was laid about the castell, it was so strong and so well prouided, that it might not be woone for all that could be done at that season: in somuch that after Dauid Fauconer, principall gunner of the kings side was slaine, the king caused the siege to be raised; yet at length (though not till a long time after this) it was deliuered to the king by appointment. ✻ Before the deliuerie whereof, the king depelie sware that he would not leaue one aliue to succeed in the inheritance and name of the Dowglasses, so long as he liued and was king.

Where vpon he came to Edenburgh, where (to the end he might distresse them the more) he determined by the aduise of his councell to send a dailie companie (though no great number) to Coldingham, which should defend the husbandmen from the spoile. Which office appointed to Bothwell chiefe of Louthaine, he did vtterlie refuse; either fearing the power of the Dowglas (whereunto all the other strength of Scotland did of late not seeme to be equall) or that he would not (being then yong) imbrue his hands with the destruction of so famous a familie. Wherevpon, ſince the king durſt not truſt the Hamiltons (as friends to his enimies, & being offended with them for the death of John Steward earle of Lennor, nor durſt commit the matter to anie of the adioining nobilitie) at length the ſame came ſo about, that Calene Campbell (dwelling on the furtheſt borders of the kingdome, being a man of good eſtimation for his wiſedome, and approued experience in feats of warre, and for his iuſtice dærelie loued of the people) was ſent by the king (with great authoritie) to the rebels. Whereby the Dowglaſſes (being forſaken of the Hamiltons and their other friends) were brought to thoſe extremities, that they were inforced to depart into England to K. Henrie the eight, who honorablie and liberallie receiued and interteined them. After this, the king (as is ſaid) getting the caſtell of Tantillone by compoſition, did ſcarſe kæpe all the couenants of his grant thereof in writing; although he performed this, that Alexander Drumman at the requeſt of Robert Bretton, had licence to returne home into his countrie, a little before which (as it ſæmeth) when James Coluille and Robert Carnicruſe were remoued from the court (as perſons ſuſpected to fauor the Dowglaſſes) their offices were beſtowed vpon Robert Bretton, then in great fauor with the king and courtiers, and aduanced to the gouernement of manie places.)

1529. The eightæenth of Maie, in the yære 1529, the earle of Cathneſſe and the lord of Sincler, with a great armie by ſea paſſed into Orkenie, to haue taken that Ile into poſſeſſion; but the people of the countrie aſſembled at the commandement of James Sincler of Kirkewall their capteine, who gaue battell to the earle and his armie with ſuch courage, that he diſcomfited the enimies: the earle with fiue hundred of his men was ſlaine, and drowned in the ſea, vnto the which they were driuen. The lord Sincler and all the reſidue were taken. The Orkenie men held opinion, that their patrone ſaint Magnus was ſæne that day to fight in the field on their ſide againſt their enimies. In the ſame moneth on the fiftæenth day, there was a great aſſemblie of the lords in Edenburgh, where the king himſelfe ſate in iudgement. The lard of Hinderland called Cockburne, and one Adam Scot of Tulhlaw, who was named king of thæues, were accuſed of theft, and of receiuing and maintæning of thæues, ſlaughters, and other crimes; of the which being conuict, they loſt their heads, which were ſet ouer the Tolbuith of Edenburgh.

On the ſame day, the earle of Bothwell was alſo conuict, for mainteining them and their crimes, and his life, lands, and goods, were in the kings hands. He was therefore kept in ward within Edenburgh caſtell, and after ſent into Murrey land, & laſtlie baniſhed the realme during the kings daies [and remained at Uenice.] Alſo, the lord Parwell, the lord Hume, the lards of Balglueth, Fernihurſt, Pollort, Johnſon, Parke Bar [with the earle Bothwell] and other principall men of the borders, were conuict by aſſiſe, and put in ward: by reaſon whereof, the borderers kept better rule euer after, during the kings reigne. [Few moneths after, the king commanded the noble men (before impriſoned, and then to be baniſhed) to be reſtored to libertie, taking pledges for their allegiance. Of which companie, one Walter Scot (killing Robert Johnſtone a thæfe of noted crueltie, therwith to gratifie the king) began deadlie enimitie with that familie, to the great hurt of both thoſe kinreds.]

About this ſeaſon, a landed man named John Scot, that had trauelled abroad in the world [ouer England, France, Italie and the holie land, as ſaith Leſleus] who now being returned into Scotland, (becauſe it was bruted in other countries that hæ had faſted 40 daies without either meat or drinke) was for triall therof put in Dauids tower in Edenburgh caſtell, and diligent watch ſet vpon him to ſæ that he had no ſuſtenance to relieue him withall, and ſo kept for fortie daies, he faſted all that time without anie kind of nouriſhment, to the great wonder of the people. In the ſummer of this yære 1529, Archembald Dowglas, that had bæne forfalted (as ye haue heard) came alone to the king while he was on hunting in Striueling parke, & beſought his grace of pardon, which he had obteined fullie at his hands, becauſe he fauoured him more than anie of that ſurname, if he had not bæne (as he was indæd) altogither determined that none of them ſhould remaine within the land at that time, and ſo he baniſhed him into France, where ſhortlie after through griefe of mind he departed this life.

1529. Archembald Dowglas baniſhed.

In the moneth of June, the king with an armie went to the borders to ſet order there for better rule to be kept, and to puniſh ſuch as were knowen to be moſt culpable. And herevpon he cauſed fortie and eight of the moſt notable thæues, with their capteine John Armſtrong to be apprehended; the which being conuict of murther, theft, & treaſon, were all hanged on growing trees, to the example of other. There was one cruell thæfe amongſt the reſt, which had burned a houſe with a woman and hir children within it: he was burned to death. George Armſtrong, brother to John, was pardoned, to the end he ſhould appeach the reſidue, which he did; ſo that they were apprehended by the kings commandement, and puniſhed for their miſdoings, according as they had deſerued. In Auguſt following, manie merueilous ſights were ſæne about Striueling, as candels burning on the tops of hils in the nights, and in the morning afore ſunne riſing. Diuerſe armed men appeared fighting vpon the ground, which was taken to be a foretoken of ſome trouble to inſue in thoſe parties. The fiftæenth day of Auguſt, a great number of people being aſſembled at the market in Campſconneth, fiftie & two perſons were drowned in the ferrie bote; amongſt the which were diuerſe honeſt men and women of the countrie.

1530. The firſt of March, in the yære 1530, the abbat of Cuiroſe called James Inglis, was cruellie murthered by the lord of Culliallan and his ſeruants, amongſt whom there was a prieſt called ſir William Louthien, for the which they were apprehended, and the ſaid ſir William the twentie and ſeuenth of the ſame moneth, vpon a publike ſcaffold in Edenburgh was degraded (the king, quæne, and a great companie of people being preſent) and after his degradation, he was deliuered to the earle of Argile high iuſtice, and the next day the ſaid Culliallan and the ſame prieſt were beheaded. This yære the colege court of iuſtice called the ſeſſions was inſtituted in Edenburgh by the king, with conſent of the three eſtates in parlement aſſembled, and after confirmed in Rome; in the which are fiftæne councellors ordinarie, eight of them being ſpirituall perſons, of the which the moſt ancient is preſident, and ſeuen temporall men, but ſo as by this number the chancellor of the realme is aboue the preſident, when he is preſent. There are alſo foure councellors extraordinarie, remoueable at the princes pleaſure. In the yære 1531, I find little done to make account of, for the erle of Angus remaining in England, could not perſuade the king of England in his fauor to breake the peace with Scotland, though the ſame earle earneſtlie laboured to bring that to paſſe.

castell of Edenburgh, & sir John Sandland knight was sent with authoritie to the hermitage (a castell in Liddesdale) to represse the spoiles and robberies committed there. When of ancient time there had béene no certeine daies and place appointed for the deciding of monie, contentions, or debts amongest the citizens and people of Scotland, John duke of Albanie obteined from the bishop of Rome, that a yearelie summe of monie (as much as should be sufficient to paie the stipend of a few iudges that shuld be appointed therefore) should be leuied of the cleargie, of euerie one according to his estate and substance. Wherupon Galwin Dunbar bishop of Aberden for himselfe in the name of the cleargie, appealed to the said bishop of Rome. Which controuersie continued from the fift Ides of March, vntill the tenth kalends of Maie, at which day the college of the iudges of Edenburgh was established, of whom in the beginning there were many profitable things done, and law was equallie ministred; but yet the same end did not follow which was then hoped amongst them. For since in Scotland there be almost no lawes but such as are decréed by parlement, which are not commonlie perpetuall, but made for a time; and that the iudges as much as in them lieth do hinder the making of such lawes: the goods of all men were committed to the arbitrement of fiftéene men, which haue perpetuall power therfore, being in truth but tyrannicall gouernment, since their onelie arbitrements must stand for law. Thus much Buchanan.

But bicause Lesleus treateth in more ample and other sort of that matter; and for that I will not depriue the reader of the seuerall writings of them both touching one thing: I will also set downe Lesleus words, writing in this order. In this parlement (saith he) by the consent of the states, it séemed good that the forme of iudgement vsed by our ancestors should be taken away. For where certeine of the cleargie, of the barons, and of the citizens, were chosen euerie yeare to trauell ouer the foure parts of the realme, to giue iudgement of ciuill causes (as they terme it) and of other things intangled with the controuersie of law: and that then it oftentimes happened, either by the ignorance of the iudge that did not atteine to the perfection of the law, or by the malice of them which were corrupted with bribes, that the worser part had vniustlie the vpper hand against the righter; to which discommoditie this was also ioined, that no cause could be well examined to the vttermost by one man at one time, bicause the iudges were so often changed; whereby it must néeds folow, that seuerall iudges (hauing seuerall minds and wits) must for one matter giue inconstant & contrarie iudgements. Wherefore to take awaie this varietie of iudgements and other discommodities, wherewith the common-wealth was afflicted; it pleased the parlement by the persuasion of the king, that a certeine defined number of senators (being persons of the greatest knowledge in law) should haue a permanent place at Edenburgh, to decide all matters of controuersie, the maner & order whereof we haue set downe in our former booke, saith Lesleus. And I for my part thinke not vnmet for the more explaning thereof, to set it downe in this place out of the same Lesleus.

The companie (saith he) of these men (whom wee call the senat of the publike wealth) receiue none but such, whose praise of vertue and sharpenesse of wit (especiallie in matters of law) doth aduance them to that place. This court is so apted of the cleargie and secular nobilitie (as a man may tearme them) that the one part of the laitie doth answer the other number of the cleargie. Which we thinke to bée done by the great benefit of God, that the religion and simplicitie of the cleargie may temper the singular wisedome of the temporaltie, obteined by the experience of worldlie causes; and againe, the iudgement of the laitie may further and moderate the pure religion and ancient simplicitie of the cleargie. Ouer all these is one chiefe and head (which is a spirituall man) who hath the highest place in sentence and pronouncing of iudgement; except the iudgement of the chancellor of the kingdome happen to come in place; for then therevnto the Scots giue the chiefest preheminence in all the affaires of the common-wealth. Thus much he.)

In the yéere 1532, sir Arthur Darcie was sent to the borders, who being at Berwike, by the counsell of the earle of Angus then being there, they made a rode into Scotland, and burned certeine places: wherevpon the Scots assembling themselues to defend their countrie, made towards the Englishmen, who retired themselues to Berwike againe. After this were diuerse inuasions made on euerie side vpon the borders, and ships likewise taken by sea, and yet no warre was proclamed. In September, in the yeare 1533, certeine commissioners of either realme were at Newcastell, to intreat for a redresse and recompense to be made for burning of townes and villages, taking of goods, casting downe of piles, taking of ships, slaughters of men, and diuerse other spoiles and iniuries done, as well by the sea as by the land, from the 23 day of Aprill in the yéere 1532, vnto the day of the méeting of the same commissioners; which doings were little lesse in effect than had béene vsed in time of open warre, although the same was not proclamed. Bicause therefore that the scathes & iniuries fell out to be so great on both sides, that particular redresse could not bée had, the order thereof was referred to the pleasure of both the princes.

Further it was agréed, that for a perpetuall peace to be concluded, certeine commissioners should be appointed to treat therof at London, as afterwards they did. For the king of Scotland there were sent as commissioners about this treatie, William Steward bishop of Aberden, Robert Reid the abbat of Kinlos, and sir Adam Sterburie knight [or (as saith Lesleus li.9.pa.439.) Adam Otterburne] the which accompanied with diuerse other knights, barons, and gentlemen, came to London, and were there right honorablie receiued the 25 of March. After they had béene before the kings presence, there were certeine commissioners apointed by him to treat with them of peace, the which agréed vpon certeine conditions and articles for a peace to continue betwixt both kings during their naturall liues, and one yere after the decease of that prince which first chanced to depart this world: and so the commissioners returned into Scotland in the moneth of Maie next insuing.

About the same time were sent into France Dauid Beton abbat of Arbroth, and James Erskin secretarie, as ambassadors to require the duke of Vandosmes sister in mariage for the king: with which motion the ladie and hir friends were verie well contented. Neuertheless (as afterwards shall apéere) the king himselfe passing secretlie into France in proper person, when he had once séene the ladie, he liked hir not; & so became a sutor to the French king his eldest daughter Magdalen, whome he obteined: wherefore the duke of Vandosmes sister would neuer after match hir selfe with anie other in mariage, but professed hir selfe in a house of religion, where she remained the residue of hir life time. The king of England sent ambassadors into Scotland, the bishop of Duresme, sir Thomas Clifford, the prior of Duresme,

✻ The king in thoſe daies did ſhew ſuch hope of honorable vertue in him, that the wiſeſt and the moſt valiant princes of the world did honor him with the ornaments of their orders: for firſt Henrie king of England adopted him into the order of the garter, the emperor made him a fellow of the golden fléece, and ſhortlie after the French king clothed him with the order of ſaint Michaell. In remembrance of all which (for a note to be left to poſteritie) he cauſed the armes of Scotland, honored with theſe thrée orders, to be ſet vp ouer the gate of his palace of Lithquoe, with the ornaments of the honor of ſaint Andrew, which are proper to the kingdome of Scotland.)

Whereunto the king anſwered, that the mariage with England ſhould be moſt profitable, but the ſame was a thing of vncerteine hope, of greater danger & labour, & of longer delaie than his carefulneſſe (being the onelie man left of that line) might well indure. Wherefore of all the emperors kinred, that mariage by manie reaſons ſhould be moſt beneficiall for him, to take to wife the daughter of Chriſtern, king of Denmark, begotten vpon Iſabell ſiſter to the emperor. Immediatlie after his arriuall, he rode in ſecret manner diſguiſed vnto Vandoſmes in Picardie, taking with him but one ſeruant named John Tennent, whome he cauſed to take vpon him as he had béene maiſter; and ſo comming to the duke of Vandoſme his place, got ſight of the ladie who ſhuld haue béene his wife; but not liking hir, he returned againe without talking either with hir or hir friends: and comming to Rouen where his companie were abiding for him, he paſſed from thence towards Paris, where the Dolphin of France was appointed by the king his father to méet him ſeuen leagues from the citie, who brought him to the king, who receiued him in ſuch hartie manner, as if he had béene his owne ſonne, and with as much honor as might haue béene ſhewed to the greateſt prince in earth. There were iuſtes, tourneis, and other princelie paſtimes practiſed and ſet forth; in which iuſtes and other exerciſes of warlike feates, he ſhewed himſelfe as hardie, cunning and valiant, as anie other perſon within all the realme of France, for the which he wan paſſing great praiſe.

In the meane time, he cauſed his ambaſſadors and the noble men that were with him, to declare vnto the king of France, that the cauſe of his comming was for mariage to be had betwéene him and the ladie Magdalen, eldeſt daughter to the king, whome he loued & fauoured aboue all other within his realme. The French king was glad héereof, that the ancient band betwirt Scotland and France might thus with new aliance be confirmed, and therefore declared that he would willinglie giue him his daughter in mariage. But héerewith he let him vnderſtand, that his daughter was much ſubiect to ſickneſſe, and therfore he referred that vnto the king of Scotland his owne pleaſure, whether he would haue hir, or his yongeſt daughter the ladie Margaret, who was after maried to the duke of Sauoy. This offer of choiſe being reported to the king of Scotland, he continued in his former purpoſe, which was, to match with the ladie Magdalen, who was in déed a pleſant yong ladie, beautifull, of good fauour, louelie countenance, and comelie manners, aboue all others within that realme.

At the ſame time alſo, was the ancient league and bond of amitie betwixt the two realmes of Scotland and France renewed, and the day of the ſolemnization of the mariage appointed to be holden the firſt of Januarie.

In the meane time, great preparation for the ſame was made, and all the nobles of France ſent for, to be there at that day. On the which within the church of Noſtre dame in the citie of Paris, the king of Scotland openlie maried the ſaid ladie Magdalen, in preſence of the king hir father, the king of Nauarre, ſeuen cardinals, and diuerſe great dukes, marquelles, earles, lords, barons, biſhops, & others. After the ſolemnization of the mariage, king James remained in France, till the moneth of Maie, paſſing the time with all kind of pleaſure and diſport that might be deuiſed for his honorable interteinement. Finallie, the king and his wife quéene Magdalen tooke their leaue of the king of France their father at Paris, about the latter end of Aprill, and ſo rode to Rouen, where they were receiued with great triumph, and from thence they paſſed downe the riuer to Newhauen where they imbarked, being accompanied by the admerall of France, and manie other noble men of the realme, appointed by the French king to attend vpon them into Scotland, & ſo they ſailed forth with pleaſant wind and proſperous weather, through the ſeas, till they came into the Forth, and there landed at the peare of Liethhauen, the 29 of Maie, in the yeare 1537, where a great number of earles, biſhops, barons, & other noble men & gentlemen of Scotland were readie to receiue them with paſſing ioy and gladneſſe, & from thence with great triumph they were conueied to the abbeie of Holie rood houſe.

Shortlie after, John maiſter of the Forbois, and eldeſt ſonne to the lord Forbois, who had maried a ſiſter of the ſaid ladie Glames, was at Edenburgh likewiſe indicted and conuict by an aſſiſe, by procurement of the earle Huntleie, for the like conſpiracie of the kings death, for the which he was beheaded and quartered, and his head and quarters ſet aloft vpon the gates of Edenburgh. His father the lord Forbois, vpon ſuſpicion of the ſame conſpiracie, was long after kept in priſon within the caſtell of Edenburgh; but at length when nothing might be proued againſt him, he was releaſed and ſet at libertie.

The maiſter of Forbois beheaded.

This yeere, the king in September cauſed iuſtices to ſit in the north parts of the realme, and likewiſe in October; and in the winter following he cauſed the like to be done in the ſouth and weſt parts. The king himſelfe was often times preſent, aſſiſting the lords whome he had appointed his commiſſioners for the furtherance of iuſtice, and maintenance thereof thorough all parts of his realme. ✲ The king appointed an aſſemblie of the nobles, by whoſe conſent an edict was made to confirme the former law, in which all his grants made at Roane in his minoritie were voided and of no authoritie. At what time alſo by the ſaid perſons it was brought to paſſe by great labor, that the kings patrimonie ſhould be augmented with manie poſſeſſions. Wherefore when they perceiued that the kings charge and dignitie could not be mainteined with ſo ſmall reuenues, they aduanced his foure ſonnes (borne of diuerſe women) to the rich abbeies & priories of Melroſſe, Kelſo, Coldingham, Holie rood, and of ſaint Andrewes, whoſe reuenues they tranſferred to the kings coffers ſo long as he liued: by which (perhaps) there came no leſſe monie (ſaith Leſleus) vnto his coffers, than did ariſe of his kinglie inheritance.)

Iuſtices appointed to ſit in diuerſe parts of the realme.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 14. pag. 447.

The king by the aduiſe of theſe noble men of his realme, thinking it neceſſarie for him to match againe in mariage with ſome noble princeſſe, ſent into France vnto the earle of Murrey, and Dauid Beton abbat of Arbroth [whome (as ſaith Leſleus lib. 9. pa. 447) Paule the third had made a cardinall, & they of France had made biſhop of Miropreuſe] his ambaſſadors there reſident, willing them by the aduiſe of the French king to treat for a mariage to be had betwixt him and the ladie Marie de Lorraine, dutcheſſe of Longuile, widow, daughter to the duke of Guiſe. And being aduertiſed from his ſaid ambaſſadors, that the king of France, the ladie hir ſelfe, and hir friends, were well contented therewith, he ſent in the beginning of Maie the lord Robert Marwell, and the maiſter of Glencarne, well accompanied into France, to ioine with his other ambaſſadors for the contracting of that mariage, the which according to their commiſſion treated thereof, and concluded vpon reſolute articles, and ſo eſpouſed hir by procurators, as the vſe is amongſt ſuch eſtates, with great triumph in the citie of Paris, whereat the king and manie noble men were preſent.

After this ſhe was conueied to Newhauen, and there taking the ſeas, paſſed through the ſame till ſhe came to Carell in Fife, where ſhe landed the tenth of June; and from thence ſhe was conueied to the new palace in the abbeie of ſaint Andrewes, being honorablie prepared for the receiuing of hir. And there the king accompanied with manie noble men, openlie ſolemnized and confirmed the foreſaid mariage with the ſaid ladie in the abbeie church, with great ioy and triumph. The king with his quæne remained there the moſt part of that ſummer. And within a few moneths after the mariage, ſhe conceiued with child, to the great comfort of the king and the whole realme, for the hope of ſucceſſion thereby; and therefore generall proceſſions and publike praiers were made thorough all parts of the realme, for the proſperous ſucceſſe of the ſame. After that the king had pacified the borders and all other parts of his realme, by exerciſing of iuſtice, and trauelling about the ſame in his owne perſon through all places (where néed required) ſo that there was as great quietneſſe, reſt, and policie vſed in Scotland, as euer was in anie kings daies before him: yet neuertheleſſe there were certeine diſobedient perſons in the Iles.

Great quietneſſe in Scotland.

The king therefore, to bring them to order, cauſed to prepare a good naule of ſhips, and in the moneth of Maie went aboord the ſame in the rode of Leith, hauing with him the earles of Arrane, Huntleie, Argile, and diuerſe other earles, lords, and barons, with whome he ſailed forth by the coaſts of Fife, Angus, Aberden, Murrey firth, Southerland, and Cathneſſe, till he came to Orkenie, where he landing and all his companie with him, were receiued verie honorablie by the biſhop Robert Marwell. Here they furniſhed themſelues with freſh vittels, and other ſuch things as were neceſſarie; and taking the ſeas againe, ſailed to the Iles of Skie and Lewes, where Mac Clewd of the Lewes, a principall clan of his kin, was brought vnto the king, who ſent forth alſo a companie to Mac Clewd Haugh, who came likewiſe out of his Ile, and preſented himſelfe to the king.

From thence the king ſailed by the coaſt of Roſſe & Kintaile, to the Ile of Tranternes, where diuerſe of the Maconiles, ſuch as the lord Olagarrie, John Moidart, and others (who alledged themſelues to be of the principall bloud, and lords of the Iles) were brought alſo to the kings preſence. From thence trauelling through the reſidue of the Iles, Maclane and James Maconile of Kinter, being the two principall capteins of the ſmall Iles, came likewiſe to the king who at length landed at Dunbreton, and ſent the capteins and ſhips with priſoners to paſſe the ſame waie he came round about the coaſt, ſo to come to Edenburgh, where the ſame priſoners being arriued, the chiefe heads of them were kept in ward as pledges for good rule in their countries, and were not ſuffered to depart ſo long as the king liued, whereby there followed great quietneſſe, and as good obedience to the lawes throughout all the Iles, as there was in anie part of the realme; and as good account and paiment made to the kings controller in his exchekер for the lands of the ſame Iles perteining to the crowne, as for anie part of the reuenues belonging thereunto within the maine land. [In this yéere (ſaith Buchanan lib. 4.) were manie taken for Lutherantſme, whereof ſome were burnt; nine recanted, and manie were baniſhed: amongeſt whom, George Buchanan was one, who eſcaped by a rope out of a windowe of a chamber.]

Whileſt the king was in this voiage, the quéene was deliuered of a ſonne at ſaint Andrewes, whereof the king being aduertiſed at his landing, haſted with all poſſible diligence to the quéene, and ſhortlie after was the child baptiſed, and called James. The archbiſhop of ſaint Andrewes, and the earle of Arrane were godfathers, and the quéene the kings mother was godmother. For the birth of this prince, there were bounfiers made through all parts of the realme, with great triumph and giuing of thanks to God for the ſame. After this the quéene, mother to the king, returned vnto Methwen, where after ſhe had remained a certeine time, a ſickneſſe toke hir, of the which ſhortlie after ſhe departed this life, and was buried in the Charterhouſe church of ſaint Johns towne, by the toome of king James the firſt. The king himſelfe and manie nobles of the realme were preſent at the funerals, which were kept in moſt ſolemne and pompous manner.

The quéene mother departed this life.

The ſame yeare were burnt at Edenburgh for hereſie (as it was then taken) a regular canon, two blacke friers, and a ſecular man. Also two prieſts were degraded, and condemned to perpetuall priſon. The ſame time there was a graie frier in the citie of Glaſcow burnt for the like cauſe, and manie other ſummoned; and becauſe they would not appeare, they were denounced heretikes. About the ſame time, James Beton archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews, a man of great age departed this life, and was buried in ſaint Andrews. Before his departure, he had prouided ſucceſſors to all his benefices, firſt to his archbiſhops ſée, and to the abbeie of Arbroth, maiſter Dauid Beton, afterwards cardinall; and to the abbeie of Dunfermling maiſter George Durie that was archdeacon of ſaint Andrews. Theſe men, without anie gaineſaieng of the king, entered with his good will into the ſame benefices, immediatlie after his deceaſſe. This James Beton builded a great part of the new college of ſaint Andrewes, and left great ſummes of monie and treaſure to go through to make an end of the ſame worke.

The death of James Beton archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews.

This yeare in the moneth of Auguſt ſir James Hamilton of Finhart knight, remaining as then in the towne of Edenburgh, was arreſted by Dauid Wood controller to the king, who charged him in the kings name to go to ward within the caſtell of Edenburgh. Which commandement he willinglie obeied, thinking himſelfe ſure inough, as well by reaſon of the good ſeruice he had done to the king, ſpeciallie in reparing the palaces of Striueling and Linletgew; as alſo for that the king had him in ſo high fauor, that he ſtood in no feare of himſelfe at all. Neuertheleſſe, ſhortlie after he was brought forth to iudgement, and conuict in the Tolbuith of Edenburgh, of certeine points of treaſon laid againſt him, which he would neuer confeſſe; but that notwithſtanding, he was beheaded in the moneth of September next inſuing [after that he had liberallie confeſſed at the place of execution, that he had neuer in anie iot offended the kings maieſtie, and that this death was yet worthilie inflicted vpon him by the diuine iuſtice; becauſe he had often offended the law of God to pleaſe the prince, thereby to obteine greater countenance with him. Wherefore he admoniſhed all perſons, that (moued by his example) they ſhould rather follow the diuine pleaſure, than vniuſtlie ſéeke the kings fauor, ſince it is better to pleaſe God than man.]

This ſummer the quéene remaining at Striueling, was deliuered of an other prince, which was baptiſed in the chappell of Striueling, and called Arthur: but within eight daies after, the ſaid prince deceaſſed at Striueling aforeſaid. On the verie ſame daie, prince James the kings eldeſt ſonne being at ſaint Andrews departed this life alſo, in ſuch wiſe, that there was but onlie ſix houres betwixt the time of their departures out of this world; which cauſed no leſſe lamentation through the whole realme, than there was ioy at their births. After this, the quéene went vnto ſaint Johns towne, where ſhe was honorablie receiued with great triumph made by the towne. She was accompanied with the principall men of the countrie, and from thence ſhe roade to Aberden, the king then being come vnto hir, where, by the towne and vniuerſitie they were receiued with great ioy, triumph, pageants, verſes, & plaies, ſet forth in the beſt maner for their paſtime. They remained there the ſpace of fiftéene daies, and were highlie interteined by the biſhop of that place.

There were exerciſes and diſputations held in all kind of ſciences in the colleges and ſchooles, with diuerſe orations made in Greéke, Latine, and other languages, to the high praiſe and commendation of the maiſters & ſtudents in that vniuerſitie. dæ, where a costlie entrie was prepared for them also, and after they had bene right princelie interteined there, they came to Falkeland. In the moneth of Maie, sir John Borthwike, commonlie called capteine Borthwike, suspected, defamed, and accused of heresie, was summoned to appeare in saint Andrews before the cardinall, and diuerse other bishops and prelats there present, where (notwithstanding his absence) the same being proued by sufficient witnesse against him (as was thought) he was conuicted and declared an heretike. An image was made to resemble him, and at the market crosse of the said citie, as a signe and memoriall of his condemnation, it was burned, to the feare of others, but he himselfe escaped their hands and got into England, where he was receiued.

☆The king of Scots (hearing of the maner of the king of England, and how he honored himselfe) toke in euill part, that the king of England in all generall assemblies of the states of Ireland did call himselfe king of Ireland, when all his predecessors before were onelie intituled by the names of lords of Ireland. For by that new title, king James his authoritie did seeme to be diminished, when the king of England did write himselfe king of all Ireland: whereof a portion by manie ages was vnder the rule of the king of Scots. Yet at length K. James did yeeld thereunto; and that the rather, because the king of England vnder this title and authoritie, did not dispossesse the heires of the Scot Makeconell; and other his Scots of those lands which they there inioied in that countrie.]

A small portion in deed.

1541. The king of England sendeth to the king of Scots.

This yeare the king of England aduertised of the meeting of the emperor, the French king, and pope, at the citie of Nice, doubting some practise to be deuised there against him, sent to the king of Scotland the bishop of saint Dauids, & the lord William Howard, desiring him as his most tender kinsman and nephue, to meete him at the citie of Yorke in England, where he would communicat such things with him, as should be for the weale of both the realmes. And therewith the king of England, trusting that the king of Scotland would haue fulfilled his desire, caused great preparation to be made at Yorke for the receiuing of him. But albeit the king of Scotland was willing of himselfe to haue passed into England, to haue met and seene his vncle; yet after long reasoning and deliberation of his councell and prelats [especiallie James Beton bishop of saint Andrews, and George Trichtoune bishop of Aberden (as saith Buchanan. lib. 14.] assembled for that purpose, casting in their minds (as they toke it) what danger might fall to him and his realme, if he should passe into England, in case he should be staied and holden there, contrarie to his will, as king James his predecessor was, hauing no succession of his bodie.

Fr. Thin.

And againe, for that it was certeinelie knowen, that the principall cause, why the king of England required this meeting or interuiew, was to persuade the king of Scotland to vse the like order in Scotland, as he had done within his realme of England, in abolishing the popes authoritie, making himselfe supreame head of the church, expelling religious persons out of their houses, and seizing the iewels of their houses, their lands and rents, and such like information. And if it chanced the king should attempt the like, they should lose the friendship which was betwixt him, the pope, the emperor, and French king, that were his great friends and confederats. Hereupon they persuaded him to staie, and by their aduise sent pleasant letters & messages vnto the said king of England, desiring him to haue him excused, for that he could not come into England at that time, hauing such lets and causes of abiding at home, as shortlie he should vnderstand by his ambassadors, whom he ment to send to him, as well for this matter as other causes. And shortlie after sir James Leirmouth was appointed to go as ambassador into England, as well to make the kings excuse for his not comming to meet the king of England at Yorke; as also to make complaint vpon certeine inuasions made by the borderers of England into Scotland, and also for the vsing of the debatable ground betwixt the two realmes.

Sir James Leirmouth ambassador into England

But the king of England sore offended that the king of Scots would not satisfie his request, to meet him at Yorke (as before is recited, would admit no excuse, but determined to make warre into Scotland, albeit as the Scotishmen allege, he would not suffer the same to be vnderstood, till he had prepared all things in a redinesse. In the meane time he sent commissioners to meet with the Scots commissioners vpon the debatable ground, to talke for redresse to be made of harmes done vpon the borders, but no good conclusion could be agreed vpon by these commissioners, neither touching the debatable land, nor yet for reparing of wrongs done by the inuasions. ¶ But that the truth concerning the causes of this war, moued at this present by that noble prince king Henrie the eight, may the better appeare; I haue thought good here to set downe the same, as they were drawen forth and published in print to the whole world by the said king in a little pamphlet, vnder this title.

1542. The king of England meaneth to make warre into Scotland.

A declaration conteining the iust causes and considerations of this present warre with the Scots, wherein also appeareth the true and right title that the kings most roiall maiestie hath to his souereigntie of Scotland, and thus it beginneth.

A declaration of the iust causes of the warre against the king of Scots.

BEing now inforced to the warre which we haue alwaies hitherto so much abhorred & fled, by our neighbour & nephew the K. of Scots, one who aboue all other for our manifold benefits toward him, hath most iust cause to loue vs, and to reioise in our quietnesse; we haue thought good to notifie vnto the world his doings and behauiour in the prouocation of this war, & likewise the meanes & waies by vs to eschew & auoid it, & the iust & true occasions wherby we be now prouoked to prosecute the same, and by vtterance and diuulging of that matter, to disburden some part of our inward displeasure and griefe: and the circumstances knowen, to lament openlie with the world the infidelitie of this time, in which things of such enormitie do burst out and appeare.

the king of Scots our nephue & neighbor, whome we in his youth and tender age preserued and mainteined from the great danger of others, and by our authoritie and power conduced him safelie to the roiall possession of his estate, he now compelleth & inforceth vs (for preseruation of our honor & right) to vse our puissance & power against him. The like vnkindnesse hath beene heretofore shewed by other in semblable cases against Gods law, mans law, & all humanitie; but the oftener it chanceth, the more it is to be abhorred, and yet in the persons of princes, for the raritie of them, can so happen but seldome as it hath now come to passe. It hath beene verie rarelie & seldome seene tofore, that a king of Scots hath had in mariage a daughter of England. We cannot nor will not reprehend the king our fathers act therein, but lament and be sorie that it toke no better effect.

The king our father in that matter minded loue, amitie, amitie, and perpetuall friendſhip betwéene the poſteritie of both: which how ſone it failed, the death of the king of Scots, as a due punihment of God, for his vniuſt inuaſion into this our realme, is and ſhall be a perpetuall teſtimonie of their reproch for euer. And yet in that preſent time could not the vnkindneſſe of the father extinguiſh in vs the naturall loue of our nephue his ſonne, being then in the miſerable age of tender youth. But we then forgetting the diſpleaſure that ſhould haue worthilie prouoked vs to inuade that realme, nouriſhed and brought vp our nephue, to atchiue his fathers poſſeſſion and gouernement, wherein he now ſo vnkindlie vſeth and behaueth himſelfe towards vs, as he compelleth vs to take armor and warre againſt him.

It is ſpeciallie to be noted, vpon what grounds, and by what means we be compelled to this warre, wherin among other is our chiefe greéfe and diſpleaſure, that vnder a colour of faire ſpeach and flattering words, we be indéed ſo iniuried, contemned and deſpiſed, as we ought not with ſufferance to permit and paſſe ouer. Words, writings, letters, meſſages, ambaſſages, excuſes, allegations, could not more pleaſantlie, more gentlie, nor more reuerentlie be deuiſed and ſent, than hath béene made on the king of Scots behalfe vnto vs; and euer we truſted the trée would bring forth good fruit, that was of the one part of ſo good a ſtocke, and continuallie in appearance put forth ſo faire buds: and therefore would hardlie beléeue or giue eare to other, that euer alledged the déeds of the contrarie, being neuertheleſſe the ſame déeds ſo manifeſt, as we muſt néeds haue regarded them, had not we bin ſo loth to thinke euill of our nephue, whome we had ſo manie waies bound to be of the beſt ſort toward vs.

And therefore hauing a meſſage ſent vnto vs the yéere paſt, from our ſaid nephue, and a promiſe made for the repairing of the ſaid king of Scots vnto vs to Yorke, and after great preparation on our part made therefore, the ſame méeting was not onelie diſappointed, but alſo at our being at Yorke in the lieu thereof, an inuaſion made by our ſaid nephue his ſubiects into our land, declaring an euident contempt and deſpite of vs. We were yet glad to impute the default of the méeting to the aduiſe of his councell, and the inuaſion to the lewdneſſe of his ſubiects, and according thereunto gaue as benigne and gentle audience to ſuch ambaſſadors as repaired hither at Chriſtmas afterward, as if no ſuch cauſe of diſpleaſure had occurred, ſpeciallie conſidering the good words, ſweet words, pleaſant words, effſones proponed by the ſaid ambaſſadors, not onelie to excuſe that was paſt, but alſo to perſuade kindneſſe and perfect amitie to inſue.

And albeit the king of Scots hauing (contrarie to the article of the league of amitie) receiued and interteined ſuch rebels as were of the chéefe and principall, in ſtirring the inſurrection in the north againſt vs, with refuſall before time, vpon requeſt made to reſtore the ſame; yet neuertheleſſe, vpon offer made, the ſaid ambaſſadors to ſend commiſſion to the borderers, to determine debates of the confines in the ſame, with ſo great a pretenſe of amitie, and ſo faire words as could be in ſpéech deſired, we were content for the time to forbeare to preſſe them ouer extreamlie in the matter of rebels. Alleit we neuer remitted the ſame, but deſiring to make triall of our ſaid nephue in ſome correſpondence of déeds, condeſcended to the ſending of commiſſioners to the borders, which to our great charge we did, and the king of Scots our ſaid nephue the ſemblable.

Where after great trauell made by our commiſſioners, this fruit inſued, that being for our part challenged, a péece of our ground plainlie vſurped by the Scots, and of no great value, being alſo for the ſame ſhewed ſuch euidence, as more ſubſtantiall, more authentike, plaine and euident, cannot be brought forth for anie part of ground within our realme: the ſame was neuertheleſſe by them denied, refuſed, and the euidence onelie for this cauſe reiected, that it was made (as they alledged) by Engliſhmen: and yet it was ſo ancient, as it could not be counterfeit now, and the value of the ground ſo little, and of ſo ſmall weight, as no man would haue attempted to falſifie for ſuch a matter. And yet this deniall being in this wiſe made vnto our commiſſioners, they neuertheleſſe by our commandement departed as friends from the commiſſioners of Scotland, taking order as hath béene accuſtomed, for good rule vpon the borders in the meane time.

After which their receſſe, the lord Warwell warden of the weſt marches of Scotland, made proclamation for good rule; but yet added therwith, that the borderers of Scotland ſhould withdraw their goods from the borderers of England; and incontinent the Scotiſhmen borderers, the fourth of Julie entered into our realme ſuddenlie, and ſpoiled our ſubiects contrarie to our leagues, euen after ſuch extremitie as it had béene in the time of open warre, whereat we much maruelled, and were compelled therefore to furniſh our borders with a garriſon for defenſe of the ſame. Whereupon the king of Scots ſent vnto vs James Leirmouth maiſter of his houſhold, with letters deuiſed in the moſt pleaſant maner, offering redreſſe & reformation of all attempts. And yet neuertheleſſe, at the entrie of the ſaid Leirmouth into England, a great number of the Scots then not loked for, made a forraie into our borders, to the great annoiance of our ſubiects, & to their extreame detriment. Wherewith, and with that vnſeemelie diſſimulation, we were not a little moued, as reaſon would we ſhould; and yet did we not finallie ſo extreamelie proſecute and continue our ſaid diſpleaſure, but that we gaue benigne audience to the ſaid Leirmouth, and ſuffered our ſelfe to be ſomewhat altered by his words and faire promiſes, tending to the perſuaſion that we euer deſired, to find the king of Scots ſuch a nephue vnto vs, as our proximitie of blond (with our gratuitie vnto him) did require.

In the meane time of theſe faire words, the déeds of the borderers were as extreame as might be, and our ſubiects ſpoiled: and in a rode made by ſir Robert Bowes for a reuenge thereof, the ſame ſir Robert Bowes, with manie other were taken priſoners, and yet deteined in Scotland without putting them to fine or ranſome, as hath béene euer accuſtomed. And being at the ſame time a ſurſeſance made on both ſides, at the ſute of the ſaid Leirmouth for a ſeaſon; the Scots ceaſſed not to make ſundre inuaſions into our realme, in ſuch wiſe as we were compelled to forget faire words, and onelie to conſider the king of Scots déeds, which appeared vnto vs of that ſort, as they ought not for our dutie in defenſe of our ſubiects, ne could not in reſpect of our honor, be paſſed ouer vnreformed: and therefore put in a readineſſe our armie, as a due meane whereby we might atteine ſuch a peace, as for the ſafegard of our ſubiects we be bound to procure.

After which preparation made, and knowledge had thereof, the king of Scots ceaſſed not to vſe his accuſtomed meane of faire words, which in our naturall inclination wrought effſones their accuſtomed effect, euermore deſirous to find in the king of Scots ſuch regard & reſpect to be declared in déeds, as the correſpondence of naturall loue in the nephue to ſuch an vncle, as we haue ſhewed our ſelfe toward him, doth require. Wherefore vpon new requeſt and ſute made vnto vs, we determined to ſtaie our armie

" mie at Yorke, appointing the duke of Norffolke our " lieutenant, the Lord priuie seale, the bishop of Dur" ham, and the maister of our horsses, there to com-
" men, treat, and conclude with the ambassadors of " Scotland, for an amitie and peace, vpon such condi" tions, as by reason and equitie were indifferent,
" whereby the warre might be eschewed, being by sun" drie inuasions of the Scots then opened & manifest.
" In this communication betweene our and their " commissioners, after diuerse degrees of commission
" shewed by the Scots, and finallie one that was by " our commissioners allowed, matters were propo-
" ned for conclusion of amitie, nothing difficill or hard
" of our part, but so agreeable to reason, as the com" missioners of Scotland said they doubted not, but " if it might be brought to passe that the king of Scots
" our nephue might haue a meeting with vs, all mat" ters should easilie be compounded and determined:
" wherevpon they left speaking of anie articles of a-" mitie, and the ambassadors of Scotland made much " outward ioy in communication of meeting. They " shewed themselues in words, fashion, and behauior
" much to delight in it, to reioise in it, and therewith
" thought it easie and facile to be concluded and ac" complished, and for their part they toke it then for a " thing passed, a thing concluded, and most certeine to " take effect, and onelie desired sir daies to obteine an" swer from their maister, and our armie, from that " time to staie and go no further: whereunto our com" missioners then agreed.
" After these sir daies was sent a commission out " of Scotland, with power to conclude a meeting pre-" cislie at such a place, as they knew well we should " not, nor could not in winter obserue & keepe. Where" with when our commissioners were miscontent,
" the ambassadors of Scotland to relieue that displea" sure, and to temper the matter whereby to win more " time, shewed forth their instructions, wherein liber-
" tie was giuen to the ambassadours to exceed their " commission in the appointment of the place, and to " consent to anie other that by our commissioners
" should be thought conuenient. Which maner of pro" ceeding when our commissioners refused, alledging
" that they would not conclude a meeting with men
" hauing no commission thereunto: the ambassadors
" of Scotland vpon pretense to send for a more am" ple and large commission, agreeable to their instruc" tions for appointment of the place, obteined a de-" laie of other six daies, to send for the ample commis" sion without restraint of place.
" Now after these six daies they brought forth a " new commission, made in a good forme, and without " exception: but therewith also they shewed new in" structions, conteining such a restraint as the former " commission did conteine, so as the libertie giuen to
" the commissioners in the commission was now at " the last remoued and taken awaie by the instructi" ons, with addition of a speciall charge to the ambas" sadors, not to exceed the same. And thus, first the am" bassadors of Scotland seemed to haue a will and de" sire to conclude on a place seemelie and conuenient,
" which for want of commission they might not do,
" and at the last might haue concluded a meeting by " vertue of their commission; and then for feare of the " commandement in their second instructions they
" durst not. And so they shewed their first instructions
" partlie to excuse their king, who should seeme secret-
" lie to will more than in the commission he did open-
" lie professe.
" Then with an ample commission from the king,
" they shewed their secret instructions for defense of " themselues, why they proceeded not according to " their commission, not caring how much they char" ged therein the king, whose fault they disclosed to discharge themselues, trusting that by the benefit of the winter approching, and the time lost in their com- " munication, their maister should be defended a- " gainst our power for this yeere, without doing for " their part that by honor, right, law, and leagues they " be obliged and bound to do. And in this meane time our subiects being taken prisoners in Scotland, " could not be deliuered vpon any ransome, contrarie to all custome and vsage of the borderers in the time " of peace and warre: and in this meane time staied a " great part of our armie alreadie pressed, and in our "
wages to go forward.
In this time ambassadors (as ye haue heard) as- " sembled to talke of an amitie, but concluded none. "
The treating of amitie was put ouer by communi- " cation of a meeting. The communication of meeting " was so handled by alteration of commission and in- " structions on their behalfe, as it appeareth a plaine deuise onelie inuented for a delaie, which hath giuen vs light, wherupon more certeinly to iudge the king " of Scots inward affection toward vs: whose deeds " and words well weied and considered, do vs plain-lie to vnderstand, how he hath continuallie labored " to abuse vs with sweet and pleasant words, and to sa- " tisfie the appetites of other at home and abroad with " his vnkind and displeasant deeds. In his words he professeth an indissoluble amitie, he allegeth kinred, " he acknowledgeth benefits; onlie the fault is, that he "
speaketh another language to all the world in deeds, " and thereby so toucheth vs in honor and denegation of iustice, as we be inforced and compelled to vse the " sword, which God hath put in our hands as an ex- " treme remedie, whereby to obteine both quietnesse for our subiects, and also that is due to vs by right, pacts, and leagues. "
We haue patientlie suffered manie delusions, " and notablie the last yeere, when we made prepara- " tion at Yorke for his repaire to vs. But should we " sutfer our people and subiects to be so oft spoiled & without remedie? This is done by the Scots, what- " soeuer their words be. Should we suffer our rebels to be deteined contrarie to the leagues without re- " medie? This is also done by them, whatsoeuer their " words be. Should we suffer our land to be vsurped contrarie to our most plaine euidence, onelie vpon a will, pride and arrogancie of the other partie? This " is done by them whatsoeuer their words be. All these be ouer presumptuouslie done against vs, and giue such signification of their arrogancie, as it is neces- " sarie for vs to oppresse it in the beginning, least they " should gather further courage, to the greater displea- " sure of vs and our posteritie hereafter. And yet in the " intreating of this matter, if we had not euidentlie perceiued the lacke of such affection as proximitie of " bloud should require; we would rather haue remitted these iniuries in respect of proximitie of bloud, to "
our nephue, than we did tofore his fathers inuasion. "
But weieng that we be so suerlie ascerteined of "
the lacke thereof, and that our bloud is there frozen with the cold aire of Scotland, there was neuer " prince more violentlie compelled to war, than we be "
by the vnkind dealing, vniust behauior, & vnprince- " lie demeanor of him, that yet in nature is our nephue, & in his acts and deeds declareth himselfe not to " be moued therwith, nor to haue such earnest regard " to the obseruation of his pacts & leagues, nor such re- " spect to the interteinment of the administration of iustice, as naturall equitie bindeth, & conseruation of " equitie requireth. Which we much lament & be sorie " for, & vse now our force and puissance against him, not for reuengement of our priuate displeasure (be- " ing so often deliuered as we haue bene) but for re- " couerie of our right, the preseruation of our subiects " from iniuries, and the obseruation of such leagues "

as

"as haue paſſed betweene vs, firmelie truſting, that "almightie God, vnder whome we reigne, will aſſiſt
"& aid our iuſt proceedings herein, to the furtherance
"and aduancement of the right, which we doubt not
"ſhall euer preuaile againſt wrong, falſhod, deceipt,
"and diſſimulation.

Hitherto appeareth how this preſent warre hath "not proceeded of anie demand of our right of our ſu"periozitie, which the kings of Scots haue alwaies
"knowledged by homage and fealtie to our progeni-"tozs euen from the beginning: but this warre hath "beene prouoked and occaſioned vpon preſent mat"ter of diſpleaſure, preſent iniurie, preſent wrong mi-
"niſtred by the nephue to the vncle moſt vnnatural"lie, and ſupozted contrarie to the deſerts of our be"nefits moſt vnkindlie, if we had minded the poſſeſſi-"on of Scotland, and by the motion of warre to at-
"teine the ſame, there was neuer king of this realme
"had mozе opportunitie in the minozitie of our ne-
"phue, noz in anie other realme a prince that hath
"mozе iuſt title, mozе euident title, mozе certeine
"title, to any realme that he can claime, than we haue
"to Scotland.

"This title is not deuiſed by pretenſe of mariage,
"noz imagined by couenant, noz contriued by inuen-
"tion of argument, but lineallie deſcended from the "beginning of that eſtate eſtabliſhed by our progeni-"tozs, and recogniſed ſucceſſiuelie of the kings of "Scotland, by deeds, wozds, acts, and writings conti-
"nuallie almoſt without interruption, oz at the leaſt
"intermiſſion, till the reigne of our progenitoz king
"Henrie the firſt, in whoſe time the Scots abuſed the "ciuill warre of this realme, to their licence and bold-
"neſſe, in omitting of their dutie: which foz the pozti"mitie of bloud betweene vs, we haue beene ſlacke to "require of them, being alſo of our ſelfe inclined to "peace, as we haue euer beene alwaies glad, rather "without preiudice to omit to demand our right if it "might conſerue peace, than by demanding thereof
"to be ſeene to moue warre, ſpeciallie againſt our "neighbour, againſt our nephue, againſt him whome
"we haue preſerued from danger, and in ſuch a time
"as it were expedient foz all chriſtendome to be in v"nitie and peace, whereby to be mozе able to reſiſt the "common enimie the Turke.

"But foz what conſiderations we haue omitted
"to ſpeake hitherto of the matter, it is neuertheleſſe
"true, that the kings of Scots haue alwaies acknow"ledged the kings of England ſuperioz lozds of the "realme of Scotland, & haue done homage and feal-
"tie foz the ſame. This appereth firſt in hiſtozies wzit-
"ten by ſuch, as foz confirmation of the truth in me"mozie haue trulie noted and ſignified the ſame. Se-
"condlie, it apeareth by inſtruments of homage
"made by the kings of Scots, and diuerſe notable
"perſonages of Scotland, at diuerſe & ſundzie times
"ſealed with their ſeales, and remaining in our trea"ſurie. Thirdlie, it appeareth by regiſters and re-"cozds iudiciallie and autenticallie made, yet preſer-
"ued foz confirmation of the ſame. So as the mat"ter of title beeing moſt plaine, is furniſhed alſo
"with all maner of euidences foz declaration there-
"of.

"Firſt, as concerning hiſtozies, which be called "witneſſes of times, the light of truth, and the life of "memozie, and finallie the conuenient way & meane "whereby the things of antiquitie may be bzought to "mens knowledge, they ſhew as plainlie this matter
"as could be wiſhed oz required, with ſuch a conſent
"of writers as could not ſo agree vpon an vntruth, "conteining a declaration of ſuch matter as hath "moſt euident pzobabilitie and apparance. Foz as it "is pzobable and likelie, that foz the better adminiſtra"tion of iuſtice amongeſt rude people, two oz mozе of one eſtate might be rulers in one countrie, vnited as this Ile is: ſo it is pzobable and likelie, that in the beginning it was ſo ozdered foz auoiding diſſen-tion, that there ſhould be one ſuperiour, in right of whom the ſaid eſtates ſhould depend.

Accozding whereunto we read, how Bzute, of whome the realme then called Bzitaine toke firſt that name (being befozе that time inhabited with giants, a people without ozder oz ciuilitie) had thzee ſonnes, Locrine, Albanact, and Camber, who determining to haue the whole Ile within the ocean ſea to be after gouerned by them thzee, appointed Albanact to rule that now is called Scotland, Camber the parties of Wales, and Locrine that now is called England: vnto whom (as being the eldeſt ſonne)
the other two bzethzen ſhould doo homage, recogniſing and knowledging him as their ſuperioz. Now conſider, if Bzute conquered all this Iland, as the hiſtozie ſaith he did, and then in his owne time made this ozder of ſuperiozitie as afozезhow can there be a title deuiſed of a mozе plaine beginning, a mozе iuſt beginning, a mozе conuenient beginning, foz the oz-der of this Iland, at that time ſpeciallie, when the people were rude? Which cannot without continuall ſtriſe and variance conteine two oz thzee rulers in all points equall without any maner of ſuperiozitie, the inward conſcience and remozſe of which ſuperioritie ſhould in ſome part dull and diminiſh the peruerſe courage of reſiſtance and rebellion.

The firſt diuiſion of this Ile, we find wzitten after this ſozt, without cauſe of ſuſpicion why they ſhould wzite amiſſe. And accozding hereunto we find alſo in hiſtozie ſet fozth by diuerſe, how foz tranſgreſſion againſt this ſuperiozitie, our predeceſſozs haue cha-ſtiſed the kings of Scots, and ſome depoſed, and put other in their places. We will here omit to ſpeake of the rudeneſſe of the antiquitie in particularitie, which they cared not diſtinctlie to commit to wziting.
But ſome authozs, as Antonius Sabellicus, amongſt other, diligentlie ſearching what he might trulie wzite of all Europe and the Ilands adioining, ouer and beſides that which he wziteth of the natures, ma-ners, and conditions of the Scots, which who ſo liſt to read, ſhall find to haue beene the verie ſame in times paſt, that we find them now at this preſent: he calleth Scotland, part of England, which is agreeable to the diuiſion afozeſaid, being in deed as in the land continuall without ſeparation of the ſea, ſo alſo by homage and fealtie vnited vnto the ſame; as by particular declarations ſhall moſt manifeſtlie appeere, by the teſtimonie of ſuch as haue left wzitting foz pzoфe and confirmation thereof.

In which matter, paſſing the death of king Humber, the acts of Dunwald king of this realme of England, the diuiſion of Beline and Bzen two bzethzen, the victozies of king Arthur; we ſhall begin at the yeere of our Lozd, nine hundzed, which is fiz hundzed fozтie two yeeres paſt, a time of ſufficient anciencie, from which we ſhall make ſpeciall declaration and euident pzoфe of the execution of our right and title of ſuperiozitie euermozе continued and preſerued hitherto. Edward the firſt, befozе the conqueſt, ſonne to Alured king of England, had vnder his dominion and obedience the king of Scots. And here is to be noted, that this matter was ſo notozious and manifeſt, as Marian a Scot, wziting that ſtozie in thoſe dates, graunteth, confeſſeth, & teſtifieth the ſame:
and this dominion continued in that ſtate thzee and twentie yeeres.

At which time Athelſtane ſucceeded in the crowne of England, and hauing by battell conquered Scotland, he made one Conſtantine king of that partie, to rule and gouerne the countrie of Scotland vnder him, adding this pzincelie wozd, that it was mozе

honorable to him to make a king, than to be a king. Twentie foure yéeres after that, which was the yéere of our Lord 947, king Eldred our progenitor Athelſtanes brother, tooke homage of Iriſe then king of Scots. Thirtie yéeres after that, which was in the yéere of our Lord 977, king Edgar our predeceſſor tooke homage of Kinald king of Scots. Héere was a litle trouble in England by the death of ſaint Edward king and martyr, deſtroied by the deceit of his mother in law. But yet within memorie, fortie yéers after the homage done by Kinald to king Edgar, that is to ſay, in the yéere of our Lord 1018, Malcolme king of Scots did homage to Knute our predeceſſor.

After this homage done, the Scots vttered ſome péece of their naturall diſpoſition: wherevpon, by warre made by our progenitor ſaint Edward the confeſſor, twentie nine yéeres after homage done, that is to ſay, the yéere of our Lord 1056, Malcolme king of Scots was vanquiſhed, and the realme giuen to Malcolme his ſonne, by our ſaid progenitor ſaint Edward: to whome the ſaid Malcolme made homage and fealtie, within eleuen yéeres after that William Conqueror entered this realme, whereof he accounted no perfect conqueſt, vntill he had likewiſe ſubdued the Scots. And therefore in the ſaid yéere, which was in the yéere of our Lord 1068, the ſaid Malcolme king of Scots did homage to the ſaid William Conqueror, as his ſuperior by conqueſt king of England. Twentie fiue yéeres after that, which was in the yéere of our Lord 1092, the ſaid Malcolme did homage and fealtie to William Rufus, ſonne to the ſaid William Conqueror: and yet after that was for his offenſes and demerits depoſed, and his ſonne ſubſtitute in his place, who likewiſe failed of his dutie: and therefore was ordeined in that eſtate (by the ſaid William Rufus) Edgar, brother to the laſt Malcolme, and ſonne to the firſt, who did homage and fealtie accordinglie.

Seuen yéeres after, that was in the yéere of our Lord 1100, the ſaid Edgar K. of Scots did homage vnto Henrie the firſt our progenitor. Thirtie ſeauen yéeres after that, Dauid king of Scots did homage to Mathild the empreſſe, as daughter and heire to Henrie the firſt. Wherefore, being after required by Stephan, then obteining poſſeſſion of the realme, to make his homage, he refuſed ſo to do, becauſe he had before made it to the ſaid Mathild, and therevpon forbare. After which Dauids death, which inſued ſhortlie after, the ſonne of the ſaid Dauid made homage to the ſaid king Stephan. Fouretéene yéeres after that, which was in the yéere of our Lord, a thouſand one hundred and fiftie, William king of Scots, and Dauid his brother, with all the nobles of Scotland, made homage to Henrie the ſeconds ſonne, with a reſeruation of their dutie to Henrie the ſecond his father. Twentie fiue yéeres after, which was in the yéere of our Lord 1175, William king of Scotland, after much rebellion & reſiſtance, according to their naturall inclination, king Henrie the ſecond then being in Normandie, William then king of Scots knowledged finallie his error, and made his peace and compoſition, confirmed with his great ſeale, and the ſeales of the nobilitie of Scotland, making therewith his homage and fealtie.

Within fiftéene yéeres after that, which was the yéere of our Lord 1190, the ſaid William king of Scots came to our citie of Canturburie, and there did homage to our noble progenitor king Richard the firſt. Fouretéene yéeres after that, the ſaid William did homage to our progenitor king John, vpon a hill beſides Lincolne, making his oth vpon the croſſe of Hubert then archbiſhop of Canturburie, being there preſent, a maruellous multitude aſſembled for that purpoſe. Twentie ſix yéeres after that, which was in the yéere of our Lord 1216, Alexander king of Scots maried Margaret, the daughter of our progenitor Henrie the third, at our citie of Yorke, in the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe, at which time the ſaid Alexander did his homage to our ſaid progenitor, who reigned in this realme fiftie ſix yéers. And therfore betwéene the homage made by the ſaid Alexander king of Scots, and the homage done by Alexander, ſonne to the ſaid king of Scots, to Edward the firſt at his coronation at Weſtminſter, there was about fiftie yéeres: at which time the ſaid Alexander king of Scots repaired to the ſaid feaſt of coronation, and there did his dutie, as is afore ſaid. Within twentie eight yéeres after that, which was in the yéere of our Lord 1282, John Baliol king of Scots made his homage and fealtie to the ſaid king Edward the firſt our progenitor.

After this began Robert Bruſe to vſurpe the crowne of Scotland, and to moue ſedition therefore againſt them of the houſe of Baliol, which made for a ſeaſon ſome interruption in the ſaid homage; but yet no intermiſſion without the termes of memorie: for within fortie foure yéeres after, which was the yéere of our Lord 1326, Edward Baliol after a great victorie had in Scotland againſt the other faction, and inioieng the crowne of Scotland, made homage to our progenitor Edward the third. And twentie yéeres after that, which was in the yéere of our Lord 1346, Dauid Bruſe, who was euer in the contrarie faction, did neuertheleſſe in the title of the crowne of Scotland, wherof he was then in poſſeſſion, make homage to our ſaid progenitor Edward the third.

Within nine yéeres after this, Edward the third, to chaſtiſe the infidelitie of the Scots, made warre againſt them: when after great victories, Edward Baliol, hauing the full and right title to the realme of Scotland, ſurrendred clearlie the ſame to our ſaid progenitor, at the towne of Rorburgh in Scotland, where our ſaid progenitor accepted the ſame, and then cauſed himſelfe to be crowned king of Scotland, and for a time interteined it, and inioied it, as verie proprietarie and owner of the realme: as on the one part by confiſcation acquited, and on the other part by frée will ſurrendred vnto him. And then after the death of our ſaid progenitor Edward the third, began ſeditions and inſurrections in this our realme, in the time of our progenitor Richard the ſecond, which was augmented by the alteration of the ſtate of the ſaid Richard, and the deuolution of the ſame to Henrie the fourth: ſo as the Scots had ſome leaſure to plaie their vagues, and follow their accuſtomed manner. And yet Henrie the fift, for recouerie of his right in France, commanded the king of Scots to attend vpon him in that iorneis.

In this time, the realme of Scotland being deſcended to the houſe of the Stewards, of which our nephue directlie commeth: James Steward king of Scots, in the yéere of our Lord 1423, made homage to Henrie the ſixt at Windſore, which homage was diſtant from the time of the other homage made by Dauid Bruſe, three ſcore yéeres and more, but farre within the freſh memorie of man. All which homages and fealties as they appéere by ſtorie to haue béene made and done at times and ſeaſons as afore, ſo do there remaine inſtruments made therevpon, and ſealed with the ſeales of the kings of Scotland, teſtifieng the ſame. And yet doth it appéere by ſtorie, how the Scots practiſed to ſteale out of our treaſurie diuerſe of theſe inſtruments, which neuertheleſſe were afterward recouered againe.

And to the intent ye may know of what forme and tenure the ſaid inſtruments be, héere is inſerted the

"the effect in word and ſentence as they be made,
"which we doo, to meet with the cauillation and contri"ued euaſion of the Scots, alleging the homage to
"haue beene made for the earledome of Huntington,
"which is as true as the allegation of him that is
"burnt in the hand, to ſay he was cut with a ſickle.
And therefore the tenure of the homage is this.

The forme of the homage.

"I John N. king of Scots ſhall be "true and faithfull vnto you lord
"Edward by the grace of God K.
"of England, the noble & ſuperiour
"lord of the kingdome of Scotland, as vn-
"to you I make my fidelitie of the ſame
"kingdome of Scotland, the which I hold &
"claime to hold of you. And I ſhall beare
"to you my faith and fidelitie of life and lim,
"and worldlie honor, againſt all men; and "faithfullie I ſhall knowledge, and ſhall doo
"to you ſeruice due to you of the kingdome
"of Scotland aforeſaid: as God ſo helpe
"and theſe holie euangeliſts.

"Now for the third part, touching records and regi-
"ſters, we haue them ſo formall, ſo autenticall, ſo ſe-
"riouſlie handled, and with ſuch circumſtances decla"ring the matters, as they be and ought to be a great "corroboration of that hath beene in ſtories written "& reported in this matter. For among other things
"we haue the ſolemne act and iudiciall proceſſe of our "progenitor Edward the firſt, in diſcuſſion of the title "of Scotland, when the ſame was challenged by 12
"competitors (that is to ſaie) Florentius comes
"Holandie, Patricius de Dunbar comes de Mer-
"chia, Willielmus de Veſci, Willielmus de Roſſe, "Robertus de Pinkeni, Nicholaus de Soules, Pa-"tricius Galightlie, Rogerus de Mundeuile, Joan-"nes de Comin, D. Joannes de Haſtings, Joannes
"de Balliolo, Robertus de Bruſe, Ericius rex Norwe-
"gie.

"Finallie, after a great conſultation and ma"ture deliberation, with diſcuſſion of the allegations
"proponed on all parts, ſentence was giuen for the ti"tle of Balioll, according whereunto he inioied the realme. But for confirmation of the dutie of the ho"mage before that time obſerued by the K. of Scots, it appeareth in thoſe records, how when thoſe compe"titors of the realme of Scotland repaired to our "progenitor, as to the chiefe lord for diſcuſſion of the "ſame, inſomuch as the authoritie of the iudgement "to be giuen depended thereupon; it was then ordered that the whole parlement of Scotland, ſpirituall
"& temporall, & of all degrees aſſembled for that pur"poſe, and conſidering vpon what ground & founda"tion the kings of Scotland had in times paſt made
"the ſaid homages and recognition of ſuperioritie, the
"ſaid parlement finding the ſame good & true, ſhould
"(if they ſo deemed it) yéeld and giue place, and by ex-
"preſſe conſent recogniſe the ſame.

"At which parlement was alleged vnto them, as "appeareth in the ſame records, not onelie theſe acts "of the princes before thoſe daies, and before rehear"ſed: but alſo beſides the teſtimonie of ſtories, the "writings and letters of forren princes at that time
"reciting and rehearſing the ſame. Whereupon the "ſaid parlement did there agree to this our ſuperiori-
"tie, and inſuing their determination did particular-
"lie and ſeuerallie make homage & fealtie with pro"clamation, that whoſoeuer withdrew himſelfe from "doing his duetie therein, ſhould be reputed as a re-
"bell. And ſo all made homage and fealtie to our pro"genitor Edward the firſt. And the realme of Scotland was in the time of the diſcuſſion of the title ruled by gardians deputed by him. All caſtels and holds were ſurrendred to him, as to the ſuperiour lord in the time of vacation. Benefices, offices, fées, promotions paſſed in that time from the méere gift of our ſaid progenitor, as in the right of this crowne of England. Shiriffes named and appointed, writs, and precepts made, obeied, and executed.

Finallie, all that we doo now in the duchie of Lancaſter, the ſame did our progenitor for the time of the contention for that title in the realme of Scotland, by the conſent of an agréement of all eſtates of the realme aſſembled and conſulted with for that purpoſe. At which time the biſhops of ſaint Andrews and Glaſcow were not (as they now be) archbiſhops;
but recogniſed the archbiſhop of Yorke, which extended ouer all that countrie. Now if the Scots will take exception to the homage of their princes as made in warre, and by force, which is not true; what will they ſay, or can they for ſhame allege againſt their owne parlement, not of ſome but of all confirmed, & teſtified by their writings and ſeales; where-vnto nothing inforced them but right and reaſon, being paſſed in peace and quiet without armor & compulſion? If they ſay they did it not, they ſpeake like themſelues; if they ſay they did it, then doo they now like themſelues, to withdraw their dutie, not ſo much to be blamed, as to be amended.

Thus appeareth vnto you the beginning of the right of ſuperioritie, with a perpetuall continuance, without intermiſſion within memorie. Certeine omiſſions and forbearings vpon the grounds and oc-caſions before ſpecified we denie not, whereby they haue manie times ſought and taken their opportunities to withdraw the doing of their duetie in knowledge of our ſuperioritie ouer them; which to auoid, they haue not cared what they ſaid or alleged, though it were neuer ſo vntrue, lieng alwaies in wait when they might annoie this realme, not without their owne great danger & perill, & alſo extreame detriment. But as they detracted the doing of their du-tie, ſo God granted vnto this realme force to com-pell them thereunto within memorie, and notwithſtanding anie their interruption by reſiſtance, which vnto the time of our progenitor Henrie the firſt neuer endured ſo long as it made intermiſſion within time of mind, whereby the poſſeſſion might ſéeme to be empaired. From the time of Henrie the firſt, vnto the ſeuenth yeare of our reigne, our realme hath béene for a ſeaſon lacerat and torne by diuerſitie of titles, till our time; and ſince alſo by warre outward-lie vered and troubled. The ſtorie is ſo lamentable for ſome part therof, as were too tedious to rehearſe.

Since the death of our progenitor Henrie the firſt, our grandfather Edward the fourth reigned, who after great trauels to atteine quietnes in his realme, finallie in the time of preparation of warre againſt Scotland died. Richard the third, then vſurped for a ſmall time in yeares, whome the king our father by the ſtrength of Gods hand ouerthrew in battell, and moſt iuſtlie atteined the poſſeſſion of this relme, who neuertheleſſe, after the great tempeſtuous ſtormes, finding all matters not yet brought to perfect quiet and reſt, ceaſſed and forbare to require of the Scots to doo their dutie; thinking it policie rather for that time to aſſaie to tame their nature by pleaſant coniunction & conuerſation of affinitie, than to charge them with their fault, & require dutie of them, when opportunitie ſerued not by force & feare to conſtreine and compell them. And thus paſſed ouer the reigne of our father without demand of this homage. And being our reigne now foure and thirtie yeares, we were one and twentie yeares letted by our nephue his minoritie, being then more carefull how to bring cc him out of danger, to the place of a king, than to re-cc ceiue of him homage, when he had full poſſeſſion of cc the ſame.

cc Wherefore being now paſſed, ſince the laſt hocc mage made by the king of Scots, to our progenitor cc Henrie the firſt, 122 yeares, at which time the hocc mage was done at Windſor by James Steward, cc then king of Scots, as before 56 of theſe yeares the cc crowne of this realme was in contention, the trou-cc ble wherof ingendred alſo ſome buſineſſe in the time cc of the king our father; which was three and thirtie cc yeares: and in our time one and twentie yeares hath cc paſſed in the minoritie of our nephue. So as final-cc lie, the Scots reſorting to their onelie defenſe of diſcc continuance of poſſeſſion, can onelie allege iuſtlie cc but 13 yeares of ſilence in the time of our reigne, becc ing all the other times ſince the homage done by cc James Steward, ſuch as the ſilence in them (had cc they béene neuer ſo long) could not haue ingendred cc preiudice to the loſſe of anie right that may yet be de-cc clared and prooued due. For what can be imputed to cc king Edward for not demanding homage being in cc ſtrife for that eſtate, whereunto the homage was cc due? What ſhould Richard the third ſearch for hocc mage in Scotland, that had neither right ne leaſure cc to haue homage done vnto him in England? Who cc can blame our father, knowing the Scots nature
cc neuer to do their dutie but for feare; if he demancc ded not that of them, which they would eſchew if they cc might, ſéeing his realme not clearelie then purged cc from ill ſéed of ſedition, ſparkled and ſcattered in cc the cruell ciuill warres before.

cc Law and reaſon ſerueth, that the paſſing ouer of cc time not commodious, that the purpoſe is not allege-cc able in preſcription for the loſſe of anie right. And the cc minoritie of the king of Scots hath indured twentie
cc one yéeres of our reigne, which being an impedi-

When therefore the king of England had ſet forth this declaration of the cauſes that moued him to make warre againſt Scotland, he prepared to proſecute the ſame both by ſea and land, and hauing rigged and furniſhed diuerſe ſhips of warre, he ſent the ſame forth to the ſea, that they might take ſuch Scotiſh ſhips as were to returne from their voiages made into France, Flanders, Denmarke, and other countries, whether they were gone for trade of merchandize, with which the Engliſh ſhips incountred, tooke 28 of the principall ſhips of all Scotland, fraught with all kind of merchandize and rich wares, which they brought with them into the Engliſh ports.

Scotiſh ſhips taken.

The king of Scotland aduertiſed therof, ſent with all ſpéed an herald, deſiring reſtitution of his ſhips, as he thought ſtood with reaſon, ſéeing no war was proclamed: but the king of England thought it no reaſon to depart with them ſo ſone, till other articles of agréement might be concluded, and therefore refuſed not onelie to deliuer their ſhips, but alſo ſent ſir Robert Bowes with men to the borders, giuing him in charge to inuade Scotland, who according to his commiſſion, with thrée thouſand men rode into Scotland, and began to burne and to ſpoile certeine ſmall townes: whereupon the fraie being raiſed in the countrie, George Gordon the earle of Huntleie, who was appointed to remaine as lieutenant vpon the borders, for doubt of ſuch ſudden inuaſions, immediatlie gathered a number of borderers, and ſet vpon the Engliſhmen, and put them all to flight; ſir Robert Bowes, and his brother Richard Bowes, with diuers other, to the number of ſix hundred, were taken priſoners; and the ſaid ſir Robert Bowes and other the principall landed men were kept ſtill in Scotland till after the kings death. This victorie chanced to the Scots, at a place called Halden Rig in the Mers, vpon ſaint Bartholomewes day, which is the twentie fourth of Auguſt.

Sir Robert Bowes inuadeth the borders.

The earle of Huntleie giueth an ouerthrow to the Engliſhmen. 1542. Leſſe

After this, the king of England ſent the duke of Norfolke with the earles of Shrewesburie, Darbie, Cumberland, Surreie, Hertford, Angus, Rutland, and the lords of the north parts of England, with an armie of fortie thouſand men, as the Scots eſtéemed them, though they were not manie aboue twentie thouſand, who entered into Scotland the one and twentith of October, and burnt certeine townes vpon the ſide of the water of Tweed: but the earle of Huntleie, hauing with him ten thouſand of the borderers and other, ſo waited vpon them, giuing them now and then ſkirmiſhes and alarms, that they came not paſt two miles from the water of Tweed within the Scotiſh bounds at that ſeaſon.

In the meane time, the king of Scotland being aduertiſed héereof, gathered a great armie through all the parts of his realme, and came to Sowtraie hedge, where they muſtered, and were numbred to be thirtie ſix thouſand men, with the which he came to Falla Mure, and there incamped, determining to giue battell to the Engliſhmen, as he pretended: howbeit, if the duke had taried longer, as it was thought he would haue done, if the time of the yéere and prouiſion of vittels had ſerued, the Scots would yet haue béene better aduiſed, before they had ioined with him in a pight field. But true it is, that after the duke had remained there ſo long as vittels might be had and recouered from anie part, he retired with his armie backe into England, not without ſome loſſe of men, horſſes, and ſpoiles, which the Scots vnder the earle of Huntleie and others tooke from the Engliſhmen in that their retire, ſpeciallie as they paſſed ouer the riuer of Tweed.

After the Engliſhmen were thus departed and withdrawne home forth of Scotland, king James being of an high and manlie courage, in reuenge of harmes done by the Engliſhmen within his countrie, thought good that his whole armie ſhould paſſe forward and inuade England, himſelfe to go therewith in proper perſon. And héerein he requeſted the conſent of his nobilitie, who after long reaſoning, and good aduiſement taken in the matter, gaue anſwer [by the earle of Murrey] to the king in this ſort, that they could not thinke it good that they ſhould paſſe within England, and to ſeeke battell, the king himſelfe being with them, conſidering that his two ſons were latelie deceaſſed, ſo that he had no ſucceſſion of his bodie: for in caſe that they loſt the field, as in chance of battell is moſt vncerteine, then the king of England hauing great ſubſtance, might therwith follow the victorie, and put the realme of Scotland in great hazard.

Therefore

Therefore they thought it ſufficient to defend their owne bounds, and to conſtreine the enimie for feare to leaue the inuaſion thereof, as preſentlie they had done; and declared that they were determined to haue giuen battell to their enimies, if they had continued within the realme, and doubted not by the helpe of God, they hauing ſo iuſt a cauſe, and being inuaded in their countrie, but that they ſhould haue obteined the victorie. The king hearing their determination, albeit his high courage preſſed him to inuade; yet the approued wit of his nobles and councellors cauſed him to follow their aduiſe, and ſo returned with his armie backe againe, the firſt of Nouember, the armie of England being firſt diſcharged, and the duke of Norfolke in his returne towards London.

The king breaketh vp his armie.

Shortlie after, the king of Scotland went himſelfe in perſon to the weſt marches of his realme, where the lord Marwell was warden, vnto whome togither with the earles of Caſſiles, and Glencarne [the lord Fleming] and certeine other lords there with him, the king appointed to inuade the Engliſh marches on that ſide, taking with them the power of the borders, and ſent alſo with them Oliuer Sincler [the brother of Rolleline Comarch] and the reſidue of the gentlemen of his houſhold. Theſe earles and lords entering into England on ſaint Katharines euen, being the foure and twentith of Nouember, began to burne certeine townes vpon the water of Eſke. But as ſoone as the ſcrie was raiſed in the countrie, the lord Wharton warden of the weſt marches of England, ſuddenlie raiſed the power of the countrie, and came to a little hill, where they ſhewed themſelues in ſight vnto the Scotiſh armie.

Oliuer Sincler.

The lord Wharton.

The Scotiſh lords perceiuing the Engliſhmen gathered, aſſembled themſelues togither, and inquired who was lieutenant generall there by the kings appointment; and incontinentlie Oliuer Sincler was holden vp on two mens ſhoulders, where he ſheweth forth the kings commiſſion, inſtituting him lieutenant to the king of that armie. But howſoeuer that was read, the earles and lords there preſent, thought themſelues imbaſed too much, to haue ſuch a meane gentleman aduanced in authoritie aboue them all, and therefore determined not to fight vnder ſuch a capteine, but willinglie ſuffered themſelues to be ouercome, and ſo were taken by the Engliſhmen, not ſhewing anie countenance of defenſe to the contrarie, and without ſlaughter of anie one perſon on either ſide.

The enuie of the lords againſt Oliuer Sincler.

The Scots diſcomfited by the Engliſhmen.

This rode was called Solowaie Moſſe, at the which were taken priſoners men of name, theſe perſons following: the earle of Caſſiles and Glencarne, the lord Marwell, the lord Fleming, the lord Somerville, the lord Oliphant, Oliuer Sincler, the lord of Craggie, and ſundrie other gentlemen, the which were led priſoners to London, where they remained till after the king was dead. The king being in Carlauerocke vpon the borders not farre from Solowaie Moſſe, when this miſfortune fell vpon his men: after he heard thereof, he was meruelouſlie amazed, the more, in calling to remembrance the refuſall made by his nobles, aſſembled with him in campe at Falla vpon his requeſt to inuade England. Herewith ſuch an impreſſion entered his mind, that he thought with himſelfe that all his whole nobilitie had conſpired againſt him, and therevpon toke ſuch a vehement and high diſpleaſure, increaſed with a melancholious thought, that he departed ſuddenlie from thence to Edenburgh, and after remoued to Falkeland, where he remained as a man deſolate of comfort, being ſore vexed in ſpirit and bodie, and would not permit anie manner of perſon to haue acceſſe to him, his ſecret & familiar ſeruants onelie excepted.

The griefe of the king for the ouerthrow of his men.

Now, as he was thus diſquieted, newes were brought him that the quéene his wife was brought to bed of a faire yong princeſſe the ſeuenth day of December, the which newes he liked verie euill; and added the griefe thereof to his former diſpleaſantneſſe, inſomuch that he perceiued the end of his life to approch, and withall ſaid, that he foreſaw great trouble to come vpon the realme of Scotland, for the purſuit which the king of England was like to make therevpon againſt the ſame, to the end he might bring it vnder his ſubiection, either by mariage, or by ſome other meane. It was reported that he was diſquieted with ſome vnkindlie medicine: but howſoeuer the matter was, he yéelded vp his ſpirit to almightie God, and departed this world the foureténth of December, in the yéere of our redemption, 1542, the thirtie thrée yeere of his age, and thirtie two of his reigne.

The birth of the Scotiſh quéene.

Shortlie after his departure, his bodie was conueied into Falkeland vnto Edenburgh in moſt honorable wiſe; the cardinall, the earles of Arrane, Argile, Rothes, Marſhall, and diuerſe other noblemen being preſent, and with all funerall pompe (as was requiſite) it was buried in the abbeie church of Holie rod houſe, beſide the bodie of quéene Magdalen, daughter to the king of France, his firſt wife. There was great lamentation and mone made for his death throughout all parts of his realme, for he was verie well beloued among his ſubiects. ❧ He was of ſweet countenance and courteous ſpeech, graciouſlie eied, hauing a diuine mind in all whatſoeuer, neither certeine in doubtfull things, nor doubtfull in things of certeintie, auoiding dangers with graue counſels, performing hard matters with great nobilitie of mind, and foreſéeing what might follow with an incredible iudgement: in ſuch ſort that hée was neuer vnprouided againſt the danger of anie thing, or was drawne from it by the difficultie thereof, or was hindered by the obſcuritie therein: whereby he might incurre the note either of a raſh, fearefull, or ſlow perſon.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 9. pag. 460.

All which ſingular commendations ſeemed to flow out of this ſpring, that he did not by heat of youth (raſhlie) but with great deliberation (ſoundlie) manage the whole affaires of the common-wealth. For as he did chieflie labor that his table might not exceed for gluttonie, nor be ouerſparing for miſerie: ſo if his apparell were decent, he eſteemed not the ſhew of womaniſh attire after the courtlie faſhion. He was ſo farre from pride, that he alwaies ſhewed himſelfe offended with the vſes thereof. He was an obſeruer of iuſtice, a defender of the law, and a ſharpe ſhield for the innocent and poore: for which cauſe he was of the nobilitie called the king of the commoners. For he ſet at libertie the poore oppreſſed with the tyrannie of the rich, and repreſſed the rich from ſpoiling of the poore: all which he did with a certeine ſeueritie, but yet ſuch, as in the ſame there appeared a wonderfull gentlenes of his naturall diſpoſition, bicauſe he ſeldome put anie of them to death, but did either by priſon or mulct puniſh the offenſe. For he was wont to ſay, that he would neuer take life from anie, but onelie to kéepe the law ſound, and for the example of others: and to kéepe downe the boldneſſe of ſuch as dwelt about the borders. With theſe conditions he left the realme plentifullie furniſhed with riches, and his owne treaſurie not emptie, but abundantly ſtored with gold, ſiluer and other furniture: for which cauſe it ſhould not ſéeme ſtrange, that his death was greatlie lamented of his ſubiects, to whom he was a perfect patrone, and a louing father.

Of whome alſo Buchanan lib. 14 writeth, that his vices did almoſt equall all his great vertues; but that they were rather to be imputed to the iniquitie of the time than the inclination of his nature, for the libertie of all things had then dissolued the publike discipline, which could not be staied but by great seueritie of correction. And this made him more couetous of monie, because that he was kept extreame hard when he was vnder the gouernment of others. Whereby, when he came to bee at libertie, he was anew to furnish all his courts with houshold stuffe, finding his houses emptie, and all things conueied away: for his tutors had consumed the kinglie patrimonie vpon those whome he willinglie would not haue receiued it. Besides, for his excesse of women the fault grew by such as were his tutors, who gaue him libertie therto, supposing therby to keepe him the longer in their danger. The nobilitie did not greatlie take his death grieuouslie, because he had fined manie, imprisoned more, and caused no small sew (for auoiding his displeasure) to flie into England, and rather to commit themselues to the enimie than to his anger.)

Queene Marie.

THe eternall God calling to his mercie James king of Scotland, the fift of that name, Marie his onelie daughter and heire began hir reigne ouer the realme of Scotland, the eighteenth day of December, in the yeare of our Lord 1542, Francis the first of that name then reigning in France, & Henrie the eight ouer the Englishmen. She was not passing seuen daies old when hir father departing this life, left vnto hir his kingdome, hir mother lieng in childbed in the castell of Lithquo, of which place the lord Leuingston being capteine, had the charge committed to him, both of the daughter & mother, with the mothers good agreement and frée consent.

Moreouer, immediatlie after the kings death (because he deceassed without making anie will, or taking anie direction for the gouernement either of the realme, or custodie of the yong queene his daughter) Dauid Beton, cardinall and archbishop of S. Andrews, the speciall minister & factor of the French causes, to the aduancement and continuance thereof, inuented and forged [by Henrie Balfure] a will and testament of the late king now departed, in which (amongst other things) he established himselfe chiefe regent, adioining with him the earles of Murrey, base brother to the king deceassed, Huntleie and Argile, not once mentioning the earle of Lennox then absent in France, nor yet James Hamilton earle of Arrane his cousine, being there present in Scotland,

Dauid Beton cardinall.

His forging of a will.

Those that professed the reformed religion, beeing then called protestants, to whome the said cardinall was euer a cruell enimie and sharpe scourge, espied forth his vniust dealing in this behalfe, and trusting by the gentle nature and good inclination of the said earle of Arrane, to haue some libertie to imbrace the gospell, set him against the cardinall: so that by the helpe of his owne and their friends, he remoued the cardinall and his adherents from the vsurped rome and authoritie, and therewith was the said earle of Arrane proclamed gouernor and protector of the realme. [And therevpon shewing his authoritie, he entereth the kings palaces, as saith Lesleus lib. 10. pa. 464. and vseth the kings treasure, and calleth the officers of the treasurie to account, whereof he reteineth some, and changeth others at his pleasure.]

The protestants espied the cardinals craftie iugling.

1543 Lesle. Fr. Thin.

This earle of Arrane made a title to haue and inioie that office and rome, as next in bloud to the yong queene, as descended from a sister of K. James the third, maried to his grandfather lord Hamilton, in the yere 1475, by reason of which mariage he was created earle of Arrane, as by act of parlement holden the same yeare at Edenburgh, it was agréed and ordeined. The king of England that noble prince Henrie the eight, aduertised of the death of the king of Scots, considered with good aduise, that now there was offered a most readie meane and iust occasion, whereby the two realmes of England and Scotland might be brought into one entier monarchie, without warre or bloudshed, by the mariage of his sonne prince Edward, being then little past sir yeares of age, with the yong queene of Scotland.

He therefore being resolued fullie to bring the same to passe, either by quiet meanes or by force, and sending for the erles of Cassiles, and Glencarne, the lords Marwell, and Fleming, and other prisoners that had bene taken at Soloway mosse, caused them to be conueied vnto Hampton court, where the seuen and twentith of December they being right curteouslie interteined, he made vnto them an ouerture of his purpose and whole intent, proponing the whole matter vnto them, requesting them for their parts, to helpe (with their consents) that a contract of mariage might be made betweene his sonne the prince, and their yong queene; promising to them libertie without ransome, besides other pleasures and benefits, if they would doo their indeuor to persuade the gouernor, and other the nobilitie of Scotland to be agréeable herevnto.

The king of England taketh with the lords of Scotland prisoners for a mariage betwixt his son and their queene.

The Scotish earles and lords accepted the kings offer, and withall promised to doo their diligence to persuade the rest of the nobilitie in Scotland at their comming home: whereupon they were licenced to depart, and so comming to Newcastell, remained there with the duke of Suffolke, then the kings lieutenant of the north parts, till he had receiued forth of Scotland certeine pledges of the chiefest of these lords, for performance of their promises. Likewise the king of England sent with them the earle of Angus, and his brother sir George Dowglas with his letters to the gouernor, requesting effectuouslie, that they might be restored to their romes, lands and possessions in that realme.

Duke of Norfolke Buchanan.

The earle of Angus sent home into Scotland.

These lords arriuing at Edenburgh, about the midst of Januarie, declared to the gouernor their message and proposition made by the king of England, with such efficacie, that the gouernor being persuaded thereto by their words, sent for the lords and nobilitie of the realme to come to Edenburgh, to a conuention there, to be holden the seuen and twentith of that present moneth: where they concluded that a parlement should be kept in March next insuing. And doubting lest the cardinall (being there present) should go about to persuade the nobilitie not to consent to their desires, they caused him to be put in ward within the castell of Dalketh: the lord Seton beeing apointed to haue the custodie of him. About the same time, sir Robert Bowes, and all other the Englishmen that were prisoners, and had beene taken at Halding rig on saint Bartholomews day (as before ye haue heard) were sent home by the gouernor into England, and sir Rafe Sadler was sent ambassadour from king Henrie vnto the said gouernor, and other the lords of Scotland, and came thither before the said parlement, to persuade the lords to agree vnto the king his maisters motions, trauelling so diligentlie in the matters whereabout he was thus sent, that it was concluded by act of parlement, to send ambassadors into England, for the better satisfaction of king Henries desires.

And so the earle of Glencarne, sir George Dowglas, sir William Hamilton, sir James Leirmouth, and the secretarie being named and appointed thereto, departed in the moneth of March, and comming into England vnto the king, remained there till the latter end of Julie. In which meane time, such conenants, contracts, and promises were had and concluded, passed and sealed interchangeablie, as stood with the pleasure and good liking of king Henrie, so as the marriage was fullie contracted, and a peace concluded for ten yeeres, by authoritie of the aforesaid parlement. Herewith also the lord governor shewed himselfe to imbrace the reformed religion, causing one frier Guilliam to preach against images, and fruitlesse ceremonies, and gaue libertie that the bible called The new and old testament, should be had in English, & vniuersallie publisht through the realme of Scotland.

Also he commanded not onelie the cardinall (as before ye haue heard) but also ordeined that the quéene mother should remaine in Lithgow with the yong quéene hir daughter, vnder some manner of safe custodie, and the cardinall to be remoued vnto his owne castell of saint Andrewes, with warders about him to see him safelie kept. ✻ Not long after, the cardinall was restored to vnhoped libertie, and the earle of Angus, George Dowglasse, and the lord Glames, the heire of James Hamilton, with manie others, by the consent of the three estates, were wholie restored to all their goods, and deliuered from the sentence of banishment.

Fr. Thin. Lesleus. lib. 10. pag. 465.

John Hamilton abbat of Passelew, brother of the governor, returning out of France (where he had imploied himselfe to studie) did (with certeine learned men, as Dauid Panter, and others, whom he had in his companie) visit the king of England, of whome they were most courteouslie interteined. After which this Hamilton returning into Scotland, was made treasuror of the kingdome, which office he discharged with great commendation, so long as his brother kept the gouernement, whom he did not onelie helpe in counsell for ordering of the kingdome, but also shewed him selfe a valiant and industrious man in the warres against the English, for defense of the kingdome of Scotland. About this time, the earle Bothwell, which was banished, and had remained long at Uenice, did returne into Scotland, whither he was honorablie welcommed, as a person much desired of his friends and kinred.)

The French king misliketh of the match with England.

The realme being thus brought in quiet, and vnder good gouernement, the French king sore misliking this new coniunction of the Scots with England, and doubting least the old former bond of alliance betwixt France and Scotland might thereby be vtterlie dissolued and shaken off, he sent for Matthew Steward earle of Lennor, then abroad in his seruice in the wars of Italie, and vpon his comming backe from thence to the court, he declared to him the decease of the late king of Scots, the intrusion of Arrane, and the attempts in that realme begun, with all the circumstances from point to point as he knew; and further discoursed with him what wrong he had to be set aside, and displaced from his right of gouernement; and therefore exhorted him to repaire home to recouer the same, offering not onelie to assist him with men, monie, and munition, but also to ioine his friends in Scotland with him in aid to attaine the place of regiment, and to remoue Arrane and others from it.

Matthew earle of Lennor.

The earle of Lennor herevpon with commission and instructions deliuered to him by the French king, had also letters from him directed to the lords that were of the French faction, wherin the said king requested them to remaine and continue in their former good meanings towards him, and to assist the earle of Lennor in all things, as should be thought expedient. ✻ Now, before the earle of Lennor returned out of France, the cardinall had vsed manie persuasions against the English, as well that the Scots set at libertie by the king, should breake their faith with him, as also to draw them to the French faction, and rather to suffer their pledges to receiue what king Henrie would vse vnto them, than by keeping promise to the English, to conueie the yong quéene vnto them.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 15.

Wherevpon, when the greater part of those nobles (whome the matter touched, could easilie find anie color for the excuse of their fault) had consented to the cardinals persuasion, onelie one amongest the rest would not yéeld thereto, which was Gilbert Kennedie earle of Cassiles, who could not be drawen from that constancie (in obseruing his faith) either by bribes, flatteries, or threats. For he (hauing two brothers pledges for him in England) did openlie protest, that he would returne to prison, and by no feare laid before him commit such a fault, as that he would redéeme his life with the bloud of his two brothers: for which cause he went forthwith to London, although euerie man spake against it. Wherevpon, the king of England did singularlie commend the constancie of the yong man, and further (to the end that his vertue might be knowne to all men) did set him at libertie with his two brethren, and sent him home honorablie rewarded.

Now the realme of Scotland being thus in great vprores by means of the quéenes and cardinals factions, whereof the last drew all (such as he could) to support the French league, they sent ambassadors into France, to request the French king to send home Matthew Steward earle of Lennor, as one that was not onelie emulous against Hamilton, but also his deadlie enimie for the slaughter of his father at Linnuchs: which yong Steward (beside his beautie and comelinesse of bodie, in the verie flower of his youth; the memorie, carefulnesse, and dangers of his father, a verie popular man, and beloued of the people; the worthinesse of that familie brought almost to an end, and that the same was of great power, and linked in mariage with manie nobles) did win and draw the minds of manie men, desirous to helpe him, for the great fauor they bare vnto him.

To the which further procurement of the peoples loue also, there might be ioined, that he was next heire to the crowne by the kings appointment, if he died without issue male; the which king James, if he had liued, would haue established by parlement: besides which likewise, there wanted not flatterers, which did not onelie stirre vp his noble mind (now gaping after great things, and vndefended against deceits) to the hope of gouerning of the kingdome for these one and twentie yéeres and more, during the quéenes minoritie, and to the rule and power ouer his enimies, whereby he might vse reuenge vpon them: but also they promised him to marrie the quéene Dowager: and in the meane time (if anie thing happened otherwise than well to the yong quéene) that he should obteine the crowne, whereby he should both be king, and the next lawfull heire of James Hamilton latelie deceassed, since the governor was a bastard, and could not onelie by law not loke or hope for the kingdome, but also not so much as hope to be heire to his owne familie. To all which were added the persuasions of the French before mentioned. Wherevpon, the yong man (whose mind was credulous, being tickled and intised with these hopes) determined to go into Scotland.)

The earle of Lennor passeth into Scotland.

The earle therefore fullie instructed by the French king, how to deale and proceed, toke his leaue, and with all spéed taking the sea, directed his course into Scotland, where (after his arriuall) he came to Edenburgh, in which towne all the lords being assembled togither with the governor, he declared to them the effect of his commission from the French king, his request to them, & good affection to maintaine them against England, if in case they would continue the old league with him, and not séeke to make anie new aliance with the king of England.

But

But perceiuing that the gouernor and his friends were minded to ſatiſfie the king of Englands deſires, he would not tarrie for a reſolute anſwer, but by the counſell of the earle of Argile, William earle of Glencarne, and others of the French faction, he ſuddenlie departed forth of Edenburgh toward the weſt countrie, highlie diſpleaſed (as ſhould ſeeme) with the gouernor, and taking Lithgow in his way, he conferred with the quéene Dowager (as they termed hir) deuiſing how to aſſemble the noble men of the French ſide, to bring hir and hir daughter to libertie, out of the danger of the lord gouernor: becauſe it was ſuppoſed that he ment to conuele hir into England.

The earle of Lennor conferreth with the quéene Dowager.

1543. Leſle.

About the ſame time, through práctiſe of the abbat of Palleie, brother to the gouernor, and others, the caſtell of Edenburgh was got out of the hands of ſir Peter Creichton, and the keeping thereof committed by the gouernors appointment vnto James Hamilton lard of Stanehouſe. But the erle of Lennor, with the aſſiſtance of the earles of Huntleie, Montroſſe, Mentiſe, Argile, and others of the French faction in Auguſt following, conueied the yong quéene with hir mother from Lithgew vnto Striueling. The cardinall alſo was there with them latelie before, hauing corrupted his kéepers, & gotten abroad at libertie. Hérewith was a day appointed and proclamed for the coronation of the yong quéene. The earle of Arrane then gouernor, with the earles of Angus, Caſſiles, the lords Marwell, Somerule, and diuerſe others, called the Engliſh lords, remaining ſtill at Edenburgh, aduertiſed the king of England of all the práctiks of Lennor, and other of that faction, requiring his aduiſe and counſell how to deale for diſappointing of their purpoſes, that ſought to continue the amitie ſtill with France, to the préiudice of peace with England.

The caſtell of Edenburgh recouered to the gouernors vſe.

The yong quéene conueied to Striueling.

The king of Englands aduertiſed héereof, as well thus from the gouernor, and other the Scotiſh lords, as alſo from ſir Rafe Sadler, his maieſties ambaſſador there, doubted greatlie leaſt theſe lords, in whoſe hands the quéene then was, in reſpect of the fauour which they bare to the French king, ſhould conueie hir ouer into France: where vpon he requeſted the gouernor, and the other lords that fauoured his ſide, ſo to deale, that ſhe might be ſent into England, there to remaine, till the mariage might be conſummate betwixt hir and his ſonne prince Edward: hauing in the meane time ſuch lords of hir countrie about hir to attend vpon hir, and to ſée to hir bringing vp, as ſhould be thought expedient. To conclude, his maieſtie not onelie ſent his princelie comfort by waie of counſell and good aduiſe, but alſo according to their deſire, and as by the duke of Suffolke (his highnes lieutenant then in the north) it was thought expedient.

The king of Englands doubt.

Thomas lord Wharton, with two thouſand men from the weſt marches, and the lord Euers with other two thouſand from the eaſt borders, were appointed to enter Scotland, and to ioine themſelues with the gouernor, and his friends, to aſſiſt them againſt their aduerſaries. But as they were in a readineſſe to march, through the ſecret labor of the cardinall, wiſhing the aduancement of the earle of Arrane his kinſman (whome he thought he ſhould well inough frame to be at his appointment) rather than Lennor that was knowne to be of a greater ſtomach, the matter was ſo handled, what by the cardinall and the earle of Huntleie of the one part, and the quéene Dowager on the other, that the earle of Arrane reuolting from the king of England, came in to the Dowager, and ioined himſelfe with the cardinall, and other the lords of the French faction: by reaſon whereof, they all concluded to maintéine him in the eſtate of lord gouernor, and not to place Lennor, as their purpoſe was to haue done, if Arrane had continued faithfull to the king of England.

Shortlie after, the yong quéene was crowned at Striueling, the cardinall taking vpon him to order things as he thought good, appointing the gouernor to beare the crowne as chiefe perſon, & next in blood to the quéene, and the earle of Lennor to beare the ſcepter. After the coronation, a parlement was called and holden at Edenburgh, at the which, in preſence of the patriarch of Apuleia the popes agent, and of the French kings ambaſſadors, monſieur la Broſſe, and monſieur Menage, latelie before come into the realme, the earle of Arrane was newlie confirmed gouernor. And for the ſure preſeruation (as they pretended) of the yong quéene, it was agréed by the gouernor and the eſtates, that ſhe ſhuld remaine with the old quéene hir mother in Sterling caſtell, during hir minoritie, and certeine rents of that ſeignioríe were aſſigned for maintenance of ſuch traine as was thought expedient to be attendant about hir: and further, the lords Leuingſton, Erſkin, and Fleming [or (as ſaith Buchanan) the lord Grams, John Areſkin, John Lindſeie, & William Leuiſton] were appointed to abide continuallie with hir, for the better ſafegard of hir perſon.

Fr. Thin.

Thus was euerie thing ordered as ſéemed to ſtand with the pleaſure of the cardinall. Wherevpon the earle of Lennor, perceiuing how vncourteouſlie he was vſed, to haue his aduerſarie thus confirmed in authoritie by the French ſide, and himſelfe reiected, he firſt ſent to the French king, informing him thoroughlie of the iniuries to him done, putting him in remembrance of the promiſes made to him when he departed from him; alſo the conſtantneſſe of his ſeruice, the hazard he had put himſelfe in for his ſake: and notwithſtanding how he was yet vnkindlie dealt with, that through truſt of his promiſed aid and aſſiſtance, he was brought out of credit in his countrie, and ſubiected vnder the commandement and authoritie of his enimie, and wrongfullie diſappointed of his right, which he looked to haue recouered, and to haue béene mainteined therein by his ſupport.

The earle of Lennor his diſpleaſure.

In conſideration whereof, he renounced his ſeruice, willing him from thenceforth not to looke for the ſame anie more at his hands. Hérewith Lennor ioining himſelfe with the earles of Angus, Caſſiles, and Glencarne, the lords Marwell, and Somerule, the ſhiriffe of Aire, the lard of Drumlanrig, and other of that ſide, called the Engliſh lords, ſet himſelfe againſt the gouernor, the cardinall, and others of that faction, ſo that the reſidue of this yeere was ſpent in ciuill diſſention betweene them. And héere is to be noted, that a little before that the earle of Arrane reuolted to the French part, there was arriued in the mouth of the riuer of Cloide on the weſt coaſt, fiue ſhips, which the French king had ſent to the aid of his friends in Scotland, vnder the conduction of James Steward of Cardonold, and of the forenamed monſieur de la Broſſe, & monſieur Menage, the French kings ambaſſadors.

There came with them alſo the patriarch of Apuleia, of whome ye haue likewiſe heard before. They had brought aboord in theſe ſhips fiftie thouſand crownes, and munition to the value of ten thouſand crownes. The earle of Lennor therfore, when he firſt reſolued to turne to the Engliſh part, with the aduiſe of his confederats, ſeized vpon thoſe ſhips, got the fiftie thouſand crownes, and the moſt part of the munition into his hands, and brought it to the caſtell of Dunbreton, reteining it to his owne vſe, where it was ſent to haue béene imploid to the maintenance of the French faction, againſt the king of England, and the lords that leaned to his ſide.

The earle of Lennox raiſeth an armie.

The earle of Lennox therefore, raiſing a power of men of warre with the aſſiſtance of the lords of his faction, came with them vnto Leith againſt the gouernor that was then in Edenburgh: but through the diligent trauell of the cardinall, the earles of Huntleie, Murrey, and Argile, the matter was taken vp, and an appointment accorded: ſo that ſir George Dowglaſſe was deliuered as a pledge for his brother the earle of Angus, the maiſter of Glencarne for his father the earle of Glencarne, the abbat Caſſaghole for his brother the earle of Caſſiles, to remaine in ſafe keeping where it pleaſed the gouernor to appoint. The earle of Lennox came vnto Edenburgh to the gouernor, but within ſix daies after, they went both to Lithquho, from whence the earle of Lennox ſecretlie departed from the gouernor without bidding him farewell, and comming to Glaſcow, fortified the caſtell.

The earle of Lennox commeth to the gouernor. He departed from him againe. He fortifieth Glaſcow. Fr. Thin. Leſleus. lib. 10. pag. 468. 1543. Leſle.

✠ When the gouernor had receiued true intelligence that the earle had taken Glaſcow, he (aſſembling ſuch power as he could make, as well of his friends and followers, as of others, eſpeciallie of the lord Boid) went vnto Glaſcow, in which place the earle of Glencarne had before placed his armie, to the end there to trie the matter with his enimies. But before the battell, the earle of Lennox had withdrawen himſelfe vnto Dunbreton, to gather a greater aſſemblie, ſhortlie after to returne to Glaſcow. The earle of Glencarne, with Tilbarne, Houſtone, Buchanan, Macfarlane, Drumquhaſſile, and other barons and nobles of the Lennox, Kamfrie, and other places adioining, with the citizens, eccleſiaſticall perſons of all orders, and the other ſort of common people, departed out of the towne to the plaine thereof (being a mile from the towne) there to trie the euent of battell (before the comming of the earle of Lennox) more in haſte than good ſpéd. Whereupon the gouernor (perceiuing himſelfe to be drawne forward to battell) commanded the trumpets to ſound to the alarmes. Whereupon the battels ioined, the hoſts began to fight violentlie, and the conflict grew to be extreme on both parts: in which (with great ſlaughter) they long time fought with vncerteine victorie.

But in the end (what with the force of his armie, and the incouragement of the capteine) the full conqueſt fell to the gouernor, who put his enimies to flight. At what time, of the fauourers of the Lennox there were manie ſlaine, partlie of the nobles (as the ſonne of the earle of Glencarne, and Monniepennie capteine of the footmen) and partlie of the common ſort (as the citizens of Glaſcow, and manie eccleſiaſticall perſons.) Beſides all which, there had manie more periſhed, if the gouernor (through his naturall clemencie) had not (when the victorie began to leane towards him) giuen a ſigne of retreit, & with much ſpéd ſaued manie of them. On the gouernors part were few killing, except Cambuſketh (the head of that familie) and the baron of Argentine. The gouernor purſuing this victorie, entered the towne of Glaſcow, where he vſed (by the perſuaſion of the lord Boid) wonderfull fauour towards the citizens, (farre beyond their deſerts) although that he depriued ſome (of the chiefeſt condition amongeſt them) from all the vſe and benefit of their goods.

The earle of Lennox remaining at Dunbar, receiued into the caſtell the earle of Glencarne, and others, which had eſcaped the battell, who ſometime after did reſt (being feared with the ouerthrow) from anie further turmoiles or troubles. But in the end, they which fauoured the Lennox, dwaſtelie ſtirre him to take weapon againſt the gouernor: whereupon he doth reſtrengthen the towne and ſteeple of Glaſcow, determining to gather a new ſupplie, and once more to caſt the dice of war. But the gouernor (minding to preuent all his indeuors by wiſe counſell) did (being accompanied with the cardinall) call to him about Glaſcow, all the nobilitie of the ſouth parts, and (bringing forth the hired ſouldiors) commanded the great péeces to be planted againſt the enimie. Whereupon (entering the towne) he beſieged the caſtell and ſteeple of the church (in which place were both Scots and Frenchmen) and in the end (after a ſlaughter of ſome of them) inforced the other to yéld their forts. After that the caſtell was thus come into the gouernors hands, he hanged eightéene of the chiefeſt and beſt loued vnto Lennox, and permitted the reſt to depart at libertie. The earle of Lennox (vnderſtanding that his affaires began to wauer, and to obteine ſuch euill ſucceſſe) doth ſend the earle of Angus and the lord Maxwell to the gouernor, to intreat of peace betwéene him and the earle of Lennox, the which they laboured with great diligence, according to the truſt repoſed in them.]

The earle of Angus and the lord Maxwell committed to ward.

But the gouernor cauſed them both to be ſecretlie conueied from the councell by the backeſide of the blacke friers of Glaſcow, vnto the caſtell of Hamilton, and from thence the earle was ſent to Blackeneſſe. The lord Maxwell was kept ſtill in hold at Hamilton, and George Dowglas, and the maiſter of Glencarne in Edenburgh caſtell. Theſe perſons thus impriſoned ſtood in great doubt of their liues (as ſome ſuppoſed:) but as diuerſe other did ſuſpect, they were rather committed for a colour, than for anie euill that was meant towards them. Howſoeuer it was with them, the earle of Lennox by the aduiſe of his friends ſent the earle of Glencarne, and a gentleman called Thomas Biſhop, vnto the king of England with offer of his ſeruice, and requeſt to haue in mariage the ladie Margaret Dowglaſſe daughter to the Earle of Angus, and néece to the ſaid king.

Mens opinions for the impriſoning of the earle of Angus.

The earle of Lennox ſendeth to the king of England.

✠ Herevnto the king granted. For the performance whereof (and the diſpatch of other things) he ſent the lord Wharton and diuerſe others. And on the earles part, the biſhop of Cathnes his brother and the earle of Glencarne were appointed, who met at Carleill to performe the agréement. The quéene, the cardinall, and the other of the French faction, did helpe the gouernor all they might, with counſell, power, and monie; becauſe they perceiued that he repented ſuch friendſhip with England as he had taken in hand by the counſell of Angus and of others. In the meane time there was a parlement aſſembled at Striueling, in which by common conſent, the earle of Lennox was condemned of treaſon; wherefore the ſentence of baniſhment was executed againſt him, and all his goods with his patrimonie were confiſcat to the quéene. Whileſt the French king was aſcerteined that Lennox had forſaken his faction, & committed himſelfe to the king of England, he ſuddenlie committed to priſon John Steward lord of Aubigne baron in France, brother to the earle of Lennox, and depriued the ſaid John Steward of all ſuch honors and offices as he poſſeſſed in France. For he was generall capteine of all the Scotiſh lands in France, being either ſuch as had gard of the kings bodie, or bowmen, or men at armes: for the king of France hath Scots in wages of all the orders.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 470.

But let vs now returne to the Patriarch, who was honorablie receiued by the cardinall and the biſhop of Scotland into the citie of Glaſcow: during whoſe abode there, great contention aroſe betwéene the cardinall and the archbiſhop of Glaſcow, who ſhould in that citie be of greateſt authoritie and honor. Which in th'end came to this iſſue, that both families fell togither by the eares, which of them ſhould go before fore with his crosse borne vpright. For the cardinall archbishop of saint Andrews and primat of the kingdome, did affirme that the archbishop of Glascow should not haue his crosse borne in his owne church, so long as the cardinall was present. Which the seruants of the archbishop of Glascow take in such disdaine, that they plucked downe the cardinals crosse and threw it to the ground. Whereupon, the gouernor (vnderstanding the whole matter, and that it was now come from words to swords) made hast to appease this factious commotion, & caused the Patriarch therwith to be brought to Edenburgh accompanied with the clergie, where he remained all the winter following. In which towne he was honorablie enterteined and feasted of the quéene, the gouernor, and other of the nobles, whome he requited with the like courtesie.

Amongest these of the nobilitie, the earle of Murrey had the Patriarch on a day to a banket, in which this Murrey did shew an honorable thing not accustomed amongest others. For where he abounded in store of siluer vessels, yet he commanded his seruants to furnish a great cupbord with christall glasses brought from Uenice, & that in the midst of dinner he should ouerturne the cupbord as it were vnwillinglie. Which the seruant at the time appointed did performe. The noise of breaking of which glasses did suddenlie fill the eares of all the companie: and the Patriarch seeing the hurt, was somewhat moued. But the earle making no account of this thing, commanded his man afresh to furnish the same cupbord with as manie and fairer vessels of glasse than the former were, to the Patriarchs great admiration. For the Patriarch affirmed that the glasses of Muranoe and Uenice did not anie way excell these. Truelie this earle of Murrey was honorable, wise, iust, and famous amongest manie princes for his manifold vertues, & manie ambassages most happilie performed amongest them. Who shortlie after this, departing the court, died of the stone at his castle in Turnwaie.

This Patriarch shewed to the gouernor (besides other priuileges that he had from the sée of Rome) his great authoritie, in that he was legat from the popes side, amongest the Scots, as long as he remained there. Which office, when he departed to Rome, he procured to be transferred to the cardinall; at what time the Patriarch also in the name of the pope, did promise much helpe, and monie to be sent to Scotland against England. For he studied by all means he could, to hinder the mariage of those two kingdoms: because he suspected thereby, that some alteration might be made in Scotland touching the religion; with the ouerthrow of churches and monasteries. Now, after that the Patriarch had remained all the winter in Scotland, he departed from thence in March, who as he was honorablie enterteined in all places, so he spared not to recount to the French king and other princes (whome he visited in his iourneie) the humanitie he found in Scotland, which he also imparted to the bishop of Rome, to the other cardinals, & to the senat of Uenice; not without singular praise and honor to the Scotish nation.]

They that were sent, so solicited the earles cause, that in the end the king was persuaded that Lennor ought of right to haue the gouernement of the realme of Scotland, and to be second person in the same. And herewith, in consideration how vniustlie not onelie his maiestie had béene dealt with, but also how vnthankefullie and discourteouslie Lennor had béene vsed, both at the hands of the French king, and also of his adherents in Scotland, by the cardinall & others: he both thankefullie receiued his gentle offer of seruice, & also promised to aid him in his title and all other lawfull causes: and herewith prepared an armie to passe into Scotland by sea, appointing the earle of Hertford, and the lord Lisle to haue the conduction of the same, who shipping at Tinmouth with their people, arriued in the Forth vnder Werdie castell, a mile & a halfe aboue Leith the third of Maie, the whole nauie conteining aboue the number of two hundred ships. Here at Newhauen, a quarter of a mile from the said castell, they landed their armie of ten thousand men of warre, with great artillerie, and all kind of munition.

The king of England meaneth to aid the earle of Lennor.

The English armie landeth by Leith.

The lord gouernor being at that present within the towne of Edenburgh, hearing of their arriuall, went forth of the towne accompanied with the cardinall, the earles of Huntleie, Argile, Bothwell, and others, purposing to stop their landing: but perceiuing the puissance of the aduersaries to be such, as they could not resist the same, they returned to Edenburgh againe, and sent maister Adam Otterborne prouost of Edenburgh, and two of the bailiffs to the earle of Hertford, to vnderstand the cause of his comming; and withall offered, that if there were anie iniuries or wrongs done by anie of the Scots nation, he would apoint commissioners to talke with such as by him should be authorised thereto, for the full answering thereof, & to that effect he would gladlie receiue them into the towne of Edenburgh.

The prouost of Edenburgh sent to the earle of Hertford.

The earle of Hertford answered that he had no commission to talke of anie such matter; but rather to take reuenge of the vniust dealing and breach of promise on those that had falsified their faith. And therefore minding to burne the towne of Edenburgh, as well as other within that realme, he willed the inhabitants and all all those that were within the same to come forth, and submit themselues before him the kings lieutenant, to stand vnto the kings will and pleasure, or else he would not faile to proceed in execution thereof. The prouost answered that he would rather abide all extremities, than accomplish his request and desire in that behalfe; and therevpon returned to the towne.

The earles answer.

After the gouernor had heard what answer was made to the prouost, he caused the castell to be furnished with all things necessarie for defense, and departed straightwaies to Striueling. The English armie lodging that night in Leith, marched the next day toward Edenburgh, passing vp the Cannogat street to enter at the nether bow, where they found some resistance made by the Scots, so that diuerse were slaine on both parts. Towards night, the Englishmen, after they had continued long in skirmishing that day with the Scotishmen, retired to Leith. The next day the whole armie with the great artillerie came forward towards the towne, and breaking open the Cannogat, they entred the towne by the same, bringing their ordinance within sight of the castell, purposing to plant the same in batterie against it; but the capteine of the castell caused the artillerie within to shoot off at them in so great abundance, & so good measure, that they slue diuerse Englishmen, and dismounted one of their péeces, so that in the end they were constreined to draw backe their ordinance & retired; but yet in the meane time they set fire on the towne, and burnt the most part of all the houses in the same. They burnt also the Cannogat street, and the abbeie of Holie rood house. The gouernor at that present released out of prison the earle of Angus, the lord Parwell, the maister of Glencarne, sir George Dowglas, and others.

Prisoners set at libertie.

In this meane time also there came from the borders by land foure thousand of English horsemen, vnder the conduction of the lord William Euers, and his sonne sir Rafe Euers; who ioining with the armie at Leith, scowred the countrie on euerie rie ſide of Edenburgh. Finallie, after the Engliſh armie had lien in Leith a certeine ſpace, they burnt that towne alſo, and ſent their ſhips awaie fraught with pillage and ſpoiles (got as well in that towne, as in Edenburgh, and abroad in the countrie) backe towards England. And therwith the earle of Hertford, the lord admerall, and others, returned by land through the countrie vnto Berwike, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie more at large appeareth. Whileſt the Engliſh armie was thus occupied in that part of Scotland, the erle of Lennor with an armie of men which he had raiſed, was readie to come on the backs of the gouernor and his adherents, if they had aſſembled their forces and come forward to haue giuen the Engliſhmen battell. For all this ſeaſon the ciuill contentions ſtill continued, and ſundrie conflicts and ſkirmiſhes chanced betwixt the parties.

r. Thin. eſcus lib. 10. ag. 474.

✲ The Scots which inhabit the mountains, and the Iles, did now in theſe turmoiles begin to ſhew ſome tokens of their inconſtancie. For they (which paied yeerelie tribute in the time of James the fift, kept the peace, liued within the bounds of law, and well obeied the gouernor) did now (after they ſaw all things on a flame) begin againe to ſpoile and deſtroie their neighbors, in the ſame vttering the humor of their naturall diſpoſition. Whereupon the gouernor (to reſtreine their boldneſſe) called vnto him George Gordon earle of Huntleie, and the earle of Argile, whereof he made the one gouernor of the north parts of Scotland, of the Orchades, and Shitland; and to the other, he committed the rule of Argile, and the Iles Hebrides. Whereupon Huntleie with all ſpeed gathered an armie from the north parts, and determined to bridle the Glancamerons, the Gencronelles, the Mudiardes, & the Kindiardes, with force and authoritie. The capteins or heads of which families, were Ewin Allanſon, Ronald Mackonellglas, and John Mudiard, who did poſſeſſe the lands of the lords Grant, and Louet, hauing expelled them by force from the ſame.

But when they firſt vnderſtood that Huntleie had incamped neere vnto them, they fled euerie one home to their owne poſſeſſions: which being defended partly by the weſt ſea, and partly included about with the mounteins, ſtopped Huntleie, ſo that hee might not haue anie paſſage vnto them: by meanes whereof (theſe diſſeſſors being baniſhed) the lords Grant and Louet were reſtored to their right inheritance. But it fell out contrarilie for Louet, who going to take his owne into his hands, fell into danger of his enimies. For at that time both the companies were diſpoſed into ſuch order, that neither partie could abſteine from fight. Whereupon they firſt diſcharge their bodies one againſt another, and their arrowes ſpent, they after flie to their ſwords, with which they fought ſo egerlie, that the night cutting off the battell, it could not be well knowne to which part the victorie gaue place. In which there was ſo great ſlaughter on both parts, that till the next morning in viewing the dead bodies, the victors were not knowne. Amongeſt whome of the part of the Glencamerons and Mudiardes there were manie ſlaine.

But by reaſon of the death of the lord Louet, and of his ſonne and heire (a youth of ſingular hope, and brought vp in France) with three hundred of the bloud and ſurname of the Fraiſers (for Louet was the head and leader of that familie) the hurt ſeemed to be the greater on their part. For there was a rumor ſpred, that there was not one of the familie of the Fraiſers left aliue that was of mans ſtate. But it happened by the ſingular benefit of God, that they left their wiues with child when they went to the fight, by which meanes the familie was after raiſed and reſtored. Huntleie (greatlie grieuing that the Fraiſers had receiued this grieuous wound) gathered a power togither, and with armes ſo purſued thoſe factious people, that he tooke and beheaded Ewin Allanſon, and Ronald, with diuerſe others, and put the reſt in priſon. The earle of Argile diſcharged the office committed to him as well as Huntleie did and with more happie ſucceſſe, for all the Iland men humblie ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, and deliuered pledges to liue quietlie hereafter.)

Buchanan. lib. 15.

Buchanan ſaith that this battell as it was beleeued, was procured by Huntleie to deſtroie the Fraiſers.

About this time the earle of Lennor, accompanied with Alexander the maiſter of Glencarne, otherwiſe called lord of Kilmawſe, Walter Graham brother to the earle of Montroſſe, ſir John Boythwike knight, and ſundrie other gentlemen, tooke the ſea to paſſe into England, and arriued at Weſtcheſter about Midſummer: & paſſing from thence to the court, he was toiefullie receiued. And immediatlie thereupon was the mariage celebrated betwixt him and the ladie Margaret Dowglas, daughter & heire to the earle of Angus, and to Margaret his wife queene of Scots, ſiſter to king Henrie the eight, at what time there was aſſured to him by way of inheritance, lands to the value of ſeuen hundred marks of yeerelie rent of aſſiſe, in conſideration of this mariage with the kings neece, and in recompenſe of lands loſt by him in France, to the which he was inheritor after the decealle of Robert Steward lord Obenie, one of the foure marſhals of France.

The earle of Lennor goeth into England

He marieth the ladie Margaret Dowglas.

Lord Obenie.

Moreouer, king Henrie being now vpon his iournie towards Bullongne, aſwell for the anoiance of his highneſſe enimies in Scotland, as for recouerie of the ſaid earles right in that realme, appointed the ſaid erle to enter Scotland in the moneth of Auguſt, accompanied with ſir Riſe Manſfield, ſir Peter Mewtas knights, maiſter Thomas Audleie, maiſter Thomas Brookes, old maiſter Winter comptroller of the kings ſhips, and his ſonne ſir William Winter that now is, and ſundrie other capteins, hauing vnder their charge two hundred hackbutters, two hundred archers with long bowes, and two hundred armed pikes, beſide the mariners belonging to thoſe ſhips that were appointed to go forth on this iournie, being in number about twelue or fourteene ſaile, belonging to Briſtow, and other of the weſt parts.

The earle of Lennor returneth into Scotland.

Upon their arriuall on the coaſt of Scotland, they burnt the Ile of Arrane, and raced the gouernors caſtell there to the ground. And afterwards arriuing at the Ile of Bute, they entered the ſame, and tooke the caſtell of Roſeis ſtanding therein (from whence the Stewards kings of Scotland had their originall) the capteine they had awaie priſoner with them into England. Here alſo they tooke two French ſhips laden with wines, and this done they entered the Firth of Clide, thinking to find none but their friends in the caſtell of Dunbreton. But true it is, that in this meane time the earle of Glencarne with ſundrie gentlemen being left in that caſtell, with the capteine thereof called Houſon, to keepe it in the name and to the behoſe of the erle of Lennor, were in his abſence perſuaded thorough practiſe of the queene Dowager, not only to renounce their promiſed faith to him, in defrauding him of that caſtell; but alſo to intrap and wind him within their danger to take him priſoner.

The Ile of Bute taken.

For this purpoſe they ſo diſſembled the matter, that they had got him on land onelie with three hundred men: and ſo farre forth they were growne in talke, that the erle of Lennor being entered into the caſtell with a few other with him, the monie was laid downe on the boord, to be paid to the capteine for his ſatisfaction. But in the meane time, the earle of Lennor, & ſuch as were with him, perceiuing ſome treaſonable treasonable practise in hand, got forth of the house againe vnto their companie below, leauing the monie behind them, and after made shift to get to their ships, and not before it was high time.

For if they had staied that night, they had béene intraped by George Dowglas, who with foure thousand men was secretlie drawne thitherwards, and entered the towne of Dunbreton, shortlie after that the earle of Lennox was thus departed and got to his ships lieng there at hand in the riuer of Clide, downe the which he retired to the sea, not without danger to haue lost the same ships, by reason of the narrownesse of the water: for the erle of Argile being gotten betwixt him and the sea with a great power of men, with banners displaied, hailsed the ships with shot of ordinance from the castell of Dinnune, annoieng the earle of Lennox his passage as much as he could. But he escaping with the English gentlemen, and the ships out of danger, toke aduise togither at the Ile of Bute what they were best to do.

The earle sore moued to haue béene thus repelled from Dunbreton, and stomaching the matter sore, to be so discountenanced by his enimie the earle of Argile, with the aduise of the English gentlemen, he returned with them, and with great shew of manhood toke land beside the castell and towne of Dinnune, where the earle of Argile with seuen hundred men was readie to incounter him, & to kéepe him off from landing: but by the helpe of the shot out of the ships, and great store of botes, the Englishmen landed, slue foure score of the enimies, most part gentlemen, and put the residue to flight, with the losse of three men onelie on the English side.

The earle of Lennox landeth at Dinnune.

This done, the towne of Dinnune was burnt, and the church spoiled, that was full of goods and ornaments. When the night approched, by reason the Englishmen had no powder, nor other prouision on land, the earle with his people returned to shipbord in safetie, howbeit not without offer of skirmish made by the enimies though to their losse, namelie of those that aduanced themselues most forward. About foure or fiue daies after, the earle of Lennox with fiue hundred men landed in another part of Argile, and remaining on land a whole day togither, burnt, spoiled, and wasted the countrie: the earle of Argile with two thousand men giuing the looking on, and not once offering the skirmish, so that the earle of Lennox with his souldiers retired to his ships without incounter.

The towne of Dinnune burnt.

The earle of Lennox landeth againe in Argile.

After this they inuaded the Ile of Kinter, where James Mackonell dwelled, burnt manie places in that countrie, toke and caried awaie great booties of cattell and other goods. All the coasts of Kile, Carrike, & Coningham, and likewise of Galloway remained in continuall feare, so that oftentimes their beacons were fired, and manie of the noble men constrained to come to the earle of Lennox, suing to him for assurance. In these exploites the earle had with him Walter Macferlane of Tirbat, and seuen score men of the head of Lennox, that spake both Irish, English, & the Scotish tongs, light footmen, well armed in shirts of male, with bowes, and two handed swords, and being ioined with the English archers and shot, did much auailable seruice in the streicts, the marishes, and mountaine countries.

¶ During these things, they which had gouernment of Scotish affairs (as the quéene Dowager, the cardinall, and the gouernor) called a councell, in which they decréed that all such of the nobilitie as had force and armor, should be readie to follow the gouernor whither soeuer he went, and there to remaine with him for the space of eight daies. Shortlie after there assembled eight thousand men, and in the sharpe winter battered the church of Coldingham, standing in armor a whole day and night to the great toile and wearinesse of the men and horsses. The nert day the gouernor, either to accuse his tendernesse sustained in the last dates labor of warre, or else fearing the inuasion of the enimie (for he was certified of an armie of men that should come from Berwike) suddenlie (vnknowne to the other nobilitie) did flie to Dunbar with a few of his owne traine. They which went about to excuse the defame of this flight, reported how he feared that he should haue béene betraied to the English by his host, for hatred which they had conceiued against him for manie of his offenses.

This departure of the gouernor brought great trouble to the armie, & so much the more, because the secreter it was (and the reason vnknowne) the more cause it gaue to the rest to feare some further euill. Wherefore the greater part remained in this obstinate mind, that euerie one should returne the nert way home, and leaue the artillerie at random. But others (who were more carefull, and would séeme lesse fearefull) do agrée to stuffe the péces full of powder, and to breake them, rather than they should fall in the hands & helpe of the enimie. To the which deuise onelie Archembald Dowglas did resist, least he should ad a wicked déed to a wicked flight. Who when he could not staie any man, either by threat, intreatie, or authoritie, he exclamed with a lowd voice (for euerie one to heare him) that for his owne part he had rather die an honest death, than to haue a sure and rich life with such dishonor. Wherefore you my friends consider what you will do, for either I will bring awaie this artillerie, or I will not returne home with life; wherefore I meane to make this the last end both of my life and glorie. When he had spoken this, a few (whose honor was deare vnto them) were moued therewith, but the rest (despairing by reason of the shamefull flight of the gouernor) did scatteringlie depart, wandring whither they thought good, without anie order. The Dowglasse with such companie as he had (placed in good order) followed the artillerie, and brought the same to Dunbar, the horssemen of his enimies in vaine hastening after them behind at their backes. This expedition by the gouernor rashlie begun, and shamefullie performed, brake the hearts of the Scots, and aduanced the minds of the English, who gloriouslie applied the dastardnesse of the gouernor to their owne glorie.)

To conclude, after the earle of Lennox and his companie had atchiued these enterprises afore mentioned, he returned towards England, and sent sir Peter Mewtas knight, & Thomas Bishop a Scotish gentleman, to aduertise the king of England of his proceedings, who found him at the siege of Bullongne, where they declared to him the whole circumstance of euerie thing, as the same had passed in the earles iornie, which the king toke in verie good part. And vpon his returne into England, after the conquest of Bullongne, the earle of Lennox was also called home to the court by letters to him directed, he being then at Bristow.

Sir Peter Mewtas.

1545.

About the middest of Februarie, sir Rafe Eure commonlie called Euers, lord warden of the English middle marches, entred Scotland with a power of foure thousand Englishmen, Irishmen, and assured Scots; and comming first vnto Jedworth, lodged there that night. And therwithall vnderstanding that the gouernor and the earle of Angus were at the abbeie of Melros, about eight miles distant from thence, the nert morning he was got forth so earlie, that he was almost vpon the enimies in such wise on the sudden, that they fled out of their lodgings, and and left their beds and all their houshold furniture which they had in store there with them, not hauing time to conueie it awaie at their departure, their warning was so short. Sir Rafe Euers at his comming thither, finding them fled and gone, spoiled the towne and abbeie, vtterlie defacing the tombes and monuments of the earles of Dowglas, greatlie to the displeasure of the earle of Angus, and those of his linage.

*After this (the comming of the English being looked for the nert yéere) the minds of the borderers were greatlie troubled, bicause they were hopelesse to atteine anie succor from the gouernor, which vsed the aduise of the clergie, but chieflie of the cardinall. Wherevpon Archembald Dowglas earle of Angus (greatlie moued partlie with his priuat losses, for he had great possessions in the marches, and in Tiuiot, and partlie to sée his ancestors monuments defaced) came to the gouernor, and fullie laid before him the greatnesse of the danger wherein the realme did stand, persuading him to incounter and resist the same. At what time also (after the gouernour had opened vnto him, that he was forsaken of the nobilitie, and now left alone) the Dowglas shewed that the same happened vnto him by his owne fault, and not by the nobilitie, which would implote their liues, liuings, and goods, for the defense of the common-wealth. For he contemning their counsell, onlie leaned to the spiritualtie, who were cowards in warre, and seditious in peace.

Out of this founteine (saith he) a suspicion (that you dare not trust one another) is growne betweene you and them, which is the onelie cause why things are no better performed. But if you determine (in great affaires) to take the aduise of them (who will not refuse to spend their blood therein) I doubt not but that we shall be able to execute as great matters as euer our ancestors did: but if we shall (by our slouth) permit the enimie to take all things from vs, then of necessitie will follow, that either they shall shortlie banish vs, or bring vs into perpetuall seruitude: the inconueniences of anie of which cannot well be spoken. As touching our selues I know that thou art suspected to be a coward, and I a traitor, which reproch if thou thinke to purge (for thou canst not auoid it) prepare to cleare the same, not with painted speaches, but with bloudie weapons.)

Wherevpon the gouernor and the said earle (sore aggreeued to be thus foiled at the Englishmens hands) assembled togither [vnder the leading of Norman Lesle son of the earle of Rothseie] all such forces as they might recouer, so that they had quicklie got them about fifteene hundred men, whereof eight hundred at the least were gentlemen. Who hearing that the Englishmen were retiring towards Jedworth, they met them at a place called Pannier hugh, or Brunehouse, where both the parties alighting on foot, ment to trie the quarell by plaine force of hand. But as they were redy to ioine, the assured Scots, to the number of seuen or eight hundred reuolted vnto the part of their countrimen, by reason whereof, after a right sharpe and fierce conflict, the Englishmen in the end were constreined to flie, whome the Scots right egerlie pursued, slue sir Rafe Euers, the lord Ogle, sir Brian Leiton, and other gentlemen & souldiors to the number of eight hundred. They tooke also about two thousand prisoners, with certeine péeces of artillerie and other munition.

This victorie fell to the Scots the seuentéenth day of Februarie, the report whereof was right displeasant to the English nation, but speciallie the losse of that worthie gentleman sir Rafe Euers was greatlie bemoned, and that euen of the king himselfe, for the noble prowesse and great loialtie which at all times had béene found in him. His seruice had béene such in these wars against Scotland, that he had brought the more part of the Scots within twentie miles space of the English borders, vnto the obeisance of the king of England, although at length they holpe to worke his confusion, as before ye haue heard. ¶ Of this gentleman & his singular seruice in the field, I omit here to speake, bicause he was imploied otherwise, besides Scotland: wherefore I remit the readers to the twentith yere of king Henrie the eight, where to his high commendation this gentleman is recorded.]

His seruice against the Scots.

*The occasion of the English ouerthrow (as saith Lesleus) and the Scots victorie, were chieflie by these meanes. First they fought vpon equall ground, and with vnequall helpes. For the Scots with the sunne on their backs (being declined toward setting) came forth of a narrow & marish place, and set vpon the English (at the side of an hill which was betweene them) hauing the sun in their faces, by which meanes they could neither well perceiue what number the Scots had, nor with their gunnes hurt anie of the Scots. But those that fought in the first battell, wherevnto was ioined (a feare not in vaine) which they had conceiued of the Scotish march-men, who in great number hauing red crosses (the note of the English) ran vp and downe hither and thither to sée the euent thereof.)

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 16. pag. 478.

About the same time that the victorie before mentioned chanced to the Scots, Robert Cornorse bishop of Rosse departed this life, to whome succéeded Dauid Pantane, secretarie to the gouernor and prior of saint Marie Ile. In Aprill, William Steward bishop of Aberden likewise deceassed, and maister William Gordon chancellor of Murrete, vncle to George erle of Huntleie, was by the cardinals sute promoted to that sée, greatlie to the displeasure of the earle of Angus, that labored to haue preferred an other thereto. For this and other causes, the cardinall was greatlie in hatred of the Dowglasses.

Death of bishops.

*About that time, the king of England by praise & preies persuaded the Flemings to take fortéene of our ships harbored in the hauen, and to conuert the commodities (wherewith they were fraught, being verie costlie) to their owne commoditie. By means whereof at one time we had warres with two nations, England and Flanders. But sith the Flemings did not the same maliciously for hatred to the Scots, but carefullie for the loue vnto the English, as the Scots did certeinlie know, they shewed none other token of enimitie to the Flemings, but that they forbad them to fish on their coasts, and did sometime intercept their ships, without further iniurie done vnto them.)

Fr. Thin. Lesleus. lib. 10. pag. 479.

This yéere also, Montgomerie, otherwise called monsieur de Lorges, knight of the order of saint Michaell, was sent by the French king with foure thousand Frenchmen into Scotland to assist the Scots against England. He landed at Dunbreton, & came in good order to Edenburgh the thirtéenth of Maie: he brought with him from the French king the order of saint Michaell, to inuest therewith the lord gouernor, the earles of Angus, Huntleie, and Argile. Herwith also was an armie of Scots raised, and ioining with the Frenchmen, they approched the borders, where they laie for a season: but the earle of Hertford lieutenant generall of the north parts comming downe, tooke such direction for the safe kéeping of the English borders, that after the Scots had laine there in campe a certeine space without atchiuing anie great enterprise, though some notable exploit was looked for to haue bene attempted by them at that present, they brake vp their armie & went home.

An armie of Scots lieth on the borders

Fr.Thin. Lesleus lib.10. pag.480.

¶ This castell of Dunbreton was at that time so carefullie kept by the captein therof, that he determined neither to deliuer it to the gouernor, nor to anie Englishman, nor to anie Scot. Wherevpon, the gouernor fearing least it should fall into the hands of the English, prepare to besiege the same; the newes therof comming to Glencarne, he signified the same vnto Lennor, affirming, that if he would come thither, he should shortlie obteine the castell. The king of England reioising of that newes, prepareth two ships, and in the meane time sent the bishop of Cathnesse into Scotland, which should forthwith be receiued into the castell. Wherefore the gouernor making the more hast, commeth to Dunbreton togither with the cardinall, and the earles Huntleie, and Argile, laieng present siege to the same, which was strong-lie done, and the castilains pressed to great extremitie by the slaughter of manie people. But at length by the policie of the earle Huntleie, it was so agreed, that the castell (which was by nature inexpugnable) should be deliuered. Which the gouernor receiued (with certeine conditions) and honorablie intreated the captein for the singular discharge of the trust committed to him: and therewithall he restored the bishop of Cathnesse, brother to the earle of Lennor to his bishoprike, which before he had lost by his going into England.)

The sixteenth of September, three or foure hundred Scots, with Marwell, Lochinuart, and Johnstone, aided with the Frenchmen, attempted to enter into England on the east borders: but the Englishmen perceiuing where they were about to passe by a certeine streit, they set vpon them with their archers, discomfited them, sleaing, & taking to the number of seuen score of them. Among other that were taken, one of the sonnes to the lord Hume, with a French captein, and George Elphinston archer of the corps to the French king, were accounted chiefe. Also on the west borders, Robert Marwell eldest son to the lord Marwell, was taken in a rode made by him and others, into the English confines on that side; although at an other time certeine Englishmen making a rode into Scotland were distressed, the more part of them being taken or slaine. At a parlement holden at Linlithquho, begun there the twentie eight of September, and continued till the first of October, Matthew earle of Lennor, and Thomas bishop of Atheltrea, were forfalted, and all their lands and goods giuen awaie and annexed to the crowne.

The lord Marwels son taken prisoner

In this meane time, the king of England desirous to haue the seruice of the Iles of Scotland for sundrie great causes and respects, moued the earle Lennor to deale with them to that end: which he did. And his trauell toke such effect, that the Iland men were contented to rest at the king of England his deuotion, partlie for that they were in a manner sworne enimies to the earle of Argile, and his familie; and partlie for that they doubted the king of Englands puissance, if he should attempt to inuade those parties: and againe, bearing an old speciall fauour to the earle of Lennor and his house, hauing an ancient bond of aliance and amitie with the same, they were the more readie to satisfie his motion. Heere vpon, they elected amongest them a lord of the Iles, the next of bloud: a title long since verie odious to the state of Scotland, and by the inducement of the earle of Lennor, he was contented as the king of Englands pensioner, to receiue two thousand crownes of him yerelie, with certeine rich apparell of cloth of gold and siluer from the said earle.

The earle of Lennor procureth them of the Iles to serue the king of England.

The lord of the Iles elected, being one of the Maconels.

The first prose he attempted to shew of his seruice in the king of Englands behalfe, was this. Hauing instructions thereto from the earle of Lennor, vnder colour of conference for matters touching the estate of the countrie, he had suborned one of his aliance and seruants, called the clane Reginald, to intrappe the earles of Argile and Huntleie. And although they escaped verie narrowlie, the lord Louet an ancient baron, & great friend to those two earles, was slaine by the said clane, togither with seuen hundred of his kinsmen and friends: insomuch that there remained not but one yong boy of that linage to succéd in that lords lands [which is before more fullie handeled out of Lesleus.]

Fr.Thin.

After this, the lord of the Iles, with six thousand men imbarked in certeine vessels, passed ouer into Carrike, harried and burnt the lands of the earle of Cassiles, then a great enimie to the king of England. In this voiage he got great spoiles, and slue manie of the enimies. After which enterprise so atchiued, he came with his power by sea, and landed in Ireland, where the earles of Lennor and Dermond were, with twelue hundred Irishmen, appointed to ioine with him, that with their whole power they might inuade the earle of Argiles countries, & consequentlie the maine land of Scotland at the broad side. But before the preparation could be made readie for that iorneie, the new lord of the Iles deceassed, whose burtall in Ireland to honor the earle of Lennor, stood the king of England in fourè hundred pounds sterling.

The lord of the Iles inuadeth Carrike.

He departeth this life.

But now to returne vnto the doings on the borders betwixt England and Scotland in this season. Ye shall vnderstand, that after the armie of Scotland was broken vp, the earle of Hertford by vertue of his commission, raised an armie in the countries of the further side of Trent northwards; so that when the same was assembled togither, with such strangers as were then in the kings wages, they were in all of horsemen and footmen twelue thousand fighting men. With this armie garded with great store of artillerie, munition, and all manner of furniture necessarie, the earle of Hertford entered Scotland, and marching to Coldingham, past vp by the water of Tweed, and burnt a great part of the Mers, and Tiuidale, the abbeies of Kelso, Melrosse, Driborne, and Jedworth, with townes & villages, to the number of fiue score.

But eight thousand, as some say.

The earle of Hertford inuadeth Scotland.

Howbeit, he entered not farre within the said countrie beyond the said water, but kept alongest nére to the same, and returned backe without anie incounter: for after the Scotish armie was broken vp, it was not like they would assemble againe, and so the earle of Hertford taking the time that serued his purpose, sore indamaged the Scotish borders at that present. Manie other small inuasions were made, as well by the one part as the other, and some skirmishes fell out betwixt them, sometime to the losse of the Scotish, and sometime of the English, according to the course of warre.

¶ Much about this time, or rather before, Robert Marwell the sonne of Robert (a yong man of singular vertue) was taken by the English. Besides which there was nothing done worthie the memorie, but that in the beginning of the next winter Montgomerie returned into France. After this, the cardinall leadeth the gouernor about the nére countries, vnder colour to reconcile such parts as were at dissention: then they came first to Perth, where foure men were punished for eating flesh on forbidden daies: from thence they went to Dundée called Toadune (to vse the name of the place, as Buchanan hath) to punish (as they said) such as vsed the late new testament of Luthers translation. Thither came also Patrike Greie (the head of a noble familie in those parts) accompanied with a good traine, togither with the erle of Rothseie, being before that commanded to be there by the gouernor, after the pacifieng of the other tumults. But the cardinall (supposing it small safetie to receiue at one time two such noble and factious persons addicted to the restored religion, into the towne) wrought with the gouernor that he and they might go backe to Perth.

The nert morning, when those two noblemen (redie for the iourneie) vnderstood that the gouernor was on his waie towards Perth, they presentlie followed him. Who being come in sight, did strike such feare into the cardinall, that the gouernor commanded them to sunder themselues, and seuerallie to enter the citie: which they did. Whereupon the nert day they were both committed to prison. But Rothseie being shortlie deliuered, Greie (whome they hated more, and feared most) was kept longer in that restraint. But before they parted thence, it seemed good to the cardinall to abate the strength of Ruthwen capteine of the towne. For which cause, the gouernor taketh his office from him, and bestoweth the same vpon Kinsane Comarch, neighbor and kinsman to Greie. For this Ruthwen was a great enimie to the cardinall, and much fauored the restored religion: as likewise was Greie, who after the same sort did not beare a friendlie mind to the cardinall, nor to his religion.

By reason whereof, the cardinall supposed, that if he might set them (by this meanes) together by the eares (sith manie of both parts would ioine for defense of the chiefe of their families) and that if anie side had the worse (as both must be diminished) that then he had by so much abated the power of one of his enimies. Upon which occasion the gouernement of Perth (which had by manie descents remained in the familie of the Ruthwens) might be thus translated to Kinsane. Thus the new capteine was sent with a power to subdue the citizens by force, if they would not willinglie obeie: as it seemed that they would not; because they tooke it with some griefe, to haue (in this new capteine) the old libertie of voices (in chosing of their gouernor) taken from them. The besieging of the towne being therefore diuided into parts, Greie (which had wholie taken the matter on him) attempted the ouerthrow thereof, from the bridge of Taie. The other band (hauing laid their artillerie along by the riuer ouer against the towne) did inuade the open side of the said Perth.

But because the swelling of the sea did not answer their deuise, they came not in time to do anie thing therein. Greie assalting it by the bridge (which Ruthwen hauing receiued, and conueied the aid into the nert houses, would seeme to leaue vngarded) when he saw no armed men stirring, did (without all feare) enter further into the towne, where he was so sharplie set vpon by Ruthwen, and his companie (suddenlie and vnlooked for breaking out of the houses vpon them) that euerie one hastened to spie some place by which he might flie awaie. But the multitude confused and driuen into a streict, did let one an other thereof. For they behind, thinking to breake in amongest the other, did hinder the first that they could not flie: in which vnorderlie multitude, manie were troden vnder foot, and three score were killed with the sword.

The cardinall (although against his mind) hauing heard of the victorie of Ruthwen; yet he did not greatlie lament the slaughter made of his aduersaries. After this, the cardinall hauing thus sufficientlie progressed to Angus: he led the gouernor after the fourteenth of December to saint Andrews, to the end (if it were possible) to bind the gouernor more firmelie vnto him. For although before he had the gouernors sonne as pledge with him; yet (as often as he remembred the eagernesse of the Scotish nobilitie, the strength of his enimies, and the inconstancie of the gouernor) he greatlie feared, least the said gouernor should with like lightnesse be drawen to assist his enimies, as he had beene led to take his part.] During the time whilest they were at S. Andrews, the cardinall caused in the Lent season all the bishops & prelats of the realme to assemble at the towne of saint Andrews, where a learned man, named maister George Wischart, that had beene in the schooles of Germanie, was accused of heresie, which he had (as was alleged against him) publikelie preached, and priuatlie taught in Dundee, Brechin, and diuerse other parts of Scotland, since his returne home. This matter was so vrged against him, that he was conuict, and burnt there in the towne of saint Andrews during the time of that conuention or assemblie.

Buchanan. lib. 15.

✲When these things were thus done, the cardinall, although he greatlie trusted to his riches; yet because he was not ignorant what were the minds of men, & what speeches the common people had of him) determined to increase his power with new deuises. Wherefore he goeth into Angus, and marieth his eldest daughter (as saith Buchanan) to the earle of Crawfords sonne. Which mariage was solemnized with great preparation, almost answerable to kinglie magnificence. During which time, the cardinall vnderstanding by his spies, that the English did prepare to inuade the Scotish borders on the sea (and spectallie did threaten those of Fife therewith) returned to saint Andrews, and appointed a day to the nobilitie, and such as dwelled about the sea coasts, to assemble togither to prouide in common for the defense thereof, and to prepare remedie for that hastened euill. For the easier and better performance whereof, he had determined, togither with the lords of that countrie, to haue sailed himselfe about the coasts, and to haue defended such places as were most conuenient.

Amongest others that came vnto him, there was a noble yong gentleman called Norman Lesle, sonne to the earle of Rothseie, whereof we haue spoken before manie times. This man (after that he had manie times employed his valiant and faithfull diligence in the behalfe of the cardinall) grew to some contention with the said cardinall for a priuat cause, which for a time did estrange both their minds the one from the other. This same contention did Norman (being thereto induced with manie faire promises) afterwards let fall. But certeine moneths following (when he returned to demand the performance of such liberall promises) they began to grow from common speech to brallings, and from thence to bitter tawnts & reproches, not fit to be vsed by anie of them both. Whereupon they departed with the greeued minds of euerie of them. For the cardinall being intreated more vnreuerentlie than he would or looked for; and the other threatning that being ouertaken by deceipt, he would reuenge it: they both returned discontented to their owne people. Whereupon Norman, declaring to his partakers the intollerable arrogancie of the cardinall, they easilie agreed all to conspire his death. Wherefore, to the end that the same might be lesse suspected, they departed in sunder afterward. This Norman accompanied onelie with fiue of his owne traine, entred the towne of saint Andrews, and went into his accustomed Inne and lodging; trusting that by such small traine he might cunninglie dissemble the determination of the cardinals death. But there were in that towne, ten of those which had consented to this conspiracie; which closed in secret corners, some in one place, and some in an other, did onelie expect the signe which was to be giuen vn-

to them to execute this deuiſe. With which ſmall companie this Norman feared not to aduenture the death of the cardinall in the ſame towne, furniſhed in euerie place with the ſeruants and friends of the cardinall.]

Whereupon the thirteenth of Maie, the cardinall being within his caſtell of ſaint Andrews, certeine of his owne friends (as he toke them) that is to ſay, the ſaid Norman, lord Leſleie, William Kirkandie, the yong lord of Grange, and Kirkmichell with ſirteene choſen men, entered the caſtell verie ſecretlie in the morning, toke the porter, and all the cardinals ſeruants, thruſting them out of the place by a poſterne gate. And that done, paſſing to his chamber where he laie in bed, as he got vp, and was opening his chamber doore, they ſlue him, and ſeized vpon the artillerie and munition, wherewith that fortreſſe was plentifullie furniſhed, and likewiſe with rich hangings, houſhold ſtuffe of all ſorts, apparell, copes, iewels, ornaments of churches, great ſtore of gold and ſiluer plate, beſide no ſmall quantitie of treaſure in readie coine.

The cardinall of ſaint Andrews murthered.

Sir James Leirmouth, prouoſt of ſaint Andrews, aſſembled all the people of that towne for the reſcue of the cardinall, after he heard that the conſpirators were entred the caſtell; but they ſhewed the dead bodie of the cardinall ouer the wals, as a ſpectacle to the people, and ſo they made no further attempt, ſith they ſaw no meane how to remedie or reuenge the matter at that preſent. The cauſe that moued the conſpirators thus to kill the cardinall, was thought to be partlie in reuenge of the burning of maiſter George Wiſchart, fearing to be ſerued with the ſame ſawce, and in the end to be made to drinke of the ſame cup. Partlie it was thought they attempted it through counſell of ſome great men of the realme, that had conceiued ſome deadlie hatred againſt him.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 10 pag. 481.

¶ But Leſleus alſo, writing of the cauſes of his death ſaith, that they were diuerſe: as the ſeuerall tormentors ſeuerallie framed euerie one a part for his owne excuſe. For Norman & John did complaine, that they were wronged by him with no ſmall iniurie, becauſe that the cardinall had not recompenſed him for the loſſe he ſuſteined; when the cardinall had reſtored to Colwine lord thereof (before through the cardinals counſell baniſhed by the king) the caſtell and poſſeſſions of Eaſter wemes; which the king had after giuen to the ſaid Norman. The lord Grange affirmed that he reuenged himſelfe, becauſe he was remoued by the cardinals aduiſe from the office of the treaſurorſhip; which (being granted by the king to him) he had diſcharged with great profit to the realme, & honor to himſelfe. And Kirkmichell did alſo ſay that he was diſpoſſeſſed by the cardinall of ſome other (I cannot tell what) poſſeſſions. All which cauſes were but veiles which they ſpread againſt the wind and report of ſo wicked and ſhamefull a deed. For vpon the fact, Norman being vexed with remorſe of conſcience, did not onelie labor to pacifie the anger of ſuch, that (either by bloud or benefit) were tied to the cardinall with all kind of duties; but did alſo, to ſhun the danger thereof, paſſe into France, and there by valour (in the ſeruice of Henrie the ſecond king of France) endeuored to wipe away that note of infamie, which he had caſt vpon his familie. All which notwithſtanding, both he and others (ſome after one ſort, and ſome after an other) were worthilie puniſhed for their wickednes.]

The ſame euening that the cardinall was ſlaine, the old lord of Grange, maiſter Henrie Balnauis, one of the councell of the realme, and ſundrie gentlemen of the ſurname of the Meluins, John Knoxs and others, to the number of ſeuen ſcore perſons, entred the caſtell to their ſupport, taking vpon them to keepe it againſt the gouernor and his partakers. Not long after, the gouernor, conſidering that his deere couſine the cardinall was thus made awaie, aſſembled the great lords of the realme, as the earle of Angus, Huntleie, Argile, and others, by whoſe aduiſe he called a parlement, and forfalted them that had ſlaine the cardinall, and kept the caſtell of ſaint Andrews. 1546. The ſlaiers of the cardinall forfalted.

Herewith alſo he raiſed a power, and beſieged the ſame caſtell, planting diuerſe peeces of great artillerie againſt it. But it was ſo ſtronglie furniſhed with all maner of artillerie & munition by the cardinall in his life time, that they within cared little for all the inforcements that their aduerſaries without could aduance againſt them. Whereupon, after that the ſiege had continued the ſpace of three moneths, the gouernor was glad to take an appointment with them within, to the end he might get out of their hands his eldeſt ſonne, who was remaining with the cardinall at the time when he was murthered, and ſo kept by them that did the murther, till now they agreed to deliuer him to his father, with condition that he ſhould raiſe his ſiege. The caſtell of ſaint Andrews beſieged. The ſiege raiſed.

They deliuered alſo the dead bodie of the cardinall, after it had laine buried in a dunghill within the caſtell, euer ſince the day in which they ſlue him. [The gouernor did name the abbat of Paſlew his brother to the biſhoprike of ſaint Andrews, and gaue the abbeie of Arbroth (being before granted to James Beton kinſman to the ſlaine cardinall) to George Dowglaſſe baſtard ſonne to the earle of Angus: which things were afterwards occaſions of great troubles in the realme.] In the yeare next inſuing, king Henrie the eight departed this life, after whome ſucceeded his ſonne Edward, the firſt of that name, king of England, France, and Ireland. Shortlie after, that is to ſay, the laſt of March, Francis the French king deceaſſed, and his ſonne Henrie, the ſecond of that name, ſucceeded him; who at the deſire of the gouernor of Scotland, appointed Leone Strozze prior of Capoa, a knight of the order of Malta, with a naule of 16 gallies, fraught with men of warre, and munition, to paſſe into Scotland, to helpe to win the caſtell of ſaint Andrews. Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 483. 1547. The king of England deceaſſed. The death of the French king.

The gouernor in the meane time with an armie paſſed to the weſt borders to beſiege the caſtell of Langham, the which was kept at that preſent by Michaell Wharton, hauing then with him but ſirteene Engliſhmen, who neuertheleſſe abid three or foure daies ſiege, and ſeuen canon ſhots, and ſo yeelded the houſe to the gouernor: and hereby was the peace broken, firſt by the Scots, euen as the Engliſhmen could haue wiſhed. Moreouer, at the ſame time, the erle of Rothous then returned out of Denmarke was acquit by an aſſiſe (as they call it) of earles and lords, of an accuſation wherewith he was charged, as confederat and partie with them that had murthered the cardinall.

Whileſt the gouernor was thus paſſed with his armie to the weſt borders, he was aduertiſed that the prior of Capoa was arriued, and [againſt the wils of ſuch as were againſt it] entred into the towne of ſaint Andrews: whereupon the gouernor, with all the nobilitie that were then about him, haſted thither to aſſiſt the prior, and ſo the ſiege was ſtronglie laid about the caſtell there. The prior cauſed certeine peeces of artillerie to be drawen vp, and mounted on the top of a church, which was higher than the caſtell; ſo that thoſe peeces ſhot plump into the caſtell, that none durſt ſhew themſelues on the wals, or abroad in the yard within the caſtell. He cauſed alſo certeine canons to be drawen with engins, Fr. Thin. The caſtell of ſaint Andrews beſieged by the French.

gins; nére to the verie wals of the castell, which battered the same in such sort, as the ditches were nére hand filled with the rubbish and stones of the wals that fell downe.

Moreouer, the gallies at an high water approched on the riuer side so nére to the castell, that with shot of canons and other artillerie, they sore annoied them within, and slue diuerse. The defendants perceiuing themselues thus besieged on all sides, & not able long to hold out, put forth a token vpon a speares point, to signifie that they desired parlee, which was granted, and certeine of them comming forth, were admitted to talke with the gouernor, the queene, and the prior of Capoa. They offered to render the castell, so they might depart, and haue their liues saued with bag and baggage.

The castell of S. Andrews yelded.

But this would not be granted, the gouernor vtterlie refusing it; at length he was content to pardon them of their liues, if the French king should thinke it good, else to stand to his pleasure. The spoile of the castell was giuen to the Frenchmen, who vpon the surrender entring the same, left nothing behind him that might serue them to anie vse in taking it away. All the principall men within it were led to the gallies, and conueied awaie into France prisoners at the French kings discretion. Diuerse of them were committed to sundrie prisons on the coast of Britaine, and others were appointed to row in the gallies till the yeare 1550, in which the prisoners were set at libertie, and the others that were in the gallies were redeemed by their friends for certeine summes of monie.

The prior of Capoa.

Thus was the castell of saint Andrews rendred the nine and twentith of Julie, fourténe daies after the arriuall there of the prior of Capoa, whereby his great valiancie, well knowen afore that time, was so renewed, as his praise for his spéedie dispatch and good successe therein was much aduanced. Shortlie after, the duke of Summerset, heretofore in this booke named earle of Hertford, vncle by the mother vnto the yong king of England, and admitted gouernor of his person, and protector of all his realms, dominions, and subiects, minding the aduancement of the yong king his nephue, thought good with all speed to procure the consummation of the mariage, betwixt him, and the yong quéene of Scots.

The duke of Summerset protector of England.

But perceiuing that the same could not be brought to passe without force, he séemed loth to let passe the opportunitie of time then offered (as he tooke it) to serue his purpose; and thereupon by aduise of councell leuied an armie with all expedition, and came to Berwike, about the latter end of August, and in the beginning of September entred Scotland with the same armie, conteining seauenténe or eighténe thousand men, which was diuided into three principall wards, the vant-gard led by the valiant earle of Warwike, the battell by the duke of Summerset himselfe, and the rere-ward by the lord Dacres of the north.

He entreth Scotland with an armie

There were certeine wings and troopes of men of armes, demilances, and light horssemen, and also of harquebusiers, that attended vpon these three wards, garded with diuerse péeces of great artillerie. The lord Greie of Wilton high marshall of the armie had the generall conduction of the men of armes and demilances. Sir Francis Brian, lieutenant of the light horssemen, with eight hundred of them was appointed to the vant-gard. Sir Peter Mewtas capteine of fiue hundred hagbutters, and sir Francis Fleming, maister of the ordinance with a thousand light horssemen, were appointed to the battell. And sir Richard Manners, with six hundred light horssemen, attended vpon the rere-ward.

The order of the English armie.

In this order marching through the Mers, and Louthian, they came at length vnto a place called Buckling Braes, nære to the Forth side, in which riuer the English fleet was arriued, and late before the towne of Leith, but now by order giuen came backe from thence, and lay nérer to the armie. The gouernor of Scotland aduertised of the comming of this armie of England thus to inuade Scotland, with all diligence sent abroad solemne summons for the leuieng of a new armie forth of all parts of the realme; supposing thereby to be sufficientlie furnished and inabled for the incounter; happen when it should; the contrarie part (no doubt) being likewise opinioned, and both hoping, or greedilie gaping after the glorie of victorie.

The English fleet.

The gouernor raiseth an armie.

For the gouernor did attempt at this time that which is accustomed to be vsed in the greatest dangers of the countrie: which was, that he sent out messengers through all the realme, who carieng a fierie crosse in their hands, should make signe (and declare) aswell to the laitie, as to the churchmen; that all they which were aboue sixténe yeares old, and vnder sixtie, should presentlie (with their armor) repaire to Mussilborow, and there be readie to defend the libertie of the countrie; who accordinglie came to Mussilborow (within lesse than two miles of the place where the English armie came to incampe, lieng at Preston) & placed themselues at Innernesse ouer against their enimies.]

Fr. Thin. Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 485.

Here we haue to vnderstand, that the Scots light horssemen oftentimes would come pricking almost within their staues length of the Englishmen as they marched, whooping and shouting, to the end they might traine them forth from their strength, and with railing words would still be in hand to prouoke them thereto. But the duke of Summerset, doubting the goodnesse of the Scotish prickers, gaue secret commandement, that no offer of skirmish by the Scotish horssemen should be taken. But at length the lord Greie of Wilton, not able to beare such bold presumption in the Scots, aduenturing as he tooke it ouer rashlie, and more than stood with their owne suertie, made suite to the duke of Summerset, that if they continued in such brauerie, it might be lawfull for him to set them further off.

The goodnes of the Scotish horssemen feared of the Englishmen.

The lord Greie desireth to incounter the Scotish horssemen.

The duke at the first by no meanes would assent thereto, telling the lord Greie, that his desire proceeded more of a lolitie of courage, than of anie knowledge of the enimie, and séemed to defend the goodnesse of the Scotish horssemen: but when the lord Greie persisted in his suite, and the earle of Warwike assisted his request, the duke in the end yéelded thereto. Herevpon when the lord Hume with the Scots the next time (which was on the Fridaie the ninth of September) came forth to offer the skirmish after their wonted maner, the lord Greie taking with him certeine bands of horssemen, both men of armes, demilances, and also light horsmen, diuided them in troopes, appointing the Spanish and Italian hagbutters on horssebacke to kéepe on a wing, and to gard the hindermost troope of the English horssemen.

He also gaue order to the leaders of euerie troope, that to which soeuer the enimie should once offer, in anie wise, that no answer by skirmish were made them, but after they had drawne them to their accustomed plaie and proffer of charge, that troope that it was offered vnto, presentlie vpon the enimies wheeling about should throughlie giue it them; and that so giuen, the next troope presentlie to giue it in the face: and so (as occasion required) both those troopes wholie togither to helpe other without breaking. The Scots comming forward, pricking and whooping after their old wont, the Englishmen forbare a great while, till at the last, foure or fiue hundred of them came scattered vpon the spurre, with a maruellous shout within a stones length of the formost troope.

These thinking then to haue wheéled about, maister Nicholas Gainesford, the leader of that troope, and lieutenant of the lord Greies band of his men of armes of Bullongne, cried; A charge, which as spéedily on the English part as vnlooked for of the Scots being giuen, from charging at that time in sport, the Scots were driuen to gallop awaie so fast as their horsles might beare them, losing of their companies that were taken and slaine, to the number of eight hundred and more (as some haue written) [at what time the lord Hume (as saith Lesleus lib. 10. pa. 486) falling from his horsse, was grieuouslie wounded, and caried to Edenburgh, and his eldest sonne was taken prisoner] but yet, as diuerse of the Englishmen aduentured too farre in following the chase, they were distressed, and sundrie of them taken prisoners, among the which were some of their capteins, as sir Rafe Bulmer, Thomas Golwer, & Robert Crouch, each of them hauing in charge the leading of seuerall bands of light horsemen. ¶ Thus much for this Fridaies skirmish, wherein the chiefest force of the Scotish horsemen was defeated, to the great discouragement of the rest.

English capteins taken.

* The English armie remaining still at Preston, did from a hill behold the number of the Scots, who (supposing that they saw a greater number than in truth there was) assembled in the meane time to consult of the estate of their affaires. And therevpon sent letters to the Scots, desiring that if they might obteine anie thing by iustice, that they should rather end the warre with couenants than with canons. The effect of which letters tended to this end. That the English did greatlie intreat the Scots, first to remember that both armies were christian men, to and of whome (vnlesse they vtterlie forget their profession) there should nothing be more welcome nor desired than peace & tranquillitie, and nothing more detestable than warre and vniust force. Besides this, that the cause of this present warre did not grow of couetousnesse, hatred or enuie, but from the desire of perpetuall peace, which could not be better or more firmelie established by any means, but by the league of matrimonie (being promised and confirmed by the publike consent and pledge of the nobilitie) with those conditions which were more beneficiall for the Scots than the English, being such as did not call them into seruitude, but into a felowship and liberall imparting of all their fortunes each to other. For so much more should that mariage be commodious to the Scots than to the English, by how much the hope of profit, and the feare of iniuries should bée greater from the stronger to the weaker.

Fr. Thn. Buchan. lib. 15.

Wherefore they should chiefliе consider (and in this kind) this to be their greatest reason, that since that their quéene was of necessitie to be giuen in mariage by the Scots, and that the same necessitie was not to be auoided; and the moderation therein verie hard: that the onelie power to chose hir a husband was left vnto the publike councell or parlement. And if they would chose (to their quéene) a husband for the publike profit and dignitie: of whome could they better take choise, than of a king their neighbor, borne in the same Iland, néere of bloud, instructed in the same lawes, brought vp in the same maners and language; not their superior onelie in riches, but almost also in all commodities and ornaments of externall things, and such a person which did bring with him peace, concord, amitie, and the forgetting of all old iniuries? But if they call to them anie other (differing from them in language, maners, and lawes) to take the kingdome: let them thinke with themselues, what and how manie discommodities will grow thereby, and to what euill counsels they shall indanger themselues: the which they may learne by the example of other nations, being farre better to be taught it by the misfortunes of others, than to féele the smart thereof by their owne experience.

Wherefore (as touching themselues) if they shall not perceiue the Scotish nation to be estranged from this amitie and concord, they would mitigate somwhat of their former promises (which by law they might chalenge) and be contented that the maiden quæne should be brought vp amongst them, and bée alwaies in their power, vntill the time that nature should inable hir fit for mariage, and vntill such time as she might chose hir a husband by the aduise of the nobilitie. And that in the meane time (vntill the same might be performed) that both the nations should absteine from warre: and that also the quéene (during that time) should neither be conueied into anie strange nation: nor that they should conclude anie pact or couenant with the French, or anie other forreine prince touching hir mariage. The which if the Scots would most holilie and handfastlie promise, the English would forthwith depart with a quiet armie. And further, that if the English had committed anie hurt or spoile (since they came into the countrie) they would recompense the same by the iudgement of good men.

These letters thus sent, the gouernor did impart vnto a few, and of those especiallie to John his brother bishop of saint Andrews (taken vnto him in place & authoritie of the slaine cardinall.) These two aduanced with great hope of victorie, were the cause that these letters were suppressed, bicause they feared that if the equall conditions of peace were knowne abroad, the most part would willinglie incline to the same quiet aduise. Wherefore they procured a false rumor to be spread through the host, that the English men were come thither with determination to take awaie the quéene by force, and by strength of armes to bring the whole kingdome into their subiection. For the gouernor being faint spirited by nature, had chosen vnto him foure such other councellors (like vnto himselfe) in the affairs of warre, by whose command & becke all things were performed. Of which number were his three kinsmen, John archbishop of saint Andrews, the abbat of Dunfermling, George Durie, with Archembald Beton; and the fourth was Hugh Rigs, a lawier, rather famous for his grosse bodie and foolish conditions, than anie knowledge in militarie affaires. These foure had so puffed vp the gouernor (inconstant by his owne nature, and changing his counsell by the wind of euerie rumor) that he would with stoped eares heare all other mens opinions. In the meane time, his friends hauing spread a feined tale (through the Scotish host) by him deuised, the Scots ran in all hast to their weapons, whose vnaduised spéed was in the end the cause of their vnfortunate procédings, as after shall apeare.)

The Scots meant not to haue giuen battell.

The purpose of the Englishmen.

For being true (as the Scots haue reported) that the gouernor, and the nobilitie of Scotland meant not to hazard battell within their owne realme, but rather to lie still and defend their ground, if the Englishmen should come forward to giue them battell there. The Englishmen aduertised thereof, the morrow after this great skirmish, raised their field verie earlie, purposing to take an hill called Pinkhill, where they might place their ordinance, and to shot into the Scotish campe, whereby they should force the Scots to dislodge from their ground of aduantage. The gouernor and the Scotish lords, beholding their enimies thus marching forward, thought best to

to ſtaie their enterpriſe, and therefore ſuddenlie, notwithſtanding their former determination, ruſhing forth of their campe, paſſed forward to incounter their enimies.

The ordering of the Scotiſh battels.

They were diuided into three battels; Archembald Dowglaſſe earle of Angus, with certeine lords with him, led the vant-gard; George Gordon earle of Huntleie, and his friends the rere-ward; and the gouernor accompanied with the earle of Argile and the reſt of the noble men, were in the maine battell. The Engliſhmen hauing got the hill, and perceiuing the Scots to come forwards with great haſt, ſtaied for their comming: but the Scots were ſo raſh and haſtie, paſſing firſt through the water in their armour, and ſo vp towards the hill, that continuing their march with ſuch ſpeed, as they ſeemed rather to trot, than to keepe anie ordinarie marching paſe, before they could come to ioine with the Engliſhmen, they were almoſt out of breath.

The Engliſh horſſemen eaten backe.

Howbeit, the earle of Angus, and the other in the vant-gard, boldlie abid the charge of all the Engliſh horſſemen, and ſo rigorouſlie reincountred them, that ſlaieng and beating downe no ſmall number both of men and horſſes, they put the reſt to flight; ſo that no ſmall part of them retired backe in ſuch diſorder, that they ran thorough the rankes of the footmen in the fore-ward, wherwith ſuch feare entered among the Engliſhmen, that (as hath béene reported) they had vndoubtedlie fled, if the manfull courage of the earle of Warwike had not béene ſhewed at that preſent, according to the wonted valure of his often approued proweſſe, whereby he cauſed them to ſtaie, and relie themſelues againe.

The valiantneſſe of the earle of Warwike.

In the meane time, the battell and the rere-ward of the Scots aduanced forward with great courage. But there was a gallie & two pineſſes of the Engliſh fléet, which from the ſea ſhot ſo terriblie at the Scotiſh armie, that the ſame was not onelie ſore galled and indamaged thereby, but alſo ſtaied, that they could not come eaſilie forward. And herewith the Engliſh vant-gard incouraged with the comfortable words and behauior of the earle of Warwike, and other the captains, made towards the Scotiſh vant-gard againe: the which not able of it ſelfe to reſiſt, retired in good order to the great battell of Scotland. Where vpon, the multitude fearing, by reaſon they ſaw them in the forward thus retire (albeit in good order) that all had béene loſt, gaue backe, and toke them to flight; whome the Engliſhmen followed amaine, ſlaieng the Scotiſhmen downe on heaps in paſſing great numbers. Manie were alſo drowned in the water of Undereſke, through the which they toke their flight.

The gallie and two pineſſes.

The earle of Huntleie taken priſoner.

The earle of Huntleie and the rere-gard ſtood ſtill with their enſignes and banners, till the chaſe was paſt by them: but at length were driuen to make awaie as well as the reſt, and the earle himſelfe in the retire being taken on foot, well clad in gilt armour inameled, was led priſoner to the lord protector. Diuerſe other men of name, barons, and knights, were taken priſoners. There were ſlaine no ſmall number of perſonages of good account. Among other, the lord Fleming, the maiſter of Erſkin, the maiſter of Graham, the maiſter of Meſſine, the maiſter of Ogiluie, the maiſter of Leuingſton, the maiſter of Roſſe [the maiſter of Argendale and Meſkane] the lard of Lochinwar, the lard of Glencarnocke, & others. [There were taken priſoners diuerſe noble men, the lord Zeſtrie, the earle of Huntleie chancellor of the realme, and others, as ſaith Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 487.]

Men of name of Scots ſlaine. Fr. Thin.

The next day, the Engliſh armie remoued to Leith, where the priſoners were put into a church, diuerſe of them being ſore wounded. But the earle of Huntleie, entering bond for them that they ſhould well and truelie paie their ranſomes, agréed vpon betwixt them and their takers, or elſe to come and preſent themſelues priſoners in England by a certeine day, they were ſuffered to depart. * The calamitie of which bloudie day, there were not a few which did impute iuſtlie to happen to the Scots, becauſe they did arrogantlie reiect ſuch honorable and beneficiall peace, and did hope (if they obteined the victorie) to haue vſed more crueltie to their owne people than vnto the Engliſh, either becauſe they would (as I my ſelfe coniecture) reuenge old quarels, or elſe haue vſed extremitie againſt ſuch as ſecretlie miſliked this conflict with the Engliſh.)

The gouernor eſcaping from the battell, came to Striueling, where the quéene regent was, togither with hir daughter the yong quéene. Héere, by the counſell and aduiſe of the earle of Angus [Argile, Rotheſen, and Caſſiles] and diuerſe other lords that were alſo withdrawne thither after the battell, they were conueied to the countrie of Menteith, where they remained in the abbeie of Inch Mahome [deliuering the yong quéene to hir mother, Erſkine and Leuingſtone to be kept there] till the Engliſh armie was departed out of the realme, and then they remoued againe, and came to Striueling. [After that the gouernor had deliuered the earle out of priſon at Edenburgh] the Engliſh nauie wan the Ile of ſaint Colmes Inch [in the meane time] and did ſundrie other exploits by ſea, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie it may appéere.

Moreouer, the earle of Bothwell, whome the gouernor had before kept in priſon, and was the night after the battell ſet at libertie, repared to the duke of Summerſet, with diuerſe other lords and gentlemen of Louthian, whileſt he laie at Leith, offering themſelues to be at the king of Englands commandement, and ſo were aſſured from receiuing hurt or damage by the Engliſh power. The duke of Summerſet hauing remained at Leith eight daies, burnt a peece of it, and demanding the caſtell of Edenburgh, but could not obteine it, departed thence the eightéenth of December homewards the nert waie, ouer the mounteins of Soutreie, comming the third day before the caſtell of Hume, where they did ſo much by countenancing to win that fortreſſe, that within three or foure daies after their comming thither, it was yorrendred.

Hume caſtell rendred to the Engliſhmen.

This caſtell being woone, & a garriſon left therein to kéepe it, they remoued to Rockeſburgh, where within the compaſſe of the ruinous wals of an old caſtell, they built a fort; & after returning into England, left a conuenient garriſon to kéepe it. They got alſo about the ſame time a ſtrong fortreſſe, called Faſt caſtell, ſtanding néere to the ſea ſide, and placed a garriſon within it. And moreouer, in this meane time, their fléet by ſea wan the caſtell of Broughtie crag, and put in like manner a garriſon within it to kéepe the ſame (as in the Engliſh hiſtorie it may further apeere) and in what ſort alſo all the chiefeſt lords and gentlemen of the Mers and Tiuidale came in, and ſubmitted themſelues to the duke of Summerſet, vpon aſſurance had and giuen.

Furthermore, whileſt the duke of Summerſet with his armie did thus inuade Scotland on the eaſt part, it was ordeined by the ſaid duke, and other of the councell to the king of England, that Matthew earle of Lennox, and Thomas lord Wharton, then warden of the weſt marches of England, ſhould with a power inuade Scotland on the weſt ſide, to the end that there ſhould not anie of the weſt borders nor countries come to aſſiſt the gouernor againſt the duke of Summerſets armie, but be driuen to remaine at home to defend their owne countrie. Herevpon, there was an armie leuied, to the number of

fiue thouſand footmen, and eight hundred light horſſemen, with which power the earle of Lennox and the lord Wharton entering Scotland the eight of September, incamped the firſt night vpon the water of Eſke, and marched the next day through the nether part of Annandale, till they came to the caſtell of Milke, a fortreſſe of good ſtrength, the wals being foureteene foot thicke.

The caſtell of Milke yelded

Capteine of this caſtell was one John Steward, brother to the lard thereof, who vpon the approch of the earle of Lennox, yelded the houſe to him, without anie ſhew of reſiſtance. Whereupon, Ferguſe Graham, brother to Richie Graham of Erſke, was appointed with a garriſon of ſouldiors to keepe that caſtell to the vſe of the yoong king of England, and was afterwards confirmed capteine there with fiftie light horſſemen, by appointment of the duke of Summerſet, & the councell; ſo that during the wars, he remained there to the great annoiance of the Scots, enimies to England, and preſeruation of the countrie thereabouts to the king of Englands vſe.

On the twentith of September, the earle of Lennox, and the lord Wharton, incamped neere to the towne of Annand, and on the morrow after approching nearer to the ſame, gaue ſummons vnto the capteine therof, called Lion, of the houſe of Glams, who with an hundred Scots [whereof Marwell and Johnſtone, and Cokpull (as ſaith Leſleus lib. 10. pa. 489. being parcell] kept the church and ſteeple of Annand, being peeces of themſelues verie ſtrong and mightilie reinforced with earth: they within therefore refuſed to yeld, and valiantlie defended themſelues. The greateſt peeces of artillerie, which the Engliſhmen had there at that time, were certeine double and ſingle falcons, wherewith they beat onelie the battlements, till they might with certeine engines approch hard to the wals, and vndermine the ſame, ſo as the roofe of the church was ſhaken downe, and a great number of them within the church ſlaine and cruſhed to death. Such as eſcaped fled into the ſteeple.

The church of Annand vndermined.

Two of the Engliſhmen that wrought about the mines, were ſlaine: but at length, the capteine moued by perſuaſion of the earle of Lennox, to whome he claimed to be of kin, rendered the ſteeple to him, with himſelfe, and 96 Scots ſouldiors, with condition to haue their liues onelie ſaued, and the capteine to remaine priſoner, and to go into England. Immediatlie vpon their comming forth of the ſteeple, fire was giuen vnto the traines of powder in the mines, and ſo both the church & ſteeple were blowen vp into the aire, & raced downe to the ground. This done, they burnt the towne (after they had ſacked it) and left not one ſtone ſtanding vpon an other, for that the ſame towne had euer beene a verie noiſome neighbour to England.

The ſteeple yelded.

The church and ſteeple of Annand blowen vp with powder.

The Engliſhmen had conceiued ſuch ſpite towards this towne, that if they ſaw but a peece of timber remaining vnburnt, they would cut the ſame in peeces with their bils. The countrie herewith was ſtriken in ſuch feare, that the next day all the Bilpatrikes and the Jordeins, the lards of Kirknichell, Apilgirth, Cloſburne, Powmendes, Nubie, and the Irrewings, the Bels, the Rigs, the Murreies, and all the clanes and ſurnames of the neather part of Annerdale, came in, and receiued an oth of obeiſance, as ſubiects to the king of England, deliuering pledges for their aſſured loialtie. The reſidue that would not come in and ſubmit themſelues, had their houſes burnt, their goods and cattell fetched awaie by the Engliſh light horſſemen, that were ſent abroad into the countrie for that purpoſe.

The Scots that came to aſſure themſelues.

These things thus executed, the earle of Lennox, and the lord Wharton, returned backe into England with their priſoners, booties, and ſpoiles, receiuing great thanks and commendations by gentle letters on the fiue & twentith of September, from the duke of Summerſet, then lieng at Rockeſburgh, about fortifieng of that place. The gouernor perceiuing thus that without the aſſiſtance of France he ſhould not be able to reſiſt the Engliſhmen, hauing now got ſuch foot hold within the realme of Scotland, required the queene Dowager, and monſieur Doiſell, liger ambaſſador for the French king, to perſuade with him by letters, to ſend an armie into Scotland, to the aid of his friends there.

The gouernors ſute to the queene Dowager, and to the French ambaſſadors.

The queene and monſieur Doiſell, perceiuing a readie waie prepared to bring that to paſſe which they moſt deſired (which was, to haue the queene of Scotland ordered in all things by the French kings aduiſe) they vndertooke to procure an armie out of France, according to the gouernors deſire, if he with the ſtates of the realme would agree that the queene might be ſent into France, and a contract made for hir beſtowing in mariage, as ſtood with the French kings pleaſure. The gouernor condeſcending herevnto, aſſembled the ſtates, and by their aduiſes, paſſed certeine couenants to the effect aforeſaid, & ſent the ſame in writing by certeine meſſengers into France.

The queene Dowager promiſeth aid out of France with condition.

The French king gladlie accepting this meſſage, prepared a nauie of ſhips and gallies to tranſport an armie into Scotland the next ſummer. In the meane time, the gouernor laied ſiege to Broughtie crag, and the duke of Summerſet, as well for meane to cauſe the Scots to retire that ſiege, as alſo for the annoiance of Clideſdale, apperteining to the gouernor and the earle of Angus, and other Scots that would not come in to the obeiſance of the king of England, appointed the earle of Lennox to make a new inuaſion into Scotland, and to vſe for triall of their fidelities the helpe of two thouſand Scotiſh light horſſemen, that were alreadie aſſured & ſworne to ſerue the king of England in all ſuch exploits in which they ſhould be imploied.

The gouernor ſendeth into France for aid.

Broughtie crag beſieged by the gouernor.

The earle of Lennox deſirous to aduance the king of Englands affaires, and hauing receiued letters from William earle of Glencarne, with promiſe of his aſſiſtance, and likewiſe of his father in law the earle of Angus, the lard of Drumlanrig, and thoſe lards and gentlemen of the countries of Kile, Conningham, Renfrew, and Lennox, entered Scotland about the twelfth of December, accompanied with Henrie Wharton, ſecond ſon to the lord Wharton, with two hundred light horſſemen, of the garriſons in Scotland, and comming firſt to Dunfreis, where the generall aſſemblie was appointed of the two thouſand aſſured Scotiſh light horſſemen, when the muſters ſhould be taken, he found ſcarſe three hundred, and thoſe for the more part of the broken countries of Annandale, Ewisdale, Eſdale, and Lideldale.

The earle of Lennox entereth into Scotland.

The earle of Glencarne came thither in deed, but vnder a counterfet ſhew of good meaning, where in truth he ment nothing but craft to diſcouer all the earle of Lennox his purpoſes: who perceiuing his double dealing, and finding no ſuch forces readie to aſſiſt him, as he looked for, and moreouer, miſtruſting the loialties of the maiſter of Marwell, & the gentlemen of Nideſdale, meaning (as he tooke it) to intrap him, and deliuer him to the queene Dowager, and the lord gouernor, ſtood in ſome perpleritie what way ſhould be the beſt for him to follow, thinking it not to ſtand with his honor to returne, without atchiuing ſome enterpriſe.

The earle of Glencarne his double dealing.

Now lord Harries.

The earle of Lennox in doubt what to do.

The earle of Glencarne had ſhewed to him two letters written by the lard of Drumlanrig, ſignifieng, that if the earle of Lennox came, accompanied onelie with Scotiſhmen, he would both ſerue him and honor him in the beſt wiſe he might: but if he brought thoſe Engliſhmen in his compante, he would not onelie refuſe to aid him, but alſo raiſe all the power he might make, either by his friends or otherwiſe, to reſiſt him, and proffer him a repulſe. The earle thus perceiuing that he was in danger to be betraied among them, and that there were all the deuiſes practiſed that might be to ſtaie thoſe that ſhould come to the deuotion of the king of England, diſſembled the matter with Glencarne, and other that were ſuborned to betraie him; pretending to them, that he would follow the courſe of their deuiſes.

The earle of Lennox diſſembleth with diſſemblers.

But in the meane time he got togither the Engliſh capteins that were appointed to attend him, and alſo ſuch Scotiſhmen as he knew he might truſt. And meaning to ſcourge Dzumlanrig, & to cut him ſhort, for that he was the chiefe inſtrument to ſtaie all the Scotiſhmen in thoſe parties from entering friendſhip with the Engliſhmen: he gaue ſecret warning to all the capteins & leaders about nine of the clocke at night, that they ſhould be readie with their men to mount on horſbacke at the ſound of the trumpet, and keepe with them the earle of Glencarne, the maiſter of Marwell, the lards of Cloſburne, Kirkmichell, and others the gentlemen of Nideſdale and Annandale.

horſſemen ent forth to courge Dzumlanrig.

They harrie ye countrie a- out Dzumlanrig.

He ſent forth ſix hundred choſen horſſemen vpon ſound of the trumpet, at twelue of the clocke at night, vnder the leading of Henrie Wharton, and other the capteins of the garriſons, who in the dawning of the nert morrow, arriued neere the place of Dzumlanrig, where they appointed foure hundred of their horſſemen to paſſe to the forraie, who raiſed fire, and burnt two miles in length, both townes and villages on ech ſide, euen hard to the gates of Dzumlanrig, ſpoiling the houſes of goods and riches, worth to the value of two thouſand marks, got three thouſand ſheepe, two thouſand herd of great cattell, beſide nine ſcore horſſes and mares.

The Annandalers laden with ſpoile and cattell, being in number foure hundred men, departed with their preie homewards. The lard of Dzumlanrig, lieng all this while in ambuſh with ſeuen hundred men, forbare to breake out to giue anie charge vpon his enimies, doubting leaſt the earle of Lennox had kept a ſtale behind: but now after he perceiued that the moſt part of the enimies were departed, and that the reſidue of the gentlemen & capteins of the Engliſh horſſemen were withdrawing towards Dunfreis, being not paſt ſix score men, he fiercelie followed after them with his power, in hope not onelie to ouerthrow and diſtres them, but alſo to take the earle of Lennox at Dunfreis.

Dzumlanrig purſueth the Engliſhmen.

Maiſter Henrie Wharton and thoſe ſix ſcore horſſemen, retiring beyond the water of Nith, and perceiuing that Dzumlanrig and his men entered the water raſhlie to purſue them, returned, and gaue ſuch a deſperate charge vpon them, that Dzumlanrig and his compante were ſcattered and put to flight: yet Dzumlanrig himſelfe, although there were ſome ſpeares broken vpon him, through the goodneſſe of his horſſe eſcaped. Two gentlemen of his ſurname and traine, that were in no ſmall eſtimation with him, were ſlaine, and ſix ſcore priſoners taken, and led to Dunfreis. The terror of this ouerthrow, and the bruit of the earle of Lennox his entrie thus made into Scotland, cauſed the gouernor to leuie his ſiege from Broughtie crag, and with ſpeed to come from thence, the better to defend his countries of Clideſdale, and Dowglaſdale. Sir Andrew Dudleie, capteine of Broughtie crag, bare himſelfe verie valiantlie in defending the caſtell during this ſiege, ſo that the Scots certes loſt diuerſe hardie perſonages: and among other, Gawen Hamilton, the gouernors kinſman, was ſlaine at the ſame ſiege.

Moreouer, the prior of Whiterne by his letters and meſſengers, offered himſelfe to obeie the king of England: and the inhabitants of the burrough and hauen townes of Wigton and Kirkowbre, the knights of Loghinwar and Garleis, the lard and tutor of Bombie, the lard of Cardines, & all the gentlemen of Annandale, Nideſdale, and Galloway, euen to Whiterne, being foure ſcore miles in length from Caerleill, through the inducement of the foreſaid prior, and of the knights of Loghinwar and Garleis, (for the fauour they bare to the earle of Lennox) within two daies after the diſcomfiture of Dzumlanrig, came vnto Dunfreis, and there receiued an oth to be true to the king of England, and afterwards went with the earle to Caerleill, leauing the countrie in good quiet, and the king of England acknowledged for lord of Galloway, Nideſdale, and Annandale, by the inhabitants thereof.

The prior of Whiterne.

And after that the forenamed perſons had remained for a ſpace at Caerleill, they deliuered pledges, but eſpeciallie for John Marwell, & returned home to their countrie, as aſſured men & ſubiects to the K. of England. In this meane while, the gouernor hauing held ſiege before the caſtell of Broughtie crag, by the ſpace of thirtie daies, and now retiring from thence (as before ye haue heard) by the aduiſe of the principall lords about him, he cauſed maiſter James Haliburton, tutor of thoſe parties, to raiſe certeine companies of horſſemen, and appointed him with capteine Leirmouth (whome he left in Dundee with certeine footmen) to defend the countrie againſt the Engliſhmen, if they iſſued forth of Broughtie crag, to atchiue anie enterpriſe anie where neere thereabouts.

The Scots deliuer pledges.

James Holliburton.

Capteine Leirmouth.

The duke of Summerſet by aduiſe of the reſidue of the councell in England, minding to bridle the Scots that refuſed to come in & ſubmit themſelues to the king of England, toke order [with the lord of Wilton, who (as ſaith Leſleus. lib. 10. pag. 491.) remained in Scotland from the fourth Ides of Aprill, vntill the tenth kalends of June] for the building of one fort at Lauder, and an other at Hadington, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie it may appeare. And further it was appointed alſo, that about the end of Februarie, the earle of Lennox and the lord Wharton, with ſeuen hundred Engliſh horſſemen, beſide the aſſured Scots horſſemen, and about foure or fiue thouſand Engliſh footmen, ſhould by the weſt borders inuade Scotland: they according to their commiſſion ſet forward, and the firſt night came to Louchmaben, and there lodged.

The earle of Lennox and the L. wharton inuade Scotland.

The next day they marched to Dunfreis, and whileſt they remained there, the earle of Angus being come to Dzumlanrig, by meſſengers entred ſome talke with his ſonne in law the earle of Lennor. But ſith it was perceiued that this was done, rather to intrap the earle of Lennor, or rather at the leaſt wiſe to driue time, vpon conſultation had with the maiſter of Marwell, the lard of Cloeſborne, and others the gentlemen aſſured of Nideſdale and Annandale, it was concluded, that the townes of Morton, Duſdere, and others, neere adioining togither in thoſe parts, ſhould be burnt; to the end that the earle of Angus might ſo be drawen to the field, and caught by ſome one meane or other.

The diſſimulation of the earle of Angus.

About midnight therefore, the forraie being ſet forth, vnder the leading of maiſter Henrie Wharton, to the number of twelue hundred light horſſemen, the maiſter of Marwell, now lord Herries, and the reſidue of the aſſured men being amongeſt them kept forward, and in the morning the earle of Lennor, Maiſter Henrie wharton.

Lennor, and the lord Wharton marched forth with the footmen, till they came ten miles beyond Dunfreis. And where the earle of Angus was drawen to the castell of Drumlanrig, vnder pretense to commune with his sonne the earle of Lennor (but meaning to intrap him) if it were possible, he was so inuironed by the English footmen yer he could haue sufficient warning, that he was forced to flée onelie with fiue persons in his companie. But now the English horssemen being come to Dusdere, eight & fortie miles within the realme of Scotland, hauing passed sundrie great riuers, they set that towne on fire.

The earle of Angus put to flight.

Dusdere set on fire.

But the maister of Marwell, with the other Scotish gentlemen and light horssemen borderers, to the number of foure hundred, being in companie of the English horssemen (as before ye haue heard) had contriued the destruction of the Englishmen afore hand. And the better to worke their feat, they had procured (as ye haue heard) the earle of Angus to come vnto Drumlanrig with a chosen power of men for that purpose. There were also vpon euerie hill about, great numbers of Scotish footmen, with speares and lancestaues to assist the earle of Angus and his complices against the Englishmen. The lard of Drumlanrig with a number of chosen horssemen was aduanced forward in sight of the Englishmen, as they were busie in firing the towne of Dusdere.

The assured Scots therefore, thinking the enterprise to be suerlie inough conueid for their contriued purpose, openlie vpon the field neere to Dusdere, hoising vp a blacke pensill vpon a speares point for a token, reuolted wholie, and ioined themselues to the lard of Drumlanrig and other their countrie men, & thrust in betwixt the English horssemen & footmen, to the great perill of distressing aswell the one as the other. For making toward the place where the earle of Lennor, and the lord Wharton were comming forward with their footmen, neere to the old castell of Dauswinton, sometime the house of the Cumins, they bruted it abroad, that the English horssemen were quite ouerthrowen.

The assured Scots.

A false rumor spred.

The earle of Lennor, beholding the maner of his aduersaries, lighted on foot from his horsse, willing the lord Wharton to do the like; for this day (said he) I will die a true Englishman. At length the English horssemen fetching a compasse in retiring backe from Dusdere, came neere to the place where the earle and the lord Wharton were ranged in order of battell: and thinking no lesse but that their horssemen had beene ouerthrowen, were readie to march backe towards Dunfreis. But their horssemen thus comming in, and perceiuing how the matter stood, gaue a right valiant charge vpon the Scots, that stood countenancing the footmen, and readie to take the aduantage, if they might haue driuen them through shrinking backe into anie disorder.

But such was the violence of the shocke giuen at that instant, with great manhood (vndoubtedlie) by the English horssemen, that the Scots were therewith put out of arraie, scattered, & quite put to flight; the lord of Drumlanrig being taken prisoner, corrupted his taker, and so got away. The maister of Marwell escaped in great danger of life, for he had sundrie speares broken on him in the chase as he fled awaie. There were yet taken that day of the Scots to the number of foure hundred, beside sundrie that were drowned in the water of Nith. Amongest the prisoners were these men of name; the abbat of new abbeie, Christie Irrewing of Bonshaw, a brother of the lord of Hempsfield, & manie other gentlemen of name. Dunfreis was rifled and spoiled, as the earle of Lennor and the Englishmen returned thither, and a martiall court appointed there for execution of pledges; but yet suspended and staied, till the councels pleasure might be knowen in that behalfe.

The Scots put to flight.

Dunfreis spoiled.

There were at the first euill news spread abroad, and certified to the court of England of this iornie, how the earle of Lennor and the English armie was ouerthrowen, so that it was by order appointed, that the earle of Derbie, the Lord Scrope, and Coniers, with their powers should repaire to the west borders to garnish the same for defense against the enimies: but vpon the true report how the matter had passed, made by maister Henrie Wharton, and one Bishop a Scotishman, sent in post for that purpose, that appointment was staied; and maister Wharton was at that time made knight, and the said Bishop richlie rewarded for bringing so good news. Herewith were letters directed downe from the councell to the lord Wharton, for the execution of certeine pledges, that is to saie, the maister of Marwels pledge, being one of his nèerest kinsmen of the house of the Herries, also the warden of the Greie friers in Dunfreis, the vicar of Carlauerocke, and diuerse other which were executed at Carlill. In this meane time were the forts at Lawder and Hadington built, the castels of Pesser and Dawkith woone, all the mils burnt within foure miles of each hand of Edenburgh, and other exploits atchiued by the Englishmen, as in the historie of England is more at large expressed.

Pledges executed.

But now the French king, hauing prepared an armie readie to come into Scotland, caused the same to draw downe to Brest in Britaine, where the ships and gallies were rigged and made readie to passe therewith into Scotland. The chiefe leaders of which armie were these, which had charge chieflie to command in the same: monsieur de Desse lieutenant generall, monsieur Dandelot coronell of the French footmen, the counte Reingraue coronell of the Almains, monsieur de Malleraie, monsieur Doisell, Pietro Strozzie coronell of the Italians, monsieur Etauges capteine of the horssemen, sir Nicholas de Villegaignon a knight of the Rhodes (or rather Malta) capteine of the gallies, and monsieur Duno commissarie of the artillerie: with diuerse other worthie personages, and men of approued valiancie. These capteins with their powers being imbarked at Brest, sailed alongst by the east seas, and at length about the middest of June came into the rode before Leith, where they landed their people and ordinance. [A little before whose arriuall into France (as saith Lesleus. libro 10. pag. 491.) Chapelle Bironne landed in Scotland, accompanied with other nobilitie of France, to giue good counsell to the Scots answerable to the time, which was (to please their eares therwith) that there should a greater armie shortlie come out of France, to succor their extremities.]

Afterwards, with the aduise of the gouernor, and other of the Scotish lords, the French power went to besiege Hadington, and comming thither, incamped themselues in places of aduantage about the towne, cast trenches, planted their ordinance, battered the rampires, and kept them within streictlie besieged on each hand, vsing all the waies they could deuise to constreine the Englishmen to yeeld. They forbare yet to giue a generall assault, bicause they would not hazard (as they haue reported) the losse of so manie men as might haue béene slaine and maimed thereby, to the great weakening of their power there, hauing not meanes to supplie it when they would.

Hadington besieged.

why the Frenchmen forbare to giue an assault.

And yet they had a great armie of Scots with them for a season, and had made the breaches so reasonable, ſonable, that with ſmall paine they might haue entered by the ſame, if the force of the defendants had not ſufficed with handblowes to haue beaten them backe, as no doubt there was no want of good wils in them ſo to haue done, if the Frenchmen had put the matter in triall: yet during this ſiege, they within ſtood in great neceſſitie of things behouefull for the defenſe of the towne. Whereupon ſir Henrie Wharton with a band of light horſſemen of the weſt borders, and others, came and put into the towne a certeine number of men with powder, and other neceſſaries, greatlie to the reliefe of the beſieged, & no leſſe diſpleaſure of the Frenchmen and Scots, that were not aware of this enterpriſe till it was done in the night ſeaſon, by the good and fortunate conduction of them that had the conueiance thereof.

The Engliſh horſſemen ouerthrowne.

But after this, there came a power of Engliſh horſſmen to the number of little leſſe than two thouſand demilances, light horſſmen, & harquebuſſiers on horſſbacke, vnder the leading of ſir Robert Bowes, ſir Thomas Palmer, ſir Henrie Wharton, capteine Gambo a Spaniard, and others; the which aduenturing ouer raſhlie within danger of the whole French power, were ouerthrowne and chaſed: ſir Robert Bowes, & ſir Thomas Palmer, with a great number of other capteins, gentlemen and ſouldiers being taken priſoners, beſides thoſe that were ſlaine. Yet after this ouerthrow of thoſe horſſemen, the French remoued their ſiege from the places where they had firſt planted it, and lodged further off from the towne, continuing there; till at length by an armie ſent forth of England vnder the conduct of the erle of Shrewſburie, the lord Greie, and others, they were conſtreined to retire from thence, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie ye may find more largelie expreſſed, to the which for the further report of the euents chancing during that ſiege, I referre the reader.

The earle of Shrewſburie remoueth the ſiege from Hadington.

But this is to be remembred, that whileſt the ſiege remained at Hadington, by a conuention or aſſemblie of the lords it was decréed, that the quéene ſhuld be ſent into France. And therevpon monſieur de Villegaignon, with foure gallies departing from Leith, made ſemblance as though he would haue ſailed into France: but hauing paſſed the mouth of the Forth, he turned his courſe on the left hand to paſſe alongſt the ſhore northward by the Germane ſeas, that compaſſing the land on the eaſt ſide, hée might paſſe about by the Iles of Orkenete, and ſo by the weſt Iles, till he came to Dunbreton where the yong quéene laie. This iournie he fortunatelie atchiued, the ſame neuer before (to mans remembrance) being made or attempted with gallies.

Fr. Thin.

At his arriuall & conuenient landing at Dunbreton, he found all things readie prouided, neceſſarie for the imbarking of the quéene, that he might conuey hir into France, for the accompliſhment wherof he had taken that iournie in hand. Herevpon ſhe being brought aboord into the kings owne gallie, wherin monſieur de Brezze was alſo appointed to be aboord with hir, as he that had bene ſent with expreſſe commandement to ſée hir conueied into France, [with the lords (as ſaith Leſleus lib. 10. 494) of Areſkine, and Leuingſton, the ladie Fleming, with certeine noble maidens named after the yong quéene, as Marie Leuingſton, Marie Fleming, Marie Seton, and Marie Beton] who togither with Villegaignon ſhewed ſuch diligence in atchiuing that enterpriſe, that finallie they arriued with proſperous wind and weather in the hauen of Breſt in Britaine with that yong quéene, béeing as then betwixt fiue and ſix yéeres of age.

The yong quéene of Scots conueied into France.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus. lib. 10. pag. 494.

✻ From thence being accompanied with the nobilitie of that prouince, ſhe kept hir right courſe to the kings palace of S. Germins in the towne of Lai-on, where ſhe was receiued with great preparation, & there taried the comming thither of the king, at that time pacifieng the ſeditions and turmoiles in the inward parts of France. When the king was come, hée gladded all men with his preſence, and prouided that there was a large houſhold, as well of the noble men and women of Scotland, as of others appointed to the yong quéene, which he ſtill increaſed (as the quéene grew more in yeres) vntill ſuch time as ſhe might be maried.)

But now to returne to the doings in Scotland concerning the warres there. After that the ſiege of Hadington was raiſed by the Engliſh armie (as before ye haue heard) the Frenchmen therevpon retired themſelues vnto Muſkelburgh; and chooſing forth a plot of ground for their aduantage, kept themſelues within the ſame. And herewith there came to them fiftéene thouſand Scotiſhmen to aſſiſt them, ſo that when the Engliſhmen came forwards to aſſaile them, they found them ſo ſtronglie imbattelled, that (whether their commiſſion didnot ſo farre extend, or whether they had no liking of the match) they forbare to ſet vpon them in that ground of ſo great diſaduantage for the aſſailants, and ſo returned backe to Hadington, and after homewards, hauing furniſhed the towne with new ſupplies of men, munition, and vittels ſufficient.

The Frenchmen incampe at Muſkelburgh.

Hée more hereof in England.

Here is to be noted, that the Engliſh fléet entering into the Forth, was readie to haue aided the armie by land, as occaſions might haue béene offered. But the lord admerall perceiuing no likelihood of battell by land, toke vpon him to atchiue ſome other enterpriſes, and firſt comming to Brent Iland, ſet certeine ſhips on fire there, of the chiefeſt in the riuer; and ſaluting the towne of Leith as he paſſed by with canon ſhot, he determined to land ſome of his men on the north ſide of the Forth, to make ſome ſpoile within the countrie of Fife. But Iohn Erſkin lard of Dun, as then ſomewhat diſeaſed, and returned home from the campe, cauſed ſuch dailie and nightlie watch and ward to be kept, that this enterpriſe could not be ſo ſecretlie conueied by the Engliſhmen, but that the ſame was perceiued, and ſo preuented, that vpon their landing they were forced to retire with loſſe: and happie was he that might firſt get againe to ſhipboord.

The Engliſh men repelled at ſaint Menets.

✻ For James Steward, brother to the quéene (hearing of this tumult) came thither in haſt with the common people of ſaint Andrews, and ſome other few citizens which were remaining in the towne, to whome the neighbors about did alſo ioine themſelues, vnderſtanding the cauſe of that aſſemblie. The Engliſh being now come on land, about twelue hundred, ſtood in warlike ſort readie for the battell, and with the feare of the artillerie (which they diſcharged out of their ſhips) did eaſilie cauſe the rude multitude to flie awaie. But this James Steward (by litle and litle ſuppreſſing the feare of ſuch as fled) did (with ſuch violence) ruſh vpon his enimies, that forthwith he ouerthrew them, put them to flight, compelled them to returne to the ſea with great ſlaughter, when alſo manie of them (as they fled to their ſhips) were drowned, beſides thrée hundred that were ſlaine, and one hundred taken.)

Fr. Thn. Buchan. lib. 15.

The earle of Shrewſburie being come backe from Hadington vnto Dunglas, order was giuen for the building of a fort there, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie further may appeare. And in the meane time monſieur de Deſſe, remaining in campe at Muſkelburgh, hearing that the Engliſh armie was remoued homewards, & how diuerſe new bands of horſſmen and footmen being left in Hadington, were readie to come forth to ſkirmiſh abroad vpon ſight of the enimie; he toke aduiſe, to trie if he might drawe them forth to their losse, and thereupon was monsieur Dandelot, and the Reingraue appointed to chose forth a thousand of their luskiest fotmen, the which with three hundred horsemen were conueied and laid close in ambush, behind a little hill not farre from the towne.

This done, a fewe horsemen were drawne forth to draw the Englishmen out of the towne to skirmish with them. The Englishmen were no soner aduised that the enimies were there at hand in the field, but that all their horsemen issued out of the towne backe with certeine fotmen, and streight had the French in chase; who retiring, mainteined the skirmish, of purpose to make the Englishmen more earnest to come forward. But immediatlie as monsieur de Desse saw his time, he gaue signe by sound of trumpet to the fotmen to breake forth, who togither with the horsemen gaue so fierce an onset vpon the enimies, that they were incontinentlie discomfited: and fleeing toward the towne, were followed by the French euen hard to the walles; diuers were slaine, and aboue an hundred taken prisoners.

The Englishmen put to the worsse at a skirmish neere to Hadington.

After this, monsieur de Desse raised from Muskelburgh, and comming to Leith set in hand to fortifie that towne. The marshall Strozzi, and monsieur Dandelot, with diuerse other capteins imbarking themselues in the gallie that yet remained, toke their course to returne to France. One of the same gallies (they being eight in number, beside a foist and a brigandine) was taken by an English ship called the falcon, as she passed through the narrow seas at a place named the Southfurlong, she being alone, and (as it chanced) hindermost of all the companie.

Leith fortified.

A gallie taken

After the departure of monsieur Dandelot, monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron remained coronell of the French fotmen in Scotland. As for the furniture on the water, there remained now but foure gallies vnder the guiding of one capteine Bach an Italian, a man of great experience and approued skill. For ye must vnderstand, that before the arriuall of the English nauie & armie to the succors of them in Hadington, monsieur de Mallerie vice admerall of France returned home with the fleet of ships that had brought the French armie into Scotland. In what sort the lord Greie of Wilton afflicted the countries of Tiuidale and Liddesdale, after the returne of the earle of Shrewsburie, is partlie touched in the historie of England.

Capteine Bach.

Monsieur de Mallerie vice admerall of France.

About the same time, there chanced a mutinie to rise betwixt the Scots and the Frenchmen in Edenburgh, by reason that a French souldier fell a quarelling with two or three Scotishmen; and falling togither by the eares, diuerse Scots that came to depart the fraie, would haue had the Frenchman to prison; but other Frenchmen being there also present, would not suffer the Scots to take him awaie. Whereupon arose a great tumult and stirre among them, insomuch that there were diuerse slaine on both parts, namelie James Hamilton lard of Stanhouse, knight, capteine of the castell, and prouost of the towne of Edenburgh, with his sonne; and maister William Steward one of the queens seruants, besides sundrie other. For the Frenchmen doubting some contriued commotion against them, assembled togither in order of battell in the streets; so that before the matter might be appeased by the capteins that shewed their diligent endeuors therin, they had inough to bring it to passe as they wished.

A fraie betwixt the French souldiers, and the townesmen of Edenburgh.

The beginner of this businesse was hanged the same day in the market place of Edenburgh, where he began first to pike the quarell. Monsieur de Desse, to shew that this variance had not proceeded so farre as the brute thereof gaue forth (for it was rather increased ye may be sure than diminished) vndertoke an enterprise in hand to win the towne of Hadington by a camisado, but in what sort they missed their purpose, and how they were well beaten backe, and sent away by the valiant manhod of the English capteins and souldiers then within the towne, yee may read further thereof in the English historie. There were seuen score (some say three hundred) slaine in the base court.

The Frenchmen giue a camisado to Hadington, & are beaten backe

But now, forsomuch as I haue said nothing of Broughtie crag, sithence the lord gouernor raised his siege from thence, ye shall vnderstand, that (as some haue written) shortlie after the earle of Argile came thither with an armie of his Irish Scots, and besieged it. But when he saw he could not preuaile, he toke truce with them within for a time, and before the same was expired, there came new succors to the Englishmen: so that the earle of Argile (by reason his people had remained there the full terme of their bounden & ordinarie seruice) was constreined to leaue his siege, and suffer the Englishmen to become maisters of a little hill, where afterwards they builded a fort. And now in the latter end of this yeere, they purposed also to haue fortified Dundee, and to haue kept the same with a garrison of souldiers; but hearing that monsieur de Desse with his Frenchmen was comming thitherwards, they auoided the towne of their owne accord, hauing first spoiled the houses, and after set them on fire.

Dundee abandoned of the Englishmen

The Reingraue with two bands of his Almains, and monsieur de Etauges with his companie of horsemen were sent before, who comming to Dundee, and finding the Englishmen gone, incamped there, staieng till monsieur de Desse was come, that followed at hand with the French fotmen. Within two daies after, they going forth to view the fort, were in danger to haue beene caught yer they could get backe againe. For the Englishmen and Lanceknights that were there with them (part of Conrad Phennings bands) issued forth, and droue them to retire, not without danger to haue beene distressed, if the Reingraue had not vsed the greater policie in retiring the troope. To be short, monsieur de Desse, to stop the Englishmen from entering anie further into the countrie on that side, left seuen ensignes of Frenchmen, & two ensignes of Scots within Dundee, with artillerie and ploners to fortifie the towne, & to keepe it in safetie from the Englishmen. This done, he returned to Edenburgh, and sent the residue of his people abroad into the countrie, to lodge in townes and villages here & there, as was thought most expedient, for the better refreshing of them after their long trauell.

Dundee fortified by the Frenchmen

& While these things were in doing, the gouernor of Scotland sent the lord Carneigeie knight (and senator) ambassador to the protector of England, which should for ransome (as the custome is) demand deliuerie of the earle of Huntleie being prisoner: which if he could not obteine, that then he should request this libertie, that his wife and children might come vnto him into England. Whereunto the protector answered, that he would not set the earle free, vntill the warres were ended: but for the companie of his wife, he was content to grant it for certeine daies; with this prouiso, that he should not withdraw himselfe by anie meanes from the custodie of Rafe Vane (corruptlie by Lesleus called Wane) who had taken him in the warres. Wherefore, when the ambassador was returned into Scotland, Huntleie was committed to certeine keepers, who should carie him from London to Morpet, distant twentie and foure miles from the borders of Scotland. Now whilest the earle doth there looke for his wines comming to him, he thinketh vpon escape, and to come to hir. For he

he had agréed with George Kar, that he ſhould one night priuilie bring to him thither, two of the ſwifteſt horſſes that he could get to flie awaie vpon them. According wherevnto Kar was readie out of the borders of Scotland with ſuch horſes as he knew would ſerue the turne, whereof one was for the earle, and the other was for his man.

The erle prepareth a ſuper for his kéepers, wherevnto they were ſolemnelie inuited, and to plaie at cards with him to paſſe awaie the tedioulnes of the night. At length (as though he had plaied inough at cards) he left off, but earneſtlie deſired his kéepers that they ſhould continue on their game. During which, the earle (going vnto the window, and loking out) did by a ſecret ſigne (for he could not well diſcerne anie thing, it was ſo extreame darke ouer all the element) eaſilie vnderſtand that all things were readie for his iournie. The earle then doubtfull (being ſometime in good hope, and ſometime in feare) thought vpon manie things, which he muttered to himſelfe: and at length vnaduiſedlie (as doubtfull men are wont to do) burſt out in theſe ſpeeches; Oh ſorrow, all theſe things be a hinderance vnto me, the ſharpeneſſe of the winter night, the doubt of my weake force and helpe, the let of an vnknowne way, and the want of a faithfull guide: God proſper the iournete. His kéepers hearing him ſpeake to himſelfe, aſked him what thoſe ſecret ſpéeches might ſignifie: to whom the earle (knowing that he was guiltie of his fault) anſwered, that thoſe words were vſed as a prouerbe amongſt the Scots: and firſt had their beginning by the old earle Morton, vttering the ſame in the middle of the night when he lay in dieng. Wher vpon (to the end that his kéepers ſhould not haue anie ſuſpicion of his determined flight) he ſitteth downe againe to cards.

After which ſuddenlie he roſe from them, as vrged by loſeneſſe of his bellie to vnburden nature, by which occaſion he forthwith (accompanied onelie with his ſeruant) leapeth forth, found the horſſes readie furniſhed for himſelfe and his man, got on them, & with ſpeedie iournie did flie to the borders of Scotland. When he was paſſed ouer the riuer of Twéed, and had a little refreſhed himſelfe from the labor of his iournie in the houſe of Kar, he went the ſame night (being Chriſtmas éue) to Edenburgh, where he was ioifullie & honorablie receiued of the quéene, the gouernor, his wife, and his other friends, with an vniuerſall gladneſſe of the whole multitude of the towne. As ſoone as his kéepers perceiued that he was gone, they ſpéedilie run to horſſe, and (doubtfull which way to follow) they ſéeke him here, and there, and euerie where, but all in vaine, for the diligence of the erle put them out of all doubt for obteining him. Whoſe flight was not onelie a frédome to himſelfe, but alſo to manie other noble priſoners, who (vpon the aſſurance of his faith and word) were permitted to depart into Scotland. The gouernor therefore, to congratulate with the earle for his returne, reſtored vnto him the chancellorſhip, and the rule of manie other prouinces which he had before his captiuitie. For which cauſe when he had remained a while at Edenburgh, he returned to the north parts of Scotland, where ſpéedilie and eaſilie he appeaſed all the tumults of thoſe people.)

On ſaint Stephans day at night, the caſtell of Hume was ſcaled, and woone out of the Engliſhmens hands. One of the ſurname of the Humes, a man of threeſcore yeers of age, was the firſt that entered on the wall, ſleieng one of the watchmen that kept his walke on that ſide. * Not long after, when the capteine of Falkecaſtell had commanded the husbandmen adioining, to bring thither (at a certeine day) great ſtore of vittels, the yong men there about hauing that occaſion, aſſembled thither at the day appointed, who taking their burdens from the horſes, and laieng them on their ſhoulders, were receiued (after they had paſſed the bridge, which was made ouer two high rocks) into the caſtle, where (laieng downe that which they brought) they ſuddenlie (by a ſigne giuen) ſet vpon the kæpers of the gates, ſlue them, and (before the other Engliſhmen could be aſſembled) poſſeſſed the other places, weapons, and artillerie of the caſtell, and then receiuing the reſt of their companie into the ſame (through the great and open gate) they wholie kept and inioied the caſtell for their countrimen.)

K. Thin. Buchan. li. 15. 1549. Leſle.

About the ſame time, the Reinſgraue returned into France, leauing his fiue enſignes of Almains behind him, vnder the charge of capteine Retonze, a good man of warre and of great experience. Also monſieur de Etauges was taken in a ſkirmiſh at Broughtie crag, as I haue noted in the Engliſh hiſtorie: & about the ſame time, there landed at Dunbreton foure bands of ſouldiers, Prouancois and Gaſcoignes, bringing monie with them to paie the ſouldiers their wages, behind as then for the ſpace of three moneths. Sir James Wilford alſo was taken about the ſame time by the Frenchmen, in a ſkirmiſh at Dunbar (as I haue alſo noted in the hiſtorie of England.) Not long after, monſieur de Deſſe was appointed by the quæne Dowager, to go vnto Jedworth, to preuent that the Engliſhmen ſhould not fortifie there, whereof ſhe ſtood in ſome doubt.

The Reinſgraue returneth into France.

Monſieur de Etauges taken priſoner by the Engliſhmen.

Sir James Wilford taken

Immediatlie vpon his comming thither, the lard of Fernihurſt requeſted him to helpe to recouer his caſtell of Fernihurſt out of the Engliſhmens hands, which they had taken from him and kept, greatlie to the annoiance of all the countrie thereabouts. Monſieur de Deſſe taking with him monſieur de Diſell, and monſieur de la Chapelle de Biton, haſted thither with the chiefeſt part of his armie, ſending before certeine capteins with their bands to ſurueie the houſe; who at their comming thither, vſed ſuch diligence in following the offered occaſion, that they both repelled their enimies that came forth to giue them the skirmiſh; and purſuing them with great rigor, wan the lims of the houſe vpon them, forcing the capteine and ſouldiers to retire within the dungeon, and kept them ſo ſhort therein, that they had opportunitie to mine an hole through the wall, of ſuch largenes, as a man might eaſilie enter by the ſame.

Hærewith a great number of Scots hauing broken open the gate of the baſe court, where the Frenchmen were buſie to aſſault the dungeon, burſt in on heapes, vpon deſire to be reuenged vpon the Engliſhmen, and namelie of their capteine, who (as they ſaid) had done them manie great diſpleaſures. The capteine perceiuing this, and doubting if he fell into the Scotiſhmens hands he ſhould die for it, he preſented himſelfe at the hole which the Frenchmen had made, and yeelded himſelfe to monſieur de Duſſac, and la Mouthe Rouge, who minding to vſe him as became men of warre, would haue led him out of the preſe: but ſuddenlie a Scot comming behind him, whoſe wife (as was reported) he had raviſhed, ſmote off his head ſo full from the ſhoulders, that it leapt foure or fiue yards quite from the bodie. Manie other cruell parts the Scots ſéemed to ſhew againſt other Engliſhmen, taken here at Fernihurſt: but they excuſed the matter by the euill dealings of the Engliſhmen towards them before that time.

The crueltie of the Scots.

Monſieur de Deſſe returning to Jedworth, aided by the furtherance and counſell of the Scots, ceaſſed not in occaſions of aduantage to attempt new enterpriſes againſt the Engliſhmen, as time and opportunitie ſerued; and among other exploits, the caſtell of Cornewall (an old houſe built after the ancient maner of fortifieng) was taken by the Frenchmen, and ſpoiled of all things worth the bearing awaie.

Capteine Cobies. Alſo capteine Cobios a Frenchman, hauing a band of fiftie light horſſemen Scots ſeruing vnder him, on a night had a faire hand againſt a number of Engliſh horſſemen, whome he charged ſo on the ſudden, as he ſaw them out of order, that he eaſilie diſcomfited them, and toke more priſoners (whome he brought to Jedworth) than he had perſons in his companie to aſſaile them.

A road made by monſieur de la Chapelle de Biron. Monſieur de la Chapelle de Biron, was ſent forth by monſieur de Deſſe, with the companie of horſſemen that belonged to monſieur de Etauges then priſoner, and fiue hundred footmen beſide Scots, to make a road into England: which enterprize he atchiued in burning townes and villages, and returned without anie great loſſe ſuſteined at that time.

Another made by monſieur de Deſſe, Fourd caſtell woone. Within two daies after his returne to Jedworth, monſieur de Deſſe diſlodged from thence, & taking with him foure field péces, and all his men of war, entered into England, toke the caſtell of Fourd and burnt it, with ten ſmall villages in the countrie thereabouts, ſituat within halfe a mile ech of other.

Thomas Kar There was one tower yet parcell of that caſtell of Fourd, which was kept by Thomas Kar, ſo that the Frenchmen could not win it, for they had no time to ſtaie long about it, remouing that night ouer the water, & incamped there within the Scotiſh ground.

As the Scots and Frenchmen executed theſe enterprizes, they were coaſted by certeine light horſſemen; but neuertheleſſe the Frenchmen returned in ſafetie to Jedworth, hauing ſore indamaged the Engliſh borderers by that road: inſomuch as it was thought, the Scots (which were with them at that Scots gaine by ſpoile. road) gained at that time, by pillage and booties to the value of nine thouſand crownes. The Engliſhmen ſore grœued, that the Frenchmen lieng thus in Jedworth, ſhould in ſuch wiſe addreſſe one enterprize after an other againſt them, ſo greatlie to their annoiance, aſſembled a power togither at Roxburgh, purpoſing to haue aſſailed the Frenchmen in their campe at Jedworth.

Monſieur de Deſſe fleeth out of Jedworth for feare of the Engliſhmen. But monſieur de Deſſe hauing warning thereof, departed from thence firſt to Melroſſe, and after further off within the countrie, fearing to be conſtreined to giue battell. Which he could not haue done without manifeſt loſſe of his feeble armie, hauing not paſt fifteene hundred footmen, and fiue hundred horſſemen able to haue done ſeruice: for ſuch was the miſerie, which they had in manner continuallie ſuſteined through want of vittels, and other neceſſarie helps during the time of their incamping at Jedworth, that what through ſickneſſe and hurts receiued in aſſaults and ſkirmiſhes, no ſmall number of Shortlie after, in the beginning of the ſummer, the Engliſhmen armed fiue and twentie ſaile of men of warre, the which arriuing at the Baſſe, neere to the mouth of the Forth, aſſailed by faire and pleaſant words to haue perſuaded the keepers of the caſtell, there ſtanding on the height of a great rocke, to haue yelded the place into their hands. But perceiuing their perſuaſions would not be regarded, they toke their courſe vp into the Forth, and finding in their waie foure ſhips of Frenchmen and Scots, ſeized vpon them as a wiſhed preie: and the morrow next inſuing, at the verie breake of day, they came before Leith, and ſaluting the towne with canon ſhot, remained there at anchor ten or twelue daies, in which

But before the place could be put in anie ſtrength, the ſhips departed from thence backe towards the ſea, and left in the Iland foure enſignes of Engliſhmen, and one enſigne of Italians, to defend the pioners and the Iland againſt the Scots and Frenchmen, if they ſhould attempt to aſſaile them.

After the Engliſh nauie was thus departed, monſieur de Deſſe, and the quœne mother being at Edenburgh, determined with all diligence to imploie all ſuch forces as they might make about the recouering of the Ile, before the fortifications begun by the Engliſhmen ſhould be brought to anie perfection. Hœrevpon, monſieur de la Chapelle de Biron, imbarked in the gallie of monſieur de Villegaignon, rowed forth to view the maner of the Engliſhmens dealing within the Ile, which he did in ſuch effectuall wiſe, that approching within harquebuſe ſhot, he brought knowledge with him not onelie of the ſtate and whole circumſtances of their buildings, but alſo of the perfect number of their enſignes, and the qualitie of the men of warre that ſerued vnder the ſame.

La Chapel de Biron.

At that preſent alſo, monſieur de Thermes latelie before arriued at Dunbreton with an hundred men of armes, and two hundred light horſſemen after the manner of France, and one thouſand footmen, was come to the quœne, buſie now to further this enterprize. She had got togither within Leith hauen all the botes that belonged to all the créekes & hauens of the Forth: ſo that on thurſdaie after Trinitie ſun-

There was no diligence wanting, neither among the Scots nor Frenchmen, to beſtow themſelues abroad, & the comfortable words of the quœne greatlie incouraged them thereto, beholding them, and deuiſing with monſieur de Deſſe and the other capteins, till they were all ſet forward.

But finallie, their generall named Cotton, being ſlaine with George Aplebie eſquire, a capteine of an enſigne of footmen ſent forth of Derbiſhire, and one Gaſpar Pizoni, that was capteine of the Italians, beſide diuers other gentlemen, and the moſt principall men of warre and ſouldiers among them: the reſidue were conſtreined to retire vnto a corner or point of the Iland, where they were taken without further reſiſtance, although before they had made verie ſtout defenſe, hurt and ſlaine diuerſe Scots and Frenchmen, both at their landing, and alſo after they were entered on land. Among other, monſieur de la Alſo a gentleman named Deſbories, which bare the ſaid monſieur de la Chapelle his coronell enſigne, was ſlaine with a pike by the hands of the forenamed Cotton the Engliſh generall.

Thus

Thus was Inskith recouered out of the Englishmens hands, after it had bene in their possession by the space of sirtene daies, the more to the high contentation of monsieur de Desse, for that at the same time he stood vpon his discharge and returne into France, being appointed to surrender vp his place to monsieur de Thermes, latelie before arriued (as ye haue heard) with commission to receiue the same. So that monsieur de Desse, to end his charge with the glorie of this atchiued enterprise, esteemed it much to stand with his honor: and no doubt with the swelling humor of the glorie thence redounding he was blowen vp; as in cases of victorie it commeth to passe in them that make a good hand: whereas the vanquished (God wot) are contrarilie qualified.

Shortlie after, he returned into France with the gallies, and monsieur de Thermes succéded in his place for the generall conduct of the French armie in Scotland. Who by the aduise of the gouernor, and other of the Scotish lords, determined with a siege volant to kéepe the Englishmen in Hadington from vittels and all other reliefe. First therefore, after that Desse was departed towards France, monsieur de Thermes with his Frenchmen and some Scots incamped at Aberladie, where they began the foundation of a fort, so to impeach the Englishmen from setting on land anie vittels there, to be conueid from thence to Hadington, as before they had done.

In this meane time, the Englishmen had increased their numbers of Almaines, and other strangers, and not onelie furnished their forts with new supplies of men; but also had an armie in the fields which lay most an end at Dunglas, and one while besieged Hume castell. But after they saw themselues disappointed of the meane, whereby they supposed to haue recouered it, they raised from thence, and spoiled the most part of Tiuidale and other the marches thereabout; in reuenge (as they alleged) of the disloialtie and breach of promise proued in the assured Scots. Generall of this armie was the earle of Rutland, lieutenant at that present of the north parts, a noble man, right valiant, wise, well aduised, and staied in his dealings, verie honorable and courteous in all his demeanor.

He was accompanied with capteins of good estimation and approued prowesse, as sir Richard Manners, sir Francis Leake, sir John Sauage, sir Thomas Holcroft, sir Oswald Wullcrop, & others. He so behaued himselfe in that dangerous time of the vprores and rebellions of the commons, through the more part of the realme of England; that although the appointed forces against Scotland were staied, and turned to the suppression of the rebels, to the incouragement (no doubt) both of Scots and Frenchmen in Scotland, yet they were so fronted and kept in aw by that armie vnder the earle of Rutland, that they rather lost than gained in this season at the Englishmens hands.

At one time the same armie, vnder the conduct of the said earle, passing forth with a conueie of vittels vnto Hadington, came so suddenlie vpon the Frenchmen where they laie in campe, that whether through default of their scouts, or other negligence vsed by them, or through the great diligence and prouident forwardnesse shewed by the Englishmen, the Frenchmen were in such hazard to haue bene vtterlie distressed, that if the Englishmen had not doubted more, than by anie was thought néedfull, they might haue ouerthrowen, taken, & slaine the Frenchmen handsmoth (as was supposed) at their pleasure. But the Englishmen euen at their first comming in sight of them (as it stood with the reason of warre, sith by the aduenturing rashlie oftentimes in such cases too late repentance easilie insueth) staied, the better to conceiue of that which they had to do. Whereby the Frenchmen had leasure to march their waies a maine pase, till they were got out of danger: for after they once beheld all the traps of the English horssemen almost at their elbowes, and herewith the battell of the Almaines suddenlie appearing on the hill top readie to come downe vpon them, it was no need to bid them packe awaie. The Frenchmen retire.

The Scotish light horssemen comming on the backe of the English armie, perceiued where the Almaines (to make them readie to giue battell) had throwen off their clokes, and left the same (with all their baggage and stuffe which they had about them) in kéeping of none but of their women and boies: whereupon those Scotish horssemen, not minding to suffer such a preie to escape their hands, came galloping in, and toke all the best stuffe they could lay hold vpon, and returned in safetie, before anie enimie could come backe to the rescue. The Almains were in no small chafe for the losse of their garments and other necessaries; but there was no helpe then to séeke remedie in that behalfe: for the Scots were withdrawen and got quite out of danger. The baggage of the English Lansquenets spoiled by the Scotish horssemen.

The English armie, after that the Frenchmen were thus fled and gone, passed forth to Hadington, with their cartages laden with vittels, to the great comfort of them within that fortresse, standing in great necessitie before this conueie came. This summer also, and a little before the vittelling thus of Hadington, vpon knowledge had that Julian Romero with his band of Spaniards, whereof he was capteine, seruing the king of England, was lodged in Coldingham, six miles distant from Berwike: certeine bands of Almains and Frenchmen came thither vpon the sudden, and surprising the Spaniards before they were aware of their approch, set vpon them in their lodgings, toke, and slue in maner the whole number of them. Hadington vittelled. Julian Romero distressed.

Things passing in this wise in Scotland in the summer of this yeare 1549, the Englishmen were not onelie in the meane time sore troubled with commotions raised by the commons of that realme; but also with the warres which the French king made against them, within the countrie of Bullognois, so that they had not meanes to imploie their forces against Scotland as they had determined to haue done; as partlie before, and more largelie in the historie of England is mentioned. By reason whereof, anon after Michaelmas they gaue ouer the kéeping of Hadington, and raising their fortifications there, they returned into England to the great reioising of Louthian, to whome that towne had giuen occasion of great troubles and calamities. Upon the giuing ouer thus of Hadington, the gouernor and the quéene Dowager were aduanced, in hope to recouer againe all that the Englishmen held within the bounds of Scotland. 1549. Hadington raced and left by the Englishmen.

But first it was thought good to assaie the winning of Broughtie crag; for it sounded (as was thought) greatlie to the diminishing of the estimation, aswell of the Scots as Frenchmen, that the English should kéepe foot so far within the realme, in despight of their whole puissance. Herevpon monsieur de Thermes about Candlemasse, hauing all things in a readinesse for the siege, came thither, and did so much, what with shot of canon to make batterie, and other meanes of inforcements, that giuing the assault both with Scots and Frenchmen, they entred the fort the twentith of Februarie by fine force, so that all those within were either taken or slaine. Wherevpon those English also that kept the castell, rendred vp the same without further resistance, amongest other prisoners: sir John Lutterell the capteine was one. 1550. Broughtie crag won by the Frenchmen.

The earle of Rutland.

The Frenchmen in danger to haue bene distressed.

A treatie for peace.

In this meane time there were certeine commissioners appointed betwirt the two kings of England and France to commune of a peace: but because they continued long in their treatie yer they could agrée, the Scots and Frenchmen surceassed not in occasions of aduantage to pursue the warre, so that comming before Lowder they besieged that fortresse, & skirmishing with the Englishmen that issued forth, to incounter them, droue them in at the gates with some losse on either part. And this done, the French held them within so streictlie besieged, that if peace had not béene the soner concluded, sir Hugh Willoughbie captéine of that fort must needs haue yéelded through lacke of shot, & other necessaries seruing for defense; which were spent, so that they were constreined to vse their pewter vessell in stead of bullets. But as it fortuned, a peace was accorded, passed, and confirmed, that verie selfe time betwirt the two kings of England and France, through the diligent and orderlie trauell of the commissioners appointed to deale therein, whose names insue.

A peace concluded.

The names of the commissioners appointed to treat of peace.

First for the king of England, the right honorable John earle of Bedford, knight of the garter, and lord priuie seale; William Paget lord of Beaudesert, knight also of the garter; sir William Peter knight, chiefe secretarie to the said king; & sir John Mason knight, secretarie to him for the French tong. For the French king were appointed Francis de Montmorance, lord of Rochpot, knight of the order of saint Michaell, and lieutenant for the same king of Picardie, in absence of monsieur de Vandosme; Gasper de Colignie, lord of Chastillon, knight also of the order, and captéine generall of the footmen of France, and the said kings lieutenant generall in the countie of Bullogne; Andrew Guillard lord Mortier, knight also of the order, and one of the same kings priuie councell; and Guillaume Bouchettell lord of Sassie, knight likewise of the order, & secretarie of the estate of the finances. The articles of the peace.

Among other articles comprised in this peace, it was couenanted, that all such forts, castels, and places as the Englishmen held in anie part within the Scotish dominions, should be deliuered and restored to the Scots; and that the forts of Dunglas, Rorburgh, and Aimouth, which the Englishmen had built and raised out of the ground, should be raced and throwen downe, to auoid all occasions of new controuersies that might grow by reason of kéeping or defending the same: so as the peace now concluded, might in all points be firmelie and truelie kept and obserued, aswell betwirt England and Scotland, as England and France, and betwirt all and euerie the subiects of the same realmes, both by sea and land. Monsieur de Mourret was sent into Scotland with the copie of this peace, by whose means it was proclamed anon after Easter about the beginning of Aprill, and euerie thing vsed and ordered according to the articles of the agréement concluded.

Monsieur de Mourret.

The Frenchmen returne home.

In Maie the Frenchmen and Almaines were imbarked at Leith in sixtéene French ships, and certeine Scotish ships, and departed from thence into France. A few there were, as Nigropellice and Saint Falcise, captens of light horsemen, with others that passed through England, and so home into their countrie. Moreouer the marquesse de Maine, after duke Daumals comming ouer into England about the same time for an hostage, passed afterwards through the realme into Scotland, to visit his sister quéene Dowager, and shortlie after returned.

The marquesse de Maine.

The death of the first duke of Guise.

They mourned both for the death of their father Claud de Lorraine, the first duke of Guise, who deceassed the eighteenth of Aprill this present yeare 1550.

Now when the French departed out of Scotland, there were manie Scots appointed vnto them; partlie, to defend them from pirats, if they should offer them anie iniurie in the streict of the British sea, and partlie for honors cause to bring them on their iournie into France. By whose departure Scotland was frélie deliuered from all forren souldiers, except certeine Frenchmen, who remained still in the countrie; because they had the Ile of Insketh and the castell of Dunbar committed to their charge, which afterwards they did most faithfullie discharge. Monsieur de Thermes, Chapellie, and diuerse other captens of France, remained also in Scotland (after that the others were imbarked to be gone into France) for pleasures cause, and to sée the countrie; who (trauelling ouer Scotland, and beholding the cities, searching the castels, and marking the bulworks of defense) did constantlie affirme, that in the whole world they neuer saw forts and townes more pleasantlie placed, or more naturallie defended. In séeing whereof they consumed the time with great pleasure, vntill the moneth of December, in which they all went into France with the quéene Dowager.

Fr. Thin. Lesleus lib. pag. 507.

Thus, as there was peace (by the departing of the French) with forren nations, which continued three yeares: so was there within the wals and kingdome warre and dissention amongest the Scots; which was most perillous and troublesome. For they which were the chiefe rulers (as the gouernor and his brother the archbishop of saint Andrews and others) did vse all things with extreame cruelties & couetousnesse. For the archbishop, being giuen to all libertie, followed by law his pleasures in all things, as though it had béene permitted vnto him. For first, as a presage of his following tyrannie, he permitted the slaughter of William Chreichton to go vnpunished, the same William being slaine in the gouernors house (if not within his owne sight) by Robert Semple: next followed the death of John Maluill an old man of Fife; who next vnto the gouernor was most accounted of by him, as chiefest of his familiars. This John had his letters (which he wrote to an Englishman, to whome he did commend a captéine his friend) intercepted. In which, although there were not anie suspicion of anie fault, yet was the author of them punished with the losse of his head. Whose patrimonie made his death séeme the more vile; because the same was giuen to the yonger sonne of the gouernor. The hurts of these wicked parts did perteine to few, the enimie thereof to manie, and the example vniuersallie to all. For by reason of this vnskilfull gouernement of the kingdome, and the slouth of his life, which offended the common people; the gouernor began to be had in contempt almost of all men.]

Buchanan lib. 15.

In September following, the quéene Dowager accompanied with the earls of Huntleie, Cassils, Marshall, Southerland, and diuerse other of the Scotish nobilitie tooke the sea, and sailing to France landed at Diepe: she was conueied thither by the prior of Capoa, & Leon Strozzie, sent and appointed with sir gallies to haue the conduction of hir. From Diepe she remoued to Rone, where the king then laie, of whome she was right courteouslie receiued, and had such attendance and seruice done vnto hir, during the time of hir tarriance there, as stood with the dignitie of hir person, and was answerable to the minds and expectations of hir traine; to the high praise likewise of the king and his court in that behalfe.

The quéene Dowager saileth into France.

The causes of the quéene Dowagers going into France

Buchanan. lib.15. Lesleus lib.10 pag.508.

France were, that now hauing disposed all things at home in Scotland, she might renew the old league in France, she might see hir daughter and hir other friends; and procure the gouernement of the realme to hir selfe. For the ambitious and subtill woman did thinke in hir mind, that the gouernor by his euill demeanor would soone be put out of his office, and that she might easilie find means to be substituted in his place. But before hir shipping into France, and whilest they were preparing, the earle of Huntleie commanded William Makintosche (chiefe of the familie of the Glenchattens, and his followers) to be apprehended (for a conspiracie secretlie begun against him, whilest he was the kings deputie in those north parts) and from thence (being first depriued of all his goods) caried him to Strachbolgie, where he was beheaded. Which fact (greatlie offending the minds of the earle of Cassils, and others that fauored the Makintosche) did so stir them against Huntleie, that a commotion and tumult had beene raised by them, vnlesse the wisedome of the queene had appeased the furie of their minds.

1551. Lesleus. lib.10 pag.508

For although the queene certeine yeares after, had vndone the sentence of proscription for the goods of Makintosche (restoring the same with the possessions and inheritances vnto the sonne of Makintosche) and thereby had seemed to cut awaie the cause of dissention betweene Huntleie and them: yet the kindred and friends of the Glenchattens (not suffering so great an iniurie to their familie to go vnreuenged) did secretlie (but eagerlie) pursue the same with great contention of mind. Wherefore entring the castell of Pet by deceipt, they apprehended Lanchlane Makintosche, and (condemning all his followers to banishment) did cruellie kill him (as the betraior of the head of his owne familie) because they supposed, that he ministred and blew the cole that fired Huntleie, to make the said William Makintosche out of the waie.

Lanchlane Makintosche apprehended.

Lesleus lib.10. pag.509.

A little before which, the maister of Ereskine, and Henrie Senclere deane of Glascow were sent into England; who at London did anew confirme the peace concluded before with the English; from whence they passed into Flanders, to make the like league with the low countries, which they did renew, to the great reioising of both nations; although in the beginning of the treatie there grew great and contentious questions for the restitution of the ships of Flanders and Holland (whereof the Scots had taken manie in the warres) notwithstanding that the Scots had alleged, that they did not offer anie violence to those of the low countries, before that they (by the persuasion of the English) had offered wrong to the Scots, in deteining their ships and merchandize

Thus much digressed from the queene Dowagers going into France, whereunto afresh to direct our pen, we say; that being at Rone, the king did there openlie make shew of hir welcome vnto him by diuerse arguments. Amongst which, this was not the least: that (besides other shews, honorable triumphs, & manie courtesies shewed to the Scots) calling a chapter of the knights of the order of saint Michaell, he admitted the earle of Huntleie and other chiefe lords of Scotland deere to the queene, and fauored by him, into the said order. Which honors and pleasures seemed the more augmented, in that the yoong queene of Scots was there present, adorned with such singular beautie, as was not easilie to be spoken, by the iudgement of Lesleus. After that they had thus spent some time in delights of courtesie, to feed the mind and eie, the king of France, the two queens of Scotland, and the other nobles, departed from thence to Paris; where they were with great triumph of the citizens most ioifullie receiued. At what time againe, the French king shewed such humanitie to Huntleie, and the other Scots; that he seemed for euer most firmelie to bind them vnto him. After that they spent some daies there at Paris, the king with that companie remoued to Blesies; where he remained all the winter.

Lesleus. lib.10. pag.510.

Now the queene Dowager, thinking the time and place fit for the executing of the cause of hir coming into France, and vsing therein the aduise of the duke of Guise, and the cardinall of Lorreine (hir brethren) openeth the same vnto the French king; shewing that amongest others, the chiefest cause to take that iournie, was to require his opinion, touching the gouernement of the kingdome of Scotland: and to know, if it pleased him that the helme of the same kingdome should be committed to hir rule. Which if he misliked, or deemed the contrarie; that yet she would wholie rest on his determination. The which matter pleased well the king, but yet with this promise; if the gouernor without anie tumult or raising of quarrels would giue it ouer.

Whereupon the queene, to bring euerie thing about as she desired, did persuade the king to confirme the dukedome of Chatelerault in France, vnto the gouernor, before granted to him and to his heires, & to make his eldest son erle of Arraine chiefe capteine of the bands of Scots in France. And further, to giue the earledome of Murrete to the earle of Huntleie (kinsman to the gouernor) and to his heires; the earledome of Rothsele to his sonne, which had maried the kinsman of the said gouernor; the whole earledome of Angus, to the earle thereof; and the erledome of Morton, to the sonne of George Dowglasse. All which he should procure likewise to be confirmed by such, as should be gouernors of the yoong queene. These things now done, the French king carefullie receiued the yoong queene of Scots into his protection; vntill she should come vnto more sufficient yeers, able to confirme all these gifts; the which if she refused then to do, the French king would then bestow as large possessions on them in France.

Buchanan. lib. 16. Lesleus. lib.10. pag.410.

In the meane time the gouernor had sent Carnegie knight and senator into France, who should in the name of the Scots giue great thanks to the king for the aid which they receiued out of France, against the Englishmen. After this the French king did liberallie open the determination of the queene mother of Scotland to the bishop of Rosse (then ambassador for the Scots in France) to Robert Carnegie, and to Gawin Hamilton (to whom, as was said, the abbeie of Kilwinin was giuen in commendam) to the end that the same which was at the first secretlie consulted betweene the king of France & the queene Dowager, might now openlie be considered among the Scots which were in France: declaring further, that he desired nothing more, than that the queene mother should sustaine the parts and place of the queene hir daughter, in the administration and gouernement of Scotland, sith the same mostlie stood with reason and equitie; and that he (the better to win the gouernor to yeeld thereunto) had giuen the gouernor the dukedome of Chatelerault, to his sonne the capteinship of all the Scots in France, and manie other liberall benefits to manie other of his kinsmen.

And to the end that no deceipt might be supposed to be hidden vnder this liberalitie, the French king willed the ambassadour to take possession of all these things in the dukes name. Robert Carnegie hauing his errand, returned into Scotland; & shortlie after, the bishop of Rosse was appointed ambassador, who at length with much adoo did wring from the gouernor a consent to part from his authoritie, and to aplie himselfe to the will of the French king: which thus in the end obteined, the bishop of Rosse goeth againe into France, to aduertise the king what he had done. Whereupon the king considering his painfull & faithfull seruice, did reward him with the abbete of Labseie in France.

Lesleus. lib.10. pag.511.

Whilest these things were in doing, Edward the first, king of England, did send the marquesse of Northampton, & other of the nobler sort of ambassadors to Henrie the second, king of France, then so- Blois.
iourning at Blesies, to moue him to giue his daughter in mariage to the king of England. At what time there were manie martiall games and passtimes shewed before the king, in which the English ioining the Scots with them as companions of their sports, did beare a part, and wan the garland (from the others) to their singular commendation. The summer next following, the French king accompanied with the quéene mother of Scotland and other of the nobilitie, did with great pompe enter Turon, Anlow, Nants, and other cities of Britaine, which he had not before seene since he atteined the crowne. After certeine moneths consumed in those iournies, he returned to Founteinblew.

Lesleus lib. 10. pag.512.

But the quéene Dowager of Scotland, taking hir courteous leaue and farwell of the French king, hir daughter, & of other the nobilitie, departed from the court, and with easie iournies came to Jamiestie: where remaining a certeine time, she had the pleasant companie of hir mother the duches of Guise, and hir other friends to their great ioy: but that she shewed a certeine griefe (for hir father latelie deceased) which somewhat diminished the sweet pleasure of that méeting. Now when the quéene Dowager had remained almost 12 moneths or more in France, honorablie interteined, bountifullie feasted, louinglie saluted by hir friends and kinred, and hauing obteined a willing grant of the effects of hir request, the Scots do vrge hir to hasten hir returne into Scotland, preparing at Paris all things necessarie therevnto.

Lesleus lib.10. pag.512.

Wherefore departing thence, and comming againe to Rone, the quene mother moued and persuaded the nobilitie about the taking of hir iournie through England into Scotland. By occasion whereof, losing their ships from Newport, they passe the seas, and happilie landed at Portesmouth, a famous port of England. The knowledge of which arriuall comming to king Edward the first, he presentlie sent thither the earle of Southampton, and the lord William Howard to interteine hir: who receiued hir with singular ioy and courtesie, and conueied hir through Hampshire, Susser, and Surreie (three prouinces of England) to Hampton court, where the king as then remained; from whence (after that she had béene there most honorablie receiued) she came along the riuer of Thames to London, and landed at Poules wharfe in the after none, and from thence rode to the bishop of Londons palace by Poules, and there lodged.

Hir receiuing at the court.

The fourth of Nouember, she rode in hir chariot to the kings palace of the Whitehall, accompanied with the ladie margaret Dowglas, the three dutchesses, of Suffolke, Richmund, and Northumberland, and diuerse other great ladies and gentlewomen, both Scotish and English. At the court gate the dukes of Northumberland, and Suffolke, and the lord treasuror were readie to receiue hir. And at hir entering into the hall, the king stood in the vpper end thereof, and the erle of Warwike holding the sword before him. She at hir approching to him, knéeled downe, and he courteouslie toke hir vp, and kissed hir; and taking hir by the hand, led hir vp into his owne chamber of presence, & after into the quéenes chamber of presence, where he kissed all the ladies of Scotland, and so departed for a while.

She dined on the quéenes side that day with the king, his seruice and hirs comming both together; the kings being placed on the right hand of the table, and hirs on the left. What plentie of all maner of costlie meates and drinks there was, and what rich furniture of plate and all other things was shewed to set forth the feast, it were superfluous to write. All the ladies both of England and Scotland dined in the quéenes great chamber. After dinner the king shewed hir his gallerie and gardens, with all other commodities of the place. And about foure of the clocke, he brought hir downe againe by the hand into the hall, where he first receiued hir, and there kissing hir, she toke hir leaue, & returned to the bishops palace from whence she came.

* And here I must not forget what Lesleus hath set downe in this place for the defense of his people, in not deliuering the yong quéene of Scots to the English, to haue entered the mariage bed of king Edward the first. Whose reasons although they may (the first ground of the warre considered, with the consent of the Scots parlement to that mariage, and the willingnesse of the English to haue caused them to performe their promise without battell) bée well answered, as matters that not derie greatlie defend the cause: yet I will not anie way say anie thing of him (being a man estranged from vs in religion, but learned, wise, of great experience, a faithfull seruant to his mistresse, and a graue bishop of Rosse) but set them downe plainelie as he writeth them, leauing the same to the iudgement of others, sith I meane not in anie thing to derogate from them, or arrogate vnto our selues more than is due. Thus therefore he writeth.

Lesleus lib. pag.113.

When the quéene (saith he) of Scots was come to London, the king of England sheweth vnto hir his treasurie, openeth the monuments, laieth abroad the antiquities of the kingdome, and laboured by manie other such kind of means, that he might prepare himselfe a passage (with the open notes of courtesie) to obteine the good will of the quæne. For he after persuaded hir with manie spéeches, that she shuld giue hir daughter vnto him, as it was before decréed by the Scotish nobilitie: which he proueth by manie arguments to be most beneficiall vnto both nations. When on the contrarie part (if she were giuen vnto the French kings sonne) it should not be profitable either to the Scots, which should giue; or the French, which should receiue hir to wife. Herewithall adding this vnto it, that there should alwais be continuall hatred, and deadlie enimitie betweene him and that person which should marrie hir.

Wherevnto the quæne both presentlie and wiselie answered, that the cause of hir daughters mariage to be solemnized with the French, was onlie by reason of the protector of England, which so bitterlie pursued the Scots with such earnest warre as then was made against them. For it was vnaduisedlie done of him, to séeke to compell by force of battell a woman, which is to be allured to the mariage bed with faire promises and flattering spéeches. Wherevnto she ioined, that the Scots were so vehementlie pressed by him, that they were inforced to craue aid from the French: for the more spéedie & easie obteining whereof, they were vrged to leaue the yong quéene of Scots in France for a pledge. Wherefore she greatly grieued that the matter was so fast knit vp by the necessitie of time, otherwise than the Englishmen would haue had it. But yet, she would labor the French king by hir letters and messengers, with all the diligence that she might, to sée if hir trauell and furtherance could do anie thing with him therein.

therein. Thus much Leſleus, and ſo againe to the matter.)

The firſt of Nouember, the quæne Dowager departed from London toward Scotland, riding from Poules through the citie, paſſing forth at Bithops gate. The duke of Northumberland, the erle of Penbroke, and the lord treaſuror brought hir to Shordich church, and there toke their leaue of hir. The duke of Northumberland had an hundred men after him with iauelins, whereof fourtie were gentlemen clad in blacke veluet cotes garded with white, & hats of blacke veluet with white feathers, and chains of gold about their necks. The earle of Penbroke had fiue ſcore men well appointed alſo, with blacke iauelins and hats with feathers, and the lord treaſuror had an hundred gentlemen and yeomen with iauelins in like maner, well apparelled: which three companies of horſmen furniſhed the ſtreets on either ſide, from the croſſe in Cheape, to Birchen lane end, as ſhe paſſed that waie.

The ſhiriffes of London had the conduction of hir to Waltam towne end, where ſhe lodged that night: and in euerie ſhire through which ſhe paſſed, the ſhiriffe, with the gentlemen of the ſame ſhire, receiued hir, and gaue their attendance on hir, till ſhe came to enter into the nert ſhire, where the ſhiriffe and gentlemen there receiued hir: and that order was obſerued till ſhe came to the borders of Scotland, and all hir charges for meat and drinks, aſwell for hir ſelfe, and whole traine, as alſo the proviſion for their horſſes, was borne and allowed by the king. [Beſides which, (as ſaith the ſame Leſleus) Richard Shelleie, now maiſter of the knights of Malta in England, and Edward Dudleie baron, were appointed to attend on hir all the waie through England, from London to Edenburgh, where ſhe was honorablie receiued by the earle Bothwell, and the lord Hume.] The earle of Huntleie, and diuerſe other of the Scotiſh lords returned home by ſea, the ſaid earle landing at Montroſſe, about the latter end of December.

✻ After that the quæne was arriued in Scotland, ſhe labored euerie waie to ſtop all occaſion of diſſention; and that theſe braules which were riſen amongeſt the nobilitie in the time of the warres, and were not yet fullie quenched, might grow no further, to bring the common wealth (alreadie much impaired) into new troubles. Wherefore, by the aduiſe of the gouernor, of the earles of Huntleie, Angus, and Argile, and by the quænes trauell, the controuerſies moued about the archbiſhoprikes of ſaint Andrews and Glaſcow, the biſhoprikes of Dunkeld and Brechine, the abbeies of Aberbrothie, Inchechaſtrie, and other benefices, were ended: by beſtowing ſome of them vpon noble mens children, and ſome vpon ſuch perſons as worthilie deſerued them.)

Doctor Wanthop, whome Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 514. calleth Robert Warhope, a Scotiſhman borne, archbiſhop of Armachane, ſo nominated by pope Paule the third, and after created Legatus à latere by Julius the third, deceaſſed this yeere in Paris, the tenth of Nouember. This man was blind from his infancie, but yet gaue himſelfe ſo to ſtudie, that he was firſt made doctor of diuinitie in the vniuerſitie of Paris, and after atteined to ſuch eſtimation in the court of Rome, that he was by the foreſaid popes aduanced (as before ye haue heard.) So that it is to be preſumed, that the ſufficiencie of his learning, (whereto he muſt needs aſpire altogither by the eare) (ſith he was quite depriued of the benefit of ſight) coupled with other good qualities of mind, were means to preferre him firſt into the popes fauour, and then to promotion of his beſtowing.

This yeere in the moneth of June, the quæne Dowager, and the gouernor, went into the north parts of Scotland; and at Inuernes, Elgin, Bamf, Aberden, and Perth, the gouernor ſat in iuſtice for redreſſe of wrongs, and adminiſtration of righteous lawes and orders. And afterwards they repaired to the weſt parts, and ſat likewiſe in iuſtice at Dunfreis, Glaſcow, Lanricke, and in other places of that countrie, where diuerſe were put to their fines for tranſgreſſing the lawes, but few or none touched by corporall puniſhment. Which was but a ſlender courſe taken in reforming enormities, and little better than impunitie; though in leuieng of the fines (perhaps) a proportion were vſed: for by that meanes manie an offenſe was redeemed by monie, and iuſtice was little better than bought and ſold, as at a publike mart.

✻ After this, they returned to Edenburgh, where all things requiſite for the eſtabliſhing of iuſtice were confirmed by the counſell of the nobilitie, and of the wiſe ſenators. Whervpon, when nothing ſeemed to want for the ſetling of a perfect peace through all the realme, but this, that certeine of the inhabitants of the eaſt limits (accuſtomed to ſpoiles) did by driuing bowties of cattell from the borders of England, ſeeme to offer new occaſion of warre. At this time, the gouernor goeth to Jedworth, and remoued ſuch magiſtrats as had negligentlie gouerned their owne prouince, or diſpatched the generall affaires of the kingdome: where taking pledges of euerie familie, he made them after that time in better quiet. Whervpon a long time following, there was a mutuall peace betweene England and Scotland. About which time alſo, the proteſtants religion making breach into the doctrine of the Romans, there was a prouinciall councell kept at Bithquoe, where the Caluiniſts with their doctrine were condemned and accurſſed; and all things decreed in the councell of Trent vnder Paule the third, were eſtabliſhed, with manie other needfull lawes made to purge the corrupt manners of the clergie.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 515.

In which meane time, Dauid Panter or Painter (for I find both written) being a man of great learning, and famous by great experience, hauing faithfullie conſumed ſeuen yeeres in France, in the ſeruice of an ambaſſador legier, came out of France to Jedworth: where, when he had declared to the gouernor (in the aſſemblie of the nobilitie) the reaſon, order, and meane which he vſed in accompliſhing of his office; he was greatlie commended of all men. And for that he had ſo diligentlie, wiſelie, & truſtilie performed that great charge, he was with great ſolemnitie conſecrated biſhop of Roſſe, in the preſence of that aſſemblie. At which time alſo, the gouernor did dub into the order of knighthood certeine borderers, who had deſerued well of the common-wealth, to the end that their vertue adorned with ſuch honorable recompenſe, might be more inlarged toward the care of their countrie. Amongeſt which perſons ſo aduanced, theſe were the chiefe: Ceſſford and Fernihurſt, Andrew Kar of Littleden, Couldinknols, Greinherdie, Balclenche, with manie other valiant men.)

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 516.

In this torneie (wherein the gouernor was thus the iuſtice) the quæne ſecretlie trauelled with the lords, both ſpirituall and temporall, to haue their conſents to be regent of Scotland, immediatlie after hir daughter the quæne came to ſufficient yeeres, and that the time of hir tutorſhip were accompliſhed, or ſooner; if the lawes of the realme would ſo permit. And to aſſure hir ſelfe of their good wils in this behalfe, ſhe contracted ſundrie priuie bands with them, making large promiſes of great rewards vnto euerie of them. To conclude, this matter was ſo handeled by hir and others, to whome ſhe committed the doings therein, that in the yeere following, the gouernor agreed to ſurrender vp the gouernance into hir hir hands, hir daughter the yong quéene being not yet full twelue yéeres of age.

The gouernor was promiſed not onelie a full diſcharge and a Quietus eſt of all his doings, as well for receipt of monie, iewels, & other things, during the time of his gouernement, but alſo a confirmation of the heritable gift of the dukedome of Chatelerault: likewiſe an other confirmation of all gifts and reſtitutions by him made, during the time he had exerciſed the office of gouernor. And forthwith the quéene Dowager ſent into France, to get all theſe things diſpatched, with ſuch aſſurances of writings vnder hands and ſeales, as was expedient, and to be ſent home into Scotland for his ſecuritie in all things.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 517.

✠ But before the gouernor had conſented to the quénes demand, there was great contention about the matter: for ſhe well vnderſtood that he would not depart with his office, before the time that the yong quéene had atteined to the age preſcribed for hir full yéeres. For it is ordeined by the law of the kingdome, that the king ſhall not remaine anie longer vnder tutors, than to the age of fouretéene; & the quéene (as it is in other women) at the yéeres of 12; at which times they may appoint procurators, which ſhall haue the gouernement of the kingdome vntill their full age. For which cauſe, the yong quéene choſe amongſt other (as after ſhall more appéere) the quéene Dowager to be one: whereupon, the quéene Dowager challenged the gouernement vnto hir ſelfe, for that hir daughter was certeine moneths aboue thoſe yéeres of twelue. Againſt which the gouernor did ſtiflie contend, conſtantlie affirming that the yong quéene did not exceed the age of eleuen yéeres.

Wherupon the quéene, to take from the gouernor all ſtarting-holes and other ſhifts, doth vrge the cuſtome of that kingdome, and the obſeruation of thoſe lawes to be, that they muſt reckon the yéere in which the Scotiſh king or quéene is yet vnborne in their mothers bellie, to be part of that number of twelue or foure téene; in which they may appoint gouernors to rule vnder them. Which the gouernor perhaps did ſéeme to confeſſe for the king, but that the ſame was true for a quéene it did not appéere; ſith it ſéemeth to be wrought by Gods high prouidence, that the kingdome of Scotland was alwaies héeretofore by manie ages gouerned by kings, and that a woman did neuer before this time (eſpeciallie one within age) challenge that kingdome vnto them, although the male line (as appéered from the Bruſes to the Stewards) deſcended from the women, haue ſometime poſſeſſed the ſterne of Scotland.

But in the end, ſaie or do what he could, the gouernor did ſurrender his place (as after ſhall more plainelie appéere) vntill which time we will purſue the orderlie courſe of things done in this place: which is, that whileſt the gouernor & the quéene mother were in this diſcord for the regent ſhip of the realme, manie ſeditious perſons (taking occaſion thereby with hope to ſcape vnpuniſhed) did renew the memorie of old iniuries. For hérevpon it happened, that manie of the familie of the Kars did (at Edenburgh) with great boldneſſe vtterlie ſlaie Balcleuche the knight. Beſides which, the yonger ſonne of the lord Ruthwen or Rewen, did publikelie thruſt through and ſlea John Chartruſſe a noble and a valiant yong man, for deadlie hatred (as was thought) betwéene thoſe two families. Yet it was ſpred abroad, that the chiefeſt cauſe why Ruthwen did kill Chartruſſe, was for that Ruthwen (being called into ſute of law by the other) diſtruſting his cauſe, and ſuppoſing that it would paſſe againſt him by iudgement, had none other remedie to relieue the matter, than that verie day to kill Chartruſſe. Which matter was the occaſion of making this law, that whoſoeuer with force or armes did either purſue or abate, recouer or loſe in anie action, ſhould not onelie be puniſhed for the raſhneſſe of the fact, but alſo ſhould haue the matter forthwith (euen in that moment of time) iudged againſt him.]

Sundrie ſlaughters of the nobilitie.

This yéere, the firſt of Julie, Edward the firſt of that name, king of England, departed this life, after whom ſucceéded his ſiſter Marie, eldeſt daughter to K. Henrie the eight. [Touching whoſe regiments, Abr. Fl. ſith this hiſtorie requireth matter appropriate vnto it ſelfe, we will ſaie little in this place, remitting the readers to the conuenient courſe of time wherein they flouriſhed and vaded. Onelie this is worthie the noting, that the realme of England was not ſo much in hir time afflicted with exquiſite troubles of barbarous perſecutors, to the diminiſhing of Gods ſeruants, and the increaſing of ſatans ſynagog, as it was like to haue triumphed vnder the glorious title of the victorious goſpell, if God had not (for the vnworthineſſe of the Engliſh people) taken the yong king awaie. For the proſperous beginning of his gouernement foretold an happie proceéding, and a bleſſed ending. But to returne to Scotland.]

1553.

✠ About this time, Norman Leſle, who (as you Fr. Thin. heard before) had fled for the death of the cardinall Leſleus lib. 1 Beton biſhop of ſaint Andrews into France (where pag 520. he then was impriſoned) being now ſet at libertie, did priuilie conueie himſelfe into Scotland. Which vnderſtood of the gouernor, he fined all thoſe that had receiued him into their houſe, & compelled Norman to flée to Denmarke, for feare that (if he were taken) he ſhould ſuffer extreme puniſhment. But when he knew that there was no place of ſafetie for him in that countrie, wandering ouer manie prouinces, he came at laſt into England, in the reigne of Edward the firſt; of whome, with the reſt of his companions, he was moſt courteouſlie receiued, with yérelie penſions out of the exchéker or common treſurie aſſigned vnto them for their maintenance, according to their eſtates.

But after that king Edward was departed the world, they all were alſo commanded to depart the realme, to whome (earneſtlie vrging that their penſions might be paied to them in an other place where they ſhould remaine) the duke of Norffolke did publikelie ſay in the councell, that it ſéemed not iuſtice, that a catholike prince ſhould paie anie penſions to ſuch as had murthered a catholike cardinall. With which anſwer the ſaid Norman was almoſt ſtroken dead, and being then wearied with the griefe of his exile, went againe into France, and there by king Henrie (by the meanes of the baron Brunſtone, whom this Leſle had ſent before to requeſt the ſame) he was made capteine of the Scotiſh light horſſemen in France. This man did ſo valiantlie, worthilie, and honorablie behaue himſelfe in warres, which the French king had (with Charles the fift then emperor) on the borders of Flanders, that he was alwaies formoſt in the front of the battell, to aſſault the enimie; hoping by that meanes to wipe awaie the blot of the cardinals ſlaughter, and more firmelie to bind the French king vnto him.

But after certeine light ſkirmiſhes (which he happilie performed againſt the enimie) following the battell at Renton (a towne in Picardie) moſt hotlie, and drawing néere within danger of the enimie, he was ſo wounded with a ſhot, that he could hardlie returne to his companie: but being relieued by his owne ſouldiers from the hands of the enimie, he was caried to Montrulle, where he ſhortlie after died, greatlie repenting him of his former wicked fact, and greatlie abhorring the other authors thereof, as furtherers of him therein. Towards whom (after his death) the French king was yet ſo louing (for the ſingular fortitude of mind that was in him) that he procured all ſuch of his Scots (as returned from the warres with Brunſtone) to be receiued into their owne countrie, and reſtored to all their goods and poſſeſſions.]

The couenants and articles are perfected. 1555. Buch.

In lent all the lords of the realme of Scotland aſſembled at Striueling, where all the couenants and articles of agreement, betwixt the quéene and the gouernor, were perfectlie and fullie concluded, and thervpon a parlement appointed to be holden in Edenburgh, the tenth of Aprill next inſuing: and in the meane time the gouernor deliuered the caſtell of Edenburgh vnto the lord Erſkin to kéepe, as it were by waie of aſſurance for his part, that all things at that parlement ſhould be accompliſhed, according to the points of the agréement made by full conſent. The lords then aſſembling in parlement at Edenburgh, on the ſaid twelfth day of Aprill, all the couenants of agréement had & made betwixt the quéene Dowager and the gouernor were preſented & read, touching the dimiſſion and giuing ouer of the gouernors authoritie, confirmed by the quéene hir ſelfe in France, with conſent of the king of France hir husband, the duke of Guiſe, and the cardinall of Lorrain hir curators, with a gift of the dukedome of Chaſtelerault vnto the gouernor, vnder the great ſeales of France, and others, to whome it apperteined.

After this, there was read a confirmation of the three eſtates of Scotland, touching the premiſſes, in which they bound themſelues to warrant the quéenes diſcharge made to him, & to eſtabliſh him as ſecond perſon of the realme [& to haue the gouernement of the caſtell of Dumbreton (as ſaith Buchanan) with other things conteined in the contract: to the which there in open parlement all the eſtates ſubſcribed, and put therevnto their ſeales. Which done, the gouernor gaue vp his office of tutorſhip, in preſence of the ſaid eſtates, the quéene mother, & monſieur Doiſell being there preſent, who receiued the ſame in the quéenes name, at that time remaining in France. And herewith preſentlie was a commiſſion ſhewed, giuen by the quéene of Scotland in France, with conſent of hir curators, making the quéene Dowager hir mother, regent of hir realme: which office ſhe tooke vpon hir, and was thereto admitted by the eſtates of the realme. Then was the parlement newlie authoriſed in the quéenes name, with conſent of hir curators, and in name of the quéene regent.

* Where is to be noted, that as at the firſt they which had the adminiſtration of the common-wealth vnder the king of Scotland in his minoritie, were firſt called gardians, and then gouernors: ſo now began they to haue a new title for the ſame, to be called regents of Scotland, not before accuſtomed among the Scots, which name hath euer ſince remained to all ſuch as execute that place (euen in our age) during the minoritie of Charles James the firſt, now ruling the ſcepter of Scotland. In which declination of things (as before you heard) to the gouernement of the French, the Scots could neuer be perſuaded that the caſtell of Edenburgh ſhould be deliuered to the rule of ſtrangers: fearing that if the quéene ſhould die without iſſue, that then the French would there by tyrannie ſettle themſelues. Wherefore the ſame was committed to the defenſe of John Areſkine, which he ſhould not deliuer to anie, but to one of the order, and of the nobilitie and parlement.

Buch. lib. 16.

About this time, the quéene regent ſent George Gordon earle of Huntleie to apprehend John Mudiard (or Mudcrac, as ſaith Buchanan) chiefe of the familie of the Reginaldins, a notable théefe, & one that was fraught with moſt wicked déeds: which iournie it is ſuppoſed that Gordon did not verie faithfullie diſcharge. Wherefore, when he returned without the diſpatch thereof, in not taking of that man, he was committed to priſon vntill the day appointed, wherein he ſhould anſwer the cauſe. Whoſe friends in the meane time (to mitigate the enuie againſt him for the ſame) did ſpred falſe rumors thereof, laieng all the fault in the familie of the Cathans: for they ſaid that the ſame was hindered by them for the malice that they bare vnto the Gordons: which ſpeeches did onelie riſe almoſt vpon this occaſion.

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 522. Buchan. lib. 16.

Whileſt the quéene prepared for hir iournie into Scotland, Gordon did caſt into priſon William (the head of the familie of the Cathans) a yong man liberallie brought vp with the earle of Murreie for kinreds ſake, being ſiſters ſon to the ſaid earle; for none other cauſe but for that he would not yéeld him ſelfe to the protection of him. Gordon therefore grieued at this man, did not thinke it ſafetie to leaue him free and at libertie behind him, when he ſhould go into France with the quéene, although he could find no fault to laie to his charge woorthie anie puniſhment. Wherefore (by his friends) he perſuaded the yong man (ignorant of all deceit) that he ſhould yéeld himſelfe into his protection and tutorſhip: for ſo by that one meanes, both the ſame of the one and ſafetie of the other might be prouided for, which the yong man did accordinglie.

Wherefore Gordon being now lord ouer the life and death of this William, did (diſſembling his hatred to him) breake with his owne wife to execute the yong and giltleſſe man in his abſence, ſuppoſing thereby to transferre all the malice which ſhould riſe thereof vnto the fact of his wife, as not done by his conſent. Which fell out quite contrarie: for when euerie one knew the ſubtill wit of Gordon the earle of Huntleie, and that his wife (a choſen and rare woman) had paſſed all the reſt of hir life within the bounds of womanlie modeſtie; they were all eaſilie perſuaded, that he alone was author vnto hir of that wicked counſell. Whereupon, Gordon being now caſt in priſon for that fact, there was (in a councell holden by the regent) great contention and varietie of opinions, touching the puniſhment which he ſhould haue. For ſome would haue him baniſhed into France for certeine yeares, & ſome would onelie haue an exceſſiue mulct to be laied vpon him.

Both which opinions were reiected by the chiefe of his enimies, Gilbert earle of Caſſiles. For he, perceiuing by the preſent ſtate of things, that peace would not long continue betwéene Scotland and France; did vtterlie withſtand his baniſhment into that countrie. For he would not haue that man (being ſo ſubtilie and vnconſtantlie witted, proud, and deſirous of reuenge, of and vpon ſuch as were emulous, or backbiters againſt him) to be a firebrand and captaine to thoſe French, who (he was aſſured, for their inſolent pride) would haue warre with the Scots. For although he thought, that of right he ought to be puniſhed, yet he did not iudge, that ante domeſticall euill was ſo much, or the puniſhment thereof ſhould be thought ſo great, that they ſhould accuſtome the French to ſhed the Scotiſh bloud. Wherefore at length his puniſhment was agreed vpon (as after ſhall appeare) in renouncing of all his right to the earldome of Murreie, & other things.

The quéene hauing the diſpoſition of all things, did at hir pleaſure change all the officers, and made the earle of Caſſils treaſuror, & Oeilmort a French man controller; alſo an other Frenchman called monſieur Rubie, kéeper of the great ſeale, as vicegerent in place of the earle of Huntleie, who was chancellor and then in ward; [and James Machill regiſter, and the abbat of Couper kéeper of the priuie ſeale, as ſaith Leſleus. lib. 10. pag. 521. Donald gouernor of the Iles.] Theſe mens counſell and monſieur sieur Doisels she vsed principallie in all things. The earle of Huntleie being to be deliuered out of ward, did for his punishment renounce his title to the earledome of Murreie; whereof he had a gift in heritage. Also he renounced his interest vnto the farmes of Orkeneie and Sheatland, and to the earledome of Mar, and of the quéenes lands of Straits Die: and further was contented to go ouer into France, there to remaine for the space of fiue yeares. But yet afterwards the quéene was contented, that he should still remaine within the realme, for the which he gaue to hir fiue thousand pounds in monie.

The earle of Huntleie renounced manie things.

Fr. Thin. Lesleus. lib. 10. pag. 522.

✠ About the same time Marie the quéene of England, and the regent of Scotland, thought good to haue a peace betweene both nations, and that their commissioners should méet to determine all controuersies. At what time for the Scots, were Robert of Kinwardie, and John Bellenden of Achnowle knights: and for the English, were Thomas Cornwallesse, and Robert Bowes knights. At what time there were lawes made touching fishing, aswell in the sea, as in certeine other limited riuers; by which all occasions of contention was taken awaie from both nations. Richard Norton, a man of great counsell in prosperitie, and of great stomach in aduersitie, being capteine of Norham castell in England, was at that time cause of the making of this law for the commons; That if anie Englishman from a Scot, or a Scot from an Englishman, did by force take away anie fish that was taken; that he should paie the mulct of twentie shillings for the same: beside other punishments of the common law.

The law for fishing.

Couenants for seamen.

Further it was agreed, that whosoeuer by force of tempest, or for anie other cause, were driuen into Scotland or England, he should not by anie pretense be staied; but he might frélie by land or sea, either on horssebacke or on foot returne home. Prouided, that he had the testimonie of the next maister of the port, or of the next towne, to witnes the cause of his arriuall; and that during the time of his abode in such a countrie, he attempted nothing against the lawes of the kingdome. Not manie daies after this, Henrie Sinclere deane of Glascow, senator, and vicepresident of the high court, did returne into Scotland out of France; being a man greatlie familiar with James the fift, aswell for the singularitie of his wit, as the excellencie of his learning.

Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 523.

But in the time of the gouernor, the courtiers (not greatlie estéeming such wisedome & learning) made no account of him, although the quéene Dowager, and diuerse of the nobilitie held him in great honor; aswell for his déepe studie in the best arts, as for his rare knowledge of the publike lawes and antiquities of Scotland. This man, vpon his first returne, was forthwith both author and persuader to and of the bishop of the Orchades chiefe president, and to the other senators; that there should be new lawes made for the short ending of suits in law; for the obseruation of a right course of iudgments, and for the taking awaie of all euill customs. In the making & tempering whereof, he was of so great iustice; that such things as were set downe in the law, were more holilie and perfectlie brought to their ancient forme than they had béene before.

The reason is readie; to wit, aswell for that in equall deliuering law to all men: as in pleading, there was by his meanes more diligence vsed by the magistrats, aduocats, scribes, and officers; in cutting awaie vaine and superfluous formes and orders: which ministred occasion, that their suits did long hang in court, before they could be determined. At this time also the marquesse of Paine (being after made duke of Almaine) who in the meane time with manie other nobles of France, had remained pledges in England, did (hauing licence thereunto) come into Scotland to sée his sister, accompanied with sir Thomas Stewkleie of England now knight; who after he had remained some daies with his sister in pleasure & delight, discharged his faith, and returned againe into England.]

Lesleus. lib. 10 pag. 524.

In Julie was a parlement held at Edenburgh, in the which manie acts and statutes were made, right profitable (as was then thought) for the common-weale of the realme. Amongest which, to passe ouer the rest, these séeme worthie to remaine chronicled to posteritie. First, that none of the citizens (in the feasts of Whitsuntide, or anie such times, in which their hirelings are accustomed to go forth) should assemble armed, to cast forth the husbandmen after the old maner. Secondlie, that the inhabitants méeting togither, should no more assemble vnder a certeine colour of gaine, which for exercise of the bodie (as it was supposed) was holden after the example of one (I can not tell who) Robert Hood a wild or vplandish man. Thirdlie, that there should be no priuat leagues contracted betwéene subiects. Which lawes did after bring great peace, ease, and quiet to the publike state.

1555. A parlement

Fr. Thin. Lesleus. lib. 1 pag. 524.

In the verie same yeare 1555, in the eight kalends of August, fell the mariage of Marie quéene of England with Philip king of Spaine in the citie of Winchester. Wherefore ambassadors were sent from the quéene regent to Philip and Marie, to congratulat their mariage. Besides which, these ambassadors did require a renewing of the league, and that commissioners should be appointed to méet the next summer in the borders, to end all controuersies. In the meane time, whilest the quéene regent did administer the affaires of south Scotland, John Steward earle of Atholl was sent into the north parts with a chosen companie, to breake the force of John Mudiard or Muderace. At what time this earle vsed such courtesie and counsell in pacifieng, and such celeritie and wisedome in executing of things; that he brought the seditious Mudiard (impatient to haue anie gouernor) to the quéene, to whome the said Mudiard did willinglie yéeld himselfe, his children, and his kindred.

Lesleus. lib. 1 pag. 525. Buchanan. lib. 16.

To which man, the quéene (in respect of singular clemencie, and pietie to all men, according to the disposition of hir nature) did wholie remit all his offenses, with this condition; that he should faithfullie remaine prisoner in the castell of Mekens, and in the towne of Perth. But as the for (as the prouerbe is amongest vs) cannot liue without his starting holes; so this Mudiard and his companions, imbued with more than forlike conditions, did (deceiuing their kéepers) returne to their owne caues, and afresh trouble all the north Scotland with their raised seditions and spoiles. Which things inforced the quéene, that she did go into those parts, to hold iustice of oires: in which she might bridle the euils of wicked men, and purge those prouinces from all the roots of sedition.

Whereupon, in the moneth of Julie, the quéene accompanied with the earles of Huntleie, Argile, Rothes, Cassils, and Marshall; the bishop of Aberden and Rosse, M. Doisell, Rubie, and others, went to the towne of Inuernesse, in which citie (the faults known by publike accusation) there was iust punishment taken vpon the offendors. And because there were manie hidden in the higher and mounteine countries, which by their absence fled the punishment; she commanded the heads of the mounteine families, that they should bring their guiltie countrimen and kindred to iudgement, according to the law established by James the fift; with a great paine paine ſet vpon the chiefe of thoſe families; if the o-ther did ſtiflie reſiſt, & would not come into iudge-ment.

Whereupon it followed, that ſundrie of diuerſe families, that were by contempt departed awaie, did come to publike iudgement. Where manie, and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort, paied the puniſhment for troubling the peace; amongeſt which, one Grant a baron being commanded to bring James Grant and diuerſe other wicked perſons before the iudges, did prouide to bring their dead heads, when they could not take their liue bodies. The earle of Cathnes alſo, becauſe that being warned thervnto, he did not bring his people before the iudges; was firſt committed to priſon in Inuerneſſe, then at Aberden, and laſtlie at Edenburgh, from whence he purchaſed his libertie with a great maſſe of monie.

Mackeie in like ſort, head and chiefe of the tribe of Strathnauerne & of Glencone, being called to iudgement (for that he had often waſted the countrie of Southerland next adioining) did contemne the precept. Whereupon the quéene prouided a great armie, which vnder the erle of Southerland brake into Strathnauerne, where he poſſeſſed all the places of doubt, leaſt anie hole might be left for the théeues to paſſe awaie from thence. Whereupon Mackeie, when he ſaw himſelfe ſo beſet (as that no place of flight was left him) yelded himſelfe to Hugh Kenedie, who led him to the quéene, by whom he was committed to priſon at Edenburgh a long time, but they of Glencone put in pledges, & (being committed to ſafe and ſtrong priſons) were reſerued to the iudgement of the quéenes pleaſure.

After this, the quœne leauing Inuerneſſe, and progreſſing the prouince of Roſſe, ſhe came to Elgine, Bamf, Aberden, and the chiefe places thereabouts, diligentlie to inquire of the miſdemeanor of thoſe people. At what time ſhe did temper the rigor of law with ſuch courteſie, that ſhe puniſhed the offendors by fine, and not by death. From thence ſhée came to Dundée, and to ſaint Johns towne, obſerving the ſame cauſe and courſe of hir comming. When ſhe had thus paſſed ouer the ſummer in bringing the mounteine people to their dutie, ſhe ſent the earle of Huntleie to ioine with the biſhop of Roſſe and Orkeneie, and to Hugh Kenedie; to whom ſhe did ſubſtitute a better and more commodious forme of diſpatch of their affaires by others: who ſhould receiue the libels and accuſations of priuate perſons, and diligentlie to inquire of them, in the townes of Inuerneſſe, Elgine, and other places. By whoſe diligence it came to paſſe, that all thoſe countries (being reduced to the rule of iuſtice) were made the more quiet.

Here I will not (ſaith Leſleus) now declare how honourablie & ſumptuouſlie the quœne in all hir progreſſe was receiued (without anie charge to hir) of the péeres, biſhops, and other nobles and gentlemen of Scotland, ſith the Frenchmen (which were then preſent with hir) haue opened to other nations as well as to their own people (with ſingular commendations to the Scots) the gorgious ſhew of this Scotland, being a moſt worthie ſigne of the fauour they bare to the quœne.] In the meane time there were ſent commiſſioners to the borders, as the biſhop of Dunblane, the lard of Lethington, & maiſter James Macgill: where doctor Tunſtall biſhop of Durham, & certeine others for England met them at Duns, and remained there till the quœnes coming backe forth of the north in September next following.

This yéere was a parlement holden, in which the lards Grimſton, Drumſton, and Grange, with maiſter Henrie Balnaues, and others, which were for-faulted in the gouernors time, were reſtored. At the ſame time the quœne, by the counſell of monſieur Doiſell, and Rubie, and certeine of the nobilitie of Scotland, requeſted that a new order might bee made, whereby euerie mans ſubſtance ſhould be put in an inuentarie, and according to the rate thereof to paie a yérelie taration, to be put and kept in the treaſure-houſe till warres began, and that then men of warre might be waged, therewith to lie vpon the borders, and none in that caſe to be charged to come from their owne houſes, but when anie great armie came forth of England to inuade Scotland.

A yérelie taxe to be leuied is proponed.

Diuerſe of the great lords were agreed to this ordinance: but the moſt part of the barons hearing thereof, aſſembled togither in Edenburgh, to the number of two hundred & aboue, and ſent the lards James Sandlandie of Calder in Louthian, and John of Wemis in Fife, to the quœne and lords, beſeeching them not to ſet ſuch new tarations vpon them, for they could not beare ſuch burdens; but would defend the realme, as before time their elders had done, not meaning to put their goods in inuentarie, as if they ſhould alreadie make their laſt will and teſtaments: and be paſt all hope of inioieng their temporall goods, as perſons not to liue longer in the world, but to take their farewell, and giue ouer all that they had by law of fatall neceſſitie not to be auoided. ✲ Adding further, that their elders did not onelie defend themſelues, and their goods againſt the Engliſh, when they were of farre greater power than they now be; but did alſo manie times make further inuaſion vpon them into their owne countrie. For which cauſe, they being not anie iot now ſo degenerat from their anceſtors, that they wold not, when need required, beſtow their ſubſtance and life in defenſe of their countrie.

This taratti-on is not granted.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. li. 16.

And as touching the hired ſouldiers, it was a thing full of danger, to commit the ſtate of Scotland to men without ſubſtance, or without hope of aduancement, and to ſuch as for monie will dare to do anie thing, being a thing apt to kindle their déepe couetouſneſſe, and to miniſter occaſion to them to attempt other matters. But to the end all other things may the better be looked vnto, let them more remember the déerenes of their countrie, than their owne eſtate or condition. For will anie man beléeue, that hired ſouldiers will more valiantlie fight for ſtrangers, than the owners will fight for the defenſe of their owne? That a little hire or wages readie to be abated in peace, will greatlier incenſe the minds of the common people; than goods, children, wiues, and temples, will moue the hearts of the nobilitie?

Whereunto may be ioined, that this matter perteineth to the higheſt good of the kingdome of Scotland, and that the ſame is of farre more importance than that it ſhould be communed of at this time, and in the tender age of our yong quœne. Beſides which the greater part of men do ſuſpect and feare, that the ſame new order for warre is vnprofitable, and ſuch as cannot be performed without ſome commotion of the Scotiſh nation, eſpeciallie ſith ſo great ſums of monie can hardlie be wrong out by tribute impoſed on the ſame Scots, as may ſuffice to nourith a hired armie to defend the borders. Wherefore it is to be feared, leaſt the end of perſuaſion grow to this point, that it do not rather open a gap to let in the enimie, than to be a barre to kéepe them backe. For if the Engliſh, after this example, being a farre richer nation, ſhall gather a much greater ſumme: who doubteth, but that they may with leſſe trouble to the cõmon people, ſuſteine an armie twiſe as great as that of the Scots, & ſuch as ſhall not onelie enter the borders, but ruſh euen into the verie bowels of the king-kingdome of Scotland?

For the other part of the oration, I cannot tell whether it be better to ſuppreſſe it in ſilence, or to deliuer it (ſaith Buchanan) to common eies & eares. For I doo heare (writeth he) manie which doo murmur and aſke who ſhall gather this monie? How much thereof ſhall be neceſſarie to and for the hired ſouldiors, and how much to be left in the hands of the treaſuror? There be manie things which put vs in great hope, that no ſuch thing ſhall be eſtabliſhed for the eſpeciall goodneſſe and temperancie of that worthie princeſſe (in whoſe hand the whole gouernment now reſteth) doth incourage vs, that we ſhall not bee ſo taxed. But yet when we remember the outward deeds of others, and our owne at home, which haue before time beene done; we cannot ſo gouerne our ſelues, but that we muſt feare the ſame hereafter to fall vpon vs, which we haue alreadie felt.

But letting theſe things paſſe, which perchance we vainlie feare, let vs come to thoſe things in which our anceſtors did place their chiefe helpe (for maintenance of their libertie) againſt the weapons of their aduerſaries. Robert the firſt of that name (in compariſon of whome none of the Scotiſh kings were counted more wiſe, and without all doubt none more valiant, as we all confeſſe) did not onelie profit his ſubiects whileſt he liued, but alſo after his death: for when he laid at point to ſurrender his life, he gaue this admonition, that we ſhould neuer make continuall peace, nor long truce with the Engliſh. For that man (by nature and by vſe of long time exerciſed in both fortunes) did well perceiue, that ſuch as liued in idleneſſe and ſlouth, had their ſtomachs and minds abated, and their bodies weakened with delights of pleaſures, and that couetouſneſſe and lecherie did ſpring vp as it were in vntilled ground, when ſeuere diſcipline and ſparing was quenched, which made them alſo to be vnpatient of labor, and to hate battell, whereby their ſtrength being diminiſhed, they ſhould eaſilie giue place to their enimies.

After that theſe two noble men had ſaid thus much, the regent fearing tumultuous inſurrections if ſhe perſeuered in this eraction, left off anie further to purſue this tax, and is (in often acknowledging hir error) ſaid to haue vſed this ſpeech; That ſome of the beſt of the Scots, and not ſhe, were authors and workers of the ſame. By which words manie ſuppoſed that ſhe ment the earle Huntleie, a man of a ſharpe wit, latelie deliuered out of priſon, and rather readie to reuenge the iniurie receiued by reſtreint of his libertie, than mindfull of anie benefit ſhewed vnto him in his deliuerance. Wherfore when he ſaw the regent bent to this one thing to inure the Scots with taxes and paiments of monie: and fearing leaſt hir power being ouermuch increaſed, that ſhe would abate the ſtrength of the nobilitie, diminiſh their authoritie, and call the whole gouernment of Scotland into the hands of hir people, it was ſuppoſed that he gaue hir counſell anſwerable to hir diſpoſition for the gathering of monie which ſhe had then in hand, being in deed the part of an enimie to hir, becauſe he knew that the Scots would not paie anie tribut, nor be ſo obedient vnto hir as they had beene before. There were alſo ſome that ſuppoſed this deuiſe to grow from Dauid Painter biſhop of Roſſe; for he being a man of rare wit, and no leſſe learning, was with manie benefits tied to the Hamiltons, and was not anie waie eſtranged from their counſels and kinreds.

1557. In this yeere, an ambaſſador of Muſcouie going into England with a great ſhip, & another bote, was caſt on land by ſudden tempeſt of the ſea in the coaſt of Buchquane, a prouince in the north part of Scotland; who hauing loſt all his goods by ſhipwracke, was ſaued himſelfe, and ſome of his companie, becauſe they lighted on a rocke, where he & they might ſaue their liues. The inhabitants did liberallie interteine this ſtrange man, and brought him to Edenburgh to the queene, who would not permit this new gheſt to want anie thing ſo long as he remained with hir: and further, commanded and procured, that his goods loſt by ſea, and come into the hands of the people, ſhould be faithfullie reſtored to him againe, appointing moreouer the lord Hume for honors ſake to accompanie him to Berwike. Leſleus.lib.10. pag.328.

This yeere alſo in the moneth of Julie was Hoter Traberne ſent ambaſſador (from Anna duke of Oldenberge, and Delmenſore, and earle of Emden) out of eaſt Friſia into Scotland, to require that the ancient couenant of an hundred yeeres made betweene the Scots and the people of Emden (which by courſe of ſome yeeres paſt, was now of no force) might now againe be renewed. Which being granted & ſolemnelie eſtabliſhed, both thoſe nations from that day did liue togither in mutuall & perfect friendſhip. After this, warres ariſing betweene England and France, queene Marie of England, fearing leaſt the Scots would be ſtirred at the motion of the French to attempt ſomething againſt England, ſent ambaſſadors to the regent, to require that ſome of the Scots might with hir people meet on the borders, to treat of matters belonging vnto them both. Leſleus.lib.10. pag.529.

Whereupon in the moneth of Julie, the procurators for both the kingdomes met at Caerleill, whither for the Scots came Robert Reid biſhop of Orkneie, Henrie Seintclere deane of Glaſcow, Robert Carnegie knight, ſenators; and the lord Harries, at that time preſident of the weſt borders. For the Engliſh did come Tunſtall biſhop of Durham, the lords Dacres, and Wharton; amongſt whome there was talke for peace, and recompenſe of ſuch iniuries as were committed by both the nations. In the meane time a certeine Frenchman landed at the weſt part on Scotland, and declared to the queene the warres betweene England and France, deſiring hir to make warre vpon the Engliſh. Whereupon the queene ſent for the lords to commune with them at Newbottell, where ſhe opened to them diuerſe wrongs done on the borders by Engliſhmen, and how no redreſſe could be got: wherfore ſhe required that warres might be moued againſt England in reuenge of thoſe iniuries, although the biſhop of Orkeneie was the ſame time at Caerleill in talke with Cutbert Tunſtall biſhop of Durham and others, commiſſioners for England. The principall cauſe that moued the queene regent to ſeeke to make war againſt England, was for that the Engliſhmen aided the Emperor in fauor of his ſonne king Philip againſt the French king, becauſe their queene had taken to huſband the ſame king Philip, and ſent the earle of Penbroke ouer with an armie to ſoine with king Philips power.

An aſſemblie at Caerleill.

The occaſion why the queene regent deſire to haue war.

It was thought therefore, that if the Scots inuaded the Engliſh borders, it might cauſe them to call backe their power forth of France to defend their owne countrie. But the Scotiſh lords would not conſent in anie wiſe to begin anie warres: which their dealing when monſieur Doiſell perceiued, hee ſpedily went to Haimouth beſide Berwike, and fortified the ſame with all diligence, making inuaſions into England. Whereupon the Scotiſhmen in their owne defenſe were conſtreined to make warre, and the earle of Huntleie was made lieutenant vpon the borders, who came thither; and remaining there by the aſſiſtance of the Frenchmen, made ſundrie inuaſions and rodes into England, burnt diuers townes and villages, and caſt downe manie ſtone houſes, piles piles and ſtrengths.

In this meane while were the Scotiſh commiſſioners at Caerleill; and the maiſter of Marwell warden of the weſt borders, being there with them, with much adoo got away and came home into Scotland. The quéene aſſembled a great armie out of all parts of the realme, the which came forward to Kelſo in the moneth of October, where the quéene & Frenchmen perſuaded them to enter by inuaſion into England. But they mening to take further aduiſe, paſſed ouer Twéd to Marwell hugh, where they incamped, and afterward approched the caſtell of Warke, inuironing the ſame with a ſiege for the ſpace of two or thrée dais. Capteine Read at that preſent had charge of that caſtell, with thrée or foure hundred footmen, and one hundred horſemen, ſéeming to care little for the Scotiſhmens forces.

The earle of Weſtmerland, being then lieutenant of the north parts, gathered ſuch power togither as he might make, and came to Lowike, accompanied with the lord Talbot, ſir James Croſts, and others, to ſuccor where moſt néed ſhould appeare. The Scotiſh armie, perceiuing the Engliſhmen thus in a readineſſe to reſiſt their attempts, toke aduiſe togither, and concluded that it was not for the weale of the realme, at that time to hazard battell forth of the bounds of their owne land, their princeſſe being abſent, and as yet in hir minoritie; conſidering alſo that the war was not taken in hand for their owne quarell, but for the pleaſure of France. Theſe and other the like reaſons, being alleged by the earles of Arrane, Huntleie, Argile, Caſſils, and others, to the quéene and French capteins, they were nothing ſatiſfied therewith; but the Scotiſh lords would attempt no further, but retired backe and ſcaled their armie.

In remouing from Warke, they were purſued by certeine bands of the borderers, and others, which were repelled, and ſtood in danger to haue béene diſtreſſed, if capteine Read had not with noble corage iſſued forth, and in time relieued them that were retiring: whereby they ſtaied and gaue a new charge, inſomuch as the Scots were beaten backe againe, and chaſed ouer the water to their maine armie that was alreadie paſſed ouer. The quéene and monſieur Doiſell, perceiuing that they could not get the Scotiſh lords to make anie further exploit at that preſent, ſhe retired home; but Doiſell with his Frenchmen were appointed to remaine ſtill in Haimouth, to countergarriſon the Engliſhmen within Berwike.

There were diuerſe fot bands of Scots waged by the French king, which were appointed to lie in places about the borders, as at Kelſo, Rockeſburgh, and ſuch like for defenſe of the countrie, and the annoiance of the Engliſhmen, as occaſions might ſerue. After this, ſir Andrew Kar, and diuerſe other entered England with a power of men about Martinmaſſe. Neuertheleſſe, the earle of Northumberland, being then lieutenant of the north parts of England, and lieng on the borders, aſſembled his forces togither, & comming to incounter the Scots on the very borders ſide nére to Cheuiot, at the firſt the Engliſhmen were put to the worſſe, but yet at length the Scots were ouerthrowne and chaſed: ſir Andrew Kar, and manie other being taken priſoners.

Sir John Foſter bare himſelfe verie valiantlie at this incounter, ſo that his ſeruice might not well haue béene ſpared. He was thruſt through the mouth into the necke, and alſo through the thigh; moreouer, his horſſe was ſlaine vnder him. The conflict was ſharpe, for both the horſſemen and fotmen came to make proofe of their forces. The warre thus being begun and followed, the Scots kept their quarterrage, and euerie noble man (as he was appointed) laie on the borders with a thouſand horſſemen, during his ordinarie tearme. And on the other ſide, the Engliſh borders were furniſhed with new ſupplies of men of warre, ſo that there were dailie rodes and incurſions made by the parties, to the great damage and ſpoile of the townes and villages ſituate nére to the confines of both the realmes.

Quarterage kept by the Scots for defenſe of their borders.

In December the quéene aſſembled a parlement at Edenburgh, where ſhée (highlie fauouring the French) ſhewed forth the letters of Henrie king of France, to be read by the whole aſſemblie, touching the ſolemnization of the mariage betweene the yoong quéene of Scots, and the French kings ſonne, which I haue here ſet downe.

A parlement.

The ſubſtance of the letter of the French king, concerning the mariage of his ſonne to the queene of Scots.

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 533.

HEnrie by the grace of God, king of the French, to his worthie coſſines & princes of Scotland, and to the reſt of the orders, being our déere friends, gréeting. It is moſt plainlie knowen to all nations, how faſt a bond hath alwaies hitherto remained betwéene Scotland & France. Neither can it be hidden what theſe ſigns of amitie were, being for number manie, for greatneſſe large, and for dutie of friendſhip mutuall ech to other; by which the kings our anceſtors haue ſéemed to confirme, and as it were to increaſe this amitie, to the end it might remaine whole and ſound for euer: yea and ſo farre the ſhew thereof hath appéered, that all the benefits of either realme haue ſéemed to be common to ech other. Which bond of friendſhip we alſo haue (for the time in which we firſt receiued the enſignes of our kingdome) labored firmelie to reteine, to the end the ſame ſhould not anie waie be decaied or broken. The which in like ſort we well vnderſtand, that you haue likewiſe abundantlie performed vnto vs.

Wherefore (more ſtronglie to knit the ſame) we will not ſuffer this opportunitie (which the diuine goodneſſe hath laied before vs, as we verelie ſuppoſe) of mariage to be ſolemnized betwéene our ſon the Dolphin, and your quéene our déere and ſwéet ſiſter and daughter. Which thing (after that it began to be intreated) was ſo vrged by all parts, as the yoong quéene was vpon that condition left with vs, when ſhe was caried into France, by the conſent of our ſiſter the Dowager, and the gouernor of Scotland, to the great reioiſing of all you that yéelded therevnto; where now ſhe hath atteined ſuch beautie and number of vertues, partlie by the liberalitie of nature (which ſhe receiued from the kinglie bloud of hir parents) and partlie by the inſtruction of my wife, that I can hardlie anie longer ſuffer (in reſpect of the age of my ſonne) that this mariage (which we haue ſo much deſired) ſhould anie longer be deferred. And ſith at Chriſtmaſſe next my ſon ſhall come to thoſe yéeres, in which he may promiſe all things that ſhall be neceſſarie for the knitting vp of the mariage; and ſith alſo we haue determined (if it ſo ſéeme good to the quéene hir mother, and to the reſt of the parlement of Scotland, which we earneſtlie requeſt at your hands) that the mariage ſhall publikelie at Paris (on the day conſecrated to the thrée kings) with ſuch ceremonies as is requiſite, be fullie conſummate with the ſpeech of my ſonne and of your quéene:

We doo by theſe letters requeſt you, that by common conſent you forthwith ſend ſome of your chiefe nobilitie, that maie honor the mariage with their presence, and that (hauing publike authoritie therefore) may frælie and according to law, dispose of those things which are accustomed to fall in such matters and affaires.

The which if you shall do, I promise that hereafter they shall liberallie vnderstand how acceptable they shall be to me: and how that you shall receiue all the fruit and benefit which shall arise of my sons mariage (for the performance whereof, by reason of his sufficient age, we will shortlie prouide) which said cõmoditie shall not onelie now remaine to you that be present, but also most abundantlie with great pleasure shall continue to your posteritie. For sith both our and your people of France and Scotland shall be so firmelie conioined (as we hope) by this mutuall knot of mariage, and our affaires with yours, and yours with ours, shall hang the one vpon the other, as it were by a certeine mutuall linke and knot, that both we (being out of the danger of such as would diminish and ouerthrow our states) maie for euer inioy such quiet as we did neuer hope to do before this. From our castell of saint Germans, the fourth kalends of November. 1557.

Upon the reading of which letters in the parlement, by the consent of the whole estates, there were elected and chosen James Beton archbishop of Glascow, Robert Read bishop of Orkeneie, George Lesle earle of Rothes, Gilbert Kennedie earle of Cassiles, James Steward prior of saint Andrewes [the quænes bastard brother] George lord Seton [capteine of Edenburgh] James Fleming, and John Erskine iard of Dun [gouernor of Montrosse] ambassadors and commissioners to go into France, and there to contract mariage betwixt Marie quæne of Scotland, and Francis Dolphin of France, and to solemnize the same mariage. Whereupon, sufficient commissions and instruments were made to them by the estates of the parlement, and they accepting the same, made preparation for that iournie, and departed in the moneth of Februarie forth of the rode of Leith, and with great winds & boisterous stormes came into France, losing in their iournie one of their ships, with men and horsses before saint Ebbes head, in the Forth of Scotland, and an other with great riches & manie gentlemen, with the capteine called Waterton in the rode of Bullongne.

Ambassadors sent into France to consummate the mariage betwixt the quæne of Scotland and the Dolphin of France.

Two ships lost.

The ambassadors themselues neuertheless escaped, and comming safe vnto the French court in the moneth of March, were honorablie receiued of the king at Paris, where the contract of mariage was made, and three score thousand franks assigned in dowrie to the quæne of Scotland, & thirtie thousand franks of yærelie pension, with manie rich iewels. There was also a perpetuall bond of league concluded betwixt France and Scotland, and great preparation made for the mariage, which was solemnized in Paris with great triumph and assistance of all the cardinals, dukes, earles, barons, lords, and bishops of the realme, in the church of Nostre dame, the 24 of Aprill in that present yære, 1558.

The assignement of the Scots quæns dowrie.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 16.

✠ After the solemnitie of this mariage, the legats of Scotland were called into the councell-house of the French king: at what time the chancellor of France delt with them, that they should represent the crowne and scepter, and other ornaments of the kingdome, to th' end the husband of the yong quæne might be crowned king also of Scotland. Whereunto the ambassadors did shortlie make answer, that they had no such thing giuen in charge to them. After which, the cardinall said; We desire nothing more at your hands at this time, but that which lieth in your power to performe; which is, here now to confirme by writing that you will hereafter, forward, approne & worke that this honor (which now we iustlie demand) maie be granted to the Dolphin, when the same shall be talked of in the parlement of Scotland. Which request (when it seemed full of impudencie) they supposed best more constantlie and sharpelie to retect.

Wherefore they answered, that their ambassage was restreined within certeine bounds, which they neither could nor would exceed. But and if they had bæne sent with free libertie of their ambassage, that yet it were not the part of faithfull friends (as the French professed to be) to require that which could not be granted without certeine and assured danger and infamie of treason, though danger of life were absent from it. All which notwithstanding, in all honest things which might well be granted they would yeeld vnto the French, ioined vnto them by so manie necessarie occasions. Wherefore they requested the French that they would not in their demands exceed the limits of modestie.

Wher vpon the ambassadors being dismissed from the court, foure of the chiefe of them (before they departed home) which were these, Gilbert Kennedie, George Lesle, Robert Read, and also James Fleming, all men of singular vertue and loue to their countrie, besides manie other of the companie, died there, not without mistrust of poison. It was also beleeued, that James the quænes brother had receiued the same draught: for (although he were of a better composition of bodie, stronger constitution of complexion, and of more youthfull strength, whereby he escaped death) he had alwaies after a continuall and dangerous infirmitie of his bellie whilest he liued, of the death of all which shall be somewhat more said hereafter. Thus leauing the Scotish lords ambassadors there in France for a time, we will returne to shew what happened betwixt the Scots and Englishmen at home, where the warres were pursued, to the losse or little gaine of both parts.]

About Whitsuntide, sir Henrie Persie with diuerse bands of the countrie garrisons, & sir George Bowes then marshall of Berwike, with sundrie bands of the garrison of that towne, passed forth into Scotland, they being in all about seuen or eight hundred horssemen, and two thousand footmen. They burnt the townes of Duns and Langton; and hauing got togither a great number of cattell, returned homewards. The Scots that laie in Kelso, and other places, keeping their quarterage on their borders (for the realme, as ye haue heard, was quartered, euerie part keeping their turne, as the manner is) assembled togither to the number of two thousand horssemen (or few lesse) and three bands of footmen, hasting forth to defend the countrie. And perceiuing where the Englishmen were, followed and coasted them as they returned with their bootie, till they came to Swinton, where they ouertooke them, and skirmished with them sharplie as they were passing through the towne.

The Scots assaile the Englishmen at Swinton.

The Scotish footmen beat backe part of the Englishmens shot into their battell, and prealled verie forward in hope to be assisted by their horssemen, the which (as ye haue heard) ouermatched greatlie the English horssemen in number: but the fight grew somewhat hot, and the more vnto the disaduantage of the Englishmen, forsomuch as their shot & powder began to faile them, by reason the mistie morning had made much of their powder dankish, so that they could haue no vse thereof. But herewith sir Henrie Lé, capteine Read, and others, being in the battell, behaued themselues verie stoutlie, causing the the ſotmen to ſtaie, and boldlie to abide the enimie: & hærewith p̃ocured the hoꝛſſemen to giue a charge in ſuch conuenient time, as if the ſame had bẽne p̃otracted, it might haue turned verie euill to the Engliſh ſide.

But now as well the hoꝛſſemen as ſotmen plateng their parts, the Scotiſh hoꝛſſemen abiding without the towne in troupe (while their ſotmen were in ſkirmiſh) fled awaie, leauing their ſotmen to be ſlaine and ſpoiled of the Engliſhmen, and yet thoſe ſotmem fought it out right manfullie: ſo that if the Scots hoꝛſſemen had done their parts ſo well as the ſotmen, it was like to haue gone harder on the Engliſh ſide than it did. But now the Scotiſh hoꝛſſemen not entring the fight, their ſotmen were incloſed by the Engliſhmen: foꝛ thoſe that were in the foꝛe-ward, and were paſſed by, returned, and coming behind their enimies, holpe to beat them downe, ſo that few oꝛ none of the Scots oꝛ Frenchmen (whereof there were ſome few amongeſt them) eſcaped, but were either taken oꝛ ſlaine.

Amongeſt others, capteine Cullane, and capteine Benedie, two chiefe leaders of the ſotmen were taken: diuerſe of their hoꝛſſemen alſo in the retire were taken, amongeſt whome William lord Keith, ſonne to the earle Marſhall of Scotland was the chiefeſt. But this victoꝛie was not atchiued without loſſe of diuerſe Engliſhmen. Amongeſt other one Pell, enſigne-bearer to ſir John Markhams band of ſotmen was ſlaine. Alſo maſter Edꝛington a capteine of light hoꝛſſemen was taken p̃iſoner by the lard of Edmonſton, at the firſt charge giuen vpon the Scotiſh hoꝛſſemen, and led awaie without reſcue. Beſide the manfull p̃oweſſe of ſir Henrie Perſie, and the other Engliſh capteins beforе mentioned, the foꝛward valiancie ſhewed that day of ſir William Bꝛereton, and Thomas Markham, that led his father ſir John Markehams band of ſotmen, alſo of Rafe Ellerkar a capteine of hoꝛſſemen, are not to be foꝛgotten, who with diuerſe other capteins & ſouldiers behaued themſelues in ſuch wiſe at that p̃reſent ſeruice, as their dealings therein deſerue ſpeciall memoꝛie.

Moꝛeouer, at an other time the Scots & Frenchmen entring into England, the Scotiſh hoꝛſſemen, to the number of a thouſand oꝛ thereabouts, paſſed foꝛth to burne and foꝛraie the countrie: but the earle of Noꝛthumberland, & his bꝛother ſir Henrie Perſie, aſſembled togither a power of hoꝛſſemen: and ſir Henrie Perſie mæting with them at Grendon, ſet vpon the Scots and chaſed them ouer the water of Twiſell, vnto the ſot battell of the Frenchmen: who retiring to the riuer of Twéed, paſſed ouer the ſame at Chapell Fourd, where they were aſſailed both by certeine ſot bands of the garriſon of Berwike, that were come foꝛth to aid the earle, and alſo by the hoꝛſſemen: ſo as diuerſe were dꝛowned in the riuer beforе they could get ouer.

The Scots put to flight at Grendon.

But after they were once got to the further ſide, they put themſelues in oꝛder of battell againe, and retired in a ſquadꝛon verie ſtronglie, ſuſteining little oꝛ no hurt at all, notwithſtanding that the erle of Noꝛthumberland (being then come) and his bꝛother ſir Henrie Perſie, with the reſt of the capteins and gentlemen of the countrie, purſued them ouer the water foꝛ the ſpace of two miles, ſkirmiſhing with them ſtill as they marched awaie, but could doo them no harme, becauſe they kept themſelues in ſo good oꝛder, & the Engliſh ſotmen were not able to reach them. Whereꝛpon the Engliſh hoꝛſſemen ſuffering the Frenchmen to depart, left them, and paſſing into the countrie, burnt long Ednam, and diuerſe other hamlets and villages, and ſo returned. Diuerſe Scots that day at the ouerthꝛow and chaſe of their hoꝛſſemen were taken p̃iſoners, as the loꝛd Greie, and oꝛhers.

And after this, the Engliſhmen wan the ſtrong pile of Cawmils, wherein were ſirtéene Frenchmen that defended it foꝛ the time verie ſtoutlie, ſo that it coſt the liues of diuerſe Engliſhmen, beforе they could take it. Shoꝛtlie after, there was a ſoꝛe ſkirmiſh at Halidon hill. Foꝛ whereas the moſt part of ſummer it was oꝛdeined, that euerie daie certeine bands of ſouldiers ſhould ward on the ſame hill, to giue libertie to the inhabitants of Berwike, to mow and carie in their haie; they continued foꝛ a time without anie trouble offered by the Scots oꝛ French, ſo that the warders ſtanding in no doubt of the enimies, vſed out of their armoꝛ to ſhoot, bowle, quait, & exerciſe ſuch like games of pleaſure. Whereof the Scots & Frenchmen being aduertiſed, came one day from Almouth in ſo ſecret wiſe, that they were dꝛawen verie nére to the Engliſhmen, yet they had anie warning of their apꝛoch.

A ſoꝛe ſkirmiſh vpon Halidon hill.

This apꝛoch as it was p̃riuie, ſo was it likewiſe ſudden, inſomuch that beforе they could be got into oꝛder, the Scots and Frenchmen were almoſt at their elbowes; and falling in ſkirmiſh with them, handled them verie roughlie: although ſir William Bꝛereton, ſir John Markeham, maiſter William Dꝛewꝛie, Cutbert Vaughan, and other the capteins of the Engliſhmen did behaue themſelues right manfullie, bꝛinging their men in oꝛder, incouraging them, and doing what apperteined vnto hardie and ſkilfull warꝛioꝛs. But yet thꝛee times that day the Scots and Frenchmen put them from the higth of the hill, till at length ſir James Croſt comming from Berwike, vſed ſuch diligence and policie in the matter, that the Scots and Frenchmen were repelled and conſtreined to retire, withdꝛawing backe into Almouth, after they had continued in ſkirmiſh from one of the clocke till it was paſt foure with no ſmall loſſe on both parts.

After this, the earle of Bothwell, lieng on the boꝛders as lieutenant, accoꝛding to the oꝛder foꝛ the time of his quarterage, entred on a day into England, and ſent his foꝛraie to burne Fenton towne, kéeping himſelfe in ambuſh at Haltwell Sweire. Sir Henrie Perſie aduertiſed that the Scots were thus entred, got togither a thouſand hoꝛſſe, and making foꝛth to defend the countrie, ſet vpon the earle at the afoꝛeſaid place of Haltwell Sweire; but ſome feare entring into the hearts of the Engliſhmen, by reaſon of certeine ſhot which the Scots had there with them, fled, and were purſued by the Scots ouer the water of Till. There were taken aboue ſix ſcoꝛe Engliſhmen, amongſt whom capteine Eringꝛton, and capteine Kar, that had the leading of light hoꝛſſemen, were two: beſide diuerſe other men of good account in ſeruice, as one Vaughan a gentleman and ſuch like.

The Engliſh men put to flight.

About this time, whileſt the loꝛd Eure commonlie called Euers, remained capteine of Berwike, one Kirkaudie couſine to ſir William Kirkaudie lard of Grange, chanced to be taken p̃iſoner into Berwike; and afterwerds being ranſomed, at his comming home to Almouth, he made repoꝛt that he had bẽne tꝛeatablie vſed, during the time that he remained p̃iſoner, at the hands of the ſaid loꝛd Eure. By reaſon wherof, vpon chalenge made by Grange to fight a combat with the loꝛd Eure, the matter grew to this iſſue; that where their degrées were not equall, Rafe Eure bꝛother to the loꝛd Eure vndertooke (in his bꝛothers behalfe) to bꝛeake a ſtaffe with the lard of Grange vpon the ſide of Halidon hill at a day appointed: where they met, either of them bꝛinging twelue gentlemen with them, to ſée the triall of this chalenge perfoꝛmed.

The lard of Grange chalẽgeth the loꝛd Eure.

But when they came to haue their armor & weapons viewed, the truth is so, that Grange was armed in a cote of plate, and a curace aloft vpon it: wherewith some fault was found, because maister Eure was clad onelie in a single cote of plate, without anie other peeces of armor for defense of his bodie. But yet such was the great courage of the said maister Eure, that he would not refuse the chalenge, notwithstanding his aduersaries aduantage of armor. Wherevpon they ran togither, and brake both their staues; and as it fortuned maister Eure was hurt in the flanke. The warre being thus pursued betwixt England and Scotland; beside the incounters and roads which are before mentioned, there were two great roads made into Scotland; the one by the earle of Westmerland, and the other by the earle of Northumberland: the lord Talbot being there, & hauing the leading of certeine demilances.

The lard of Grange and maister Rafe Eure ran one against another.

Moreouer, it was thought good by the Englishmen, not onelie to annoie the Scots by land, but also by sea. Wherevpon sir John Clere with certeine ships of warre sailed forth alongest the coast, till at length he arriued at the Iles of Orkeneie; where going on land about an enterprise, & staieng longer than was requisit, he was incountred by his aduersaries, and slaine with manie of his people, which were there on land with him. But though the Scots had good successe in that part, they sustained great damage on the west side of the realme, by a iournie which the erle of Suffer then lord deputie of Ireland attempted against them. For the better vnderstanding whereof ye shall note, that after the lord Clinton high admerall of England had burnt the towne of Conquest in Britaine, there were seuen ships of warre appointed to passe into Ireland, as the Marie Willoughbie, the New barke, the Sacret, the Gerfalcon, and three other that were merchants, and appointed that yeare to serue the quéene of England in hir warres.

Sir John Clere slaine in the Ile of Orkeneie.

There were also beside those seuen ships of war, two vittellers appointed to attend vpon them. Sir Thomas Cotton was ordeined their admerall, and one Southweke of Douer was assigned to be their viceadmerall. Now vpon their arriuall in Ireland, the earle of Suffer hauing also prepared three other ships, with sufficient and necessarie prouision for his iourneie, imbarked with so manie souldiers as conuenientlie might be bestowed aboord in that fléet, conteining twelue saile in the whole; and departing toward the west of Scotland, landed in a part of the countrie called Kentire, with as manie souldiers and mariners as might be spared out of the ships, leauing them furnished with competent numbers for their safegard; and being got to land, he passed forth into the countrie, & burnt two houses that belonged to James Maconell chiefe gouernor of those parts, & a great enimie to the Englishmen.

James Maconell.

He burnt also diuerse townes, villages, and hamlets belonging vnto the said Maconell, with great store of corne and other things which came in their waie. The Scots oftentimes skirmished with the Englishmen, but durst not aduenture to ioine with them in battell, they kept so good order by the earle of Suffer his politike and valiant conduction. There were a sort of Scots gotten into a boate meaning to haue fled, but being apprehended by the Englishmen, they were executed. Finallie, after the earle had remained there on land, in burning and spoiling the countrie for the space of three daies, he returned to his ships, and in safetie went aboord againe with his men: and making saile to the Ile of Arrane, entred the hauen called Amalasche, and landing at that place, burnt the countrie, and after went to Cumber, where he likewise burnt and harried that Ile.

The earle of Suffex burnt the Ile of Arrane.

This done, he meant to haue gone into two other Ilands, Ila and Jurete: but the winds grew so terrible with tempests and foule weather, that they lost one of their ships; and some of the rest were so rent & spoiled of their tackle and furniture, as they escaped in great hazard of being cast awaie also. There were six and twentie mariners drowned, the which perceiuing the ship to be in danger of sinking, fled into the boate, and so perished: the other that remained in the ship were saued, as maister Francis Randoll, and others. By reason therefore of such foule weather, the earle of Suffer was constreined to returne into Ireland, arriuing in Cragfergus, where he landed with his souldiers: and appointing the ships to returne into England, he passed by land vnto Dublin, spoiling the enimies countries by the waie, and taking from them a great preie and botie of cattell; notwithstanding the painfull passage that he had to make through the cumbersome waies, bogs, and woods, without reliefe of all necessarie things in that so troublesome a iournie.

Foule weather.

The earle of Suffex returneth into Ireland.

Thus far for those yeares warre in the daies of Marie quéene of England, betwixt the Englishmen and Scots: whereof sith I haue found none that hath written anie thing at all, I haue yet set downe these odnotes, as I haue learned the same of such as had good cause to know the truth thereof, being eie-witnesses themselues of such enterprises and exploits as chanced in the same warres; namelie capteine Read, capteine Wood, capteine Errington, capteine Gurleie, and capteine Markham; with others, which of their courtesie haue willinglie imparted to me the report of diuerse such things, as I wisht to be resolued in. Which accordinglie (so far as my remembrance hath serued) I haue here deliuered, to the end the same maie giue occasion to others (that maie happilie light vpon more full instructions) to impart to posteritie a more perfect discourse, where otherwise the matter might peraduenture wholie passe in forgetfulnesse.

And now to returne vnto the Scotish ambassadors that were sent into France, for the conclusion of the mariage betwixt their quéene & the Dolphin. After that the same mariage was consummat, and euerie thing ordered and brought to passe according to the effect of their commission; in the moneth of August they toke their leaue of the French king, the quéene, and nobilitie there, to returne homewards into Scotland: albeit few of them came home, for the bishop of Orkeneie departed this transitorie life in Diepe, the fiftéenth of September; the earle of Roths deceassed there the ninth of November; the earle of Cassils lord treasuror departed in the same place the fourtéenth of November; and the lord Fleming deceassed in Paris the eightéenth of December. And so onelie the archbishop of Glascow, the prior of saint Andrews, and the lard of Dun returned into Scotland in October. After whose comming, there was a parlement summoned by the quéene, to be holden in December next.

The ambassadors died almost all. Lesleus. lib. 10 pag. 538, 539.

[In August, Archembald Campbell erle of Argile, whose wit was singular in dispatch of the affaires aswell of peace as of warre, was made high iustice of Scotland; and in France was aduanced to the title of a knight of the order of saint Michaell. Few daies betweene these things departed this life the bishop of Brechin, and Andrew Durie bishop of Whitechurch. To the one did succéed the abbat of Couper, in place of the other came Alexander Gordon archbishop of Athens by the quénes benefit. ſather vnto him) had made abbat of Melroſſe and Kelſo died alſo this yeare. Whoſe monaſteries the quéene did forthwith giue vnto the cardinall Guiſe; long after which followed alſo the death of the abbat of Bamtorinoch. At this verie time manie prodigious ſights (which I will not here recite, being touched by Leſleus) did appeare by a marker of ſuch ominous things, whereof theſe verſes were made.

Portentum eſt miſerę gentis, quæ numine læſo
Diuiſis ſacris diuidet imperium.

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 542.

In September there was a parlement holden at Edenburgh, in which the acts of the former legats in France (about the mariage of the quæne of Scots to the Dolphin) were confirmed. At what time the Dolphin of France by his ambaſſadors did vehementlie requeſt, that the crowne (which they terme matrimoniall) ſhould be giuen vnto him by the decrée of the ſtates, whereby he might be called king of Scotland as long as the quéene liued. The quéene alſo iudging it a point of honor, to heape all title of glorie which ſhe could vpon hir huſband, as one that by a certeine inclination of mind did vertuouſlie fauor him; gaue in charge alſo to the ambaſſadors, that they ſhould earneſtlie follow the ſame cauſe amongeſt the Scots. And to the end to draw them the more eaſilie into hir opinion; ſhe drew the matter into certeine articles, deliuered to the ambaſſadors with more ample inſtructions touching the ſame: the ſumme of all which was this.

Firſt, diligentlie to beat into the Scots with what diſpoſition of mind the Dolphin was affected toward them, as well as his father, who held the Scots in that account as he did his owne people, and ſo alwaies would haue them: which good mind of the French towards the Scots to be plaine without anie diſſimulation, it maie well appeare as well by the couenants eſtabliſhed for the mariage, as alſo by the benefits which he hath not onelie beſtowed vpon the Scots and Scotland in generalitie, but alſo, in particularitie vpon certeine eſpeciall Scots of his owne frée will, almoſt without the requeſt of anie bodie. And that they ſhould alſo further laie abroad, what helpe the quæne and Scots haue had of the worthie cardinall of Lorraine, & the duke of Guiſe the quéenes vncle. All which the ambaſſadors themſelues (as they haue fullie proued) did well vnderſtand.

Secondlie, where the quéene doth thinke that ſhe is greatlie benefited with manie honors by ſo great a king, but eſpeciallie in this, that ſo mightie a prince hath taken hir into the fellowſhip of the holie bed; by which there can not anie other commoditie grow to the king than the reuenues of the kingdome which he hath purchaſed with his great charge and labor: and that the quéene conſidering all this (with great griefe of mind) doth ſéeke by what meanes ſhe might at leaſt erpreſſe ſome ſmall token of a thankefull mind for ſo manie benefits (becauſe if ſhe ſhould not doo ſome thing, no ſmall blot would ſéeme to be imputed to the quæne and the Scots) it came into hir mind to thinke by what meanes ſhe could requite ſome part therof, which ſhe could doo (as ſhe thought) if at the leaſt ſhe did but honor hir huſband with the kinglie title, & giue vnto him the mariage crowne of Scotland.

This thing therefore the quéene hir ſelfe doth earneſtlie deſire, and doth courteouſlie requeſt all the eſtates of Scotland, that the ſame maie be eſtabliſhed by the voices of the full parlement, and that they will command ſome three or foure of the chiefeſt nobilitie honorablie to carie the enſignes of the kingdome to him, that at the leaſt by this token of loue, the king & the beſt of the court maie well perceiue, with what reuerence and with what dutie they fauour the king hir huſband.

And to the end that this requeſt of the quæne, for the rareneſſe of the example, ſhould not breed anie doubt in the mind of the nobilitie, and to hold them as it were in ſuſpenſe, it was giuen in charge alſo to the ambaſſadors, that they ſhould in manner point with their finger, that manie ages paſt, the quéene of Naples did not onelie for loue ſhe did beare vnto him, adorne the duke of Anion hir huſband, with the bare name of a king; but did alſo by the conſent of the nobilitie, giue him rule and gouernement ouer the ſame kingdome. The like whereof was alſo done in our memorie by the quæne of Spaine to hir huſband the archduke of Auſtrich, & by the quæne of Nauarre to the duke of Vandoſme.

But if that the Scots be moued by the example of the Engliſh, who haue excluded Philip king of Spaine, that then the ambaſſadors ſhould eaſilie wipe awaie that doubt, if they admoniſh the Scots that the Engliſh are not tied to the Spaniards with that firme and néedfull band as the Scots are to the French, both which nations haue one priuilege, magiſtrats to gouerne, and one fellowſhip and participation of the adminiſtration of all the things in either kingdome. Wherevnto they muſt further adde that it was ſo far off, that the Engliſh ſhould reape anie fruit or commoditie by the Spaniards, that the king of Spaine himſelfe did (as it were) wring from the Engliſh all the commoditie he could, to performe his affaires out of the realme. And further, that the Engliſh being out of all hope for their quæne to haue anie iſſue by the ſame mariage, they would not grant vnto it, when there is a certeine and full hope left to the Scots, that iſſue may come of this marriage.

Beſides all this, let it be opened vnto the Scots, what great benefit maie redound vnto them by this ſigne of a thankefull mind. For it maie ſo happen, that if the king Dolphin ſhall féele himſelfe increaſed with this title of honor by the Scots, as a note of their good fauour to him, that he maie raiſe vp his father the king of France, that he will not by anie meanes permit the quéene of Scots his wife to be excluded from the kingdome of England, after the death of quéene Marie, who was not like to liue long being ſore troubled with the dropſie.

well fiſhed to catch a frog.

Not ſo likelie as that lies drop out of your pen.

Theſe things and manie others were giuen in charge to the ambaſſadors (comen out of France) to declare to the parlement of Scotland. Which being thus declared to the ſtates and the quéene regent, with might and maine ſéeking the furthering thereof; at length it was granted that he ſhould be king during the life of the quéene. For which cauſe Gilleſper Campbell earle of Argile, and James Steward, baſtard brother to the yoong quéene, being prior of S. Andrews, were named to erecute their conſent vnto the Dolphin, to declare him king, and to inueſt him with the ornaments thereto belonging, and further to ſhew the readie minds of the Scots toward him, not onlie in this but in all other things: by which anie honor or profit might anie waie riſe vnto him.

But whileſt theſe men doo prepare all things for ſuch a iournie, certeine factious perſons did beat into their eares, how beauie a iournie that would bee vnto them. For it would happen, that whileſt they were buſie in prouiding for ſmall things abrode, they ſhould by delaie corrupt, or by abſence cleane ouerturne matters of greater importance at home. For they did know how the ſubtill wit of James, and the great power and ſtrength of the earle of Argile would be milling in thoſe new things which were in hand amongſt theſe of the religion: for which they neuer left off intreating and perſuading, vntill they had wholie staied them from that iournie.

Buch.lib.10. During these affaires, Marie quéene of England died, and that worthie ladie Elizabeth succéeded in hir place. Immediatlie whereupon, the yong quéene of Scots bare hir selfe as heire to that kingdome, and caused all hir hangings, bedding, vessels, and other houshold stuffe to be stamped and marked with the title and armes of the kings of England. And although France were then miserablie afflicted in chalenging the dominion and gouernment of Millane, Naples, and Flanders; yet they would nœdes heape euill vpon euill, and adde thereunto the title of England, as being vnto them a verie scorne and mockerie (as Buchanan tearmeth it.) Neither did the wiser sort of the French looke into that matter: for the Guises, who at that time gouerned all things, did consent to this error of the Scotish quéene, because they would thereby séeme to haue gotten to themselues a singular honor in adding the title of England to the French name.

The regent hauing now gotten a consent (as before you haue heard) of the matrimoniall crowne to be bestowed vpon the husband of the yong quéene of Scots, began after a sort to put on a new mind: for by little and little she conuerted that old and accepted courtesie into commanding arrogancie; and the gentle answers wherewith she was wont to appease all parts, were turned contrarie. Which before she durst not do by reason of the present state, which then was such, as she feared not to promise what she would not haue to be performed, because she had not then obteind the grant of the matrimoniall crowne: but now hauing all things after hir owne mind, she vsed other conditions, and other spéeches. There was also a parlement appointed at Striueling in the first daies of Maie.

And because she was heard oftentimes to saie, that she would not suffer the maiestie of the chiefe gouernement to be cast downe from the seat thereof, but wold restore it to the former place. By which sayings manie were admonished of some troublesome tempest to follow. Whereupon diuerse came to intreat hir for the protestants, amongest which for the dignitie of his name, to make the matter to be more easilie obteined, there were sent Alexander Ennigame earle of Glencarne, and Hugh Campbell shiriffe of Aire, a worthie knight, before whom the regent could not refraine hirselfe, but burst forth into these words.

"These men (saith shee) sith they haue preached not verie sincerelie, shall be banished, though you and your ministers resist against it. And when they replied, beséeching hir that she would remember what she had often promised: she answered, that the performance of promise is to bée chalenged of princes, so farre as it séemeth commodious for them to performe it. Whereunto they replied, that they therefore renounced all dutie and obedience vnto hir, and did further forewarne hir of the great mischiefes that would flow out of this fountaine: with which answer shée being stroken more than shée looked for, said in the end, that she would both thinke on it and them.)

In assemblie of the cleargie. Fr.Thin. In Julie and August, there was a conuention of all the prelats and cleargie holden at Edenburgh, in the which certeine men & women of Edenburgh were accused of heresie, and abiured at the towne crosse with faggots on their backes: [whereupon (as saith Lesleus lib.10.pa.538.) were great tumults raised at Edenburgh, for the appealing whereof, the lord Seiton was made gouernor there.] In this assemblie it was required, that the common praiers might be read in the Scotish tong in churches, with certeine other articles of reformation, whereof the answer was deferred till March, in which moneth a prouinciall councell was appointed to be holden at Edenburgh. The second of March, the said prouinciall councell of all the prelats and clergie of Scotland began, wherein diuerse articles were proponed by the temporaltie; as to haue the praiers and administration of the sacraments in the Scotish language, the election of bishops and all beneficed men to passe by the voices of the temporall lords & people of their dioceses and parishes, with diuerse other reformations: all the which the bishops refused to grant, where through there arose shortlie after great trouble in Scotland.

Requests made by the laitie.

The quéene regent caused summons to be giuen to John Knor, John Wullocke, John Dowglas, and Paule Methane, to appeare at Striueling the tenth day of Maie: and for lacke of appearance they were denounced rebels, and put to the horne. Whervpon the said John Knor being in Perth, persuaded the maister of Lindseie, the lards of Tulibardin, Dun, Pettarrow, and diuerse other being there assembled, with the burgesses of the townes of saint Johns towne and Dundee, to pull downe the images and altars in all churches, and to suppresse the houses of friers, & other religious places. Who after a sermon made by him to that effect, the same tenth of Maie they began in saint Johns towne, and cast downe the abbeie of the Charterhouse, the Blacke and Carmelite friers, called the Tullelum [and so cleane, that (as saith Buchanan) within two daies there was left no signe thereof almost to be séene] and reformed all other churches thereabouts, breaking downe the images and altars in Fife, Angus, Mernis, and other parts there next adioining.

The quéene regent being aduertised thereof, sent for the duke of Chatelerault, and diuerse other of the nobilitie, as the earles of Atholl, Argile, Marshall, and others, who came with hir to Perth, otherwise called saint Johns towne, hauing with them two thousand Frenchmen [to whome also repaired (as saith Lesleus lib.10.pag.548) the archbishop of saint Andrew and Glascow, the bishops of Dunkeld, and Dunblane, James prior of saint Andrews, the abbat of Colwper and Dunfermeling, with manie other chiefe of the cleargie] who entered the towne vpon appointment of the lord Ruthen capteine thereof, and so receiuing it, gaue it in keeping to capteine James Steward, and capteine Cullane, with their bands of men of warre. In the meane time the erle of Argile, and the prior of saint Andrews, left the quœne in Perth, and went to saint Andrews, ioining themselues with the other, and made reformation of the churches, casting downe altars, images, houses of friers, and abbeies in that towne, and in Colwper, and other places thereabout: and assembling a great companie of countrie men, came to Londors, Balmeare, & Colwper, to make resistance against the Frenchmen that were in Falkeland with the quéene [come thither from Perth, after that she had left in Perth fiue hundred men vnder the charge of James Steward cardinall, & James Cullane.] But when they should haue met on Colwper more in battell, the duke of Chatelerault, the earle Marshall, and others, laboured betwixt them, so that the battell was staied, & the quœne with the Frenchmen returned vnto Edenburgh.

And to the end that nothing ſhould want to further hir, the king would ſhortlie ſend certeine noble men into Scotland, which ſhould counſell hir in theſe troubleſome affaires. Beſides which, he brought letters out of France from the king and the quæne, to the priор of ſaint Andrewes, in which they rather ſought to incline his mind by courteſie to obedience, before that they would inforce him therevnto by warre. Francis king of France to Iames priор of the monaſterie of ſaint Andrewes.

Leſleus lib. 11. pag. 554.

AFter that I vnderſtood by certeine letters, & by the common report of all (my coſine) that Scotland did flame in euerie part with tumults and ſeditions, it is ſtrange to ſée how greatlie I was aſtonied thereat. But when I heard that you (to whome my dead father, my déere wife, and my ſelfe, haue giuen ſo manie large benefits) ſhould be forgetfull of them all liberallie beſtowed, and become the author, head, and nouriſher of this fire of contention and bralles; I could not be perſuaded that you would ſo farre digreſſe from that office and dutie of pietie, which you haue alwaies made ſhew to beare vnto the quéene.

But if the thing were ſo, as the common fame doth report of you, I did verelie thinke that the promiſes and flattering words of others had intiſed you to this deceipt, onelie to take the fault vpon you; for whoſe whoſe cauſe (when they had diſcharged themſelues thereof) the offenſe would ſéeme to be either none, or verie ſmall, after that you had taken it vpon you. Which my opinion of you, if it be true, it ſhall be as ioifull to me, as that which ſhould be moſt ioifull: for by this meanes I wiſh that ſome part of my diſpleaſure (into which I would haue you thinke that you are woorthilie fallen) were quenched, in that you haue (as I heare) but onelie deceiued the good hope which we conceiued of your pietie towards God, and your faithfull ſeruice towards me.

Wherefore, ſith nothing is more déere or acceptable vnto me, than that (controuerſies appeaſed) all things without anie tumult maie be knit togither by the law of good order: and ſith the ſame (as it ſéemeth to me) maie beſt be done by your trauell, I do admoniſh you by theſe letters, and (for the good will I beare you) do earneſtlie requeſt you, that you will returne to your owne profit and fidelitie, from which you haue moſt ſhamefullie fallen, to the end that I maie by the ſame more plainlie vnderſtand that you carie an other mind than that which I can gather out of your ſolliſh doings, the which ſhall then fullie apéere to me, if at length you ſo bend all your force, that all things diſordered in thoſe parts, maie by your diligence be called backe to the commonwealths ancient, ſound, and holie forme of obedience, which you know is due to God and me.

Otherwiſe I would haue you be perſuaded that I will ſhortlie ſubdue you, and all thoſe which ſhall cleaue or miniſter helpe vnto you, in taking iuſt puniſhment vpon you, which I will bitterlie execute. The charge of declaration whereof, and the further large expreſſing of my mind, I haue committed to this bearer, whome I would haue you credit as much as my ſelfe. I praie God (coſine) to kéepe you in health. Paris the ſixtéenth kalends of Auguſt.

Marie queene of Scots, and Dowager of France, to James the prior of the monaſterie of ſaint Andrewes.

I can not (coſine) but greatlie wonder, that you which are not onelie néereſt to vs by bloud, but are alſo (as you know) greatlie benefited by vs with manie liberalities, ſhould be either of that malice or boldnes, that you would with one fault ouerthrow the maieſtie of God, and violate the authoritie of me and the king my huſband. For it is a thing woorthie of great admiration, to conſider how it might happen that you who being preſent, did open to me the names of the duke of Chatelerault, and of manie others, which ſéemed to you to diminiſh my authoritie, ſhould now being abſent (as a leader and head of all other ſeditious perſons) hurt my dignitie, and that in matters of greateſt weight, in which the honor of God is leſſened, and my authoritie clearelie taken awaie: all which I ſhould more eaſilie haue beléeued of anie other my ſubiects, than of you.

Trulie moſt grieuouſlie (as I ought) I beare this, that you haue falſified that faith to me, which had a ſpeciall hope of your fidelitie: though as yet I can ſcarſe be perſuaded to thinke you to be ſo farre from truth and reaſon, that you would be caried awaie into ſuch blind errors. All which I deſire to fall out to be as true, as true maie be, requeſting alſo of God ſo to giue to you his light, that returning into the right waie, you maie ſhew your ſelfe a good man, and obedient to our lawes, by doing contrarie things to that which you haue alreadie performed. Wherefore, by theſe letters I admoniſh, and with intreatie as earneſtlie as I can, deſire you to recompenſe your former euill with following good déeds, and that the anger (which I and the king my huſband haue bitterlie conceiued againſt you) maie by that meanes be pacified. Otherwiſe trulie I would haue you vnderſtand, we will execute ſuch puniſhment vpon you, that you ſhall for euer be mindfull thereof. The which doubtleſſe if you compell vs by your déedes to performe, it ſhall be to you a moſt grieuous thing. I praie God kéepe you from all danger. Paris the 9 kalends of Auguſt.

I can not ſée why Leſleus ſhould call hir Dowager, ſith by hir letter it appéareth hir huſband was yet liuing, in that ſhe talketh of hirs and hir huſbands diſpleaſure.

Subſcription: Your good coſine Marie.

James Steward the prior of ſaint Andrewes (whome proſperous ſucceſſes had before aduanced) did in reading theſe letters of the king and quéene ſo frie in anger and hatred, that he could not forbeare but muſt nédes returne anſwer, expreſſing the ſame (after confirmed by his déedes) though now ſomewhat ſmothed with good woords. The effect of which letters were in this ſort: That he was grieued in his mind as much as he might, becauſe he was ſo farre fallen into the miſlike and diſpleaſure of thoſe princes, whome he reuerenced with great dutie, that they ſhould bitterlie obiect vnto him in their letters that he was a ſeditious perſon, noted of ingratitude, fraught with malice, and defiled with hereſie.

Touching which notes of theſe wickednes, ſith they were imputed to him by the nobilitie of Scotland (meaning ſuch as ſtood againſt the reformed religion) he with faire ſpéeches requeſted the princes, that they would not attribute more to the malice of his enimies in accuſing him, than to his vprightnes in purging himſelfe: and that they ſhould not thinke anie thing to be ſpoken by his enimies, but that which ſauoured of malice, enuie, and hatred, eſpecialie ſith they did not onelie go about to diminiſh his fame abroad amongeſt the princes, but alſo at home did openlie laie wait for his life and liuing.

But he would ſo labor, that all men ſhould well perceiue his good mind (towards the princes) fullie laied abroad without anie veile of diſſimulation, whereby his aduerſaries ſhould be aſhamed to haue laied ſuch open reproch againſt him, and the king & quéene ſhould miſlike that they had ſo eaſilie credited his enimies. Wherefore he deſired that hereafter they ſhould rather beléeue anie thing of him, than that he would be noted for an vnthankefull man, as they had obiected vnto him. From the deteſtable ſpot whereof (being of all the verie worſt, ſith nature abhorreth the ſame) he would kéepe himſelfe, and rather die by anie kind of torment, than to ſuffer the leaſt ſpot of ſuch a vice to dwell in his name, eſpecialiie in the affaires of that king and quéene, whereof he had found the firſt moſt courteous, and the ſecond moſt bountifull.

And therefore, as he had with all dutie hitherto proſecuted their fauour, ſo he (would during his life) contend, that his trauell, diligence, and faith, ſhould neuer want in performing or defending their affaires, ſo that they would not burthen him with that which might be a detriment to the cauſe of God and religion: for if either of them were in hand, neither the fraudulent counſels of his ſtriuing aduerſaries, neither the bitter woords of the ſharpe threats of the king or quéene, ſhould make him leaue off, or repelle the

cc their woꝛthie foꝛce in taking vpon him the defenſe of thoſe things.

cc Wherefoꝛe he would not haue the king oꝛ quéene to thinke that their authoꝛitie is touched, when he laboꝛed to pull awaie the deuiſes of the papiſts. From cc which onelie thing (ſith he ſuppoſeth the honoꝛ of God, the gloꝛie of the king and quéene, and the helpe cc and health of his countrie to be conteined therein) he cc will not be withdꝛawne by the foꝛce of anie man, noꝛ cc be in quiet foꝛ all the threats of the king and quéene, vntill he haue wholie cut awaie the bꝛanches of ſuperſtition, and vtterlie pulled vp the roots thereof.

Crokes had ſcarſe perfoꝛmed his ambaſſage foꝛ which he came (as befoꝛe you haue heard) in deliuering theſe letters: but foꝛthwith alanded at Leith Dtauian a Frenchman, with foure troops of ſouldiers, with a great maſſe of monie, & other furniture needfull foꝛ the warres: whome after a few daies the regent ſent backe againe into France, to require of the king, that foure other companies of ſouldiers might be ſent ouer, which might with thoſe (alreadie now in Scotland) ſupplie the number of twentie enſignes: to whome alſo it were expedient to ioine a hundꝛed hoꝛſmen, which number ſhe affirmed would ſuffice to pacifie all the tumults in Scotland, ſo that foure ſhips well appointed might alwaies lie in the hauen of Leith, to watch the poꝛt. Of all which if the Scots were pꝛouided (by the benefit of the king) and that the comming of hir bꝛother the marqueſſe of Albuſe were haſtened, ſhe pꝛomiſed then to bꝛing all things to an end.

Beſides which, ſhe did alſo ſignifie vnto the king, that the Scots of the reformed religion, foꝛ the increaſe of their faction, had ſecretlie growen in league with ſome of the nobilitie of France, who did dailie ſend letters and meſſengers to the Scots, to incouꝛage them not to leaue off from their attempts; pꝛomiſing alſo vnto them that they would hinder (by all the meanes they could) that no great armie ſhould be made out of France againſt them: and moꝛeouer, in that the Scots had ſent ambaſſadoꝛs to Germanie, and into Denmarke, foꝛ religions cauſe, to requiꝛe aid from thence, but their chiefeſt and pꝛincipall hope did reſt (as ſaith Leſleus) in England.]

1559. During theſe things, the duke of Chatelerault and the loꝛds of the congregation ſent to the quéene (whereof we will ſpeake moꝛe hereafter) beſeeching hir to leaue off from making of foꝛts within the realme. But ſhe would not grant ſo to doo: wherefoꝛe they aſſembled their whole foꝛces in Edenburgh, and

Leith beſieged beſieged the towne of Leith in October: the quéene and Frenchmen, with the biſhops of ſaint Andꝛews, Glaſcow, Dunkeis, the loꝛd of Seton, and diuerſe other Scotiſhmen being within it. But the Frenchmen of warre iſſued foꝛth of Leith, and met néere to

The Scotiſhmen are vanquiſhed. the abbeie of Holie rood houſe, with the Scotiſh loꝛds and their companie, where manie Scotiſhmen were ſlaine, & the reſt chaſed into Edenburgh: the Frenchmen alſo following them vnto the gates of Edenburgh, had entred, if thoſe within the caſtell had not ſhot off the artillerie at them, to ſtaie the ſlaughter and purſute.

In the time of this ſiege, the yong lard of Lethington, ſecretarie to the quéene, being with hir in Leith, left the towne, & ſecretlie departing, got him to the loꝛds, and holpe greatlie afterwards to obteine aid out of England. After this, the quéene and

The quéene came to Edenburgh. Frenchmen came to Edenburgh, which was peaceablie rendꝛed to them, where they remained all that winter. About the ſame time, Nicholas Pelue the biſhop of Amiens, monſieur de la Bꝛoſſe, & two doctoꝛs of diuinitie, came to Scotland in September, and la Bꝛoſſe was made lieutenant of the French armie, monſieur Partigues coꝛonell of the footmen.

New men ſent into Scotland.

And with them came a great companie of French ſouldiers vnto the quéene regent, ſo that then the French power was thirtie fiue hundꝛed good men of warre, beſides two bands of Scotiſh ſouldiers, vnder the leading of capteine Anthonie Kenedie, and James Steward of Cardonald.

✻ The Frenchmen being thus entered France, twelue of the chiefeſt of the nobilitie were aſſembled at Edenburgh, of whome there was a day required of hearing to be giuen to la Bꝛoſſe, and to the biſhop, affirming that they were ſent thither as ambaſſadoꝛs. To whome it was anſwered, that they did not ſéeke peace (as they did diſſemble) but threaten war: foꝛ otherwiſe to what end were it to bꝛing armed ſoldiers to diſpute thereof? Foꝛ the Scots were not ſo ignoꝛant of the ſtate of things, that they would commit them ſelues to that deciding of matters, in which they might be compelled to accept conditions anſwerable to the mind of the aduerſarie. But if amongeſt weapons it pleaſed them to make peace, they would alſo pꝛouide, that they would not rather ſéeme to be dꝛawne thereunto by compulſion, than quietlie led by reaſon. Foꝛ if they did trulie & from their heart requiꝛe that in déed which they ſéeme in woꝛds, they would diſcharge thoſe ſtrange ſouldiers, and méet (as they haue often done in other places) vnarmed, as to a thing that by woꝛds and reaſon is to be decided, and not by ſwoꝛds the ſtrength to be compaſſed. And thus much foꝛ the ambaſſadoꝛs. Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 16.

Now you haue heard befoꝛe of the battell of Leith, the beſieging and the regaining of Edenburgh; touching which, becauſe it is omitted befoꝛe in the reciting of the things done in thoſe places, I thinke it not amiſſe (though it come a little out of courſe) to ſet it downe (as Buchanan hath placed the ſame) next after the ſpéeches vſed to thoſe ambaſſadoꝛs. Thus therefoꝛe he wꝛiteth touching the defenſe of Leith. Buchan. lib. 16.

Theſe noble men (meaning thoſe at Edenburgh) did wꝛite to the quéene much after this maner, That they did greatlie maruell, that the regent pꝛouoked with no iniuries, did ſo ſone depart from the foꝛmer couenants; and expelling the ancient inhabitants of Leith, and placing there a colonie of ſtrangers, ſhe would in that place build a caſtle to the deſtruction of the lawes and liberties of the realme, and to the danger of the liues of them all. Wherefoꝛe they did earneſtlie intreat hir, that ſhe would deſiſt from this thing raſhlie attempted (againſt the faith of hir pꝛomiſe, the publike commoditie, and the lawes and liberties of the kingdome) leaſt ſhe inforce them by neceſſitie to pꝛaie in aid of the whole people.

Beſides which alſo, they which were aſſembled at Edenburgh, did wꝛite to the ſame effect, about a moneth after that they had diſpatched the other letters, adding theſe petitions to the ſame laſt letters; That ouerthꝛowing the new foꝛtreſſes, ſhe would command all the ſtrangers and hired people to depart out of the towne, to the end that it might be fꝛée foꝛ all men (according to iuſtice) there to traffike and vſe their mutuall trade of buieng & ſelling one with an other. The which if ſhe refuſed to doo, they would take it foꝛ a ſure token, that ſhe ment to bꝛing this kingdome into ſeruitude; againſt which euill they would pꝛouide all whatſoeuer remedie that they could. Within thꝛée daies after, the quéene ſent Robert Foꝛman chiefe herald to anſwer the matter, with inſtructions and commandements deliuered to him in theſe woꝛds.

Firſt of all, you ſhall ſhew vnto them, that nothing could happen vnto vs moꝛe contrarie to our opinion, than that there ſhould be anie other hauing authoꝛitie here, beſides my daughter and hir huſband my ſonne in law, vpon whome all our authoꝛitie doth depend; that the foꝛmer acts of the nobili-tie,

"tie, and this present request, or rather commande-
"ment doth well declare, that they acknowledge no "other superioritie; and that their demands (or rather "threatnings) with what shew of words soeuer they be "cloked, are sufficientlie enough knowen vnto vs, as "no new things. Againe, you shall require of the duke "of Chastelerault, that he call to mind what he hath "promised to vs by his words, and to the king by his "letters. Which was, that he would not onelie hear-
"ken to the kings commandement; but also worke,
"that his sonne the earle of Arrane should not at all
"ioine with those tumults of the countrie, and whether "the things which he now doth, are the performance "of his promises.

"To their letters also you shall answer; that we
"haue openlie shewed our indeuor to bring things to "quiet; that we will grant to anie thing, which maie
"not resist the pietie due to God, and doth not fight "with their duetie towards their king and quéene, and "that I did neuer so much as once thinke of the ouer-
"throw of their lawes and libertie; and much lesse, so"much as dreame of conquering the kingdome by "violence. For to whome, or for whome should I séeke
"the kingdome, when my daughter doth alreadie
"possesse it? Touching the defense and fortifieng of "Leith, you shall aske them this; whether that we at "anie time haue attempted anie thing that waie, be"fore that they with manie assemblies, and at length
"with conspiracie among themselues, did openlie
"shew that they would shake off the lawfull gouerne-
"ment, and before that they at their pleasure troubled "the whole publike state (vnknowledge to vs, who "held the place and authoritie of the chiefest gouernor)
"strengthened their factions with strong cities, and "made league and couenants with our ancient emi-
"mies?

"And to omit other things, what cause can they (in
"the end) bring forth, whie it was lawfull for them to "reteine an armie at Edenburgh, to inuade the go-"uernors of those affaires? And that it is not lawfull "for vs at Leith for our owne defense and safetie, to "haue anie other gard about vs? Truelie they séeke
"this therin, that we should labor to shun their furie
"(as hitherto we haue done) by continuall and dailie "change of places. Is there anie thing in their let"ters that mentioned their dutie to the right magi"strate? Doth there lie open anie waie for the resto"ring of concord? Or do they shew anie token that "they would haue these seditions pacified, and that "they would all things should be reduced to their for"mer state?

"Let them cloke this with what colour they will of "publike commoditie; yet it is manifest that they "thinke and séeke nothing lesse. For if they had one-
"lie staied vpon a concord, we haue often shewed
"them a waie thereunto. Neither are they ignorant "that these French had (by the commandement of "their king) béene long before dispatched out of Scot"land, vnlesse their doings had béene the cause of "their staie. Wherefore, if they will yet now offer
"anie honest conditions which may induce vs to hope;
"and that (the maiestie of the gouernement alwaies
"saued sound) maie declare that they will modestlie
"and obedientlie obeie their superiors: we will re"fuse no means to restore a concord & quiet amongest
"them and vs, nor omit anie thing that maie tend to
"the publike commoditie.

"Neither are we alone so affected towards them,
"but also their king and quéene; who hath sent vnto
"them a worthie knight of the order of the scallop "shell, and one of the chiefe of the ecclesiasticall order,
"with letters and commandements touching the "same: whome they did so contemne, as that they "would not vouchsafe them answer, no not so much as hearing. Wherefore, you shall demand, and command the duke, the nobilitie, and all others of what condition soeuer, that they depart in sunder;
or otherwise, that they shall not be kept togither, vnlesse it be by strength of armes. To all this the next day, which was the three and twentith of October, the nobilitie answered after this order.

We easilie vnderstand by your letters and com-mandements sent by the herald, how obstinatlie you be euillie minded against pietie towards God, the publike commoditie of the realme, and the common libertie of vs all: all which things we must & do defend, as of right we ought. Wherefore, from henceforth we do suspend and forbid your gouerne-ment, in the name of the king and quéene, or by what other name or title you do vsurpe the publike administration of the kingdome; as persons certeinlie knowing, that those things which are now done by you, do with the mind of those princes fight against the publike safetie of this realme.

And as you do not esteéme vs lawfull subiects of those princes & of this kingdome, to make a publike senate or councell: so we do not acknowledge you for a regent to execute supreme authoritie; speciallie sith the gouernement (if you haue anie such committed vnto you by the princes) is for most iust & weigh-tie causes forbidden you: and that in the name of the same princes, whose councellors we are borne to be, chiefelie in matters which perteine to the safetie of all the people. And although we haue determined not to flæ anie danger, in deliuering of that towne, in which you haue placed strange and hired souldiers against vs: yet for the reuerence which we beare vnto you, as vnto our quéene mother; we earnestlie with all faithfull intreatie beséech you, that you depart from thence; whilest the cause of publike commoditie doth inforce vs to recouer that towne by weapons

Besides which, we further request, that you will leade them out of the towne with you, within foure and twentie houres; if there be anie which do challenge vnto themselues the names of ambassadors, either to decide controuersies, or to gouerne the affaires. For it is but equitie that we prouide for the safetie, and willinglie spare the bloud of all those hired souldiers, aswell for the ancient amitie which hath béene betwéene the French and the Scots, as for the mariage of our quéene with their king:
which friendship we would rather should be increased than diminished. The same day also, the said herald declared at his returne to the regent, that the day before it was persuaded in an assembled coun-cell of the nobles and the other commons; that all the déeds and saiengs of the regent did onelie tend to verie tyrannie.

Herevpon, there was a decrée made to take the gouernement from hir: so that the whole com-panie subscribed, as to a most iust matter: and that there they did forbid anie ambassage, giuen or sent to hir by hir sonne in law and hir daughter:
further, commanding hir to execute no gouerne-ment, vntill the generall assemblie of a parlement to be appointed by them in such place as they should thinke conuenient. The fiue and twentith daie, the lords of the religion sent an herald to Leith, to will all the Scots to depart the towne within foure and twentie houres, and to separat themselues from the subuerters of publike libertie. Thus much Buchanan of this done about the state of Leith, before the nobilitie besieged the same (as is before set downe.)
And so againe to the order of the historie.]

The lords of Scotland, perceiuing the Frenchmen increse, so that they by their owne forces onlie were not able to resist them, sent William Petellan̄ to Elizabeth the quæne of England for aſſiſtance, to expell the Frenchmen. Which the quæne of England granted, not onelie for to ſerue the Scotiſhmens turne; but ſpeciallie for the ſuertie of hir owne realme and ſtate, which as then was thought to ſtand in danger of trouble, in caſe the Frenchmen were ſuffered to remaine in Scotland: conſidering the euill dealing of the French king and his councell in ſome points alreadie ſhewed. The quæne of England therefore ſent the duke of Norffolke to Berwike, whither came to him the earle of Argile, the prior of ſaint Andrews, Harris the maiſter of Parwell, Robert Carnegie, and the yong lord of Lethington, ſecretarie, & made agreement to haue aid of England, to the effect aforeſaid.

They had their requeſt granted them. 560. Buch. 559. Leſle.

And for ſure keeping hereof, the Scotiſh lords deliuered pledges into England, there to remaine during the life of the king of France, and one yeare after his deceaſſe. The pledges were theſe: Dauid Hamilton, ſonne to the duke of Chatelerault; an other called Colme Campbell, couſine to the earle of Argile; Robert Dowglas, brother to the prior of S. Andrews; and the laird of Lochleuin, and a ſonne of the lord Ruthwen. About the ſame time, James Hamilton earle of Arrane, eldeſt ſonne to the duke of Chatelerault, and capteine of the Scotiſh companie of men of armes and archers in France, being fled for religion ſecretlie to Geneua, from thence came by the conuoie of maiſter Randall Engliſhman into England: which at his comming into Scotland he performed, and ioined himſelfe with the earle of Argile, and other lords in the cauſe aforeſaid.

Lord Hamilton taketh part with the earle of Argile.

The duke of Chatelerault, the earles of Argile, Arrane, and others, came to the towne of Glaſcow, and cauſed the images & altars to be taken downe, ſeizing the biſhops liuing into their hands, and tooke the caſtell of Glaſcow perteining to the biſhop, and put certeine gentlemen into it to keepe it. Whereof the Frenchmen being aduertiſed, marched forward to Glaſcow, to the number of fiue thouſand men: the biſhop of Glaſcow, the lords Sempill, Setton, Ros, and diuerſe others with them, tooke the caſtell againe, and ſtaieng one night of the towne, returned on the next morrow to Kirkintulloch, and from thence to Liſhquo and Edenburgh.

The towne of Glaſcow is taken.

After their returne from Glaſcow, a certeine number of Frenchmen went to Striueling, and paſſing by the bridge ouer the water of Firth, came into Fife, in purpoſe to haue gone vnto ſaint Andrews, and to haue fortified the towne. But they being in Kingcorne, there aſſembled togither in Fife the earles of Arrane, and Rothes, the prior of ſaint Andrews, the lord Ruthwen, the maſter of Lindſie, and diuerſe other, hauing with them no great number: but yet they dailie ſkirmiſhed with the Frenchmen, and would not ſuffer them to come from the ſea ſide; where diuerſe Frenchmen were ſlaine, and one of their capteins, with thirtie of his ſouldiors, and few Scotiſhmen, or in maner none: except that the earle of Southerland, who chanced to be with them at the pricking, was ſore hurt and maimed in the arme with the dredge of a caleeuer ſhot.

Certeine Frenchmen ſlaine.

As the Frenchmen were in their progreſſe, at the mouth of the water of Leuin in Fife, there arriued in their ſight a nauie of ſhips: which at the firſt kenning they tooke to be French ſhips, but ſhortlie after perceiuing them to be the Engliſh nauie, they returned with great diligence to Burnt Iland, where they paſſed the ferrie of Kingcorne in botes and craiers to Leith, and inſtantlie began to fortifie that towne, caſting great trenches about it, and making great blockehouſes for their defenſe, as preuenting ſuch perils as otherwiſe might haue befallen them, and

✻ In the meane time, whileſt thoſe of the religion had almoſt deſtroied all monaſteries, certeine barons of Perne, partlie for hatred to the catholike religion (as the Romiſh cleargie tearmeth it) and partlie blinded with deſire of preie (as in all aſſemblies of battell there will be ſome) ouerthrew the monaſterie of the Carmelite friers in Aberden. Who going about alſo to haue ſpoiled the monaſteries of the Trinitie, and of the friers Minors, were hindered thereof by the lord Leſle; and the baron of Buchquhane, at the commandement of the earle of Huntleie. Notwithſtanding which, they could not be ſo ſufficientlie repreſſed, but that they went to old Aberden (for ſo they call that place in that towne, which is beautified with the biſhops palace, the canonrie, and the vniuerſitie) and would haue aſſaulted the magnificent and ſtatelie church thereof. But to keepe them from the ſame, the biſhop, & John Leſle (the officiall of that place, the one by counſell, the other by preaching, and both by the aid of the earle of Huntleie) did their indeuor, at what time the Leſlées put them beſides their purpoſe.]

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 563. 1560. Fr. Thin.

This Leſle is now called biſhop of Ros and compiled an hiſtorie of Scotland in Latine, printed at Rome.

The quæne regent hearing of the arriuall of the Engliſh, ſent vnto the viceadmerall of that fleet, named maiſter Winter, requiring to know of him, for what cauſe he was come into thoſe waters. This gentleman addreſſing himſelfe to accompliſh the commandement impoſed and laid vpon him, came face to face to the ſaid viceadmerall, and with countenance, wherein appeared tokens of inward courage, put forth his demand as he was inioined. The viceadmerall anſwered, that he had beene abroad on the ſeas ſeeking after pirats, and in caſe anie of them came thither, he was arriued there in the Forth to wait on them: where as the principall cauſe in deed was to impeach, that no Frenchman ſhould land there, in caſe anie came forth of France, and alſo to keepe them that late in Inſkith from vittels, and that no Frenchman ſhould paſſe by ſea forth of Leith.

✻ Whereupon the quæne regent did ſend Noualle the king of Frances orator in that realme, to requeſt the queene of England, that ſhe would call hir ſhips home againe, and that ſhe would not ſend aiding ſouldiers to the lords of the religion (whome Leſleus neuer tearmeth by anie other name than ſectaries and ſeditious perſons) whereby the peace might be broken with the French, and ſo occaſion of warre giuen. Whereunto hir maieſtie anſwered (with no leſſe care of hir kingdome than became the maieſtie of ſo good a mother to haue of hir children) that ſhe had no ſuch mind as to make warre. But becauſe that ſhe certeinlie vnderſtood, that great troops of Frenchmen did dailie land and increaſe in Scotland, for what cauſe ſhe knew not: ſhe could doo no leſſe than place ſouldiers in diuerſe forts and hauens, which might defend the Engliſh from the malice or hurt of ſuch ſtrangers, if they ſhould attempt anie thing. Neither would ſhe ſuffer that hir people ſhould ſet foot in Scotland, vnleſſe that they were prouoked thereunto by iniuries offered them.]

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 564. Fr. Thin.

About the ſame time, the quæne regent, hearing that the duke of Norffolke was come to Newcaſtle as generall lieutenant of the north, ſent an herald with a letter to him, in which letter it was ſignified that the herald had credit to declare further matter than was conteined in the ſame letter. But when hee was demanded what he had to ſay, he denied to haue anie credit at all. Wherfore William Flower, then Cheſter herald, and now Norreie king of armes, was was ſent vnto the quæne, who comming to Holie rod houſe néere to Edenburgh, was receiued by ſundrie heralds, & ſo was had to one of their houſes, and there kept for that night. The next day after hæ had dined, he was brought to the court, and at his entering within the gates, there were a number of harquebuſſiers readie with their péeces that diſcharged and ſhot off the ſame.

At his comming to the preſence of the quéene, he with dutifull obeiſance deliuered his letters, and after the ſame had béene read, he was demanded what credit he had to vtter. Whereupon he declared, that the duke of Norffolke, being the quéenes maieſties lieutenant in the north parts of England, maruelled greatlie that ſhe would ſend an herald with letters, and write therein how ſhe had giuen credit to him; and yet when he was demanded to vtter his credit, he ſhould confeſſe that he had none. The quéene herewith called for the herald, to vnderſtand whether he had credit or not: who denied to haue anie at all. Wherwith the quæne ſéemed to be ſomwhat abaſhed, but neuertheleſſe ſhe brake forth and ſaid, that ſhe maruelled greatlie that the quæne of England ſhould ſend hir ſhips into hir riuer, without giuing hir knowledge aforehand.

Cheſter anſwered thereto, that where it was certeinlie knowne, that the French king had prepared to ſend a power of men of warre into Scotland, without aduertiſing hir thereof; ſhe could not but thinke that dealing verie ſtrange, and therefore had in verie déed ſent certeine of hir ſhips, with vittels for proviſion to be laid within hir townes and caſtels on the frontiers. Which ſhips by tempeſt being diſperſed, might hapilie be driuen into the riuer there, albeit he had not ſpoke with anie of them ſince there comming forth. But yet (as he had heard by others) they had béene verie vncourteouſlie vſed: for comming in after that maner for ſuccor, the canon had béene bent againſt them. Herewithall the count Martigues ſtanding by, began to ſpeake verie ſtout words vnto Cheſter, alleging that where it was perceiued well inough, that the quæne of England ment to make war againſt his maiſter the French king, he truſted ſhe ſhould gaine as little thereby, as his ſiſter had done in breaking with hir father Henrie the late French king. Cheſter hereunto anſwered, that he thought to haue found but one regent in Scotland, to whome he ſhould néed to make anſwer: whereupon Martigues was commanded to ſilence.

Martigues a forward captein, but an vntrue prophet.

All this while the quæne had talked with Cheſter in the Scotiſh tong. And bicauſe he did not ſo well vnderſtand hir, he began to ſpeake in the French language: whereat the quéene ſéemed greatlie to reioiſe, & ſo began againe to diſcourſe with him of hir griefs; and he on the other part made hir anſwer as fell beſt to purpoſe. And at length, when he was demanded what further credit he had; he declared, that where ſhe had requeſted a ſafe conduct for monſieur le Broſſe to paſſe through England into France, if ſhe would ſée him ſafelie conueied to Berwike, he durſt aſſure hir of a ſufficient ſafe conduct for his ſafe paſſage through the quéene his miſtreſſe realme: but at length, there was another gentleman commended to him, in lieu for la Broſſe, that was his couſine. And now when Cheſter ſhuld take his leaue, he declared that he had not bæne courteouſlie dealt with: for ſince his comming thither, he could not be ſuffered to paſſe anie where abroad out of his chamber, but at meale times. And therefore if anie of hir meſſengers ſhould come into the quéene his miſtreſſe dominions, he would procure (if he might) that they ſhould taſt of the like interteinment. But the quæne ſeemed not to vnderſtand that he had bin in anie wiſe ſo hardlie dealt with, ſhewing that ſhé was not well contented therewith; and ſo Cheſter toke his leaue, and returned backe into England, without anie reward for his paines taken in that iournie, at the hands of the Scotiſh quéene: how ſo euer ſhe liked of his meſſage.

An Engliſh armie. Leſleus lib. 10 pag. 565.

In the meane time, there was an armie prepared in England, of ſeuen or eight thouſand men, who were ſent into Scotland; the lord Greie of England being appointed generall, who came to the linkes, beſide the towne of Leith, on ſaturday the firſt of Aprill. Before they pitcht downe their field on the ſaid linkes, monſieur Martigues, coronell of the French armie, iſſued forth of Leith with nine hundred harquebuſſiers of Frenchmen, to a little knoll called the Halke hill, where a ſore, continuall, and hot ſkirmiſh was begun betwixt the Engliſhmen and Frenchmen, with hagbuts, caléeuers, and piſtolets, which ſkirmiſh continued fiue or ſix houres, in the which there were manie ſlaine on both parties, and diuerſe hurt. At length Martigues was forced with his companie to retire backe to the towne of Leith, and the Engliſhmen pitched downe their campe, and planted their ordinance beſide the ſaid hill.

They were backed with 500 pikes which kept aloofe.

The lord Greie ſent vnto the quéene.

The lord Greie being in Muſkelburgh, ſent to the quéene regent, that laie as then in the caſtell at Edenburgh, deſiring an abſtinence of warre for foure and twentie hours, that in the meane time he might ſend ſome of his councell to declare to hir the cauſe of his comming with that armie, and to commune of ſuch things as might ſtanch the ſhedding of blood. The quæne granted hereunto, and ſent an herald to Leith, to cauſe the ſaid aſſurance to be taken: but yer he came to the towne, the ſkirmiſh aforeſaid was begun with forwardneſſe inough of both ſides.

Men are ſent to ſpeake with the quæne mother.

In this meane time, the lord Greie ſent ſir George Howard, and ſir James Croſts to the caſtell of Edenburgh, to ſpeake with the quéene to that effect: who had long conference with hir vpon the blockehouſe at the vtter gate of the caſtell, during the time of the ſkirmiſh; where they declared, that the occaſion of the comming of the armie, was for the cauſe aboue mentioned, deſiring the quæne to procure the Frenchmen to depart the realme of Scotland: and they promiſed in that caſe to returne againe into their owne realme, and neither to diſquiet Frenchmen nor Scots. Wherupon the quéene toke time to be aduiſed till the next day, that ſhe might conſult with the principall perſonages within the towne of Leith, requiring that it might be lawfull for hir to ſend to them to that effect, which was granted.

The French men to depart the realme.

The next day ſhe ſent one Drummond a trumpetter, or herald (as ſaith Leſleus) with a letter to monſieur de la Broſſe, to the effect aforeſaid, directing him to paſſe to the Engliſh campe, and to get a guide with him to go to the towne of Leith, as was agreed: and there was one appointed to go with him. But immediatly after his departing from the Engliſh campe, he was ſuddenlie called backe againe, and his letters taken from him, was commanded to repaire to the caſtell of Edenburgh to the quæne, and to declare to hir that they would not haue anie talke, but would be reuenged on the Frenchmen, for the ſlaughter of their men the night before. Thus the parlée ceaſſing, the ſiege was inforced with right ſharpe purſute, and ſtrong defending on either part.

The Engliſh are deſirous to reuenge the iniuries done vnto them.

The Engliſhmen caſt trenches vpon the ſouth-eaſt ſide of the towne, and raiſed a litle mount which they called mount Pellam after the capteins name, and placed their ordinance aloft thereon: but bicauſe it was ſo farre from the towne, they did not ſo much ſcath thereto as they intended. The lord Greie, lieutenant of the Engliſh armie, lodged (during this ſiege) ſiege) within the towne of Leſſalrike, in the deanes houſe, and the moſt part of their demilances and other horſſemen laie in the ſame towne. The footmen with their capteins lodged in hales, tents, and pauilions, vpon the ſouth and ſoutheaſt ſide of the towne of Leith, and diuerſe Scotiſh lords incamped with them in the fields, as the earles of Argile, Arrane, Horton, and Glencarne; the lords Boid, Ogiltree, the prior of ſaint Andrews, the maiſter of Marwell, and others. The duke of Chatelerault, and diuerſe with him remained in Holie rod houſe: and with the quæne in the caſtell, the biſhop of S. Andrews, the biſhop of Dunkeld, the earle Marſhall, the lord Erſkin capteine of the caſtell, maiſter James Macgill clearke of the regiſter, the prouoſt of Dunglas, called maiſter Abraham Chreichton, and diuerſe others.

On Eaſter æuen, capteine Wood, and capteine Dethicke, ſeruing on the ſea vnder maiſter Winter the Engliſh admerall there, were appointed by him to paſſe vp the riuer to Blackeneſſe, who with their bands going aboord into a barke prepared for that purpoſe, ſailed forward: and on Eaſter day in the morning, preſenting themſelues before the caſtell, it was yeelded to them by certeine Frenchmen that were within, and thereupon it was deliuered to the keeping of James Hamilton, an ancient gentleman; and capteine Wood, being ſet on ſhore, came to the campe before Leith by land. On blacke Monday, the Frenchmen, iſſuing forth of Leith, ſet vpon the Engliſhmen in their trenches, and did much harme: as in the Engliſh hiſtorie it further appeareth. During the ſiege thus afore Leith, the quæne regent was ſore vexed with ſickeneſſe, but neuertheleſſe, ſhe continued to labor for agreement, not ceaſſing to ſend to the lords for to haue the matter taken vp. And for the better accompliſhing of hir deſire, ſhe procured the earle of Huntleie to come forth of the north, who toke vp his lodging in Edenburgh, and toke great paines to treat betwixt the quæne and lords for ſome agreement: but when he perceiued his trauell to be in vaine, hee returned into the north againe, and left the ſiege lieng ſtill as hee found it.

In this meane while, the Engliſhmen, lodging on the ſouthſide of the towne beſide mount Pellam, battered with their great artillerie at the pariſh church of Leith, and at ſaint Anthonies ſteeple, in which the Frenchmen had laid certeine peeces of artillerie, and at length beat it downe: but perceiuing they could not do anie great hurt to the walles on that ſide, they caſt new trenches vpon the ſouth and ſouthweſt ſide of the towne, and raiſed a mount there, naming it mount Summerſet, & placed thereon certeine peeces in batterie, and ſo beat the wals, that a great part thereof was ouerthrowne, and a breach made. Whereupon the Engliſhmen & Scots on a morning came with their ladders, and preſenting themſelues to the aſſault, found the breach nothing reaſonable; ſo that although they egerlie preaſſed forward to enter the towne, yet they were fiercelie beaten backe with great ſlaughter and bloudſhed on both parts, but namelie of the aſſailants.

The Engliſhmen, perceiuing that they were too raſh in aſſaulting the towne, being not aſſaultable, deuiſed other ſhifts to obteine their purpoſe, raiſing an other mount of earth on the weſt ſide of the water of Leith, and named it mount Falcon. Aloft on this mount, when it was brought vp vnto a great height, they planted their great artillerie, which continuallie beat into the towne, ſore annoieng them within, but ſpeciallie beating the houſes and places by the ſhore ſide, ſo that none might go vp nor downe the towne on that part, without danger to be ſlaine with ſhot from that mount. The Frenchmen, during the time of the ſiege, manie times iſſued forth towards the ſands, and ſometimes towards the trenches, ſo that ſundrie ſore ſkirmiſhes chanced betwixt the Engliſhmen and them, with the ſlaughter of diuerſe, both of the one part and the other. Amongeſt other of them within, there were ſlaine two Scotiſh men of name, to wit, capteine Benedie, and yong Henrie Drummond: and of them without, there was ſlaine a Scotiſh gentleman, called the lard of Cleiſch.

The Engliſh armie was throughlie furniſhed with vittels forth of all parts of the realme, and that vpon reaſonable prices: but the French within the towne could get none, more than they had prouided before the comming of the Engliſh armie, which when it began to faile them, they were conſtreined to eat their owne horſſes, whoſe fleſh ſeemed to them in that neceſſitie more delicious, than before that time anie maner of veniſon. Thoſe within Inſkeith alſo were in great neceſſitie of vittels: but yet neither they within the one place, nor they within the other, would render their ſtrength, looking ſtill for aid forth of France. ✠ Whileſt theſe things were done in Scotland, the French king, to ſhew how he fauoured the pope, and how farre he maligned the reformed lords of Scotland, ſent his ambaſſadors Iohn Babone a Burdeleie knight, and that eloquent man Anthonie Muret of France to pope Pius the fourth of that name, to yeeld all the dominions of France & Scotland at the popes commandement.

In the meane time, the quæne regent, perceiuing hir ſickneſſe ſo to increaſe, that ſhe looked for preſent death, ſent for the duke of Chatelerault, and all the lords of Scotland that were in the towne of Edenburgh, and in the campe: who came vnto hir altogither into the caſtell of Edenburgh, where ſhe made vnto them a graue and pithie exhortation, perſuading them to vnitie and concord with their ancient friends of France; and now more ſtedfaſt to them than at anie time before, by reaſon of the mariage of the quæne their good ſouereigne, with the king of France. And herewith ſhe brake out into certeine words, to diſſuade them from the amitie contracted with the Engliſhmen, declaring that the Engliſhmen aided them not for anie other reſpect, than for their owne turne and commoditie. Moreouer, for hir owne part ſhe ſaid, that ſhe fauoured the weale of the realme of Scotland, as much as France; conſidering ſhe had the honor to be quæne and regent thereof, and hir daughter heritable quæne of the ſame.

Furthermore ſhe ſaid, that if ſhe had attempted anie thing that ſeemed or appeered to the noble men contrarie thereunto; the ſame came to paſſe rather for lacke of wiſedome and iudgement, than for want of anie good will: and if it pleaſed God to prolong hir daies, ſhe would be glad to amend that had beene done amiſſe: and if he called hir to his mercie, ſhe praied them moſt hartilie to acknowledge their dutie vnto the quæne their ſouereigne, and to maintaine their ancient amitie with the king and realme of France, & to make ſome good accord with the French that were within the towne of Leith, who would gladlie accept the ſame, to the end that as well they as the Engliſhmen ſhould depart this realme. For ſhe feared greatlie (as ſhe ſaid) leaſt if the Frenchmen departed, the Engliſhmen would ſtill remaine, and ſubdue the land to their obedience: and therefore ſhe beſought all good Scotiſhmen to haue reſpect to the libertie and weale of their countrie.

After ſhe had talked thus a good while with manie teares, ſhe deſired the lords to forgiue hir in anie thing wherein ſhe had offended anie of them, during the time of hir being in Scotland, which they gladlie seemed to do: and on the other part, she forgaue them with all hir hart (as it appeered) all offenses which they had committed against hir: and thus diuerse of them weeping, she tooke euerie of them by the hand, and so they taking leaue of hir, departed, and returned into Edenburgh, and to their campe. Whilest the siege thus laie before the towne of Leith, diuerse great troubles rose in sundrie parts of the realme, and spectallie betwixt the earle of Huntleie, and the earle of Atholl, so that there was taking of prisoners, and ouerthrowing of houses on either part, and great preparation made, and armies put in a readinesse to inuade either others countries.

The quéene taketh hir leaue.

The earle of Huntleie and Atholl are at variance.

But this businesse was pacified by the trauell and good mediation of maister Alexander Gordon, then postulat of Gallowaie, maister John Lesle officiall of Aberden, and William Lesle the yoong lard of Buchquhan, who agreed them for all matters in controuersie, & caused them to go to either others house.

The matter is pacified.

[During which siege of Leith also, the earle Bothwell, and Sarlalouse, then capteine of the souldiers, and gouernor of the castell of Dunbar, did at Dunbar with manie light excursions intercept manie of the English and Scots going to Leith, whome they ransomed for a great summe.]

Fr. Thin. Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 571.

At the same time, one maister Donald Fraser, archdeacon of Rosse, tooke the bishops castell of the canonrie of Rosse, and kept the same against maister Henrie Sincler, then bishop there, and the chiefest men of authoritie in that dioceese, as Wachenzée, Balnagoun, Foulis, and the shiriffe Tramercie, who assembled about the same, and besieged the castell, where great force was vsed, both by them without to win it, and of them within to defend it. The bishop being then resident in Cromercie castell, hearing that the house wold not be gotten without great slaughter, thought it against his conscience, his profit, and honor, to win it in that manner: and therefore sending for maister John Lesle, officiall of Aberden, and maister Alexander Dunbar, subchantor of Murreie, by their labour and diligent treating in the matter, the bishop by reasonable apointment recouered his castell of them that held it against him.

The castell was restored againe.

The French king, vnderstanding in what distresse his men remained that were besieged within Leith, and perceiuing himselfe not able to send an armie to succour them within the time that their necessitie required, thought good to trie if the matter might be taken vp: and to that effect sent two ambassadors, the earle of Randon, and monsieur Monluc bishop of Valence, who declared to the quénes maiestie of England, the cause of their comming; which was, to desire hir to retire hir armie forth of Scotland, vpon some such reasonable conditions as might be agreed vpon. And herewith they declared that they were sent to the quéene, and not vnto the subiects of Scotland: for it was not meet that the king should send to his owne subiects (as they were by the mariage of their quéene) to require peace, or to condition with them for agreement.

Monsieur Monluc bishop of Valence.

The quénes maiestie of England therefore sent sir William Cecill knight, hir principall secretarie, and doctor Wotton deane of Canturburie and of Yorke, one of the priuie councell, with the French ambassadors into Scotland. Whilest they were yet vpon their iournie, the quéene regent (whome they thought to haue found aliue, and to haue vsed hir helpe as an instrument to haue furthered the treatie to some good end) consumed partlie through melancholie, thought, and grieuous displeasure, and partlie with long and incurable sicknesse, departed this life in the castell of Edenburgh the tenth of June, in the yeere of our Lord 1560. ✻ Hir bodie was first conueied into France, to the monasterie of Feschampe, which is in Normandie, from whence it was caried to the abbeie of S. Peter at Rhemes in Champaigne (whereof hir sister was then abbesse) in which it was after most honorablie buried.] She was a wise and verie prudent princesse, and in hir time had learned good experience of the nature and inclination of the nobilitie and people of Scotland.

The praise the quéene Dowager.

During the time that she was regent, she kept good iustice, and was well obeied in all parts of the realme in Orkeneie, and the westerne Iles. And if she had to hir owne experience ioined the councell of the nobles and wise men of the realme of Scotland, without following the aduise of strangers, there had béene neuer question nor debate betwixt hir and the nobilitie, as some deemed. But because that others, and namelie, monsieur Doisell, and Rubé, were adioined to hir by the estates of Scotland, who dailie pressed hir to deuise new alterations of lawes, impositions, tarations, and such things as were not in vse in Scotland: therefore the estates and people of the land did grudge, although not for anie misliking they had of hir, who suerlie deceassed, to the great griefe and lamentation of the whole number of the estates and people of the realme.

The death of that noble princesse made the French men within Leith, and also the ambassadors more discouraged than otherwise they would haue béene. But neuertheless these foure ambassadors of England and France comming to Edenburgh, entered in conference among themselues, vpon articles proponed as well for releise of the Scotishmen, as for the weale and suertie of the quéene of England and hir subiects. Wherevpon certeine lords of Scotland were admitted to talke with them also: and after long treatie, a peace was concluded the tenth of Julie, in the yeere of God 1560, with certeine articles touching as well Scots and French, as Englishmen. Buch. lib. 17.

Amongſt whom there had béene great diſputation touching the quéene of Scotlands returning into hir owne realme, wherevnto hir vncles were verie willing; although ſome did ſéeme to ſtaie the iournie, whoſe ſpéeches tended to this effect as followeth.

“ That the iournie was dangerous, eſpectallie be“ cauſe the quéene of England did not greatlie fauoꝛ it; then that ſhe ſhould come to men by nature bar“ barous & ſeditious, which would not eaſilie obeie the gouernement of a man. Whereof ſhe had freſh examples befoꝛe hir eies, of hir father, and of hir mother, whome (when they either could not oꝛ durſt openlie oppꝛeſſe) they foꝛced to a deſperation of things with their manie deuiſes, ſith they daillie liued by them in danger of honoꝛ oꝛ of life.

On the contrarie part, they which would haue the Dowager of France returne to hir naturall countrie, and were ſkilfull of the affaires of Scotland, did allege that thoſe ſeditions were rather occaſioned by the default of the kings & gouernoꝛs, than of the ſubiects; whilſt they ſtriued to reduce that kingdome (which from the beginning had alwaies béene fꝛæ) to infinit bondage, and to the fꝛée power of the lawes: which that nation (being moꝛe warlike than welthie) could not indure. When contrarilie, they did not onelie defend all their gouernoꝛs (which did not attempt the ouerthꝛow of their liberties) from the outward enimie, and from the inward tumults of the people: but they alſo made them (thꝛough loue and dutie towards their kings) inuincible ouer their enimies, and famous amongeſt ſtrange nations.

And that the chiefeſt meane at this time to pacifie all thoſe troubles in Scotland, was not to make alteration of anie thing in Scotland, from the ſtate wherein euen now it ſtandeth. Where vpon ſhe reſolued to come ſpédilie into Scotland, whereof moꝛe ſhall be ſaid hereafter; vntill which, we will intreat of other matters done in Scotland. The quéene of Scots hauing hir mind ſtill ſetled vpon hir returne into Scotland; Noalius a ſenatoꝛ of Burdeaux landed befoꝛe this in Scotland (whither he was ſent) a little after the end of the publike parlement, foꝛ which cauſe he was ſtaied and turned ouer to the next aſſemblie of parlement, which was appointed the twelfe kalends of June.

But when at that time alſo the nobilitie aſſembled did not ſit in councell, becauſe they were yet vncerteine of the quéenes mind; in the meane time James Steward returned out of France, and bꝛought with him a commiſſion, which gaue them authoꝛitie to hold a parlement, therein to treat and conclude of matters touching the common-wealth. Wherevpon in the end there was audience giuen to the ambaſſadoꝛ, the effect of whoſe legacie was, to renew the old league with France, to vndo the league with England, and that pꝛieſts ſhould be reſtoꝛed to their liuings, out of which they had béene thꝛuſt by violence.

To theſe things it was anſwered, that concerning the league of France, they were not anie waie guiltie of the bꝛeach thereof; and contrarilie that the French had manifoldlie neglected the ſame; but ſpeciallie of late, in ſéeking the authoꝛitie of their publike libertie, in that they would haue bꝛought the people (their friends and giltles of anie euill) vnto miſerable ſeruitude. Foꝛ the league with England, they could not by anie meanes diſſolue that, except they ſhould be counted moſt vnthankefull, recompenſe ſo great a benefit with great wickednes, & conſpire againſt the defendoꝛs of their liberties. And as touching reſtitution foꝛ ſuch as they called pꝛieſts, they did acknowlege that they had not anie office, vſe, oꝛ authoꝛitie in the church.

In this councell alſo it was decréed, to ouerthꝛow all the monaſteries of monks, foꝛ which cauſe diuerſe were ſent out into all places of the realme to execute the ſame. By occaſion whereof, the quéene being in France, and deſirous to haue peacefull landing in Scotland; would not foꝛ this pꝛeſent meddle with religion, but diſſembled the ſame: although Dureus abbat of Ferline, and John Sinclere latelie apointed biſhop of Vꝛechine, did vehementlie perſuade and laboꝛ hir to the contrarie.

Fr.Thin. 1560. Abbridged out of the printed booke thereof.

In this yeare also on the ninth of March, was the election of superintendents at Edenburgh, which was published to serue for the election of all other ministers in this forme following (John Knox being the minister thereof.) First was made a sermon, in which these parts were intreated; principallie the necessitie of ministers and superintendents. Secondlie the crimes & vices that might vnable them of the ministerie. Thirdlie the vertues required in them. Fourthlie & lastlie, whether such as by publike consent of the church were called to such office, might refuse the same.

The sermon finished, it was declared by the same minister John Knox (the maker of that speech or sermon) that the lords of the secret councell had giuen charge and power to the churches of Louthian, to chose maister John Spotswood superintendent, & that sufficient warning was made by publike edict to the churches of Edenburgh, Luithithgue, Striueling, Treuent, Hadington, & Dunbar, as also to earles, lords, barons, gentlemen and others, which haue or might claime to haue voice in the election to be present that daie at the same houre. And therefore inquisition was made, who were present, and who were absent.

After this was called the said maister John Spotswood, who answering to his name, the minister Knox demanded, if anie man knew anie crimes or offenses of the said Spotswood, that might disable him to be called to that office. Which thing thrise demanded, there was after question moued to the whole multitude; if there were anie other whome they would put in election with the said Spotswood. Then the people were asked whether (if they admitted the said Spotswood for their superintendent) they would honor and obeie him as Christes minister in euerie thing perteining to his charge.

Euerie nation is to haue his peculiar gouernement in religion, as is best liking to the godlie disposers of the religion of that countrie, sith vulgus monstrii multorum capitum.

Wherevnto the people answered that they would, which thus granted, there were further questions and matters touching the articles of the apostles creed, and concerning the state of religion propounded to the superintendent, intended to be created. Wherevnto, when he had answered affirmatiuelie, the people were againe demanded for his allowance; which they easilie granted with the consent of the nobilitie. These things thus performed, and a certeine praier (to obteine the spirit of God to be powred into this new elect vessell) finished, the rest of the ministers (if there be anie) and elders of the church present, in signe of their full consent, shall take the elected by the hand.

And so the chiefe minister giuing an especiall benediction (the forme whereof is there set downe, with the exhortation which they must also vse to the elected) this election is wholie finished (without anie imposition of hands on his head) and he sufficientlie created a superintendent minister; of whose election of elders, deacons, excommunications, and other ecclesiasticall regiment, I meane not to speake anie more (as matter impertinent to my discourse, though not to the nature of an ecclesiasticall history) sith I haue onelie here in hand the politicall and temporall gouernement, and not the discourse of religion and essentiall forme thereof.]

Ambassadors sent into England.

Before this, in the beginning of the winter this yeare, the lords sent the earle of Morton and Glencarne, and the yong lard of Ledington secretarie, ambassadors into England; to giue thanks to the quæns maiestie of England, for the aid which they had receiued of hir, to expell the Frenchmen. The 1561. earle of Murreie passed through England into France. He departed from Edenburgh the eighteenth of March, and in Aprill came to Vitrie, as hereafter shall appeare; where he found the quéne, meaning to submit himselfe. But the day before he came, maister John Lesle officiall of Aberden was come thither, who was sent from the earle of Huntleie, and other the lords spirituall and temporall of the north parts; he tooke ship in the rode of Aberden, and landing at Vrule in Holand, passed through the lowe countries in post till he came to Paris, and from thence vnto Vitrie aforesaid [the eightéenth kalends of March] where he found the quæne, whom he most dutifullie saluted. Fr.Thin.

After which (being most courteoulie receiued of hir) he opened vnto hir the effect of his ambassage, which consisted spectallie vpon these parts; to admonish the quæne that she should not suffer hir selfe to be blinded or deceiued with the flattering words of James the prior of saint Andrews (hir bastard brother) for his onelie drift was, that he (hauing no French aid with him into Scotland) might obteine of the quæne the whole gouernement of the kingdome, vnder the colour whereof he might more easilie teare & cleane ouerthrow the catholike religion; which he did assault by all meanes possible. This is he which before is called the earle of Murreie that went into France but not rightlie, for he was not earle vntill long after this time.

Wherefore Lesle did with all the firmest aduise and counsell which he might, vrge the quæne not to yéeld to his cloked words. For the obteining of which demand from the quæne, he did fitlie ad to his persuasions, that James did rather aspire to the kingdome, than that he fixed his mind and eie vpon the ouerthrow of religion. Wherefore, if she had anie care of hir owne and the réalms affaires; she must prouide that this James should remaine in France, vntill she were arriued in Scotland, & had pacified all the tumults there.

But if she would not do so, that yet at least she should take order, that she with hir naule should land in the north parts of Scotland, & first go to Aberden: for by that meanes she might prouide, that the setled lords of the religion might sone be pacified, and the rest which were yet wauering, might more freelie and willinglie be brought againe to the catholike religion. For there was an other order to be vsed in Scotland, than that which the French obserued, whilest they gouerned there; at which time vndoubtedlie the Scots were hopelesse euer to haue inioied the presence of the quæne.

But now, sith that the Scots do vnderstand, that their quæne (contrarie to their hope) will returne vnto them, hir presence will (like the rising sun) so cause the clouds of all tumults to vanish out of the minds of all hir subiects, that they will easilie incline to the mind of the quæne, whatsoeuer she shall thinke, attempt, set downe, or decree, in restoring of religion. For the Scots are of that mind towards their princes, as they will in all things obeie their vpright gouernors; and are accustomed with no lesse mind to resist tyrants, if they vsurpe vpon them in eraction of authoritie.

Wherefore Lesleus did earnestlie persuade the quæne in the name of the earle of Huntleie, and the other nobilitie, that she should not giue hir selfe (as vanquished) into the hands of the enimies, and especiallie of James Steward hir brother, from whome (as from a fountéine) all their seditions haue had beginning. For James Cullen (kinsman to the erle of Huntleie, an expert seruitor in the warres by sea and land) was sent forth with Lesle (as captéine of that iournie) to bring hir safe to Aberden. For all the nobles of the north prouinces will sone be readie with twentie thousand men to gard hir to Edenburgh, and to defend hir against all the counsels, deceipts, and forces of all men.

Which message being thus ended from the mouth of Lesle, the quæne commanded him not to depart from hir, vntill she returned into Scotland; and further

further gaue in charge, that letters ſhould be written to the peeres and nobilitie of Scotland, to let them vnderſtand of hir comming into Scotland, & to be a witneſſe of hir good will vnto them. The next day after came to the queene at Vitrie, in Champaigne, James Steward (which is touched a little before) the prior of S. Andrews. Who after he had in re-uerence done his dutie, bound himſelfe with all fi-delitie, trauell, and diligence, moſt religiouſlie vnto hir; faithfullie further promiſing, that he would procure that the Scots ſhould willinglie obeie hir, without anie forren powers to be brought by hir in-
to Scotland.

For it was thought that he went into France for that purpoſe, to diſſuade the queene that ſhe ſhould not bring any power of the French with hir. But in the end, diſcering his mind more fullie, and putting awaie all ſuſpicion of deceit, he did with more fami-liaritie requeſt the queene to honor him with the erldome of Murreie. Whereunto the queene did courteouſlie anſwer, that ſhe would ſatiſfie his requeſt when ſhe came into Scotland. Wherefore, when this James perceiued that the queene was ſomewhat well bent towards him, and that ſhe credited his words, he attended on hir vnto Janeuille, and there remaining with hir a certeine ſpace, did after go into Scotland (as is before ſaid) to prepare the minds of the people, that they might receiue the queene comming into the realme, with good conſent and du-tifull honor; who paſſing through England, came into Scotland in the kalends of Maie.]

The nobles aſſemble at Edenburgh.

The duke of Chatelerault, the earles of Hunt-leie, Atholl, Marchall, and all other the noble men of the realme, aduertiſed of the queens comming, aſſembled at Edenburgh with all poſſible diligence.
In the meane time, whilſt the queene was preparing to take hir iournie, and to come into Scotland, the queene of England ſet forth ſome of hir great ſhips to the ſeas, to watch & gard the coaſts of hir realme.

Ships wait in the narrow ſeas.

Whereof they being aduertiſed in France, ſent the abbat of ſaint Colmes Inch to the queene of England, to deſire of hir a ſafe conduct, in caſe by wind or tempeſt ſhe chanced to land in England. But before he was returned to Calis therewith, as he was appointed; the queene and hir retinue were ſafelie landed in Scotland; neuertheleſſe, the Engliſh ſhips toke ſome of the Scotiſh lords, as the earle of Eglenton his ſhip, and others, which were brought into England, and ſtaied for a time; but were after releaſed, and ſent home into Scotland.

A ſafe conduct required.

Certeine ſhips taken.

The queene alſo, by the aduiſe of the L. of France, ſent monſieur Doiſell into England, to paſſe through the ſame into Scotland before hir cõming, there to haue receiued the forts of Dumbar and Inſkeith, of monſieur Charlebois, and to haue kept the ſame till hir comming. But he was ſtaied, and paſ-ſed no further than to London: for it was thought that his going into Scotland would turne to no great benefit of that realme: becauſe that he & mon-ſieur Rubeie were the principall authors of all the troubles in Scotland, betwixt the queene regent, and the nobilitie there. She was attended on from Paris vnto Calis with manie noble men; namelie hir fir vncles, the dukes of Guiſe, and Daumall, the cardinall of Lorraine and Guiſe, the grand prior, and the marqueſſe Dalbeuf, alſo the duke de Ne-meurs, and other of hir friends and kinſmen.

Monſieur Doiſell.

The queene was conueied into Calis.

There were two gallies prepared, and certeine other ſhips to go with hir into Scotland, and there went with hir three of hir ſaid vncles, the duke Daumall, the grand prior, and the marqueſſe Dalbeuf:
alſo monſieur Danuille the conſtables ſonne, and diuerſe other. She arriued at Leith the twentith day of Auguſt, in the yeare of our Lord 1561, where ſhe was honorablie receiued by the earle of Argile, the lord Erſkin, the prior of ſaint Andrews, and of the burgeſſes of Edenburgh, and conueied to the abbeie of Holie rod houſe. For (as ſaith Buchanan) when ſome had ſpread abroad hir landing in Scotland, the nobilitie and others aſſembled out of all parts of the realme, as it were to a common ſpec-tacle.

Buchanan, lib. 17.

This did they, partlie to congratulat hir returne, & partlie to ſhew the dutie which they alwaies bare vnto hir (when ſhe was abſent) either to haue thanks therefore, or to preuent the ſlanders of their enimies; whereof not a few by theſe beginnings of hir reigne did geſſe what would follow; although in thoſe ſo variable motions of the minds of the people, euerie one was verie deſirous to ſee their queene offred vnto them (vnlooked for) after ſo manie haps of both fortunes as had fallen vnto hir. For when ſhe was but ſix daies old, ſhe loſt hir father among the cruell tempeſts of battell, and was by great diligence brought vp by hir mother (being a choſen and worthie perſon) but yet left as a preie to others, by reaſon of ciuill ſeditions in Scotland, and of outward warres with other nations, being further laid abroad to all the dangers of frowning fortune, before ſhe could know what euill did meane.

For leauing hir owne countrie, ſhe was nouriſhed as a baniſhed perſon, and hardlie preſerued in life from the weapons of hir enimies, & violence of the ſeas. After which, fortune began to flatter hir, in that ſhe honored hir with a worthie mariage, which in truth was to this queene rather a ſhadow of toie, than anie comfort at all. For ſhortlie after the ſame, all things were turned to ſorrow, by the death of hir new yong huſband, and of hir old and greeued mother; by loſſe of hir new kingdome, and by the doubt-full poſſeſſion of hir old inheritable realme. But as for theſe things ſhe was both pitied and praiſed; ſo was ſhe alſo for gifts of nature as much loued and fauored; in that, beneficiall nature (or rather god God) had indued hir with a beautifull face, a well compoſed bodie, an excellent wit, a mild nature, and good behauior; which ſhe had artificiallie further-red by courtlie education and affable demeanor.
Whereby at the firſt ſight, ſhe wan vnto hir the hearts of moſt people, and confirmed the loue of hir faithfull ſubiects.]

Coſtlie iewels

Being thus come out of France, ſhe brought into Scotland manie rich and coſtlie iewels of gold worke, pretious ſtones, orient pearls, & ſuch like, as excellent and faire as were to be found within Europe, with rich furniture of houſhold, as hangings, carpets, counterpoints, and all other neceſſaries for the furniſhing of hir princelie houſes. The chiefeſt part of the hangings and other furniture of houſehold, was ſhiped at Rone, and arriued at Leith in the moneth of October next following. After the queene of Scots had remained the ſpace of foure or fiue daies at Holie rod houſe, the duke of Chatelerault, the earle of Argile, and diuerſe other of the nobilitie being preſent, there was an act made by the lords of the councell [in which none of the cleargie (as ſaith Leſleus lib. 10. pa. 580) were preſent] with con-ſent of the queene, that to remoue all cauſes of trouble in time to come for the matter of religion, it was ordeined, that no alteration of the eſtate of religion publikelie ſtanding within the realme, at hir arriuall in the ſame, ſhould be made; & that nothing ſhould be attempted, either publikelie or priuatlie to the contrarie, vpon great paine, which was put forth and publiſhed through all parts of the realme with great diligence.

After this, there were eleuen temporall lords, and by whose aduise she should rule and gouerne things, six of them to remaine continuallie with hir in roome of officers, as the secretarie, comptroller, and others. The lords of the priuie councell were these, the duke of Chatelerault, the earle of Huntleie chancellor, the earle of Argile, the earle of Atholl, the earle Marshall, the earle of Glencarne, the earle of Morton, the earle of Montrosse, the earle of Errol, maister Henrie Sinclar bishop of Rosse, and the lord Erskin, with the prior of S. Andrew. ✻ But among these reioisings of the quænes interteinment into hir kingdome, there happened a light fault, but such as did deepelie enter into the minds of both the factions, of the catholikes (forsooth) and of the reformed religion.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 16.

For where it was agréed by the quéene and the nobilitie, that no alteration should be had of religion in the publike state, yet was masse permitted to hir and to hir familie priuilie to be vsed. For the preparation whereof whilest the vestments and other things were caried through the hall into the chappell, one of the companie snatched awaie the wax candels and brake them: by occasion whereof (if some of the household had not come betweene to helpe in that action, and ended the same) all the other furniture had béene throwne downe. Which matter was taken of people diuerslie, some blaming it as a most sawcie part; others interpreting it, that it was onelie done to trie the patience of the priest; and some iudged and said that the priest was worthie to be punished with that paine which the scripture appointeth to idolaters.

Which matter in the verie beginning was appeased by James the quénes bastard brother, not yet created, but in expectation earle of Murreie. For which cause he would not offend the quæne, as I suppose, though afterward he not onelie offended hir, but deposed hir, and set vp hir sonne; as more plainlie shall hereafter appeare. At the quieting of this matter (saith Buchanan) George Gordon was greatlie grieued, being a man bent to all occasions of troubles, who thinking now to win fauor to him thereby, did say to the quénes vncles that were present, that he would reduce the countrie beyond Caledon vnto the old religion. The which being indéed suspected of manie, and feared by such as had heard manie other things of his wit; they caried the same to the quénes brother, by meanes whereof this little sparke in the beginning was the occasion of all the long ciuill dissention in Scotland, as I am led to iudge by manie reasons.

Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 587.

But now although the gouernment (as before is touched) was appointed to twelue before named, or at lest to six, which by turnes should be assistant to the quéene: yet the whole déed of ruling did in effect depend vpon hir bastard brother James, by reason of the fauor that the quæne especiallie did beare vnto him. Wherefore this James, vsing the quænes authoritie at his pleasure, did bestow manie liberall gifts vpon his fellowes. Which the nobles so much misliked, that in the end manie of them began egerlie to beare his authoritie, as hereafter shall be more touched.]

Daumal went with the two gallies into France. The rest went through England into France.

The duke Daumall, after he had remained with the quéene a certeine time, toke his leaue of hir, and with the gallies returned into France. The grand prior and monsieur Dannille tarted somewhat longer, and passed through England into France. The marquesse Daulbeuf taried in Scotland all the nert winter, till the spring of the yére, and then returned into France through England. The towne of Edenburgh prepared great and costlie triumphs for the quénes entering, which shée made into that towne in the moneth of September. After this, she passed vnto Striueling, and from thence to Perth, and then to Dundee, and also to saint Andrews, into which townes she was receiued with great honor and triumph. From saint Andrews she returned vnto Edenburgh, where she remained all the nert winter. In December there was a great assemblie of all the principall lords, spirituall and temporall of the realme; where it was demanded of the prelats, to grant the third part of the fruits of their benefices to the quéene, towards the bearing of hir charges for the maintenance of hir traine, and to susteine the ministers, till some order were taken to mainteine hir household, and a gard to tend on hir, by the aduise of the estates.

The quéne visited the townes.

An assemblie of the lords.

The third part of the spirituall liuing demanded.

The prelats agréed for the quénes pleasure to support hir with the fourth part of the fruits of their benefices, for one yéares space onelie, to helpe to beare hir charges, and to susteine hir gard; and in the meane time order might be taken by the aduise of the whole estates for the same. But notwithstanding the refusall of the prelates to paie the third part, the lords of the priuie councell made an act, and set forth letters, that all the prelats and beneficed men should be charged to paie yéerelie to the quénes comptroller and his collector, the whole thirds of all fruits of their benefices: and that it should be lawfull to the comptroller and his deputies, to take the third of what part of euerie benefice where he best pleased, and to deale therewith at his pleasure: also to haue to do with the rents of brotherhods of common churches, and such like. This order hath béene obserued euer since, not without great grudge of the prelats, and other beneficed men of the realme, and their friends, as well those that professed the reformed religion, as others.
